
Third World Quarterly

1987 Index

Third World Foundation
for Social and Economic Studies

Third World Quarterly

1987 Index

Third World Foundation for Social and Economic Studies
London

This Index is published by
THIRD WORLD FOUNDATION
New Zealand House
80 Haymarket, London SW1Y 4TS

© Third World Foundation 1987

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced or transmitted, in any form by any means without permission.

Printed in Great Britain
by The Eastern Press Ltd.
London and Reading

Notes on the Index

The Index contains three parts:

- (i) Subject Index
- (ii) Geographical Index
- (iii) Title Index of books reviewed, with authors' names, and (in brackets) reviewers' names

The following abbreviations are used throughout the Index:

- E (Editorial)
- FR (Feature Review)
- LFR (Literary Feature Review)
- LP (Literary Profile)
- LR (Literary Review)
- M (North-South Monitor)
- R (Review)

Subject Index

- Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome official Kenyan response, (3)906-19
- Afghanistan
exile politics of, (1)67-84
- Africa
creative writing, exile and dictatorship in, education and development in, (3)1019-
(1)271-96
21(R) famine and relief in, (3)1013-6(R)
FAO conference, (1)297(M)
Francophone states summit, (2)688-9(M)
Horn, crises in, (3)ix-xiv(E) international relations, (3)1018-9(R) literature of, (3)986-92(LP); (3)993-6(LR) Lusophone states summit, (4)1496-7(M)
Marxist states in, (2)744-50(R) music of, (3)1021-2(R) politics in post-independent, (3)967-70(FR) population movements in, (4)1282-1310
reference books about, (4)1438-41(BN)
Soviet foreign policy in, (4)1106-11 technology, institutions of, (3)1032-3(BN)
- AFRICA Fund Committee, (3)1075-6(M)
- African National Congress communist links with, (2)397-8 exile of, between 1976-86, (1)1-27
Freedom Charter, (2)672-7
- African Petroleum Producers' Association,
(3)1072-3(M)
- agriculture, (3)310-12(M); (1)312(M) in Namibia, (2)712-19(R)
reform of in Peru, (1)372-4(R)
- AIDS, see Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome
- AMIN, Samir article by on capitalism, inequality and despotism in the Third World, (4)1129-56
- ANC, see African National Congress
- ANGELL, Alan and Susan Carstairs article by on exiles and Chilean politics,
(1)148-67
- Angola
economy, politics and society in, (2)744-
50(R)
Savimbi's claims, (3)964-6(FR) summit, (4)1495-6(M) women in, (1)354-8
- Arab League, (2)692(M); (3)1067(M);
(4)1491(M)
- Arab poetry and fiction, (4)1405-9(LR);
(4)1409-12(LR)
- Argentina
bibliography on exile and dictatorship in,
(1)257-8, 269
literature on violence in, (4)1366-70(LR) summits, (1)320-1(M); (4)1486-7(M)
- arms
North-South flow, (4)1257-81
sale of and Gulf war, (4)1454
- ASEAN, see Association of Southeast Asian Nations
- Asia
human rights activism, (1)367-8(R)
- Asia, South
industrial growth prospects, (4)1225-56
population movements in, (4)1282-1310 women in leadership politics and movements, (3)848-70
Urdu poetry, (3)998-1000(LR)
- Asia, Southeast
human rights activism, (1)366-7(R)
industrial growth prospects, (4)1225-56
- Association of Southeast Asian Nations
Indochina crisis and, (3)976-83(FR) ministerial meetings, (1)317-19(M); (2)687-
8(M); (4)1487-9(M)
- Bangladesh
drug policy in, (4)1420-2(R) industrial growth prospects, (4)1225-56
- Barbados
bibliography on, (4)1436-7(BN)
- BASTOS, Augusta Roa writing and exile in Paraguay, (1)212-28; (1)229-45
- BOESAK, Allan
speeches and writing on South Africa,
(2)385-94; (2)728-31(R)
- BONTEMS, Claude
article by on Saharawi Arab Democratic Republic, (1)168-86
- Brazil
bibliography on exile and dictatorship in,
(1)258, 269

SUBJECT INDEX

- Brazil (continued)
 debt repayments by, (4)1156-66; (4)1486-7(M) exiles returning to, (1)203-11 novels from, (4)1381-5(LR) summit meetings, (1)320-1
- BROWNE, Robert article by on aid to post-apartheid South Africa, (2)439-514
- Cambodia
 recent history of, (3)976-83(FR)
- CAMPBELL, Horace article by on dismantling the military in post-apartheid South Africa, (2)468-92
- Caribbean
 bibliography on exile and dictatorship, (1)258-9, 268-9
 conflict in and international law, (4)1449-59
 Dominican Republic in, (4)1433(R) literature of, (4)1371-5(LR) women and literature in, (4)1390-5(LR) reference books on, (3)1030(BN); (4)1434(BN)
- CARSTAIRS, Susan and Alan Angell
 article by on exiles and Chilean politics, (1)148-67
- Central America
 bibliography on exile and dictatorship in, (1)159-60, 268-9
 conflict in and international law, (4)1449-59 economies in, (1)369-71(R) reference book on, (4)1434(BN)
- Central American Common Market, (3)1061-2(M)
- Chile
 bibliography on exile and dictatorship in, (1)260-1, 270
 exiles and politics, (1)148-67
- China (People's Republic)
 democracy in, (1)368-9(R)
 Kampuchea and, (3)976-83(FR) reform and adjustment in, (4)1341-4(FR) year book on, (4)1440(BN)
- cities
 guide to world, (3)1033(BN)
- cocoa discussions and agreement on prices and production of, (1)300-1(M)
- coffee discussions and agreement on prices and production of, (1)300(M); (3)1053-4(M); (4)1472-3(M)
- commodities, (1)300-3(M); (2)684-5(M); (3)1053-4(M); (4)1470-3(M)
- Commonwealth
 finance ministers, meeting of, (2)686-7(M) Games, boycott of, (1)324-5(M) heads of government on South African sanctions, (1)306-8(M)
- Communaute Economique de l'Afrique de l'Ouest, (4)1494-5
- Contadora Group, (3)1061-2(M); (3)1064-6(M); (4)1485-6(M)
- Costa Rica
 summit meeting, (3)1065-6(M)
- CRABTREE, John
 article by on consolidation of Garcia government in Peru, (3)804-24
- Cuba
 role of Jose Marti in, (1)371-2(R)
- DABYDEEN, David and Nana Wilson-Tagoe annotated bibliography by on themes in West Indian literature, (3)921-60(B)
- debt
 Brazil on repayment of, (4)1157-66
 Latin American, (4)1167-83
- democracy
 China and, (1)368-9(R)
 lack of and inequality in Third World, (4)1129-56 Latin America and, (4)1431-2(R) in Philippines, (4)1329-38(FR) and pluralism in Africa, (3)967-70(FR) in Sudan, evaluation of, (3)891-905 voting patterns and, (4)1434(BN)
- development
 economic anthropology and, (3)1007-8(R) political economy of, (3)1005-7(R) women and, (4)1422-4(R)
- disarmament, see also arms
 Five Continent Peace Initiative on, (1)303-4(M)
 US-Soviet talks on, (3)1055-9(M); (4)1473-5(M)
- Dominican Republic
 politics and development in, (4)1433(R)
- drugs
 politics of, (3)1011-12(R); (4)1420-2(R)
- D'SOUZA, Herbert article by on return of exiles to Brazil, (1)203-11
- DURAN, Esperanza seminar paper by on Contadora, (4)1456-7

SUBJECT INDEX

- education and development in Africa, (3)1019-21(R)
in Namibia, (2)712-19(R)
- EEC, see European Economic Community
- Egypt
families, emotional and social roles of,
(1)361(R)
- El Salvador
summit meeting, (3)1065-6(M)
women in, (1)354-8(R)
- environmental warfare, (4)1348-51(FR)
- Eritrea
crises in, (3)ix-xiv(E)
- ETCHESON, Craig article by on civil war and coalition government of Democratic Kampuchea, (1)187-202
- Ethiopia
crises in, (3)ix-xiv(E)
famine and relief in, (3)1013-16(R) politics, economics and society in, (2)744-
50(R) relations with superpowers, (4)1415-16(R)
- European Economic Community, (2)687-
8(M); (3)1061-2(M)
- exile, see individual countries conference on, (4)1459-60 editorial on, (1)ix-xi(E)
- Fair Traders in Agriculture, (1)310-11(M)
- FAIZ Memorial lecture (1986), (2)700
- FAO, see United Nations Food and Agriculture Organisation
- FASSIH, Esmail article by on status of writers in Iran, (3)825-47
- FAUNDEZ, Julio seminar paper by on international law and liberation wars, (4)1452-3
- FFRENCH-DAVIS, Ricardo article by on Latin American debt and capital flows, (4)1167-83
- FITZGERALD, E U K
seminar paper by on Nicaragua and US destabilisation, (4)1457-8
- Five Continent Peace Initiative, (1)303-4(M)
- FLS, see Southern African Frontline States
- food
UN programmes on, (1)297-8(M)
- FORTIN, Alfred J article by on official Kenyan response to AIDS, (3)906-19
- foundations, directory of, (4)1435-6(BN)
- France
summit with Francophone states, (2)688-
9(M) Francophone states of Africa, summit meeting, (2)688-9(M)
- FREDERIKSE, Julie article by on media and South Africa, (2)638-56
- GARCIA, Alan popularity of used in consolidation of ruling party, (3)804-24
- GATT, see General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade
- GELB, Stephen and Duncan Innes article by on post-apartheid South African economy, (2)545-82
- GELDOF, Bob awarded 1986 Third World Prize, (3)1043-9
- General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade,
(1)304-6(M); (1)311-14(M)
- Ghana
traditional theatre in, (2)750-5(R)
- government and politics in post-independent Africa,
(3)967-70(FR)
reference book on, (3)1034(BN)
- GRAHAM-YOOLL, Andrew article by on Latin American exiles in Europe, (1)246-53
- Group of Five, (2)685-6(M)
- Group of Seven, (2)685-6(M); (3)1059-61(M);
(4)1477(M)
- Group of Ten, (2)681-3(M); (4)1468-70(M)
- Group of Twenty-four, (2)681-3(M); (4)1468-
70(M)
- Guatemala history of, (3)1026-8(R)
summit meeting, (3)1065-6(M)
- Gulf Cooperation Council, (1)316(M);
(2)693(M); (3)1070(M); (4)1491(M)
- HAMILTON, Clive
article by on growth prospects in South Asia and Southeast Asia, (4)1125-56
- HANLON, Joseph article by on post-apartheid relations between South Africa and neighbours,
(2)437-49

SUBJECT INDEX

HANLON, Joseph (continued)
seminar paper on South African destabilisation strategies, (4)1455-6 health

in Namibia (2)712-19(R)
pharmaceuticals in Third World, (4)1420-2(R) in South Africa, (2)731-4(R)

HINDSON, Doug article by on urbanisation strategies in South Africa, (2)583-600

Honduras
summit meeting, (3)1065-6(M)

human rights in America, (1)343-5(R) in Asia, (1)367-8(R) information and documentation on, (1)343-9(R); (3)1032(BN) in Israel, (1)345-7(R) in Southeast Asia, (1)367-8(R)

HYMAN, Anthony article by on exile politics of Afghanistan,
(1)67-84

IDA, see International Development Association

IMF, see International Monetary Fund

India
encyclopedia on, (4)1441(BN)
industrial growth prospects, (4)1225-56
novels from, (4)1399-1405(LR)
Sikh separatism, (1)361-3(R); (4)1206-24
Tamilnad, (3)1026(R)

Indonesia
background to, (3)1025-6(R) capitalism in, (4)1429-31(R) military and politics in, (1)337-42(FR)
industrial growth prospects, (4)1225-56

INNES, Duncan and Stephen Gelb article by on post-apartheid South African economy, (2)545-82

Inter-African Coffee Organisation, (3)1053-4(M); (4)1472-3(M)

International Cocoa Agreement, (1)300-1(M)
International Coffee Organisation, (1)300(M);
(3)1053-4(M); (4)1472-3(M)

International Development Association,
(2)681(M); (3)1052-3(M)

International Fund for Agricultural Development, (3)1051-2(M)

International Law
seminar on regional conflicts and, (4)1449-59

International Monetary Fund, (2)681-3(M);
(3)1052-3(M); (4)1468-70(M)

International Tin Council, (2)684-5(M)

International Tropical Timber Agreement,
(1)302(M)

Iran

Afghan resistance, role in, (1)80-2 post-revolutionary exiles, (1)108-29 status of writer in, (3)825-47

Iraq

Jews in, (4)1428-9(R)
military role in politics, (1)365-6(R) war with Iran, response to, (3)1023-4(R)

Islam, see Shi'i Islam

Islamic Conference Organisation, (3)1068-70(M)

Israel

human rights in, (1)345-7(R) and Iraqi Jews, (4)1428-9(R)
Palestinian Arabs in, (4)1405-9(LR)

JACKSON, Jesse presidential bid, (3)1001(R)

JAHAN, Rounaq
article by on women in leadership, politics and women's movements in South Asia,
(3)848-70

JOFFE, George
seminar paper by on legal implications of conflict in Gulf and Mediterranean,
(4)1453-4

Kampuchea (Coalition Government of Democratic)
civil war and coalition government, (1)187-202

Indochinese meeting on, (1)319-20(M);
(4)1487-9(M)

politics of, (3)976-83(FR)

KAPUR, Rajiv A

article by on Sikh separatism and the creation of a state of 'Khalistan', (4)1206-24

KATJAVIVI, Peter

seminar paper by on Namibia, (4)1455

Kenya

official response to AIDS, (3)906-19

SUBJECT INDEX

'Khalistan', demand for creation, (4)1206-24
see also India

KIRKWOOD, Mike

article by on literature and popular culture in South Africa, (2)657-71

KLARE, Michael T

article by on North-South arms flow and impact on Third World, (4)1257-81

KOPIETZ, Hans-Heino

seminar paper by on Gulf war and arms sales, (4)1454-5

Korea, South

exile and dissident movements in, (1)130-47

KORNBLUH, Peter article by on the Reagan Doctrine in Nicaragua, (4)1118-28

Laos

Indochinese meeting, (1)319-20(M)

Latin America

annotated bibliography on exile and dictatorship in, (1)254-70 debt and capital flow in, (4)1157-66; (4)1167-83

economy and democracy in, (4)1431-2(R)

encyclopedia on, (3)1030(BN)

exile movement in Europe, (1)246-53 literature and exile in, (1)229-45

population movements in, (4)1282-1310

Soviet foreign policy towards, (4)1111-15

women's movements in, (3)1010-11(R) liberation, national, (1)349-50(R)

Libya

Qaddafi's role in, (4)1426-8(R)

Lima Support Group, (3)1064-5(M); (4)1485-
6(M)

literature

African, (1)271-96; (2)751-5; (3)993-6(LR)

Arabic, (4)1405-9(LR); (4)1409-12(LR)

Argentinian, (4)1366-70(LFR)

Brazilian, (4)1381-5(LR)

Caribbean, (4)1399-1402(LR); (4)1402-
5(LFR)

Latin American, (1)229-45; (3)996-8

Mexican, (4)1378-81(LR)

Muslim, (4)1412-14(LR)

Naipaul V S, by, (4)1352-65(LP); (4)1376-
8(LR)

Nicaraguan, (4)1385-90(LR)

Paraguayan, (1)212-28; (1)375-6(R)

South African, (2)657-71; (2)728-31;
(4)1395-9(LR)

Soyinka, by, (3)986-92(LP)

Third World women's, (4)1390-5(LR)

Urdu poetry, (3)998-1000

West Indian, (921-60

LODGE, Tom

article by on the ANC 1976-86, (1)1-27,

Lusophone states in Africa, summit meetings, (4)1496-7(M)

MAJA-PEARCE, Adewale

literary profile by on Wole Soyinka, (3)986-92

Malawi

FLS meeting, (1)326-7(M)

Lilongwe agreement, (3)1078(M)

Malaysia

industrial growth prospects, (4)1225-56

MANDELA, Nelson

on future South Africa, (2)385-94

speeches and writings by, (2)728-31(R)

MANDELA, Winnie

on future South Africa, (2)385-94

MANLEY, Michael

1986 Manzur Qadir Memorial Lecture,
(2)700

on multilateral institutions, (4)1449-59

MANZUR Qadir Memorial Lecture, (2)700

MARES, David R

article by on Mexican sovereignty, autonomy, interdependence and political economy, (3)788-803

MARTI, Jose

role in Cuban revolution, (1)371-2(R)

Marxism

dictionary of, (3)1034(BN) influence on African writing, (2)750-5(R)

Marxist states

in Africa, (2)744-50(R)

McQUADE, Frank

annotated bibliography by on exile and dictatorship in Latin America since 1945, (1)254-70

MEER, Fatima

article by on South African political future, (2)396-407

Mexico

economy and the state, (3)970-5(FR) literary perspectives on, (4)1378-81(LR) research guides (4)1435(BN) sovereignty, autonomy, interdependence and political economy of, (3)788-803

SUBJECT INDEX

- Middle East conflicts and international law, (4)1449-59 socialist perspective on crises, (3)1024-5(R)
 Soviet foreign policy in, (4)1103-6
 yearbook on, (4)1437-8(BN)
- military, see also arms
 in Africa, (3)1018-19(R) and politics in Iraq, (1)365-6(R) and politics in Indonesia, (1)337-42(R) and politics in South Africa, (2)468-92;
 (2)724-7(R)
- mining in developing countries, (1)353-4(R)
 in Namibia, (2)712-19(R)
- MINTER, William
 article by on Western relations with post-apartheid South Africa, (2)450-67
- MOHAMMADI, Ali and Annabelle Sreberny-Mohammadi
 article by on post-revolutionary Iranian exiles, (1)108-29
- Mozambique
 Lilongwe agreement, (3)1078(M) revolution in, (3)1017-18(R) summit meetings, (3)326-7; (4)1495-6(M)
 Multi-Fibre Arrangement, (1)304-6(M) music, African, (3)1021-2(R)
 Muslim literature, (4)1412-4(LR)
- NAIPAUL, V S
 autobiographical writing, (4)1376-8(LR) literary profile of, (4)1352-65
- NAM, see Non-Aligned Movement
- Namibia
 reference books on, (3)1029(BN); (3)1030-1(BN); (3)1031-2(BN) situation in, (2)712-19(R)
 SWAPO, role in, (1)85-107
 UN authority in, (1)298-9; (4)1455
 UN conference on, (1)298-9(M)
- Neo-Marxism, dictionary of, (3)1034(BN)
- Nepal
 industrial growth prospects, (4)1225-56
- Nicaragua
 novels on, (4)1385-90(LR)
 Reagan Doctrine on, (4)1118-28
 US destabilisation of, (4)1457-8
- Nigeria
 Soyinka and, (3)986-92(LP)
 women in, (1)354-8(R)
- Non-Aligned Movement, (1)327-9(M); (1)333-4(M); (3)1063-4(M); (3)1075-6(M); (4)1485(M)
- North-South
 arms flow, (4)1257-81 nuclear weapons and materials provisions about by member-states of South Pacific Forum, (1)308-10(M) Soviet-US talks on, (3)1057-9(M); (4)1473-5(M)
 Warsaw Pact summit on, (4)1475-7(M)
- OAPEC, see Organisation of Arab Petroleum Exporting Countries
- OAU, see Organisation of African Unity
- O'DONNELL, Guillermo
 article by on debt repayments by Brazil, (4)1157-66
- OECD, see Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development
- OMOND, Roger
 article by on post-apartheid South African constitution, (2)622-37
- OPEC, see Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries
- Organisation of African Unity assessment of, (1)359-60(R) ministerial sessions of, (1)321-2(M); (1)322-4(M); (3)1073-5(M)
- Organisation of Arab Petroleum Exporting Countries, (3)1070(M); (4)1493(M)
- Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development, (4)1477-9(M)
- Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries, (1)314-6(M); (2)692-3(M); (3)1071-2(M); (4)1493-4
- OTTAWAY, Marina
 article by on coalition government in Sudan, (3)891-905
- Pacific Basin and Oceania
 bibliography on, (4)1436-7(BN)
- Pakistan
 industrial growth prospects, (4)1225-56
 literature from, (3)998-1000(LR); (4)1412-14(LR)
- Palestine exile politics, (1)28-66
 novels from, (4)1405-9(LR)

SUBJECT INDEX

Panama

roots of political instability, (3)763-87

Paraguay

annotated bibliography on exile and dictatorship, (1)261, 270

Bastos on writing and exile in, (1)212-28; (1)229-45; (1)375-6(R) parliaments, see also government compendium to world, (3)1029-30(BN)

Peru

agrarian reform, miners, peasants and entrepreneurs in, (1)372-4

bibliography on exile and dictatorship, (1)261-2

consolidation of Garcia's government, (3)804-24 novel set in, (3)996-8(LR) urban-rural themes, (1)374-5(R)

Philippines

history and crises in, (4)1329-38(FR)

industrial growth prospects, (4)1225-56

politics

in post-independence Africa, (3)967-70(FR) systems in, (4)1439(BN)

population

movement and distribution in Third World, (4)1282-1310

PROTHERO, R Mansell

article by on population movements and distribution in Third World, (4)1282-1310 refugees, US policy towards, (4)1424-6(R) resources

assessment of world, (3)1029(BN)

and population movements, (4)1282-1310

ROWE, William and Teresa Whitfield article by on literature and exile in Latin America, (1)229-45

rubber

discussion and agreement on prices, (2)684(M); (4)1470-1(M)

SAARC, see South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation

SADCC, see Southern African Development Coordination Conference

Sahara, Western

bibliography on, (3)1033-4(BN)

Saharawi Arab Democratic Republic, (1)168-86

SAMATAR, Ahmed I

article by on governance and dissent politics leading to impasse in Somalia, (3)871-90

SAVAGE, Michael

article by on social and economic costs of apartheid, (2)601-21

SAVIMBI, Jonas

leadership claims of, (3)964-6(FR)

SAYIGH, Yezid

article by on politics of Palestinian exile, (1)28-66

SHEARMAN, Peter

article by on Gorbachev's Third World policy, (4)1083-17

Shi'i Islam

history, doctrines and social protest of, (1)363-5(R)

SHIN-BOM, Lee

article by on exile and dissident movements in South Korea, (1)130-47 shipping

UNCTAD meeting on, (4)1466-7

slavery

and historical progress, (3)1012-3(R)

Somalia

crises in the Horn of Africa, (3)ix-xiv(E) governance and dissent politics, effect of, (3)871-90

South Africa

aid for post-apartheid, (2)493-514

apartheid, social and economic costs of, (2)601-21; (2)740-4(R) change in, (2)734-40(R)

Commonwealth sanctions against, (1)306-8(M) constitution post-apartheid, (2)622-37

destabilisation strategies of, (2)705-12(FR); (4)1455-6 economy post-apartheid, (2)545-82 education handbook on, (3)1031-2(BN)

health in, (2)731-4(R) literature and popular culture in, (2)657-71

media in, (2)6388-56

militarisation in, (2)724-7(R)

military, dismantling of post-apartheid, (2)468-92

novels from, (4)1395-9(LR)

political future of, (2)396-407 politics and ideology in, (2)705-12(FR); (2)719-24(R); (2)734-40(R); (2)740-4(R); (4)1345-8(FR) relations with neighbours post-apartheid, (2)450-67

SUBJECT INDEX

South Africa (continued)

- sanctions towards, (1)298-9(M); (1)306-B(M); (1)320-4(M); (4)1435-8(FR)
- social forces determining alternatives for, (2)515-44
- socialist alternatives for, (2)408-36
- statements by possible leaders, (2)385-94
- trade union activities in, (2)719-24(R)
- urbanisation in, (2)534-5; (2)583-600
- women in, (2)728-31(R); (2)740-4(R)
- South America
 - reference book on, (4)1434(BN)
- South Asia, see Asia, South
- South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation, (1)317(M); (2)690-1(M); (4)1489-91(M)
- South Pacific Forum, (1)308-10(M); (3)1062-3(M); (4)1482-4(M)
- South-South
 - monetary cooperation, (3)1003-5(R); (4)1184-1205
- South West People's Organisation
 - in exile, (1)85-107
- Southern African Development Coordination Conference, (1)325-6(M); (3)1076-7(M)
- Southern African Frontline States, (1)324-7(M); (2)439-42; (2)694-5(M); (3)1078(M); (4)1455-6
- Soviet Union
 - change under Gorbachev, (4)1338-41(FR)
 - disarmament talks with US, (3)1055-9(M); (4)1473-5(M)
 - foreign policy compared with US, (4)1418-20(R)
 - policy debates in, (3)1001-3(R)
 - Third World policy, (4)1083-17; (4)1415-16(R); (4)1417-18(R)
- SOYINKA, Wole
 - literary profile on, (3)986-92
- SREBERNY-MOHAMMADI, Annabelle and Ali Mohammadi
 - article by on post-revolutionary Iranian exiles, (1)108-29
- Sri Lanka
 - bibliography on, (4)1436-7(BN)
- STEWART, Frances
 - article by on South-South monetary cooperation, (4)1184-1205
- STONEMAN, Colin and John Suckling
 - article by on social forces determining post-apartheid alternatives in South Africa, (2)515-44
- SUCKLING, John and Colin Stoneman

article by on social forces determining post-apartheid alternatives in South Africa, (2)515-44

Sudan

- coalition government in, (3)891-905
- crises in, (3)ix-xiv(E)
- SWAPO, see South West People's Organisation
- SWILLING, Mark
 - article by on socialist alternatives in post-apartheid South Africa, (2)408-36
- Syria
 - bibliography on, (4)1436-7(BN)

Tanzania

- women and development in, (4)1422-4(R)
- technology
 - directory of African institutions, (3)1032-3(BN)
 - and economic development in Third World, (1)351-3(R)
 - source book on, (4)1440(BN)
- terrorism
 - bibliography on, (4)1435(BN)
- textiles
 - discussions and agreements on markets and materials, (1)304-6(M)

Thailand

- industrial growth prospects, (4)1225-56
- THIEME, John
 - literary profile by on V S Naipaul, (4)1352-65

Third World

- arms trade, effect of in, (4)1257-81
- capitalism, inequality, conflict in, (4)1129-56
- health and drugs in, (4)1420-2(R)
- monetary cooperation in, (4)1184-1205
- population movement in, (4)1282-1310
- reference books on, (4)1437(BN); (4)1438(BN)
- Soviet Union, relations with, (4)1083-1117; (4)1415-16(R); (4)1417-18(R)
- technology in, (1)351-3(R)
- term: origin, definition and usage of, (4)1311-27
- women and development in, (4)1422-4(R)
- Third World Foundation News, (1)333-4; (2)699-700(M); (3)1043-9; (4)1449-61
- Third World Prize 1986
 - awarded to Bob Geldof, (2)699-700(M)

SUBJECT INDEX

- THOMAS, Caroline
seminar paper by on economic sovereignty, (4)1451-2
- THOMAS, Roger G
annotated bibliography by, on exile, dictatorship and creative writing in Africa, (1)271-96
- timber
discussion and agreements on prices and production of, (1)302(M)
- tin
discussion and agreements on prices and production of, (2)684-5(M)
- Trinidad
and V S Naipaul, (4)1352-65(LP)
- TUTU, Desmond
on future South Africa, (2)385-94
sermons and speeches, (2)728-31(R)
- United Nations
encyclopedia on, (1)350-1(R)
- United Nations Conferences on Rubber,
(2)684(M); (4)1470-(M)
- United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, (1)300-1(M); (4)1467-
7(M)
- United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea, (4)1463-4(M)
- United Nations Food and Agricultural Organisation, (1)297-8(M)
- United Nations World Food Council,
(1)297(M)
- United States
disarmament talks with USSR, (3)1055-
9(M); (4)1473-5(M)
foreign policy, (3)961-4; (3)1018-19(R);
(4)1418-20(R)
human rights practices, (1)343-5(R)
Nicaragua, role in, (4)1118-28; (4)1457-8
Philippines, role in, (4)1329-38(FR) refugee policy, (4)1424-6(R)
- urbanisation
alternative South African strategies, (2)583-600
- Uruguay
bibliography on exile and dictatorship,
(1)262; (4)1486-7(M)
summit meeting, (1)320-1(M)
- Vietnam
herbicides used in, (4)1348-51(FR)
Indochinese meeting, (1)319-20(M)
- VIGNE, Randolph
article by on SWAPO in exile, (1)85-107
- Warsaw Pact, (4)1475-7(M)
- WEEKS, John
article by on roots of political instability in Panama, (3)763-87
- West Indies
annotated bibliography on literary themes, (3)921-60(B)
- Western Economic Summit, (4)1480-2(M)
- wheat
international discussion on subsidies of,
(1)302-3(M)
- WHITFIELD, Teresa and William Rowe article by on literature and exile in Latin America, (1)229-45
- WILSON-TAGOE, Nana and David Dabydeen
annotated bibliography by on themes of West Indian literature, (3)921-60(B)
- WOLF-PHILLIPS, Leslie article by on origin, definition and usage of term Third World, (4)1311-27
- women
characterisation of in West Indian literature, (3)939-42
decade of 1975-85, (3)1008-10(R) and development process, (4)1422-4(R)
Latin American movements, (3)1010-11(R) position and status in El Salvador, South Africa, Namibia, Angola, Nigeria,
(1)354-8(R)
in South Africa, (2)728-31(R); (2)740-4(R) in South Asian politics, (3)848-70
Third World writing by, (4)1390-5(LR) World Bank, (2)681-3(M); (3)1052-3(M);
(4)1468-70(M)
- Yemen, Arab Republic and People's Republic of
bibliography on, (3)1029(BN) politics, economy and society in, (3)983-5
- Zaire
summit meeting, (4)1495-6(M)
- Zambia
summit meetings, (1)326-7; (4)1495-6(M)
- Zimbabwe
FLS summit, (1)326-7
history from 1890-1980, (1)358-9(R)

Geographical Index

- Afghanistan, (1)67-84
- Africa (see also individual countries), (1)271-96(M); (1)321-9(M); (1)359-60; (2)688-9(M); (2)694-5 (M); (2)744-50(FR); (2)750-5(FR); (3)967-70(FR); (3)993-6(LR); (3)1013-16(R); (3)1018-22(R); (3)1032-4(R); (3)1072-8(M); (4)1106-11; (4)1340-5(LR); (4)1437-41(BN); (4)1472-3(M); (4)1494-7(M)
- Angola, (1)354-8(R); (2)744-50(R); (3)964-6(FR); (4)1495-7(M)
- Argentina, (1)257-8, 269; (1)320-1(M); (4)1366-70(FR); (4)1486-7(M)
- Asia (see also individual countries), (1)367-8(R)
- Asia, South (see also individual countries), (3)848-70; (3)998-1000(LR); (4) 1225-56; (4)1390-5(LR); (4)1489-91(M); (4)1282-1310
- Asia, Southeast (see also individual countries), (1)366-7(R); (2)687-8(M); (3)976-83(FR); (4)1225-56; (4)1487-9(M)
- Bangladesh, (4)1225-56; (4)1420-2(R)
- Barbados, (4)1436-7(BN)
- Brazil, (1)203-11; (1)258, 269; (1)320-1(M); (4)1157-66; (4)1381-5(LR); (4)1486-7(M)
- Cambodia, (3)976-83(FR)
- Caribbean (see also individual countries), (1)258-9, 268-9; (3)1030(R); (4)1371-5(FR); (4)1390-5(LR); (4)1434(BN)
- Central America (see also individual countries), (1)259-60, 268-9; (1)369-71(R); (3)1061-2(M); (4)1434(BN); (4)1485-6(M)
- Chile, (1)148-67; (1)260-1, 270
- China (People's Republic of), (1)368-9(R); (4)1341-4(FR); (4)1440(BN)
- Costa Rica, (3)1065-6(M)
- Cuba, (1)371-2(R)
- Dominican Republic, (4)1433(R)
- Egypt, (1)361(R)
- El Salvador, (1)354-8(R); (3)1065-6(M)
- Eritrea, (3)ix-xiv(E)
- Ethiopia, (2)744-50(R); (3)ix-xiv(E); (3)1013-16(R); (4)1415-16(R)
- France, (2)688-9(M)
- Ghana, (2)750-5(FR)
- Guatemala, (3)1026-8(R); (3)1065-6(M)
- Honduras, (3)1065-6(M)
- India, (1)361-3(R); (3)1026(R); (4)1206-24; (4)1225-56; (4)1399-1402(LR); (4)1441(BN)
- Indonesia, (1)337-42(FR); (3)1025-6(R); (4)1225-56; (4)1429-31(R)
- Iran, (1)80-2; (1)108-29; (3)825-47
- Iraq, (1)365-6(R); (3)1023-4(R); (4)1428-9(R)
- Israel, (1)345-7(R); (4)1405-9(LR)
- Kampuchea, (1)187-202; (1)319-20(M); (3)976-83(FR); (4)1487-9(M)
- Kenya, (3)906-19
- Korea, South, (1)130-47
- Laos, (1)319-20(M)
- Latin America (see also individual countries), (1)229-45; (1)246-53; (1)254-70; (3)1010-11(R); (3)1030(R); (4)1111-15; (4)1167-83; (4)1390-5(LR); (4)1431-2(R)
- Libya, (4)1426-8(R)
- Malawi, (1)326-7(M); (3)1078(M)
- Malaysia, (4)1225-56
- Mexico, (3)788-803; (3)970-5(FR); (4)1378-81(LR); (4)1435(BN)
- Middle East (see also individual countries), (3)1024-5(R); (4)1103-6(4); (4)1437(BN); (4)1449-59
- Mozambique, (1)326-7(M); (3)1017-18(R); (3)1078(M); (4)1495-7(M)
- Namibia, (1)85-107; (1)298-9(M); (1)355-8(R); (2)712-19(FR); (3)1029(R); (3)1030(R); (3)1031-2(R); (4)1449-59
- Nepal, (4)1225-56
- Nicaragua, (4)1118-28; (4)1385-90(LR); (4)1449-59
- Nigeria, (1)354-8(R); (3)986-92(LP)
- Pacific Basin and Oceania, (4)1436-7(BN)
- Pakistan, (3)998-1000(LR); (4)1225-56; (4)1412-14(LR)

GEOGRAPHICAL INDEX

- Palestine, (1)28-66; (4)1405-9(LR)
 Panama, (3)763-87
 Paraguay, (1)212-28; (1)229-45; (1)261, 270;
 (1)375-6(R)
 Peru, (1)261-2; (1)372-5(R); (3)804-24;
 (3)996-8(LR)
 Philippines, (4)1225-56; (4)1329-38(FR)

 Saharawi Arab Democratic Republic, (1)168-
 86
 Somalia, (3)ix-xiv(E); (3)871-90
 South Africa, (1)1-27; (1)306-8(M); (1)354-8(R); (2)385-679;* (2)705-12(FR);
 (2)719-24(FR); (2)724-7(FR); (2)728-
 31(FR); (2)731-4(FR); (2)734-40(FR);
 (2)740-4(FR); (4)1345-8(FR); (4)1359-
 9(LR); (4)1449-59
 South America, (4)1434(BN)
 Soviet Union, (3)1001-3(R); (3)1055-9(M);
 (4)1083-1117; (4)1338-41(FR); (4)1415-
 20(R); (4)1473-7(M)
 Sri Lanka, (4)1436-7(BN)
- Sudan, (3)891-905
 Syria, (4)1436-7(BN)

 Tanzania, (4)1422-4(R)
 Thailand, (4)1225-56
 Trinidad, (4)1352-65(LP)

 United States, (1)343-5(R); (3)961-4; (3)1001-
 3(R); (3)1005-9(M); (4)1118-28; (4)1424-
 6(R); (4)1437-5(M)
 Uruguay, (1)262, 270; (1)320-1(M); (4)1486-
 7(M)

 Vietnam, (1)319-20(M); (4)1348-51(FR)

 West Indies (see also individual countries),
 (3)921-60

 Yemen, (3)983-5; (3)1029(BN)

 Zaire, (4)1495-6(M)
 Zambia, (1)326-7(M); (4)1495-6(M)
 Zimbabwe, (1)326-7(M); (1)358-9(LR)

Title Index of Books Reviewed

- Access to Justice - The Struggle for Human Rights in South East Asia* ed. by Harry M Scoble and Laurie S Wiseman (Jeremy Smith) (1)366-7
- Africa: The Health Issue* ed. by Carol Barker and Meredith Turshen (G V Weston) (FR) (2)731-4
- Africa South of the Sahara* 1987 Europa Publications (4)1439
- African Crisis Areas and US Foreign Policy* ed. by Gerald J Bender, James S Coleman and Richard L Sklar (Douglas Rimmer) (3)1018-19
- African Economic Handbook* by Michael Todd (4)1440-1
- Afro World, The: Adventures in Ideas* ed. by O R Dathorne (Alastair Niven) (FR) 750-55
- Agrarian Reform and Rural Poverty: A Case Study of Peru* by Tom Alberts (Lewis Taylor) (1)372-4
- Angola: Politics, Economics and Society* by Keith Somerville (Ben Turok) (FR) (2)744-50
- Angolan Women: Building the Future: From National Liberation to Women's Emancipation* Organisation of Angolan Women (Joan Ebeid) (1)354-8
- Apartheid in Crisis* by Mark Uhlig (David Moore) (FR) (2)734-40
- Apata: The Story of a Reluctant Criminal* by Harold A Bascom (Michael Gilkes) (LFR) (4)1371-5
- Appropriate Technology Sourcebook* by Ken Darrow and Mike Saxeman (4)1440
- Arms and the African: Military Influences on Africa's International Relations* ed. by William J Foltz and Henry S Bienen (Douglas Rimmer) (3)1018-19
- Army and Politics in Indonesia, The* by Harold Crouch (FR) (1)337-42
- Arrow of God* by Chinua Achebe (Alastair Niven) (LR) (3)993-6
- Art and Ideology in the African Novel: A Study of the Influence of Marxism on African Writing* by Emmanuel Ngara (Alastair Niven) (FR) (2)750-5
- Barbados* by Robert B Potter and Graham M S Dann (4)1436-7
- Beggar Your Neighbours: Apartheid in South Africa* by Joseph Hanlon (Richard Moorsom) (FR) (2)705-12
- Beggar's Strike, The* by Aminata Sow Fall (Alastair Niven) (LR) (3)993-6
- Beka Lamb* by Zee Edgell (Michael Gilkes) (LFR) (4)1371-5
- Big Deal: The Politics of the Illicit Drugs Business* by Anthony Henman, Roger Lewis, Tim Malyon et al. (Andre McNicoll) (3)1011-12
- Biographical Dictionary of Marxism* ed. by Robert A Gorman (3)1034
- Bitter Pills: Medicine and the Third World Poor* by Dianne Melrose (Mahesh Surendra Patel) (4)1420-2
- Black Consciousness in South Africa: The Dialectics of Ideological Resistance and White Supremacy* by Robert Fatton Jr (Richard Moorsom) (FR) (2)705-12
- Black and Gold: Tycoons, Revolutionaries and Apartheid* by Anthony Sampson (Donald Woods) (FR) (4)1345-8
- Brutal Force - The Apartheid War Machine* by Gavin Cawthra (Elling Njaal Tjoenneland) (FR) (2)724-7
- Calculated Kindness: Refugees and America's Half-Open Door 1945-Present* by Gil Loescher and Joan A Schanlan (Ronald Kaye) (4)1424-6
- Call Me Woman* by Ellen Kuzwayo (Lionel Cliffe) (FR) (2)728-31
- Cambodia 1975-1982* by Michael Vickery (Craig Etcheson) (FR) (3)976-83
- Cambridge Encyclopedia of Latin America and the Caribbean, The* ed. by Simon Collier, Harold Blakemore and Thomas Skidmore (3)1030
- Challenges and Drought, The: Ethiopia's Decade of Struggle in Relief and Rehabilitation* Relief and Rehabilitation Commission (Randolph C Kent) (3)1013-16
- Change of Skin, A* by Carlos Fuentes (Jason Wilson) (LR) (4)1378-81
- China Challenge, The; Adjustment and Reform* by David S G Goodman, Martin Lockett and Gerald Segal (Shaun Breslin) (FR) (4)1341-4

TITLE INDEX OF BOOKS REVIEWED

China—Politics, Economics and Society:

- Iconoclasm and Innovation in a Revolutionary Socialist Country* by Marc Blecher (Shaun Breslin) (FR) (4)1341-4
- Chinese Democracy: The Individual and the State in Twentieth-Century China* by Andrew J Nathan (James Cotton) (1)368-9
- Cities of the World: Second Edition, Volumes 1, 2, 3 and 4* ed. by Margaret Walsh Young and Susan L Stetler (3)1033
- Cities of the World: Second Edition Supplement* ed. by Margaret Walsh Young and Susan L Stetler (3)1033
- Come to Laugh: African Traditional Theatre in Ghana* by Kwabena N Bame (Alastair Niven) (FR) (2)750-5
- Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1985* Department of State, Washington DC (Barnett R Rubin) (1)343-5
- Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1985: Israel* Department of State, Washington DC (Shaw J Dallal) (1)345-47
- Crisis in the Philippines: The Marcos Era and Beyond* by John Bresnan (Walden Bello) (FR) (4)1329-38

Democracy and Pluralism in Africa ed. by Dov Ronen (John Wiseman) (FR) (3)967-70

Destructive Engagement: Southern Africa at War ed. by Phyllis Johnson and David Martin (Richard Moorsom) (FR) (2)705-12

Development, Crises and Alternative Visions: Third World Women's Perspectives by Gita Sen and Caren Grown (Kathleen Staudt) (4)1422-4

Development Economics on Trial: The Anthropological Case for a Prosecution by Polly Hill (John Toye) (3)1007-8

Directory of African Technology Institutions, Volumes 1 and 2 comp. by J C Woillet and M Allal (3)1032-3

Dispensations: The Future of South Africa as South Africans See It by Richard John Neuhaus (David Moore) (FR) (2)734-40

Dominican Republic, The: Politics and Development in an Unsovereign State by Jan Knippers Black (Paul Sutton) (4)1433

Dona Flor and Her Two Husbands by Jorge Amado (Maria Alicia Ferrera-Pena) (LR) (4)1381-5

Double Colonization: A: Colonial and Post-Colonial Women's Writing ed. by Kirsten

Holst Petersen and Anna Rutherford (Nissa Torrents) (LR) (4)1390-5

Duke, The: Memories and Antimemories of a Participant in the Repression by Enrique Medina (Nick Caistor) (LFR) (4)1366-70

Economic Development of the Yemen Arab Republic, The by Ragaei El Mallakh (Fred Halliday) (FR) (3)983-5

Economic Policymaking in Mexico: Factors Underlying the 1982 Crisis by Robert E Looney (Laurence Whitehead) (FR) (3)970-5

Economies of Central America, The by John Weeks (George Irvin) (1)369-71

Economist Human Rights Guide, The by Charles Humana (Paul Sieghart) (1)347-9

Economist World Atlas of Elections, The: Voting Patterns in 39 Democracies by Dick Leonard and Richard Natkiel (4)1434

Education Priorities and Aid Responses in Sub-Saharan Africa ed. by Hugh Hawes and Trevor Coombe with Carol Coombe and Kevin Lillis (Angela Little) (3)1019-21

Education and Society in Africa by Mark Bray, Peter B Clarke and David Stephens (Angela Little) (3)1019-21

Elections and Democratisations in Latin America, 1980-85 ed. by Paul W Drake and Eduardo Silva (Harold Blakemore) (4)1431-2

Encyclopedia of the Third World: Third Edition by George Thomas Kurian (4)1438

Encyclopedia of the United Nations and the International Agreements by Edmund Jan Osmanczyk (Philip Alston) (1)350-1

Encyclopedia of World Problems and Human Potential ed. by Union of International Associations (3)1030-1

Encyclopedias of India, The by Henry Scholberg (4)1441

Endgame in South Africa? The Changing Structures and Ideology of Apartheid by Robert Cohen (Richard Moorsom) (FR) (2)705-12

Enigma of Arrival, The by V S Naipaul (John Thieme) (LR) (4)1376-8

Environmental Warfare: A Technical, Legal and Policy Appraisal ed. by Arthur H Westing (Alistair Hay) (FR) (4)1348-51

Estrangement by Elechi Amadi (Alastair Niven) (LR) (3)993-6

TITLE INDEX OF BOOKS REVIEWED

- Ethiopia: Politics, Economics and Society* by Peter Schwab (Ben Turok) (FR) (2)744-50
- Ethiopia, the United States and the Soviet Union* by David A Koen (Margot Leit) (4)1415-16
- Factory and Family: The Divided Lives of South Africa's Women Workers/Impilo Yabasebenzi Emzansi Afrika* by 992 Women Workers and the Institute for Black Research (Tsehani Berhani-Selassie) (FR) (2)740-4
- Family in Contemporary Egypt, The* by Andrea B Rugh (Margaret R Biswas) (1)361
- For Their Triumphs and For Their Tears: Women in Apartheid in South Africa* by Hilda Bernstein (Joan Ebeid) (1)354-8
- Forbidden Agendas: Intolerance and Defiance in the Middle East* ed. by Jon Rothschild (Cheryl A Rubenberg) (3)1024-5
- Frangipani House* by Beryl Gilroy (Michael Gilkes) (LFR) (4) 1371-5
- Future for Namibia, A: 2 Agriculture: Transforming a Wasted Land* by Richard Moorsom (Randolph Vigne) (FR) (2)712-19
- Future for Namibia, A: 4 Education, Repression and Liberation* by Justin Ellis (Randolph Vigne) (FR) (2)712-19
- Future for Namibia, A: 5 Exploiting the Sea* by Richard Moorsom (Randolph Vigne) (FR) (2)712-19
- Future for Namibia, A: 3 Mines and Independence* (Randolph Vigne) (FR) (2)712-19
- Future for Namibia, A: 1 Namibia in the 1980s* (Randolph Vigne) (FR) (2)712-19
- Ghana: Politics, Economics and Society* by Donald I Ray (Ben Turok) (FR) (2)744-50
- Gift of the Devil: A History of Guatemala* by Jim Hardy (James Painter) (3)1026-8
- God's Bits of Wood* by Sembène Ousmane (Alastair Niven) (LR) (3)993-6
- Good Conscience, The* by Carlos Fuentes (Jason Wilson) (LR) (4)1378-81
- Grain of Wheat, A* by Ngugi wa Thiong'o (Alastair Niven) (LR) (3)993-6
- Handbook for African Writers, A* ed. by James Gibbs (4)1438-9
- Herbicides in War: The Long-Term Ecological and Human Consequences* ed. by Arthur H Westing (Alastair Hay) (FR) (4)1348-51
- High Art* by Rubem Fonseca (Maria Alicia Ferrera-Pena) (LR) (4)1381-5
- History of Famine and Epidemics in Ethiopia Prior to the Twentieth Century, The* by Richard Pankhurst (Randolph C Kent) (3)1013-16
- Hope and Suffering: Sermons and Speeches* by Desmond Tutu (Lionel Cliffe) (FR) (2)728-31
- Human Rights Activism in Asia: Some Perspectives, Problems and Approaches* Asian Coalition of Human Rights Organisations (Carmel Budiardjo) (1)367-8
- HURIDOCs Standard Formats for the Recording and Exchange of Information on Human Rights* by Bj@1rn Stormorken with Annie McMorris (3)1032
- I the Supreme* by Augusto Roa Bastos (John King) (1)375-6
- Indian Rural Economy 1880-1955, An: The Tamilnad Countryside* by Christopher John Baker (T J Nossiter) (3)1026
- Indonesia: The Rise of Capital* by Richard Robison (Jonathon Head) (4)1429-31
- International Foundation Directory, The* Europa Publications (4)1435-6
- International Guide to Research on Mexico* Center for US-Mexican Studies (4)1435
- International Terrorism: A Bibliography* by Amos Lakos (4)1435
- Introduction to Shi's Islam, An. The History and Doctrines of Twelver Shi'ism* by Moojan Momen (Akbar S Ahmed) (1)363-5
- Iraq in Transition: A Political, Economic and Strategic Perspective* ed. by Frederick W Axelgard (Marion Farouq Sluglett) (3)1023-4
- 'It's Like Holding the Key to Your Own Jail': Women in Namibia* by Caroline Allison (Joan Ebeid) (1)354-8
- Jaguar Smile, The: A Nicaraguan Journey* by Salman Rushdie (Amanda Hopkinson) (LR) (4)1385-90
- Jesse Jackson Phenomenon, The: The Crisis of Purpose in Afro-American Politics* by Adolph L Reed Jr (Tony Badger) (3)1001
- Jonas Savimbi, A Key to Africa* by Fred Bridgland (Victoria Britain) (FR) (3)964-6
- Jose Marti: Architect of Cuba's Freedom* by Peter Turton (Mike Gonzalez) (1)371-2

TITLE INDEX OF BOOKS REVIEWED

- Kampuchea Between China and Vietnam* by Chang Pao-Min (Craig Etcheson) (FR) (3)976-83
- Kampuchea: Politics, Economics and Society* by Michael Vickery (Craig Etcheson) (FR) (3)976-83
- King Solomon's Mines Revisited: Western Interests and Burdened History of Southern Africa* by William Minter (Donald Woods) (FR) (4)1345-8
- Land Apart, A: A South African Reader* ed. by André Brink and J M Coetzee (Judie Newman) (LR) (4)1395-9
- Latin America. Bankers, Generals and the Struggle for Social Justice* by James F Petras et al. (Harold Blakemore) (4)1431-2
- Latin American Women's Movement, The: Reflections and Actions* Isis International Women's Information and Communication Service (Kathleen Staudt) (3)1010-11
- Libya: Qadhafi's Revolution and the Modern State* by Lillian Craig Harris (Lisa Anderson) (4)1426-8
- Lights on the Hill, The* by Garth St Omer (Michael Gilkes) (LFR) (4)1371-5
- Linking the South: The Route to Economic Cooperation* ed. by Bernard Chidzero and Altaf Gauhar (Timothy M Shaw) (3)1003-5
- Long Night of Francisco Sanctis, The* by Humberto Constantini (Nick Caistor) (LFR) (4)1366-70
- Lure of Zion, The: The Case of the Iraqi Jews* by Abbas Shibliak (Peter Sluglett) (4)1428-9
- Maira* by Darcy Ribeiro (Maria Alicia Ferrera-Pena) (LR) (4)1381-5
- Mexico: Class Formation, Capital Accumulation, and the State* by James D Cockcroft (Laurence Whitehead) (FR) (3)970-5
- Mexico's Dilemma: The Political Origins of Economic Crisis* by Roberto Newell and Luis Rubio (Laurence Whitehead) (FR) (3)970-5
- Middle East and North Africa 1987, The* Europa Publications (4)1437-8
- Militarization of South African Politics, The* by Kenneth W Grundy (Elling Njaal Tjoenneland) (FR) (2)724-7
- Military Marxist Regimes in Africa* Journal of Communist Studies (Ben Turok) (FR) (2)744-50
- Miners, Peasants and Entrepreneurs: Regional Developments in the Central Highlands of Peru* by Norman Long and Bryan Roberts (Lewis Taylor) (1)372-4
- Modern Mexico: State, Economy and Social Conflict* ed. by Nora Hamilton and Timothy F Harding (Laurence Whitehead) (FR) (3)970-5
- Modern Poetry of the Arab World* trans. and ed. by Abdullah al-Udhari (M M Badawi) (LR) (4)1409-12
- Move Your Shadow: South Africa, Black and White* by Joseph Lelyveld (Donald Woods) (FR) (4)1345-8
- Mozambique: The Revolution Under Fire* by Joseph Hanlon (Barry Munslow) (3)1017-18
- Music of Africa, The* by J H Kwabena Nketia (Janet Topp-Fargion) (3)1021-2
- Namibia* by Stanley Schoeman and Elna Schoeman (3)1029
- Namibia: Perspectives for National Reconstruction and Development* United Nations Institute for Namibia (Randolph Vigne) (FR) (2)712-19
- Namibia: Reclaiming the People's Health* ed. by Tim Lobstein and Namibia Support Committee Health Collective (Randolph Vigne) (FR) (2)712-19
- Namibia: A Violation of Trust* by Susanna Smith (Randolph Vigne) (FR) (2)712-19
- Namibia: The Violent Heritage* by David Soggot (Randolph Vigne) (FR) (2)712-19
- Nelson Mandela* by Mary Benson (Lionel Cliffe) (FR) (2)728-31
- Nelson Mandela: The Struggle is My Life* International Defence and Aid Fund for Southern Africa (Lionel Cliffe) (FR) (2)728-31
- Old Gringo, The* by Carlos Fuentes (Jason Wilson) (LR) (4)1378-81
- Options for Developing Countries in Mining Development* by George W Walrond and Raj Kumar (Ciarnan O'Faircheallaigh) (1)353-4
- OAU After Twenty Years, The* by Amadu Sesay, Olusola Ojo and Orobola Faschun (Guy Martin) (1)359-60
- Other Fires: Stories from the Women of Latin America* ed. by Alberto Manguel (Nissa Torrents) (LR) (4)1390-5

TITLE INDEX OF BOOKS REVIEWED

- Our Namibia: A Social Studies Textbook* by Henning Melber (3)1031-2
- Out of India* by Ruth Prawer Jhabvala (Maria Couto) (LR) (4)1399-1402
- Pacific Basin and Oceania* by Gerald W Fry and Rufino Mauricio (4)1436-7
- Pakistani Literature* ed. by Alamgir Hashmi (Shahrukh A Husain) (LR) (4) 1412-14
- Parliaments of the World: A Comparative Reference Compendium Volumes 1 and 2* Inter-Parliamentary Union (3)1029-30
- Paths to Progress: Bread and Freedom in Developing Societies* by William McCord and Arline McCord (Marc Williams) (3)1005-7
- Patriarchy and Accumulation on a World Scale: Women in the International Division of Labour* by Maria Mies (Kathleen Staudt) (4)1422-4
- PDR Yemen: Outpost of Socialist Development in Arabia* by Helen Lackner (Fred Halliday) (FR) (3)983-5
- Penguin Book of Modern Urdu Poetry* ed. by Mahmood Jamal (Shahrukh Husain) (LR) (3)998-1000
- People's Democratic Republic of Yemen, The: Politics, Economics and Society* by Tareq Y Ismael and Jacqueline S Ismael (Fred Halliday) (FR) (3)983-5
- Peruvian Contexts of Change* ed. by William Stein (Lewis Taylor) (1)374-5
- Petals of Blood* by Ngugi wa Thiong'o (Alastair Niven) (LR) (3)993-6
- Pharmaceuticals and Health in the Third World* by Surendra J Patel (Mahesh Surendra Patel) (4)1420-2
- Philippines After Marcos, The* by R J May and Francisco Nemenzo (Walden Bello) (FR) (4)1329-38
- Philippines Reader, The: A History of Colonialism, Neocolonialism, Dictatorship and Resistance* by Daniel B Schirmer and Stephen Rosskam Shalom (Walden Bello) (FR) (4)1329-38
- Pills, Policies and Profits: Reaction to the Bangladesh Drug Policy* by Francis Rolt (Mahesh Surendra Patel) (4)1420-2
- Planning the Mexican Economy: Alternative Development and Strategies* by Jorge Buzaglio (Laurence Whitehead) (FR) (3)970-5
- Political Domination in Africa: Reflections on the Limits of Power* ed. by Patrick Chabal (John Wiseman) (FR) (3)967-70
- Political Economy of Development, The* by J R Parkinson (Marc Williams) (3)1005-7
- Political Economy of Namibia, The: An Annotated Critical Bibliography* by Tore Linne Eriksen with Richard Moorsom (3)1030
- Political Economy of Reform in Post-Mao China, The* ed. by Elizabeth J Perry and Christine Wong (Shaun Breslin) (FR) (4)1341-4
- Political Handbook of the World* ed. by Arthur S Banks (3)1034
- Politics and Government in African States 1960-1985* ed. by Peter Duignan and Robert H Jackson (John Wiseman) (FR) (3)967-70
- Power! Black Workers, their Unions and the Struggle for Freedom in South Africa* by Denis MacShane, Martin Plaut and David Ward (Terence Ranger) (FR) (2)719-24
- Pretoria's Praetorians-Civil-Military Relations in South Africa* by Philip H Frankel (Elling Njaal Tjoenneland) (FR) (2)724-7
- Qaddafi and the Libyan Revolution* by David Blundy and Andrew Lycett (Lisa Anderson) (4)1426-8
- Qadhafi's Libya* by Jonathon Bearman (Lisa Anderson) (4)1426-8
- Reagan Administration's Foreign Policy, The: Facts and Judgment of the International Tribunal* ed. by Hans Kochler (Peter Shearman) (FR) (3)961-4
- Reagan and the World: Imperial Policy in the New Cold War* by Jeff McMahon (Peter Shearman) (FR) (3)961-4
- Real Life of Alejandro Mayta, The* by Mario Vargas Llosa (Mike Gonzalez) (LR) (3)996-8
- Requiem for a Woman's Soul* by Omar Rivabella (Nick Caistor) (LFR) (4)1366-70
- Rich Like Us* by Nayantra Sahgal (Maria Couto) (LR) (4)1399-1402
- Road to Power, The. Indonesian Military Politics 1945-1967* by Ulf Sundhaussen (William Boddy) (FR) (1)337-42
- Road to Zimbabwe, 1890-1980, The* by Anthony Verrier (Terence Ranger) (1)358-9

TITLE INDEX OF BOOKS REVIEWED

- Role of the Military in Politics, The: A Case Study of Iraq to 1941* by Mohammad A Tarbush (Marion Farouk Sluglett) (1)365-6
- Roots of Crisis in South Africa, The* by Ann Seidman (Terence Ranger) (FR) (2)719-24
- Sanctions Handbook, The* by Joseph Hanlon and Roger Omond (Donald Woods) (FR) (4)1345-8
- Secret Life of Saeed, The: The Pessoptimist* by Emile Habiby (Fadia A Faqir) (LR) (4)1405-9
- Shadow by the Door, The* by Gerardo Di Masso (Nick Caistor) (LFR) (4)1366-70
- Shi'ism and Social Protest* ed. by Juan R I Cole and Nikki R Keddie (Akbar S Ahmed) (1)363-5
- Side by Side: The Autobiography of Helen Joseph* (Lionel Cliffe) (FR) (2)728-31
- Sikh Separatism: The Politics of Faith* by Rajiv A Kapur (Paul Wallace) (1)361-3
- Sixth Continent, The: Russia and Mikhail Gorbachev* by Mary Frankland (Stephen White) (FR) (4)1338-41
- Slavery and Human Progress* by David Brion Davis (Ben Whitaker) (3)1012-13
- South Africa: The Cordoned Heart 20 South African Photographers* (Tsehai Berhani-Selassie) (FR) (2)740-4
- South Africa in the 1980s: State of Emergency* Catholic Institute of International Relations (Terence Ranger) (FR) (2)719-24
- South Africa: No Easy Path to Peace* by Graham Leach (Donald Woods) (FR) (4)1345-8
- South Africa: The Peasants' Revolt* by Govan Mbeki (Terence Ranger) (FR) (2)719-24
- South African Disease, The: Apartheid, Health and Health Services* by Cedric de Beer (G V Weston) (FR) (2)731-4
- South America, Central America and the Caribbean 1986* Europa Publications (4)1434
- Southeast Asia Divided: The ASEAN-Indochina Crisis* ed. by Donald E Weatherbee (Craig Etcheson) (FR) (3)976-83
- Southern Africa in the 1980s* ed. by Olkajide Aluko and Timothy Shaw (Terence Ranger) (FR) (2)719-24
- Soviet Interests in the Third World* ed. by Robert Cassen (Margot Leit) (4)1415-16
- Soviet Paradox, The: External Expansion, Internal Decline* by Seweryn Bialer (Stephen White) (FR) (4)1338-41
- Soviet Power and the Third World* by Rajan Menon (Margot Leit) (4)1415-16
- Soviet Union under Gorbachev, The* ed. by Martin McCauley (Stephen White) (FR) (4)1338-41
- Soviet Union and the Third World, The: An Economic Bind* by Elizabeth Kridl Valkenier (R H Cassen) (4)1417-18
- Sport of Nature, A* by Nadine Gordimer (Judie Newman) (LR) (4)1395-9
- Sri Lanka* by Vijaya Samaraweera (4)1436-7
- State of Fear, A: Memories of Argentina's Nightmare* by Andrew Graham-Yooll (Nick Caistor) (LFR) (4)1366-70
- Statistical Yearbook of China 1986* The State Statistical Bureau of the People's Republic of China (4)1440
- Stories* by Sergio Ramirez (Amanda Hopkinson) (LR) (4)1385-90
- Strangers in Their Own Country: A Curriculum Guide on South Africa* by William Bigelow (3)1031-2
- Struggle for the Third World, The: Soviet Debates and American Options* by Jerry F Hough (Sheryl Cross) (3)1001-3
- Suharto and His Generals: Indonesian Military Politics 1975-1983* by David Jenkins (William Boddy) (FR) (1)337-42
- Superpower: Comparing American and Soviet Foreign Policy* by Christer Jonsson (S Neil MacFarlane) (4)1418-20
- Superpower Rivalry and Third World Radicalism: The Idea of National Liberation* by S Neil MacFarlane (Elizabeth Kridl Valkenier) (1)349-50
- Syria* by Ian H Seccombe (4)1436-7
- Talkative Man* by R K Narayan (William Walsh) (LR) (4)1402-5
- Technological Capabilities in the Third World* ed. by Martin Fransman and Kenneth King (Colin Stoneman) (1)351-3
- Things Fall Apart* by Chinua Achebe (Alastair Niven) (LR) (3)993-6
- Third World Guide 1986-7* ed. by Neiva Moreira (4)1437
- Third World Marxist-Leninist Regimes: Strengths, Vulnerabilities, and US Policy* Institute for Foreign Policy Analysis (Ben Turok) (FR) (2)744-50

TITLE INDEX OF BOOKS REVIEWED

- To Bury Our Fathers* by Sergio Ramirez (Amanda Hopkinson) (LR) (4)1385-90
- Touching Ground, Taking Root: Theological and Political Reflections on the Philippine Struggle* Catholic Institute for International Relations (Walden Bello) (FR) (4)1329-38
- Towards the Decolonization of African Literature. Volume 1: African Fiction and Poetry and their Critics* by Chinweizu, Onwuchekwa Jemie and Ihechukwu Madubuike (Alastair Niven) (FR) (2)750-5
- Turning the Tide: Us Intervention in Central America and the Struggle for Peace* by Noam Chomsky (Peter Shearman) (FR) (3)961-4
- Understanding Indonesia* ed. by Leslie Palmer (William Boddy) (3)1025-6
- Unheard Words: Women and Literature in Africa, The Arab World, Asia, the Caribbean and Latin America* ed. by Mineke Schipper (Nissa Torrents) (LR) (4)1390-5
- Waiting: The Whites of South Africa* by Vincente Crapanzano (David Moore) (FR) (2)734-40
- Waking Giant, The. The Soviet Union Under Gorbachev* by Martin Walker (Stephen White) (FR) (4)1338-41
- Walking on Thorns: The Call to Christian Obedience* by Allan Boesak (Lionel Cliffe) (FR) (2)728-31
- Wild Thorns* by Sahar Khalifeh (Fadia A Faqir) (LR) (4)1405-9
- Wine of Astonishment, The* by Earl Lovelace (Michael Gilkes) (LFR) (4)1371-5
- Western Sahara: A Comprehensive Bibliography* by Lynne F Sipe (3)1033-4
- Women in Development: A Creative Role Denied? The Case of Tanzania* by Marja-Liisa Swantz (Kathleen Staudt) (4)1422-4
- Women in Nigeria Today* Ahmadu Bello University, Zaria, Nigeria (Jose Ebeid) (1)354-8
- Women of El Salvador: The Price of Freedom* by Marilyn Thompson (Joan Ebeid) (1)354-8
- Women in the World: 1975-1985. The Women's Decade* ed. by Lynne B Iglitzin and Ruth Ross (Kathleen Staudt) (3)1008-10
- Women: A World Report. A New Internationalist Book* ed. by Debbie Taylor (Joan Ebeid) (1)354-8
- World Encyclopedia of Political Systems and Parties: Second Edition* ed. by George D Delury (4)1439
- World Resources 1986: An Assessment of the Resource Base that Supports the Global Economy* The World Resources Institute/International Institute of Environment and Development (3)1029
- Worlds of Muslim Imagination, The* ed. by Alamgir Hashmi (Shahrukh A Husain) (LR) (4)1412-14
- Working Women in South Africa* by Lesley Lawson (Tsehan Berhani-Selassie) (FR) (2)740-4
- Year in the Death of Africa, A: Politics, Bureaucracy and the Famine* by Peter Gill (Randolph C Kent) (3)1013-16
- Yemens, The: The Yemen Arab Republic and the People's Republic of Yemen* by G Rex Smith (3)1029

THIRD WORLD FOUNDATION

for social and economic studies

Organisation

The Foundation, registered as a Charity in 1978 under the law of England and Wales, has its headquarters in London. The Trust Deed provides that the Foundation will not accept directly or otherwise, any aid, grant or assistance from any government or official agency.

Objectives

To work for the intellectual, economic and social advancement of the people of the Third World through publications and research. To assist in the evolution of a fundamentally just and equitable relationship between the Third World and the developed countries. To create greater awareness of the causes of poverty in the Third World.

Settlor and Trustees

The Trust Deed is made between the Bank of Credit and Commerce International of 39 Boulevard Royal, Luxembourg (Settlor) and the Trustees who exercise their powers in accordance with the provisions of the Trust Deed.

Advisory Committee

The work of the Foundation is guided by a committee consisting of: Dr Ali Attiga, Secretary-General, OAPC; HE Mr Bernard G Chidzero, Minister of Finance, Economic Planning and Development, Zimbabwe; HE Mr K K S Dadzie, Secretary-General, UNCTAD; Mr E V Iglesias, Minister of Foreign Affairs, Uruguay; HE Mr Amir Jamal, Permanent Representative of Tanzania, Geneva; HE Mr S S Ramphal, Secretary-General, Commonwealth Secretariat; Professor Abdus Salam, Director, International Centre for Theoretical Physics; Professor A K Sen, All Souls College, Oxford; Dr K Soedjatmoko, Rector, UN University.

Mr Altaf Gauhar is the Secretary-General of the Foundation.

Mr Azim Husain is the Principal Adviser of the Foundation.

The benefits of membership

Membership of the Foundation is open to individuals and institutions. The annual membership fee is £40/US$60 and this entitles you to a one year (four issues) subscription to Third World Quarterly at a reduced rate and a copy of our annual book Third World Affairs, plus savings of up to 30% on the regular price of other Foundation books.

To enrol as a member simply complete the order form inside this issue and return it to us together with your payment.

State of exile: the African National Congress of South Africa, 1976–86

The environment of exile politics is usually viewed as hazardous, sterile, corrosive and demoralising. Political groups which are forced out of their domestic terrain are understood to be especially vulnerable; loneliness, frustration, inactivity, hardship and insecurity generate ideological dissent, personality conflicts, and escapist delusions. Exile politicians are forced into a dependent relationship with their hosts and patrons, whose hospitality and generosity may be conditional and subject to capricious change. Survival and success in such an environment may depend on skills and talents quite different from those developed in the history of the movement before its departure from home. It can require ideological innovations which risk distancing it from its original social constituency. Exile is usually perceived as an experience which is inherently detrimental and problematic.

The understanding of exile as a term of trial for political organisations has been consolidated by the study of movements which have been especially badly affected by their displacement.¹ Outstanding in the studies of African exile politics is John Marcum's work based on the history of Angolan nationalist organisations.² Marcum's analysis of the difficulties of exile has influenced many other academic commentaries.³ Those historians of exile movements which have prospered or flourished have understood their success as being achieved despite the pitfalls of exile, usually as the result of the reinsertion of leadership and followers back within their native territory.⁴

¹ See, for example, Sheridan Johns, 'Obstacles to guerrilla warfare: a South Africa case study', Journal of Modern African Studies, 11(2) 1974; Kenneth Grundy, Guerrilla Struggle in Africa, New York: Grossmann, 1971; Richard Gibson, African Liberation Movements, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1971.

² John Marcum, 'The exile condition and revolutionary effectiveness. Southern African liberation movements', in Christian Potholm and Richard Dale (eds), Southern Africa in Perspective, New York: Free Press, 1979; John Marcum, The Angolan Revolution: Volume II: Exile Politics and Guerrilla Warfare, Cambridge, Mass: MIT Press, 1978.

³ Including my own. See my analysis on the exile Pan-Africanist Congress in Tom Lodge, Black Politics in South Africa since 1945, London: Longman, 1983, pp 305–17.

⁴ For this perspective see: Barry Munslow, Mozambique: The Revolution and its Origins, London: Longman, 1983; Basil Davidson, In the Eye of the Storm, London: Longman, 1972.

The approach in this article is rather different. Here the subject is an organisation whose bureaucracy, structures, and disciplined following exists outside its country of origin yet which has not only survived exile but has, it will be argued, been strengthened by the experience. The African National Congress has been an exile body for over two decades. Its survival during the first phase of exile during which it was unable to initiate any significant political or military activity within South Africa has been described in an earlier essay by this author.⁵ Our concern here will be with its development in the post-1976 phase, in the ten years since the political reawakening inside South Africa represented by the Soweto uprising. The ANC's activities inside the country since 1976 will not be detailed here. They lie outside the focus of this article which is with the ANC's external presence and functions. It is sufficient to state that accompanying the development of the exile movement over the last ten years and contributing very significantly to its buoyant morale and diplomatic impact has been the revival of an internal guerrilla insurgency. The guerrilla warfare, though still at a very modest level, has been steadily increasing its scope and effectiveness in quite exceptionally difficult circumstances. Tables 1 and 2 provide an indication of the present character of guerrilla activity. The insurgent campaign has succeeded in re-establishing the ANC as the predominant force in black South African politics even if its support is still mainly in the form of ideological inclination and emotional sentiment rather than organised membership.⁶

The apparent self-confidence and vitality of the ANC exiles at present is certainly partly attributable to the ANC's success in re-establishing a presence within the townships of South Africa. But, this article contends, this is not the whole story. The terrain of exile is not wholly disadvantageous for the development of a political movement. It can provide protection, security, powerful forms of external support, factors and conditions which facilitate the development of a form and ⁵ Lodge, Black Politics . . . pp 296-304.

⁶ For details of the urban guerrilla campaign from 1977 to date Tom Lodge, 'The African National Congress in South Africa, 1976-1983: guerrilla war and armed propaganda', Journal of Contemporary African Studies (Pretoria) 3(1-2) 1983-4, pp 153-80; Tom Lodge, 'The ANC in 1982', in South African Research Service, The South African Review I, Johannesburg: Ravan, 1984; Tom Lodge, 'The ANC in 1983', South African Review II, Johannesburg: Ravan, 1984; Tom Lodge, 'Maychome!—Let us go to war! from Nkomati to Kabwe, the ANC, January 1984-June 1985', South African Review III, Johannesburg: Ravan, 1985; Tom Lodge, 'The Second Consultative Conference of the ANC', South Africa International (Johannesburg) 16(2), October 1985, pp 80-97; Tom Lodge, 'The ANC, Kabwe and after', International Affairs Bulletin (Johannesburg) 10(2), September 1986.

STATE OF EXILE

Table 1: Guerrilla activity, July 1985 to June 1986

	1 Jul 1985 31 Dec 1985	1 Jan 1986 30 Jun 1986
Attacks on police or police facilities; police/Umkhonto clashes:	25	50
Attacks on SADF personnel or buildings:	6	0
Attacks on homeland politicians, community councillors, and other individuals:	22	9
Landmine explosions:	6	11
Limpet mine attacks on economic infrastructure (mainly Escom substations):	9	26
Limpet mine attacks on railway facilities:	2	3
Limpet mine attacks or bombings on commercial premises used by civilians during business hours:	1	4
Limpet mine or bomb attacks in or outside hotels or restaurants during business hours:	0	4
Gunfire attacks on commercial premises during business hours:	0	1
Grenades thrown in crowded business districts:	1	0
Limpets in central business districts out of business hours:	15	3
Limpets in or outside recreational facilities out of hours:		2
Attacks on government or public buildings:	1	0
Others/unspecified	0	5
TOTAL	88	118

Source: Both Tables 1 and 2 are compiled by the author from statistics based upon press reports, official statements and events mentioned in political trials. The figures may be slightly conservative because of government suppression of information.

quality of organisation unattainable in the precarious circumstances of opposition politics within the homeland.

What follows is a sketch of the bureaucracy which the ANC has created in a foreign environment. After examining the workings and functions South Africa) and the rest administrative or educational.¹³ ANC sources claim Umkhonto recruitment has increased very dramatically since September 1984¹⁴ as an effect of the exodus of refugees from South Africa. In May 1984 the United Nations High Commission for Refugees (UNHCR) distributed funds through the ANC for about 9,000 South African refugees,¹⁵ so the higher estimates of ANC strength appear quite reasonable. Umkhonto we Sizwe is clearly the largest structure within the exile organisation and it seems sensible to begin any survey of the ANC's bureaucracy with an examination of Umkhonto's essential characteristics.

For the majority of the men and women who join the ANC's external organisation, joining the ANC means joining an army. Much of this army is accommodated in five training camps run by the ANC in Angola, two near Luanda, and the others in the north and north-east. Umkhonto recruits have been trained in Angola since 1977, before then most of the ANC's military instruction was conducted in Tanzania.¹⁶ Umkhonto guerrillas often spend two years in Angola and a chosen elite supplement their basic training with advanced courses in the Soviet Union and the German Democratic Republic.

From the testimony of state witnesses and defectors at political trials a fairly coherent picture of the contents of the military training programme has emerged. ANC recruits join the organisation in territories neighbouring South Africa—most frequently Botswana or Swaziland—and after a screening process which is intended to weed out police agents they are offered the choice of immediate military instruction or the completion of their academic education.¹⁷ Only in 1985, at the Kabwe Conference, was experience of the military camps made compulsory for all ANC members. Prospective guerrillas after their

¹³ Stephen Davis, Season of War: Insurgency in South Africa, 1977–1980, Medford, Mass: Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy, Tufts University, 1982, p 207.

¹⁴ Howard Barrell, 'Exiles swell ANC ranks', March 1986. Barrell cites 'reliable estimates' of 7,000 for the size of the Umkhonto trained forces before the exodus.

¹⁵ Cape Times (Cape Town), 11 May 1984. Not all recipients of UNHCR funds though the ANC need necessarily be ANC recruits. The statistic merely provides an indication of the scale of the refugee community. In 1986 the UNHCR provided $10 million to the ANC 'to take care of displaced people' (Steve Mufson, New Republic, August 1986, p 22).

¹⁶ See John D Nelson, Some External Aspects of Internal Conflict Within South Africa, PhD dissertation, George Washington University, 1975, p 193. Umkhonto's Tanzanian camp today accommodates only trained men.

¹⁷ Captured ANC activists as well as defectors sometimes claim that they were beguiled into joining the ANC with promises of scholarships and then compelled to join Umkhonto. Such allegations have become less common; this may reflect ANC recruiting successes and the wider acceptance by black South Africans of the legitimacy of political violence.

induction into the organisation and a few educational sessions concerning ideological essentials, are flown from Lusaka where they are placed in a reception camp. Here they receive introductory lessons in South African history and politics, lectures on explosives, map reading, and military tactics, as well as physical drilling and exercise sessions. Weapon handling begins in a second camp; recruits are taught to handle automatic rifles, RPG 7 rocket launchers, hand-grenades, as well as the light weaponry employed by the South African Defence Force. The instruction is usually supervised by Cubans¹⁸ and its quality is excellent, according to South African police sources.¹⁹ The trainees learn how to use explosives and deploy them in sabotage, they are taught the principles of clandestine organisation and communications, and they are instructed in guerrilla tactics as well as the military techniques employed in more conventional forms of warfare. The range of weaponry and equipment to which trainees are introduced is much wider than the variety actually used by Umkhonto in South Africa; apart from theoretical classes in the operation of heavy artillery, the Angolan trainees programme has included lessons on the use of land-mines since 1977²⁰ (eight years before such devices were introduced into South Africa) as well as radio communications.

After the completion of basic guerrilla training Umkhonto members are given more specialised courses, sometimes in a different camp: different programmes are arranged for rural and urban warfare, some people receive special training in ordnance and logistical support, and others (especially women)²¹ graduate as couriers. The more proficient are sent to Europe, often to the Ukraine in the Soviet Union where they learn to handle more complicated weaponry: Grad P rocket launchers,²² anti-tank weapons, mortars, and heavy machine guns—weapons which require a team to operate them and which are usually associated with mobile or conventional warfare rather than small-scale

¹⁸ According to one ANC defector, nine Cubans were present at one camp which otherwise had an ANC complement of 450. Testimony of Jeffrey Boshigo to the Subcommittee on Security and Terrorism of the United States Senate, 24 March 1982, mimeo (henceforth, Denton Committee hearings).

¹⁹ See for example statement by Lieutenant-Colonel Jack Buchner, cited in The Star, 13 May 1982.

²⁰ Boshigo testimony, op. cit. Denton Committee hearings. According to Ephraim Mfalapitsa, another witness in the Denton Committee hearings, the Umkhonto command intended to initiate a rural land mine offensive based from Botswana as early as 1981. Mfalapitsa's own defection apparently thwarted this.

²¹ The vast majority of Umkhonto cadres who have been tried in South African courts have been men but recent trials suggest the pattern is changing.

²² First used by the ANC in South Africa in an attack on Voortrekker-hoogte military base near Pretoria in 1981.

guerrilla operations. In the USSR they learn more sophisticated sabotage techniques as well as interrupting the curriculum with cultural excursions to collective farms, schools and factories.²³ Fully trained guerrillas are either absorbed straight away into operational duties or they are placed in holding camps and subjected to refresher courses.

Only a small proportion of trainees at any one time are involved in combat in South Africa. As yet it is a small-scale war; since the beginning of 1980 to mid-1986 the number of attacks carried out by Umkhonto totals less than five hundred. If each of these attacks was carried out by a different Umkhonto unit (which is not the case) then at most two to three thousand Umkhonto people would by 1986 have had field experience—a minor proportion of their numbers. How are the rest deployed? Placing large numbers of men in holding camps for long periods of inactivity is an almost certain recipe for low morale and indiscipline. Reports of demoralisation and mutiny in ANC camps have been infrequent since 1977,²⁴ the year of resumption of guerrilla operations. It is likely that a proportion of trained guerrillas are used in the logistical support given to combat units—Umkhonto is organised on the basis of a very compartmentalised division of labour.²⁵ The camps themselves require staffing and defending—Cubans and other non-South Africans provide technical expertise but much of the direct instruction in all branches of the programme is given by Umkhonto members. Other ANC facilities require defending, especially in frontline states. The training camps are supposed to provide their own food and each camp maintains a farm.²⁶ Then there is the possibility that those ²³ The numbers involved in Soviet and Eastern European training are quite large. Boshigo's group numbered sixty altogether and short training periods in Europe are a fairly common factor in the experiences of guerrillas who are later captured and put on trial in South Africa. For a general description of Soviet training facilities based on trial testimony see The Star, 17 May 1984.

²⁴ Camp mutinies in Tanzania and Angola were reported in 1984 and 1985 (The Star, 18 March 1985 and Rand Daily Mail, 23 April 1984) the one a reaction to the Nkomati Accord set-back by guerrillas impatient for action and the other related to dissatisfaction with living conditions. That there were reasons for rank-and-file dissatisfaction was obliquely acknowledged by Oliver Tambo ('We are a force', Sechaba, October 1984). However if discontent and tension was an endemic problem it would have been more apparent at the Kabwe conference of which we now have quite a detailed picture. No reports suggest camp demoralisation on the scale which existed in the late 1960s (see The Star, 'Big Troubles in ANC guerrilla camps', 22 December 1968) and which came to a head at the 1969 Morogoro Conference (for reference to tensions at the Morogoro Conference see Joe Slovo in The African Communist (95), 1983).

²⁵ See Davis, op. cit., p. 368. As well as divisions with specialised military functions—ordnance, rural guerrilla activity, sabotage—different groups are assigned to financial, transport, and other administrative operations.

²⁶ The Financial Mail (Johannesburg) of 8 June 1984 reported the camps as agriculturally self-sufficient. Poor food has in the past been the most frequent source of morale and disciplinary problems. In 1967–9 Zambian-based diplomats claimed that Umkhonto units in local ANC camps conducted 'food raids' in the surrounding countryside (Nelson, p. 203).

guerrillas not involved in the South African theatre may be engaged alongside MPLA troops fighting UNITA forces in Angola itself. Both UNITA spokesmen and ANC defectors have alleged that the ANC plays a role in the Angolan conflict.²⁷ It would not be the first time Umkhonto soldiers have fought on foreign soil; ANC units participated in joint offensives with ZAPU in 1967–68 and again in 1978–80.²⁸

With the exception of those who go to Europe the direct influence on them of their East European and Cuban instructors is confined to technical matters. Paralleling the military training is an extensive academic programme with a heavy emphasis on South African history, political economy, and philosophy. The teaching is by South Africans, in the early stages of the development of the camps by eminent leaders of the ANC and the South African Communist Party (SACP), later on administered by the hierarchy of political commissars who provide a second element in the command structure of the camps from platoon level upwards. The academic programme includes courses on the history of South African resistance, ANC ideological principles, especially those associated with the Freedom Charter, the analysis of the South African economy, and the basic essentials of Marxism–Leninism. Some of the political education was reportedly a cause of dissatisfaction among recruits for it reflected the ideology of a left-wing leadership which had emerged ascendent within the ANC during the 1950s and 1960s and which was out of step with the intellectual background of recruits influenced by the Black Consciousness of the early 1970s.²⁹ This does not seem to have been an enduring problem probably because of the shift in black political culture within South Africa since 1976. Considering the location of the camps, the sources of externally supplied training and resources available to Umkhonto, and the strong association of the SACP with the Umkhonto hierarchy from its inception in 1961, it would not be surprising if the camps were an important source of a radicalising impulse within the ANC as a whole.

Umkhonto operations and logistics are directed and administered through Botswana and other territories adjacent to South Africa, but ²⁷ Testimony of Elizabeth Matube in State vs. Sipho Binda, 19 August 1985. UNITA claims vary. Savimbi has suggested that the ANC has several thousand soldiers committed to anti-UNITA operations (The Citizen (Johannesburg) 7 May 1986). A UNITA brigadier was more conservative, claiming the ANC to have deployed three battalions, 600 men, alongside FAPLA forces (The Citizen, 20 May 1986).

²⁸ References to joint ZAPU–ANC operations, 1978–80: The Washington Post, 2 January 1984; The Star, 12 April 1984; Mfalapitsa testimony, Denton Committee hearings. At the end of the Zimbabwean conflict 100 ANC guerrillas reported to guerrilla reception points.

²⁹ See Davis, op. cit., pp 182–9.

the vulnerability of these countries and their government's attitudes to Umkhonto rules out the development of large military bases by the ANC within their borders.³⁰ Umkhonto's command structure was, until the 1984 Nkomati accord, largely located in Maputo³¹ but that is no longer possible and leading Umkhonto officers seem to work for most of the time in Lusaka or in Angola. Political and military leadership within the ANC is closely intertwined, the three most senior Umkhonto officers are all members of the NEC, and at least a third of NEC members have military experience.³²

Umkhonto is a bureaucratically complicated technically sophisticated, and operationally effective organisation. Its training programme produces highly motivated and militarily accomplished combatants whose quality has been proven in the progress Umkhonto has made in developing an insurgent campaign inside the Republic.³³ It is still, though, largely an exile army—only quite recently has its organisational structure within South Africa advanced beyond individual and mutually isolated cells or units.³⁴ Despite a formal commitment to democratic principles reflected in the absence of privileges associated with rank as well as periodic attempts by military and political leaders to make themselves personally accessible to rank ³⁰ Neither the Zimbabweans nor the Botswana authorities are prepared to tolerate any military linked activity by the ANC. The transport of guerrillas and arms across their territories has to be clandestine. The Swazis are openly hostile to the ANC.

³¹ In 1982 a Mozambican intelligence official defected to South Africa bringing with him a document which he claimed to be an official agreement between the Mozambique government and Umkhonto representatives. In return for Mozambican provision of field equipment, transport base areas and houses, the ANC would hit targets of strategic significance to the Mozambican economy. There is no evidence that such plans were ever implemented and whatever help the Mozambican government provided came to an end in April 1984 (Scope (Durban) 18 March 1983). It does seem likely that Maputo was an important operational centre for Umkhonto. ANC and SACP publications have conceded that among the casualties of the SADF raid on ANC houses in Matola were several experienced Umkhonto officers. (See for example profile of Motso Mokgabudi in Umsebenzi 2(1) 1986).

³² The three leading Umkhonto Officers are Joe Modise, Commander in Chief, Thembi Chris Hani, Political Commissar, and Joe Slovo, Chief of Staff.

³³ The training seems to be weakest in educating prospective combatants in the techniques of clandestine operation. A significant number of Umkhonto cadres have been arrested in South Africa as a result of their own indiscretions. Careless driving is one especial cause for them attracting police attention. On the other hand the fact that Umkhonto units are able to survive in the field undetected for increasingly lengthy periods suggests that this may not be a universal problem.

³⁴ Since mid-1984 Umkhonto units have been recruiting and training activists within the country. Several trials have suggested that a command structure located within South Africa co-ordinates the activities of different groups of units. South African police were prepared to concede this at the beginning of 1986 (The Citizen, 18 March 1986).

and file, the organisation is hierarchical,³⁵ elitist,³⁶ and disciplined.³⁷ This is in keeping with its East European models of external military inspiration and is also appropriate with a military organisation whose leaders conceive its future development as advancing through increasingly sophisticated phases of warfare. South Africa is a modern industrial state; the armed force which seeks to overcome its defences requires a matching bureaucratic and technological quality and this is difficult to reconcile with prerequisites of democracy.

The second largest wing of the ANC's organisation also provides a haven for a substantial number of its youthful recruits. The ANC's educational establishment is situated in Morogoro, the isolated area in south-eastern Tanzania where the organisation used to have its guerrilla training camps. The need for the ANC to provide secondary schooling for its adherents became especially pressing in the wake of the Soweto riots when it began receiving large numbers of refugee school children. A school was first established in a few farm buildings on a 600 acre site in Mazimba, Morogoro, the land being donated by the Tanzanian government in 1977.³⁸ The following year the ANC created a Department of Education and Culture, a complex pyramid of committees which

³⁵ All reports suggest that the spartan regime of the training camps is shared by everybody within them. Promotion within the Umkhonto hierarchy seems to be the reward of combat experience and quite high-ranking Umkhonto officers continue to be deployed in the field. Most defectors' accounts do not claim that a hierarchy of privilege exists within the ANC.

³⁶ Within Umkhonto there are elite combat units, such as the Special Operations Unit (see The Weekly Mail, 11 April 1986; The Citizen, 22 May 1986, R Kasrils in Sechaba, May 1986). As we have seen, Umkhonto training is graded according to ability and potential of different trainees, and the graduates of Angolan camps are regarded overall by the ANC leadership as the officer corps of a future people's army. 'We have to bear in mind the fact that the comrades we are training outside constitute the core of our army. They are the organisers and the leaders of the mass army that we have to build inside the country. They are our officer corps, we cannot deploy them forever as combat units. They are our officer corps. For obvious reasons, no army in the world fights with combat units composed of officers'. Documents of the Second National Consultative Conference of the African National Congress, Zambia, 16-23 June 1985, Zambia London: ANC, p 35.

³⁷ Police sources claim a harsh disciplinary system prevails which includes a prison camp in Quatro, Angola (The Star, 17 May 1984). Such reports should be treated with reserve. Nevertheless changes instituted at the Kabwe conference may have been prompted by resentment of the disciplinary regime in the camps. One of the two former NEC members who failed to be re-elected was Andrew Masondo, National Political Commissar and Head of Security. The conference established a grievance procedure to act as a check on abuse of leadership authority. On the more positive side Umkhonto discipline had the effect of restraining units in the field from attacking civilian targets at the end of 1985. It is not clear whether the recent series of attacks on shopping arcades and commercial premises is the effect of a breakdown in discipline or rather, as Howard Barrell has argued (Weekly Mail, 18 July 1986), the result of units in the field being given greater tactical autonomy.

³⁸ Sechaba, August 1979; The Herald (Harare), 4 September 1985.

linked leading office-bearers in the ANC, SACTU, Youth and Women's sections to the administration of the school.³⁹ Starting with fifty students, by the end of 1980 student enrolment had increased to nearly 200 taught by twenty teachers. An elaborate building programme began in 1980 and three years later 1,000 pupils were accommodated at Mazimba. Numbers seem to have stabilised since then; today the ANC community at Mazimba totals about 1,500 including teachers, administrative staff and infants and primary school children.⁴⁰

As well as the secondary school, the Solomon Maglangu Freedom College (SOMAFCO), the complex houses the Charlotte Maxeke Child Care Centre,⁴¹ a crèche, a hospital and a maternity home, three small factories which supply furniture, clothing and food, a photographic laboratory, and 800 hectares of farmland which make Mazimba self-sufficient in maize, sorghum, and beans. The farm is the nucleus of an ambitious project to establish a 5,000-strong community accommodated in ten villages supported through industrial workshops, agriculture and ranching. SOMAFCO itself has well-equipped classrooms, a library, and several dormitory buildings. The planning and construction of the buildings were executed by ANC members but the finance for the facilities came from outside. The single most important donors have been Swedish, both private and governmental, though Dutch anti-apartheid organisations, and UN agencies have given substantial support as well. In 1982 SOMAFCO's budget alone amounted to $5.5 million.⁴² As well as externally derived financial support the ANC has also begun to appeal for volunteer teachers; certain Labour Party-controlled local education authorities in Britain recently announced plans to recruit and pay British teachers to work at Mazimba.⁴³

Apart from the normal concerns of educationists, the teaching staff at Mazimba have two particular preoccupations. First, there is the object of providing the ANC community with the vocational skills required for government. In the words of SOMAFCO's principal, Comrade Njobe: We are thinking of educating to take over a country which is highly developed and therefore in our curriculum we stretch over ordinary academic subjects

³⁹ ibid.

⁴⁰ 'A people's education', SASPU National (Braamfontein), April 1986

⁴¹ 'Childcare: Imperative for our future', Sechaba, November 1982.

⁴² International Herald Tribune (Paris), 12 September 1985.

⁴³ The authorities concerned were those of Brent, Haringey and ILGA. The help is at the ANC's request. The Star, 23 November 1985.

... to skills in the vocational and technical fields—commercial skills, secretarial skills, and all skills along those lines.⁴⁴

Secondly the curriculum itself and the way in which the school is administered is calculated to strengthen the influence of certain political and social principles. So, for example, considerable emphasis is placed on 'bridging the gap between mental and manual labour'—teachers and students spend several hours each week working on the farm. As far as is possible the school stresses material self-sufficiency. Amongst the various subjects taught is a course on the 'development of society'. Corporal punishment is prohibited. Student representatives participate in the deliberations of the School Administrative Committee.⁴⁵ Students run the hostels and also contribute to disciplinary decisions. To quote Njobe again: 'We are teaching to destroy all tendencies towards stratification of societies into exploiting classes. We would like to create a school of comradeship'.⁴⁶

The ideas are of course very similar to those which are orthodox within the educational system of the ANC's host, and major benefactor, Tanzania. Over the seven years of the centre's existence donors have clearly remained impressed, for the ANC has apparently gained a reputation for 'honest and competent use of resources'.⁴⁷ Scandinavian aid, which is principally directed at the ANC's educational projects, has increased rapidly; nearly $12 million was received by the ANC from Norway and Sweden in the course of 1985.⁴⁸ Twenty million dollars is expected this year from these sources.⁴⁹

The ANC's resources do not stretch to tertiary education. In 1983 it was estimated⁵⁰ that about 1,500 ANC members were being trained in British, European and American universities. This represents an impressive proportion of the total membership of the exile organisation. There are sizeable groups of students attending institutions in the Netherlands, East Germany, and the USA. Communist countries seem to have been especially significant in supplying technical skills to the organisation: agriculturists, paramedical workers, and engineers. The wide variety of higher educational systems experienced by people destined to occupy senior positions within the movement is likely to

⁴⁴ 'Interview with Njobe', Sechaba, February 1980

⁴⁵ SASPU National, April 1986

⁴⁶ Sechaba, February 1980.

⁴⁷ SASPU National, April 1986.

⁴⁸ International Herald Tribune, 17 August 1985.

⁴⁹ ibid., 12 September 1985

⁵⁰ Financial Mail (Johannesburg), 8 June 1984, citing Davis in Harper's, December 1983.

ensure that it remains subject to eclectic intellectual influences. Regional educational committees in different parts of the world where there are concentrations of ANC students do provide one means of regulating the ideological predisposition of the student diaspora. Within the facilities at Mazimba this is the task of political commissars appointed to the governing committees.

From 1977 the ANC has become predominantly an organisation of young men and women surmounted by senior echelons of soldiers and bureaucrats whose exile had in many cases preceded the births of their new followers. The townships exodus in the couple of years following the Soweto uprising brought to the ANC a mass of vigorous recruits whose intellectual development had been unaffected by the ideological tradition represented by the older ANC leaders. Davis, writing in 1981, refers to the 'neo-Africanism' of the post-1976 recruits and their impatience with the heavy emphasis on class analysis in the education received in the camps.⁵¹ In 1980 the victory of ZANU in the Zimbabwean Chimurenga was rumoured to have reinforced the questioning within rank and file of the ANC's customary political alignments.⁵² Xan Smiley, writing in The Times (London) in June 1983, reported that the ANC was contemplating a restoration of 'a more traditional black African image'.⁵³ In the same year Tom Karis, an authoritative analyst of the ANC, suggested that the abolition of the Revolutionary Council and its replacement with committees more directly subject to the NEC may have been intended to emphasise the pre-eminence of Africans in the organisation.⁵⁴ In the case of the ANC's African leaders, their manner and bearing as diplomats, and increasingly, statesmen, conflicted with the sartorial expectations of the teenage graduates of Soweto street battles. Oliver Tambo, an essentially unpretentious man, is not in the habit of donning combat fatigues on public occasions, and this has allegedly been a source of some grumbling among ANC student communities.⁵⁵

Administrative measures such as the provision of educational programmes or a political commissariate can help to bridge the gulf between different generations and echelons of ANC membership, but ⁵¹ Davis, op. cit., pp 182-9.

⁵² ibid., p 182.

⁵³ 'A new and bloodier image for the ANC?', The Times, 27 June 1983.

⁵⁴ T Karis, 'Revolution in the making, black politics in South Africa', Foreign Affairs, Winter 1983/4, p 395.

⁵⁵ Testimony of Elizabeth Matube, State vs. Sipho Binda, 1985. This defector's claim has been corroborated by similar complaints from informants of the author who remain loyal to the ANC.

they can only be part of the solution. Since 1981, which the ANC designated as the 'Year of the Youth', a conscious effort has been put into fostering an ideological base for young people. The Youth Section was re-invigorated at a special conference in Mazimba in 1982 under the leadership of Umkhonto cadres. The predominantly military role young people play inside the ANC was a theme which influenced much of the discussion:

. . . ANC youth have to fully come to terms with the fact that we are at war inside South Africa and we are not just here outside the country . . . It also means that membership of Umkhonto we Sizwe is not only for those who are 'less educated'—intellectuals are needed in the field of battle. We are not talking about the 'battle of ideas' but the actual armed confrontation. We need engineers, scientists, technicians etc—in the past we tended to concentrate on social sciences but now there is a shift in our ranks towards natural sciences.⁵⁶

The fifteen-man Youth Secretariat is apparently composed of men and women said to be 'steeped in conspiracy' and 'clandestine methods' with a reputation for fearlessness earning for them 'a good deal of respect from the older leaders'.⁵⁷ By the mid-1960s, though, the 'young lions' had left 'neo-Africanism' a long way behind them; many of their leaders were said to have joined the Communist Party as well as the ANC⁵⁸ and an extensive process of discussion and debate preceded the election at Kabwe of the ANC's first 'non-racial' National Executive.⁵⁹ Since 1980, of course, the ANC's youthful intake is being shaped by a popular political culture in which Black Consciousness is no longer pre-eminent. In South Africa the most powerful influences are being supplied by the burgeoning trade union movement, as well as the massive federation of local community and youth organisations led by the United Democratic Front. The UDF has itself been radicalised since its inception partly as a result of the absorption into its leadership structures of the men from Robben Island, the pioneers of the first Umkhonto guerrilla offensive of 1961–5. Today the ANC's ideas and iconography are intrinsic to South African black teenage sub-culture; and ideological disaffection with the 'second wave' of post-1984 recruitment is rather unlikely.

⁵⁶ 'Impressions of the ANC Youth Conference', Sechaba, November 1982.

⁵⁷ The Sowetan, 21 October 1985.

⁵⁸ The Sunday Star, 20 October 1985. Leaders of the Youth Section delegation to an international youth festival in Moscow found in Soviet achievements evidence 'of the superiority of Socialism over Capitalism' (Nyawuza in Sechaba, October 1985, pp 18–19).

⁵⁹ See H J Simons, The Freedom Charter, equal rights and freedoms, in Selected Writings on the Freedom Charter, London: Sechaba Publications, 1985, p 105.

The original purpose of the ANC organisation which began to be built outside South Africa after 1960 was diplomacy and this still remains as one of the most important functions of the ANC's bureaucracy. Diplomacy is a vital sphere of ANC activity. It can secure financial and other forms of assistance in such a way as to minimise reliance on a single or narrow range of foreign allies. International legitimacy is crucial for the ANC in a conflict which already involves many powerful external interests. With foreign governments poised to implement various sanctions against South Africa the extent to which the ANC is recognised by these powers as being popularly representative has become all the more important. Most recently ANC diplomacy has assumed a fresh dimension, that of defining or developing the movement's relationship with a variety of interest groups and organised bodies inside the Republic.

The ANC receives its military equipment from the Soviet Union and other allied states. As we have seen these countries also give military training and various forms of tertiary and vocational education of selected groups. The German Democratic Republic prints ANC and SACP literature. The help is significant for the ANC but does not represent massive allocations of these states' resources. Much of the weaponry is fairly old and unlike other insurgent armies in Southern Africa (for instance, SWAPO or UNITA) the ANC's arsenal seems limited to automatic rifles, hand-grenades, mines, and side-arms. The ANC receives very little cash from Warsaw Pact donors.⁶⁰ It is accorded hardware which no other states (with the exceptions perhaps of China and one or two African countries) are willing to supply, hospitality and recognition. The ANC's representatives in Eastern European countries are granted diplomatic status and treated with elaborate courtesy. It is a relationship of long standing; key ANC leaders visited the socialist bloc during the 1950s and the channel of military assistance was opened in 1962. Obviously the alliance with SACP helped to keep it open without being a necessary condition for it. The affinities developed by the ANC in the international cold war tensions of the 1950s and early 1960s also helped to bring it into alignment with the ideologically similar MPLA and Frelimo of Angola and Mozambique, establishing a relationship with both which was to be very helpful later on.

To what extent help from socialist countries is reciprocated by the ANC is difficult to say. It is true that the ANC is supportive of Soviet positions in foreign policy; Tambo, for example, in his presentation of the NEC report at Kabwe indicated sympathy for Soviet perceptions of issues in Afghanistan and Czechoslovakia—but neither are of vital concern to Southern African politics. It is likely that socialist donors place less value on such formal gestures of rhetorical courtesy than on the development of several generations of soldiers, technocrats, and scholars now holding high office in the ANC who can be expected to have been intellectually influenced by their training in socialist institutions.⁶¹

⁶⁰ According to Oliver Tambo when he met South African businessmen in September 1985

Western-derived aid is of considerable importance to the ANC and probably needs more diplomatic effort to secure and maintain. The ANC has an international network of offices, though these are modest establishments and representing the ANC publicly is often allocated to fairly junior people. The ANC does not maintain a vast cadre of diplomats, but the few it does support in the USA, Western Europe, and, since 1984, Australia, are extremely able.⁶² In these countries the ANC has traditionally benefited from the activities of local anti-apartheid or anti-racist pressure groups; in the case of the British Anti-Apartheid Movement (AAM), the ANC had a role in its establishment and continues to work very closely with its leadership. Britain has always been a centre of ANC diplomatic work and this is logical. Britain's links with South Africa are stronger than any other foreign power, there is an expatriate community of 50,000 South Africans living in Britain, and a long history of contact between left-wing and liberal British politicians and their black South African counterparts. The ANC's headquarters once was situated in London and a large number of older ANC and SACP members live in Britain permanently.⁶³ The long-established ANC presence in Britain is beginning to reap dividends. Quite apart from symbolic gestures of recognition—freedom of several British cities for Nelson Mandela and his statue on the bank of the Thames—the ANC has begun to have contacts with both the Foreign Office and Conservative politicians and has been promised more substantial favours by the Labour Party. ANC spokesmen use a language and have a manner which seems to evoke a warm public response in Britain; this is partly a reflection of the skill of their representatives but also the result of familiarity and common elements of culture.⁶⁴

⁶¹ Francis Meki, for example, the author of an historical PhD dissertation on the history of the Comintern written at the University of Leipzig in the 1960s. Today he is editor of Sechaba. The obituary in Sechaba (January 1982) of a leading personality in the Women's section, Nomvana Shangaia, refers to ten years she spent in the USSR undergoing medical training.

⁶² This is a reputation they have enjoyed since the 1960s. See Nelson, op. cit., p 200.

⁶³ Both Sechaba and the African Communist are edited in London.

Notwithstanding the lobbying experience of Mfanafuthi Makatini, their seasoned UN representative, the ANC's position in the US is less certain. Until recently ANC presence in America was limited largely to students. Official American hostility to Marxism and the lack of American experience in dealing with radical anti-colonial movements used to ensure that ANC contact with US politicians was slight or inconsequential. Nevertheless, the ANC has had a considerable impact on non-government circles. Oliver Tambo began what has become a succession of meetings with or addresses to multinational corporation executives from 1981. In 1982 the New York group of ANC activists had succeeded in attracting considerable media attention through pickets of 'tribal' musicals and were being asked to check and advise on forthcoming productions of South African-related material.⁶⁵ The ANC presence in the US was at least sufficiently developed to enable it to be cast in a leading role when the disinvestment campaign exploded on college campuses in 1984. This has now compelled the present US Administration to grudgingly concede a degree of official contact with ANC representatives.

The frontline states apart, the ANC seems to accord Africa rather a low priority in its diplomatic agenda. It is represented in only a sprinkling of African states outside Southern Africa. African aid, with the exception of Zambia, Tanzania, and Ethiopia, is usually administered through the Organisation of African Unity, and as Oliver Tambo has often publicly indicated is neither dependable nor substantial.⁶⁶ It is chiefly in Africa in which the ANC finds itself confronted with the presence of a competitor, the Pan-Africanist Congress, which is still able to influence public and official perceptions in at least Nigeria, Zimbabwe, and Libya. The most important help, of course, which the ANC obtains from any foreign power is the accommodation provided by Zambia, Angola, and Tanzania, but this today is the outcome of a relationship which is of a much deeper and more intimate character than that characterised by diplomacy. The ⁶⁴ Western European recognition is by no means confined to Britain. ANC representatives are given semi-official status in Scandinavian countries (in which they receive Government aid), were signatories to the Geneva Convention in 1980, and have had several meetings with European Economic Community officials (The Star, 10 September 1985 and 26 September 1985).

⁶⁵ The Star, 4 February 1982.

⁶⁶ See Tambo's criticisms of the OAU reported in The Times, 11 August 1984.

ANC's relationship with other frontline states is more problematic because of their vulnerability to South African pressure. Outstanding in its absence from the various expressions of congratulatory support from foreign governments and organisations at Kabwe was any mention of a greeting from Mozambique.⁶⁷ The ANC's experience in Mozambique and the way it was kept ignorant of the events which culminated in the signature of the Nkomati pact is a telling instance of the uneven quality of its African diplomacy.⁶⁸ It serves as a reminder of just how important diplomatic activity can be, especially in the case of a foreign country with the potential to influence South African events and with a non-committal approach to the ANC—the US and Britain are two such examples.

The ANC's usual diplomatic work has been augmented by the beginning of a new phase of formal contacts with South African groups. Since September 1985 the Lusaka or Harare offices have entertained at least a dozen deputations. Beginning with a group of businessmen led by the Anglo American chairman, these have included representatives of the Progressive Federal Party, the Soweto Parents' Crisis Committee (SPCC), the Federated Chamber of Industries, the National Convention Movement, Roman Catholic and Protestant churches, the Kngwane Inyandya movement, the Congress of South African Trade Unions, the National Union of South African Students, and the National African Federated Chambers of Commerce (NAFCOC). In some cases, as with the white businessmen, these talks have been exploratory to elicit from the ANC its position on particular issues. In the case of COSATU and NAFCOC, intentions may have been more ambitious; both represent constituencies which may favour the ANC's accession to power subject to certain assurances. In the case of Inyandya and the SPCC, visiting the ANC was a significant political statement: in Inyandya's case, setting it apart from other homeland-based groups and with the SPCC in endorsing its attempt to represent and lead the school children boycott movement.

These contacts are obviously beneficial for the ANC: they help to confirm its ascendancy in black South African politics and open up the possibility of eroding the South African government's support base within the white community. They have their difficult dimension, though. Commenting on the talks, a SACP Politburo document observed:

... a political readjustment in the ruling power bloc which favours its liberal

⁶⁷ See list of greetings in Documents from the Second Consultative Conference of the ANC, pp 60–1.

⁶⁸ Joseph Hanlon, Mozambique: The Revolution Under Fire, London: Zed Books, 1985, p 261.

bourgeoisie wing would undoubtedly create better objective conditions for the continuing struggle by the revolutionary forces to achieve the aims of national democratic revolution.

Tactically, what flows from this?

On the one hand we are justified in helping by all means (including talks) to advance the process of breaking the cohesion and unity of the ruling class and to isolate and weaken its most racist and politically reactionary class brothers . . .

We must expose their objective of co-opting forces from among the oppressed in order to frustrate the achievements of the main aims of the national democratic revolution.

We must not play into their hands by working out compromises (or being seen to work out compromises) for some hypothetical negotiating table . . .

Nor must a genuine desire to project a public image of 'reasonableness' tempt us to paddle softly on the true nature of the liberation alliance and its revolutionary socio-economic objectives.

At the same time we must not mechanically dig in our heels against any future possibility of negotiation with brother forces.⁶⁹

The difficulty for the ANC leadership is that in such a process it can become increasingly difficult to distinguish between a tactical position and one representing a principle. This is especially the case when the ANC leadership itself is eclectically diverse and lacks a detailed conception of such issues as the precise role the state would play in the economy in a liberated South Africa. There is also the problem of whatever the intentions of the participants in such talks these cannot always be easily communicated. This difficulty has obviously been worrying the ANC leadership:

[there is the] possibility that our movement will be in contact with levels of the ruling circles . . . that it has never dealt with before . . . [it is] vital [that we] should be of one mind about this development . . . to ensure . . . it does not have a negative effect on the development of the struggle.⁷⁰

ANC spokesmen do seem to have made some allowances for the preoccupations and special concerns of their partners in these various talks. The key question for both businessmen and Western governments has been the extent and nature of economic nationalisation advocated by the ANC. Oliver Tambo and other ANC leaders have insisted on their commitment to a mixed economy and have suggested that the level of private enterprise which would be a matter of debate, not something, to quote Tambo, that 'we . . . envisage fighting in the street over'.⁷¹ The same point incidentally, was made by Joe Slovo in his speech at the sixty-fifth anniversary celebrations of the SACP in London: '... the continuing drive towards a socialist future . . . could well be settled in debate rather than on the streets'.⁷² Oliver Tambo at the September 1985 meeting with South African businessmen speculated that ANC nationalisation measures might be limited to a 51 per cent state shareholding. This moderation well may be the reflection of principled beliefs rather than a tactical negotiating ploy: even the SACP has a theoretical commitment to a transitional phase of national democracy.⁷³ Nevertheless ANC ambivalence on economic issues is out of step with more radical economic philosophies which prevail inside South Africa: UDF leaders proclaim the virtues of a 'people's dictatorship' in which private ownership would be restricted to boutiques and barber's shops.⁷⁴ Clearly this was not the vision Sam Motsuenyane and his colleagues in NAFCOC brought away with them from Lusaka.⁷⁵

⁶⁹ SACP Politburo document released to South African State President's office, 12 June 1986.
⁷⁰ Documents from the Second Consultative Conference, p 36.

The ANC like any other organisation in such a situation uses different language for different constituencies. The gentle and courteous language of diplomacy and discussion with outsiders contrasts sharply with the strident and jargonised prose employed in its journal, Sechaba. In its radio broadcasts to South Africa, directed presumably at a popular audience, the language is especially harsh:

The regime's police and soldiers who have been massacring our people in millions over the years still return to their homes and spend comfortable nights in the warmth of their beds . . . They must be haunted by the mass offensive. We must attack them at their homes and their holiday resorts just as we have been attacking their bootlickers at their homes. This must now happen to their white colleagues. All along it has only been the black mothers who have been mourning. Now the time has come that all of us must mourn. White families must also wear black costumes. (Domestic servants must play) a leading role. They know where their employers keep their weapons and they are the ones who can devise plans of transferring the ownership of these weapons.⁷⁶

⁷¹ 'A conversation with Oliver Tambo of the ANC', Cape Times, 4 November 1985.

⁷² 'Communist blueprint for South Africa', The Guardian Weekly, 17 August 1986, p 9.

⁷³ Peter Hudson, 'The Freedom Charter and socialist strategy in South Africa', Politikon, 13(1), June 1986.

⁷⁴ See Raymond Suttner and Jeremy Cronin, Thirty Years of the Freedom Charter. Johannesburg: Ravan Press, 1986, pp 179-80.

⁷⁵ See Business Day (Johannesburg), 30 May 1986 and 'ANC in favour of private property says Motsuenyane', Weekly Mail, 11 July 1986, p 5.

⁷⁶ Reported in The Guardian (London), 20 October 1985.

The issue of just whom violence should be directed at seems to be one over which there is disagreement in the ANC. Reddy Mazimba, the ANC representative in Harare was attributed with the injunction that 'White parents would have to go to the graveyards' when the ANC's offensive reached white areas and white schools',⁷⁷ a threat which was swiftly repudiated by the ANC's Lusaka office.⁷⁸ ANC leaders maintain that white civilians per se will not be targets of attack, only incidental victims of 'crossfire'.⁷⁹ Joe Slovo referred to recent limpet mine explosions which killed or hurt civilians at bus stops and a Wimpy Bar as 'diversions' and 'blemishes'.⁸⁰ Even within the narrower field of diplomacy the ANC employs variations in rhetoric: in the United States its personalities describe the organisation as 'a community of love and justice [on a] pilgrim's road to freedom' and speak of their admiration for the values enshrined in the American Constitution,⁸¹ while in a different context they proclaim their 'natural alliance with the Soviet Union and the world socialist system as a whole'.⁸²

Such alterations of language and tone are inevitable and necessary in an organisation which has to preserve a balance between the requirements of loyalty and gratitude to its military patrons, assuaging the potential hostility of Western governments and reassuring liberal allies within capitalist democracies, while at the same time retaining and expanding support within a heterodox collection of constituencies inside South Africa. They only represent a threat to the ANC's integrity if they open up ideological and strategic divisions within leadership or between leadership and following. As yet this does not appear to be a serious risk but it should be borne in mind that the ANC's leadership is socially and ideologically an eclectic one. We will conclude this survey of the exile organisation by looking briefly at the composition of its leadership and the different political traditions it represents.

The men and women elected at the Kabwe conference can be placed in four categories each of which represent a significant group within the organisation. First there are the people whose political experience dates back to the nationalist revival of the ANC Youth League in the 1940s and who predominated in the mass-based militant populist campaigning of the 1950s. Oliver Tambo is representative of these, a former attorney

⁷⁷ The Star, 28 May 1985.

⁷⁸ ibid.

⁷⁹ See for example Oliver Tambo's statement to the House of Commons Foreign Affairs Committee, The Situation in South Africa, minutes, 29 October 1985, p 6.

⁸⁰ Joe Slovo interviewed on the BBC World Service, 4 July 1986.

⁸¹ Joe Leyleveld, quoted in The Star, 3 November 1983, and Tom Karis, op. cit., pp 394-5.

⁸² Joe Leyleveld, quoted in The Star, 3 November 1983.

and school teacher whose moderate philosophy and lack of interest in economic questions recall a period when the ANC's ideology expressed the concerns of a class alliance which had strong roots in the African middle class. Of the same age as the veterans of populist nationalism are the working-class leaders of the 1940s and the 1950s many of them former trade unionists and SACTU office holders and some of them also office holders within the Communist Party. John Nkadimeng, the late Moses Mabhida, and also Joe Slovo (never in fact a trade unionist, but currently the Chairman of the SACP) can be put in this group. More radical in their socio-economic ideals they nevertheless share many common areas of experience with the older nationalists: the decade of open multi-class and multi-communal campaigning of the 1950s, an aversion to extreme degrees of violence, the patience and caution of long years of exile, a dislike of utopian sectarianism,⁸³ and other elements of a common political outlook.

Then there are two younger groups. A considerable proportion of NEC leaders spent their politically formative years in the politics of violent and clandestine action of the 1960s when the ANC's methods of necessity had to be those of a conspiratorial and clandestine elite. Within the country the ANC was reconstituted underground and in the process considerably radicalised. Some of these men, Mac Maharaj and Jacob Zuma are two such cases, underwent lengthy prison sentences on Robben Island for their role in the first Umkhonto campaign. Meanwhile a fourth group of young men left the country to join the ANC in exile; virtually the whole of their political experience has been in the external bureaucracy. Simon Makana, Francis Meli and Thabo Mbeki, all students who completed their academic training at foreign universities, are representative of this category.

The younger men have matured in an ANC which for them has always been a revolutionary organisation and despite the self-control and diplomatic restraint which they are often called upon to exercise they are likely to be less conciliatory and more radical in their attitudes.⁸⁴

⁸³ See for example 'Conference expels left-wing deviationists', Sechaba, August 1985, for a detailed history of the ANC's treatment of a group of Trotskyite dissenters.

⁸⁴ For instance, contrast Thabo Mbeki's position with relationship to black entrepreneurs with that of Nelson Mandela, as expressed in the 1950s:

'Thus black capitalism instead of being the antithesis is rather confirmation of the parasitism with no redeeming features whatsoever, without any extenuating circumstances to excuse its existence' (Mbeki in Selected Writings on the Freedom Charter, p 48).

'The breaking up and democratisation of these monopolies will open up fresh fields for the developments of a prosperous Non-European bourgeois class. For the first time in the history of this country the Non-European bourgeoisie will have the opportunity to own in their own name and right mills and factories and trade and private enterprise will boom and flourish as never before' (Nelson Mandela, 'In our lifetime', Liberation, No. 19, June 1956, p 6.)

They are presently being joined by a fresh influx of potential leaders from the post-1980 era of open working-class mobilisation inside South Africa. These bring with them the politics of a conflict which increasingly is popularly perceived in the terms of a polarisation of class.

Many external commentaries devote a great deal of attention to the extent to which the SACP influences the ANC leadership. This is very difficult to quantify exactly. The SACP keeps the identity of most of its membership secret. This is partly the consequence of the ingrained habit of always functioning in hostile terrain but also because of the sensitivity of SACP involvement in the affairs of the ANC in the context of both African and Western hostility to Communists. Of the thirty NEC members less than a quarter can be authoritatively said to be SACP members though there is evidence which suggests that the SACP influences several others as well. As has been argued above, life experiences are at least as important as formal political affinities in determining the ideology of different members of the NEC (and presumably the ANC as a whole). Two other points are relevant to the evaluation of SACP influences. First, recent SACP documentation suggests that the manpower resources of the Party are very stretched at the moment and this has inhibited the degree to which the Party can function as a deliberate and unified presence within the wider liberation movement. For example, between 1983 and 1985 the Central Committee did not hold a single meeting.⁸⁵ Secondly, adherence to Marxism is by no means confined to Communists within the ANC. Both well-educated recruits from South Africa and the graduates of Western European universities are influenced by an intellectual background in which Marxism is a powerful constituent. Interestingly Thabo Mbeki, a British and US-trained economist, and one of the more radical young NEC members, was criticised in a Zimbabwean newspaper recently for his 'incomplete study of the SACP and the ANC'. Mbeki was taken to task by this contributor for allegedly asserting that the SACP was responsible for the 'shelving' of socialism.⁸⁶

African nationalism, Christian liberalism, clandestinity, technocracy, communist popular frontism, Western Marxism, and indigenous working-class radicalism as well as residual elements of black consciousness are constituents in the ANC's complicated ideological recipe. Within this mixture individual ideological identities are very difficult to chart and plot. There are, though, several issues which observably provide differences of emphasis and even implicit disagreement. Two have already been referred to: the nature of the violence employed by ANC guerrillas and the ingredients in the ANC's projection of a mixed economy. A third, which with future diplomatic activity may become accentuated, is the question of how the conflict will ultimately be resolved. Three years before his death, Moses Mabhida provided a clue illuminating different perceptions between SACP revolutionaries and the wider movement on the mechanics of transition: (There is) one issue, on which the Party (the SACP) follows Communist doctrines in preference to the (Freedom) Charter's proposals. The issue is concerned with the nature of the State organisation to be established after the democratic seizure of power. In our opinion it will be necessary to destroy the apparatus of the racist state and replace it with new political institutions to safeguard the revolution and clear the way for a new social order.⁸⁷

⁸⁵ 'Inner Party Bulletin' taken by South African Defence Force members raiding ANC facilities in Gaborone in June 1985 and later given to South African journalists.

⁸⁶ Zimbabwe Herald, 28 November 1985.

Obviously the form of 'seizure' (a favourite word in ANC phraseology) will be a decisive factor in the attainment of such a goal. There do seem to be two different perceptions within the ANC of how transference of political power is likely to take place. On the one hand is the scenario favoured by Umkhonto strategists (probably irrespective of political affiliation): here the dénouement of the struggle is conceived in terms of an overwhelming general insurrection:

Armed insurrection, in some form or other, rather than guerrilla warfare, but often as a culmination of guerrilla warfare, is the classic method of making a revolution. There appear to be two main categories into which insurrections fall—the spontaneous mass uprising, as in Iran, and the planned uprising, as in Petrograd, October 1917. These stand at either end of a scale of varying possibilities.

In the first category there is no prearranged plan or date, with an entirely unexpected, even extraneous, event sparking off the conflagration. In such a situation, revolutionaries struggle to gain control, and organise the seizure of power.

In the second category, insurrection is deliberately timed as the final move in a carefully prepared plan of revolutionary action—in which the balance of forces has been finely calculated. The Bolsheviks struggled to gain control over the forces unleashed by the February Revolution, as an unexpected event, and directed these forces to the planned seizure of power in October 1917. What we can be sure about is that every revolution which must depend for its ultimate success upon popular support demands an active revolutionary situation before insurrection can be safely launched. It also needs a movement which has the forces and means powerful enough to overthrow the existing order.⁸⁸

⁸⁷ Moses Mabhida, Speech to ANC Youth Conference, Morogoro, 17–23 August 1982, African Communist, No. 92, First Quarter, 1983.

In emphatic contrast with this almost millennial vision is the practical Realpolitik of the diplomats. Oliver Tambo has asserted on several occasions that the ANC's main objective lies not 'in a military victory but to force Pretoria to the negotiating table',⁸⁹ an argument elaborated by Thabo Mbeki:

The call you make to people is the same, saying you are not prepared to negotiate, that you must intensify the offensive. But in the course of that offensive it is clear that one of the most important things is breaking up of the power structure. . . . Even the army will have its problems because it is a conscript army subject to all the pressures that the general public is subject to. There are 'homeland' leaders also subject to pressures and we hope that more of them will desert Botha's camp as well. Out of this you will get a re-alignment of forces. We are not talking of overthrowing the government but of turning so many people against it that it would be forced to do what Ian Smith had to do.⁹⁰

This should not be understood as a division between 'radicals' and 'moderates' but rather a difference separating realist from romantics, both of which categories may embrace a variety of ideological inclinations. For Marxists as well as revolutionaries the advantages of inheriting an advanced industrial state relatively unscathed by civil warfare are obvious enough. When the Commonwealth Eminent Persons' Group (CEPG) presented the possibility of a non-violent accession to power the ANC's leadership's response was unexpectedly, even receptively, uncertain.⁹¹ For revolutionaries, guerrilla insurgency is by no means the only safeguard against the revolutionary process (to cite the historical analogy used by the SACP) stopping short at a February without 'moving into an October'.⁹² Not with the reappearance in South Africa of a massive working-class political movement.

This article began with the contention that the ANC has been not only unharmed by the pressures and trauma of exile but has actually ⁸⁸ Ronnie Kasrils, 'People's war, revolution and insurrection', Sechaba, May 1986.

⁸⁹ Financial Mail (Johannesburg), 17 January 1986.

⁹⁰ The Observer (London), 2 March 1986.

⁹¹ An ANC representative at the Nassau Conference appeared willing to contemplate the possibility of a truce proposal (The Star, 25 October 1985). ANC preconditions for negotiation with the South African authorities seemed to soften significantly in the days which immediately succeeded the SADF raids on ANC buildings in Zimbabwe, Zambia and Botswana (Business Day, 'EPG peace package is still on the rails', 21 May 1986).

⁹² SACP Politburo document.

prospered because of it. Underneath the shelter afforded by sympathetic government, the organisation has developed resources well beyond the capacity of internally based South African political movements. It has been able to offer to its partisans an hermetic world which has taken its moral and physical authority to heights that vastly exceed those of a political party. But then, as Oliver Tambo has frequently argued, the ANC 'is not a political party, it is a national movement'.⁹³ It is an army, an educational system, a department of foreign affairs, a mini economy, a source of moral hegemony, in short, a government. Despite the manifest insecurities of dependence on weak countries unable to protect the organisation from the hostility of the South African Republic,⁹⁴ despite the human suffering which produced it and continues to inform every facet of its existence, it is a state-in-exile, and only in exile could such a state have been constructed.

⁹³ House of Commons, op. cit., p 4.

⁹⁴ Witness the recent deportations of ANC members from Lesotho. There is a long list of assassinations of prominent ANC people in the Frontline States. A plot to kill the Lusaka-based leaders reported by Howard Barrell (Sunday Tribune (Durban), 19 December 1982) has at least been partially corroborated by defector testimony (see statement by Ephraim Mfala, Denton Committee hearings, p 19).

⁹⁵ The ANC's reputed overall budget of $100 million in 1983 (Financial Mail, 8 June 1984) is comparable to that of the reformist business group, the Urban Foundation, and minute when contrasted with, for example, the 1981 South African military budget of $2.76 billion (Washington Post, 2 January 1984). Recently the ANC's budget was estimated more conservatively at between $25 million and $40 million a year. Swedish contributions were estimated at $6 million in 1985, equal in value to the weaponry provided by the Soviet Union (Steve Mufson, New Republic, August 1986, p 22).

The politics of Palestinian exile

Uprooting, occupation, and dispersal

In 1948, 78 per cent of the historic land of Palestine came under occupation by the newly established State of Israel. Of a total Palestinian Arab population of 1.4 million, 60 per cent became refugees in the remaining parts of Palestine and in neighbouring Arab countries.¹ Between 83 per cent and 93 per cent of the inhabitants of the areas now occupied by Israel were uprooted and sent into exile. Most of the refugees crowded in with the original residents of the Gaza Strip, under Egyptian administration, and of the West Bank, which was formally annexed to Jordan in 1950, while additional numbers settled in Syria, Lebanon, and Transjordan, or even further afield.²

Different legal conditions pertained to the refugee community in each Arab country. In Jordan, the Palestinians were granted full citizenship, including the issuing of passports, in accordance with the 1950 Act of Union. Syria granted equal rights (including the vote) with its own citizens and Iraq waived the need for residence and work permits, whereas Egypt permitted certain political and military activities but confined its Palestinians to the Gaza Strip; Lebanon imposed major restrictions on all aspects of refugee life.³ In several Arab countries, a minority of refugees became full nationals, but the individuals affected usually enjoyed family or religious affinity with the issuing authorities (as in Syria and Lebanon), or provided needed professional and technical skills to the host country (as in the Gulf).

¹ Various estimates at 750–840,000 people. There are many accounts of the circumstances surrounding the flight of the Palestinians and their resettling. One is N Nazzari, The Palestinian Exodus from Galilee, 1948, Beirut: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1978. Another is R Sayigh, Palestinians: From Peasants to Revolutionaries, London: Zed Press, 1979. A more general history is D Hirst, The Gun and the Olive Branch, London: Faber and Faber, 1977. Recently, an Israeli journalist unearthed official Israeli Army documents confirming the fact that the Palestinians fled as a result of Zionist military action and not because of exhortations to do so by Arab leaders. B Morris, 'Operation Dani and the Palestinian Exodus from Lydda and Ramle in 1948', The Middle East Journal 40(1) Winter 1986, pp 82–109.

² 200,000 refugees joined 800,000 residents in the Gaza Strip while 360,000 others joined the 425,000 residents in the West Bank. Over 100,000 refugees fled to each of Lebanon, Syria, and Transjordan.

³ These countries have issued special 'Palestinian refugee' identity cards and travel documents. In many cases in Lebanon, refugees could only obtain laissez-passer papers defining them as 'stateless' and 'of uncertain origin'. The PLO has frequently pressed the Arab League to issue a recognised Palestinian passport. See interview with the PLO's 'foreign minister', Farouq Qaddoumi, in the PLO weekly Filistin ath-Thawrah (571) 24 August 1985, p 20. For a portrait of refugee life in Lebanon, see F Turki, The Disinherited: Journal of a Palestinian Exile, New York: Monthly Review Press, 1972.

In 1967, Israel occupied the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, forcing 300,000 persons, many refugees for the second time, into Jordan.⁴ The whole of Palestine was now under occupation, as well as Egyptian Sinai and the Syrian Golan Heights. Israel also ruled over 1.5 million Palestinians: 1 million inhabitants of the so-called 'Occupied Territories' of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, and 0.5 million 'Israeli Arabs' in Israel proper. By 1986, the captive population had grown to 2 million, with another 2.5 million Palestinians in the Arab Diaspora.⁴

Elements of uniqueness

The Palestinians are not the only people to have experienced occupation and national subjugation. Many peoples around the world have suffered colonial domination, during which they experienced collective political and physical repression and economic exploitation. In the post-colonial era, many ethnic or tribal minorities have also suffered expulsion and mass migration as a result of inherent conflicts within their new nation-states. Rarely, though, has a whole people been subjected simultaneously to uprooting, expulsion, dispersal, and complete denial of nationhood, as have the Palestinians; in history, only the Armenians and Kurds have suffered somewhat similar experiences. Since its establishment, Israel has undertaken a systematic attempt to deny the very existence of the Palestinians and to erase their national identity: by treating the Palestine question solely as one of refugees, by rewriting history textbooks, demolishing villages, and changing historical landscapes.⁵ This is what makes the Palestinian case unique in the modern world.

⁴ There were 1.25 million refugees and migrants in Jordan, 4-500,000 in the Arab oil states, 400,000 in Lebanon, and 250-300,000 in Syria. On Palestinian demography, see E Said, E Zureik, J Abu-Lughod, I Abu-Lughod and M Hallaj (eds), A Profile of the Palestinian People, Chicago: Palestine Human Rights Campaign, 1983. In 1979, there were 1,803,564 registered Palestine refugees still receiving benefits from the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees. Report of the Commissioner General of UNRWA, 1978-9, paragraph 2.

⁵ The former Israeli Prime Minister, Golda Meir, best expressed this process when she responded to a journalist's question by asking: 'The Palestinians, who are they? They do not exist.' Western countries have assisted in the denial of Palestinian rights. The implication that the Palestinians are not a legitimate national community is the essence of US and Israeli policy that 'is so extreme that Palestinians are not even permitted to select their own representatives for eventual negotiations about their fate'. N Chomsky, 'Thought control in the USA: the case of the Middle East', Index on Censorship (7) 1986, p 2.

Complicating the Palestinians' situation and adding to its uniqueness is their special relationship to the broader Arab world, with whom they share a common political, social, and cultural heritage. The Palestine cause is an Arab one, and has received widespread support in all Arab countries. But it has also become an element of domestic (national) and inter-Arab politics, rendering it vulnerable to the regional and sectarian conflicts of the area. Specifically, the Palestinians—as people, cause, or movement—in the main host countries of the Palestinian Diaspora have been subjected to continuous attempts at co-optation or containment by regimes which are themselves still seeking to assert the political and moral legitimacy of their claim to power.

Features of exile

These circumstances—uprooting, dispersal, national denial, and interaction with the Arab environment—have imbued the Palestinian exile with several distinct features and have determined the nature and form of the Palestinians' historical response.

The first of four main features is that the Palestinians have felt an overwhelming need to reassert their identity, to the extent of emphasising their distinctiveness from their Arab brethren. Yet the emphasis on a separate Palestinian identity has brought the contemporary national movement of the Palestinians into conflict with its Arab environment. Pan-Arabists deny the right of any Palestinian to offer territorial or political concessions in Palestine, claiming that the land and therefore any decisions affecting it belong to the whole Arab nation. The Syrian and Jordanian leaderships both lay a rival historical claim to all or part of Palestine.

Secondly, in a situation where over half the Palestinian people and the whole of Palestine are under Israeli occupation, and given rival Arab claims, it has been imperative for the contemporary Palestinian leadership to construct a political entity that could represent the Palestinians politically and existentially. Furthermore, the fact that the Palestinians have never had indigenous governing bodies has also made it necessary that such an 'entity' be embodied in institutions that can legitimately claim to represent and serve the Palestinian people.

A third feature is that, despite the presence of large Palestinian refugee communities in the three 'confrontation' states immediately abutting Israel—Jordan, Syria, and Lebanon—there has not been, since 1948, a solid foundation on which to construct a Palestinian entity, nor even a dependable base from which to launch independent politico-military action. Since the mid-1960s, when the contemporary national resistance movement came into being, several attempts have been made to establish a political entity, a military base, and even a rudimentary socio-economic structure. Yet on every occasion the combination of the challenge posed by the Palestinian example, the threat to internal stability, and the risk of inviting Israeli retaliation, has been sufficient to bring the host governments into direct confrontation with the Palestinian movement. Indeed, the movement's vulnerability to the political and physical consequences of Arab divisions, and thus its need to play an unending balancing game between competing Arab interests, form the fourth feature of the Palestinian exile.

It is these features which, in different ways and for widely varying reasons, make the bond with the Palestinians under occupation so important to the contemporary Palestinian national leadership. The ability to evoke support from the Palestinians 'inside' the Occupied Territories and to reach the Israeli occupier militarily, endows the leadership 'outside' in exile with added legitimacy and moral strength. Legitimacy also strengthens the leadership's claim to represent the Palestinians to the world community. In turn, international legitimacy and support assist that leadership in its rivalry with certain Arab states. Ultimately, it has been the success of the Palestine Liberation Organisation (PLO), in re forging Palestinian identity, in building institutions that represent the Palestinians and serve them, and in eliciting broad international recognition of Palestinian rights, that makes the PLO their sole legitimate representative in the eyes of the 4.5 million Palestinians, even though 4 million of them are now completely outside its physical control in Israel, the Occupied Territories, Jordan, Syria and Lebanon.

Palestinian nationalism and its environment

The unique position of the Palestinians within the Arab environment has influenced the nature and development of their contemporary national movement, inter-group ties, and Arab-Palestinian relations. The following three sections deal with these areas. Later sections deal with Palestinian responses: to formulate autonomous political goals, to develop a specific approach to the use of military means in the struggle against Israel, and to build national institutions.

Two forms of contemporary Palestinian nationalism

In response to their plight, the Palestinians have constantly displayed a high level of political activism. During the 1950s and early 1960s, this took the form of participation in Arab opposition parties, mass support for pan-Arab issues and leaders, and fedayeen action—cross-border raids against Israeli targets by individuals or self-organised groups.⁶ In Israel proper, a nationalist movement emerged, al-Ard, but it was soon banned and its leaders were gaoled, leaving only the Arab section of the Israeli Communist Party as a vehicle for political expression.⁷ Equally, most Arab governments undertook population control of the Palestinians, limiting or repressing political and social activism in varying degrees; the low point was in the 1961–3 period.

In this climate, many Palestinians concluded that they could not rely on either the Arab governments or the opposition parties to restore their homeland. Between 1956 and 1964, several clandestine groups preaching armed struggle evolved, most prominent of which were the Palestine National Liberation Movement (Fateh) and the Palestinian branch of the Arab Nationalist Movement (which coalesced into the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP) in late 1967). Although both groups believed in the ultimate necessity of broader Arab military involvement, they felt that the Palestinians themselves had to take the initiative; Fateh even spoke of the need for an example of armed propaganda, a foco.⁸ From these early beginnings developed the idea of applying the concepts of 'guerrilla warfare' and 'people's war' in the Palestinian case.⁹ In the two-year period before June 1967, the guerrillas implemented their slogans by launching military operations against Israeli targets from adjacent Arab territory, despite

⁶ On Palestine political activism in Jordan in this period, see A Cohen, Political Parties in the West Bank under the Jordanian Regime, 1949–1967, Ithaca and London: Cornell University Press, 1982, and A Plascov, The Palestinian Refugees in Jordan, 1948–1957, London: Frank Cass, 1981. On fedayeen action in Gaza, see K Love, Suez The Twice-Fought War, New York: McGraw-Hill, 1969.

⁷ On this period, see S Jiryis, The Arabs in Israel, New York: Monthly Review Press, 1976, and F Asmar, To be an Arab in Israel, London: Frances Pinter, 1975.

⁸ L Kadi, Basic Political Documents of the Armed Palestinian Resistance Movement, Beirut: PLO Research Center, 1969, p. 22. Fateh in particular took an independent line, whereas the Arab nationalists considered themselves part of the Arab front.

⁹ Fateh's early military thought was strongly influenced by the Algerian example, and its leaders met Chinese and Vietnamese leaders, as well as 'Che' Guevara, in the early 1960s. On the rise of the guerrilla movement, see Abu Iyad with Eric Rouleau, My Home, My Land: A Narrative of the Palestinian Struggle, New York: Times Books, 1981; H Cobban, The Palestinian Liberation Organisation: People, Power and Politics, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1983; and R El-Rayyes and D Nahas, Guerrillas for Palestine, London: Croom Helm, 1976.

constant attempts in most Arab countries to intercept and detain Palestinian infiltrators. After the Six Day War, the various guerrilla groups came to be termed collectively as the Palestine Resistance Movement (PRM).

Sensing the growing dissatisfaction of the Palestinians, and fearing their orientation towards the autonomous guerrilla groups, the Arab leaders sought the creation of a docile instrument that would keep 'a tight rein on Palestinian activities [rather] than promot[e] an effective Palestinian Resistance'.¹⁰ Accordingly, the First Arab Summit Conference (January 1964) authorised the delegate for Palestine, Ahmad Shuqeiri, to contact various Palestinians and study the issue of a Palestinian entity.¹¹ Shuqeiri overstepped his mandate, however, and convened a Palestine National Council (PNC) in Jerusalem, on 28 May 1964.¹² The 388 members of this effective Palestinian 'parliament', who represented all the Palestinian communities (excepting that of Israel), established the Palestine Liberation Organisation and elected an Executive Committee to head it. Faced with this fait accompli, the Second Arab Summit felt obliged to recognise the PLO on 11 September and approve the formation of a Palestinian Liberation Army (PLA).¹³

Prior to June 1967, the two forms of contemporary Palestinian nationalism grew in parallel: one, the PLO, represented legitimacy sanctified by the Arab regional order; the other, the PRM, represented extra-legal grassroots militancy and self-reliance. One provided the 'entity', the other the 'identity'. Ironically, while the PLO was negatively affected by the outcome of the June 1967 War because of its affiliation to the Arab states, the PRM's real growth came after the Israeli Army (IDF) had overwhelmed the combined Egyptian, Syrian, and Jordanian

¹⁰ El-Rayyes and Nahas, op. cit., pp 16–17.

¹¹ A Shuqeiri, Min al-Qimma ila al-Hazimah (From Summit to Defeat), Beirut: Dar al'Awdah, 1971, pp 61–2. (In Arabic).

¹² An excellent discussion of this period is in I Sakhnini, 'Al-Kayan al-Filistini, 1964–1974' ('The Palestinian Entity, 1964–1974'), Shu'un Filistiniyya (41–42) January–February 1975, pp 46–74. (In Arabic).

¹³ A cynical view is that the PLO was 'a device to enable the Arab governments to pass the responsibility of confronting Israel to the Palestinians and thereby avoid shouldering it themselves' M Kerr, The Arab Cold War: Gamal 'Abd al-Nasir and his Rivals, 1958–1970, New York: Oxford University Press, 1971 (3rd edn, 1978 reprint), p 115. In any case, as Fateh's second-in-command states, 'the PLO was kept paralysed for a year after its establishment, and was then prevented from taking an independent line'. Abu Jihad (Khalil al-Wazir) in interview with Ahmad Saif, 'Taqqeem Mukhtalaf Marahil an-Nidal al-Filistini' ('Evaluation of the various phases of the Palestinian struggle'), Shu'un Filistiniyya (152–153) November–December 1985, p 6. (In Arabic). On the regional background to the Arab decision on the PLO, see Kerr, op. cit., pp 114–17.

armed forces. The war shattered more than soldiers and tanks: it overturned prevalent assumptions and expectations about the power of the modern Arab states and their regular armies. In discrediting the Arab governments, the war weakened their physical and moral ability to repress the Palestinian guerrillas.

If the June War had created the objective conditions for the rise of a resistance movement (the presence of a captive population in occupied territory, and the debilitation of Arab political control), then it was the Battle of Karameh, in March 1968, that transformed the guerrillas into a real alternative to the existing Arab order in Palestinian and Arab eyes. In Karameh, a refugee town on the East Bank of the Jordan River, some 300 guerrillas fought off elements of a 15,000-strong Israeli force for thirty-two hours. Eventually, over half the guerrillas were killed or captured and the town was devastated, but the myth of Israeli invincibility had been destroyed.¹⁴ As a result, the PRM was flooded with thousands of volunteers and in the following months it expanded into Palestinian population centres, opening social, organisational and political offices and recruiting a popular militia. The PRM's overall military capability remained modest, but the swell of Arab popular support had not made it a political force to be reckoned with.

Throughout 1968, the guerrillas increased their representation and support within the PLO, and in February 1969 Arafat became its new Chairman. However, not all guerrilla groups had entered the PLO at this stage, nor accepted its authority. The amorphous PRM was still seen as the true fighting force, the authentic Palestinian conscience, whereas the PLO was viewed as having bureaucratic tendencies by definition. For two years, while Arafat's Fateh group worked to consolidate the PLO's role, all major decisions were still taken by loosely knit coordinating committees within the PRM. It was the Jordanian civil war of 1970-1 that altered this situation: the guerrillas sustained heavy casualties and were finally driven out of Jordan altogether.¹⁵ The PRM, both as a body and a concept, was thrown into disarray. The politico-military slogans of the small 'radical' groups in particular were discredited, allowing Fateh (always the dominant force) the opportunity to promote the PLO as the Palestinian political centre. From then on, until the evacuation from Beirut in 1982, the PRM was effectively subsumed to the PLO, and the two terms 'PLO' and 'PRM' became virtually synonymous.

¹⁴ The Jordanian Army also played a major role in the battle, contributing to the figure of twenty-eight Israelis killed, but of concern here is the guerrillas' decision to stand and fight inside Karameh despite the certainty of an Israeli victory. Of 116 guerrillas killed, some had thrown themselves under IDF vehicles with explosive satchels; many were only trainees, and all were poorly armed.

¹⁵ Arafat estimated guerrilla losses in September 1970 at 921 dead, of whom 860 belonged to Fateh and the PLA. Palestine Chronology (PC hereafter) (12), Beirut: PLO Research Center, 1971, p 684. The Palestine Red Crescent Society estimated Palestinian civilian dead at 3,490. K Hindi, F Bawarshi, and S Moussa (eds), The Palestinian Revolution and the Jordanian Regime, Beirut: PLO Research Center, 1971, p 502. Guerrilla dead over the next ten months reached 200, and 200-300 more were killed in the Jordanian Army's final sweep in July 1971. Again, the vast majority of these men were from Fateh. PC (12) p 664, and Volume 13, p 84.

Inter-Palestinian group ties

The Palestinian arena has constantly witnessed a profusion of self-styled 'liberation groups'.¹⁶ Until 1965, most were no more than bands of local youths intent on hitting back at the Israeli settlers just across the new borders, while a few adopted a more systematic approach and constructed clandestine, politicised organisational networks. After 1965, the rise of the PRM led to the progressive disappearance of dozens of small bands which merged with the dominant guerrilla groups. This process peaked during the ninth PNC in July 1971, when several figures declared their merger with Fateh following the effective dissolution of their bases during the Jordanian civil war.¹⁷ Since then, the line-up of Palestinian guerrilla groups has remained virtually unchanged.

Three guerrilla groups are generally considered to be bona fide resistance organisations. These are Fateh, the PFLP, and the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine (DFLP). Each of these groups is led by people seen as authentic Palestinian nationalists with a long history of independent political activism, most prominently Yasser Arafat, Khalil al-Wazir and Khaled al-Hasan in Fateh, George Habash and Ahmad al-Yamani in the PFLP, and Nayef Hawatmen and Yasser Abd-Rabbo in the DFLP. Each group was formed under the initiative of these founders, and subsequently formulated policy according to its own view of Palestinian needs. In contrast, the formation and policies of three other groups have been closely tied to certain Arab regimes. These are the Vanguard of Popular Liberation War Organisation-Sa'iqa Forces (Sa'iqa), the Arab Liberation Front (ALF), and the PFLP-General Command (PFLP-GC).¹⁸ The first two were established by the Palestinian branches of the ruling Ba'thist wings in Syria and Iraq respectively, while the third was established by a former Syrian Military Intelligence officer, Ahmad Jibril. Two other minuscule groups emerged independently—the Palestine Popular Struggle Front (PPSF) and the Palestine Liberation Front (PLF)—but have only survived by receiving support from one Arab or Palestinian sponsor or another. Fateh, and the precursors of the PFLP, DFLP and PFLP-GC all came into being before 1967, while Sa'iqa, the ALF, and the PPSF all appeared in 1968–9.¹⁹

¹⁶ One discussion of the causes for multiplicity is B Stanley, 'Fragmentation and National Liberation Movements: the PLO', Orbis 58 (4) Winter 1979, pp 1033-55.

¹⁷ Ironically, one such person was Dr Samir Ghosheh, the Secretary-General of the Palestine Popular Struggle Front, who soon led his group back out of Fateh and later joined the anti-Arafat faction in 1983.

¹⁸ Even Egypt and Jordan sponsored their own Palestinian groups at one stage—the Palestine Arab Organisation and Battalions of Victory—but these had dissolved by late 1970.

The reasons for organisational multiplicity in the Palestinian exile relate to the physical facts of geographical dispersal and to ideological differences, rather than traditional tribal, sectarian or regional divisions. True, certain socio-political tendencies are discernible, with Palestinian Christians tending to join Marxist groups (reflecting a minority's preference for secular programmes and the high proportion of middle-class Christians within the intelligentsia) or of lower middle-class Palestinians and those from rural backgrounds leaning towards mainstream Fateh (reflecting broad nationalist and conservative social sentiments); however, these are not dominant patterns that adequately explain political behaviour. Nor has popular support been significantly affected by regional considerations. The proportion of 1948 refugees supporting any particular group roughly equals the same proportion among 1967 refugees, although it might be expected that the former would only back a group insisting on the 'total liberation of Palestine' and the latter a group working for a mini-state in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.²⁰

The major role in promoting and perpetuating organisational diversity among the Palestinians has therefore been played by the physical facts of exile and dispersal. Geography has placed the Palestinian people and movement under the security and political control of rival Arab governments. These governments have had an interest in promoting Palestinian divisions and in hindering unity or mergers in order to prevent the growth of a potent politico-military movement outside their control. In turn, the ability of the smaller guerrilla groups to obtain Arab backing has encouraged them to manipulate the Palestinian mainstream or at least to insist on maintaining greater organisational and political autonomy than would have been the case for purely ideological reasons.

¹⁹ The PLF split off from the PFLP-GC in 1977, taking the name under which Jibril had operated in the early 1960s.

²⁰ The fact that many Palestinian leaders support 'partial', as opposed to 'total', liberation of Palestine although they originate in the areas occupied by Israel proper, indicates the weakness of the regional factor.

This Arab role explains why groups that lack credibility and mass support have managed to survive, and why the PLO has had to recognise their legitimacy as Palestinian organisations.²¹ As a result, the PLO has never been the commanding organ for a single political and military body combining the resources of a number of ideologically diverse parties that the National Liberation Front (NLF) in South Vietnam was, nor could it impose homogeneity by forced merger as did the National Liberation Front (FLN) in Algeria. But, at least until 1983, it was more effective as a representative and coordinating structure than is the case with national and social liberation movements in many parts of the Third World today.

In response to Arab involvement and the multiplicity of guerrilla groups, Palestinian politics evolved in several distinct ways. First, Fateh constantly attempted to transform the PLO into the sole and final arbitrator in the Palestinian arena, in order to secure political autonomy from the Arab states. Despite basic policy differences, both the PFLP and DFLP supported this direction, even though the PFLP often suspended participation in the PLO Executive Committee in protest against specific actions and though both engaged in their own bilateral contacts (with other Arab and Palestinian actors). This meant, secondly, that the main guerrilla groups always strived for broad consensus within the movement regardless of the actual balance of forces in the field or voters in the PNC (and Executive Committee). Consensus and collective policy formulation were important both in order to demonstrate and preserve Palestinian identity through a show of political unity, and to circumvent damaging splits that would be manipulated by the Arab states. This also meant that the smaller groups gained leverage over the mainstream that went far beyond their real capabilities or political weight.²²

Reflecting this game of power politics, two sets of inter-organisational relations developed, operating in parallel. One involved ties between each individual group and the PLO; the other consisted of bilateral or multilateral contacts outside the PLO's framework. Fateh acted mainly through the PLO, and formed its inter-group alliances within the PLO Executive Committee on the platform of official PLO policies. Conversely, the smaller groups often operated outside the PLO structure in order to counter Fateh's dominance; besides issuing individual or joint statements, actual alliances were formed as a tangible vehicle for opposition. The major instance was the 'Rejection Front' set up in 1974 between the PFLP, ALF, PFLP-GC and PPSF in order to defeat any move by Fateh and the PLO to participate in an international peace conference that would result in a negotiated peace with Israel. The existence of rival platforms did not determine individual ties with the PLO, however. For instance, of the 'Rejection' groups, only the PFLP withdrew its representative from the PLO Executive Committee in 1974. Similarly, the ALF and PFLP-GC suspended participation in the Executive Committee (without formal withdrawal) in the late 1970s although they were out of line with other 'rejectionists'. These political dynamics may suggest that the PLO was unable at any point to impose itself as the sole authority and final arbitrator within the Palestinian arena, but in fact the smaller groups resorted to these alternatives as a means of pressure to influence policy and improve their position within the PLO, rather than to supplant it.

²¹ Besides the constant threat of Arab retaliation, the Palestinian mainstream has been unwilling to eliminate such rivals because of the need to reinforce the Palestinian people's sense of unity and identity. Khaled Hasan, one of Fateh's founders and a member of its Central Committee, is quoted as saying that he had supported Shuqeiri's idea of handing the PLO over to Fateh in 1968, but that his colleagues had preferred it as 'a comprehensive front for all Palestinian groupings—"the Palestinian people in exile"'. Cobban, The Palestinian . . . , p 42.

²² A cogent discussion of this aspect is in A D Miller, 'Organisational constraints: the Palestinian dimension', in The PLO and the Politics of Survival, New York: Praeger, 1983, pp 40-64.

Palestinian-Arab relations

There is a symbiotic relationship between the Arab states and the Palestine question: the Palestinians are Arabs and share close ties of kinship, commerce and political history with their immediate neighbours; two million of them live in the Arab countries; Palestine has strong political and religious significance for all Arabs; consequently there is considerable overlap at the social, economic, and political levels between the refugee community and host population in each Arab county. This has led to widespread grassroots support among the Arab peoples, and even within various Arab armies, for the contemporary Palestinian national movement.²³ Also tying the Arabs to the Palestine question is the fact that Israel demonstrably threatens their own vital interests, whether territorial, economic, political, or military. Indeed, both moral and strategic reasons have made 'the cause' a factor leading to changes of regime in several Arab countries since 1948.

²³ Sympathy for the PRM is evident in the assistance the guerrillas have received from various Arab armies: from Jordanian officers and soldiers, including bedouins, who aided attacks on Israel in 1968-9; from members of the Iraqi Expeditionary Force to Jordan in 1967-70 who provided arms, training, and supplies; from Syrian officers who provided fire cover and intelligence information for operations on the Golan front; and from Lebanese rank and file who deserted their army in 1976, splitting it in two, to prevent a crackdown on the PRM.

Due both to popular sentiment (implying a threat to regime security) and institutional interests, therefore, Arab governments have constantly been under strong internal pressure to espouse Palestinian aims and to support them morally and materially. Conversely, the same governments have taken advantage of the Palestine cause and posed as its guardians in order to rally public opinion around themselves and gain greater internal legitimacy and stability.²⁴ By adopting a forward position on Palestine, the Arab governments have contained popular movements and diverted them through their own institutional channels rather than any alternative political structures (whether local opposition parties or the PRM itself).²⁵ This logic has also been reflected in inter-Arab politics in an 'outbidding' process by which one regime can discredit a rival regime by showing greater commitment to 'the cause'. The immediate reasons for the involvement of a particular Arab state in the Palestine question may thus be positive or negative, and policy may be active or passive, but the involvement is unavoidable. It is the organic nature of the Arab states' link to the Palestine question that makes Palestinian-Arab relations crucially important, and that creates a complexity unparalleled for any other national movement in exile.

The above comments do not apply equally to all Arab countries. Of the twenty-one members of the League of Arab States (besides the PLO), Somalia, Mauritania, and Djibouti have been peripheral to the central Arab process. Similarly, the two Yemens, Sudan, and several Gulf emirates are not influential Arab actors and in any case have adopted a consistent stand of political (and some material) support for the Palestinian movement and Arab confrontation states without real involvement in intra-Palestinian or Palestinian-Arab feuds. This includes Tunisia, where the Arab League has its headquarters but which has little regional influence. Finally, because Morocco's foreign policy is oriented towards the Maghreb (Arab West) and Europe, rather than the Mashreq (Arab East), its Palestinian role has been marginal, although it is a major North African country and has played an active mediatory role in inter-Arab politics.²⁶

²⁴ Arab motives for supporting the Palestine cause are discussed by M Hudson, Arab Politics: The Search for Legitimacy, New Haven: Yale University Press, 1977; and A D Miller, The Arab States and the Palestine Question: Between Ideology and Self-Interest, Washington DC: Georgetown University, 1986.

²⁵ A PLO official illustrated this process with the following example. Prior to March 1968, Fateh enjoyed widespread support and influence in Iraq through local 'Support Committees of the Palestine Revolution', committees which Ba'th Party members, then in opposition, joined in large numbers. On seizing power in March, one of the Ba'th's first decrees was to dissolve the Support Committees. Over the next few months, the government gradually curtailed Fateh's freedom of action, and then established its own guerrilla group in spring 1969. Interview in Amman, March 1984.

Leaving these countries aside, the remaining Arab states have been directly affected in one way or another by the Palestine question. Of this group, some countries have adopted 'interventionist' Palestinian policies, the others 'non-interventionist' ones.²⁷ Interventionism signifies direct interference in the internal affairs of the PRM/PLO through material support for one group or another, public comments on the movement's policies and leadership, and/or physical measures affecting the movement's freedom of operation. Non-interventionism lacks most of these active features, depending instead on reciprocal arrangements by which broad political, moral, or financial support has been extended to the PRM/PLO in return for acceptance of those countries' general policies and regional manoeuvres.²⁸

In the interventionist category are Syria and Jordan, followed by Iraq and Libya. In the non-interventionist group are Egypt, Saudi Arabia, and Kuwait. In each case, there have been strong incentives for involvement: the presence of a large Palestinian community (1,200,000 in Jordan, 250,000 in Syria, 100,000 in Saudi Arabia, and 250,000 in Kuwait, besides 800,000 on the West Bank and 400,000 in the Gaza Strip whose movement, trade, and documentation pass through Jordan and Egypt respectively); ideological commitment (Syria, Iraq, and Libya); and inter-Arab rivalry (Syria versus Iraq, Jordan, or Egypt, and Libya versus Egypt). Two exceptions to the above categorisation are Lebanon and Algeria. Lebanon has been directly influenced by the Palestine question, due to its proximity to the battlefield and the presence of a large refugee community (400,000). Yet it cannot be considered an interventionist Arab state, despite attempts to limit Palestinian activities within its borders, because its government has failed to manipulate the Palestine question and to impose its authority. Algeria, in contrast, is not tied to or influenced by the Palestine question, but for moral and ideological reasons it has been the only Arab country to offer unconditional material and political support to the Palestinian movement consistently since the early 1960s.²⁹

²⁶ Despite ostentatious actions like the Hasan-Peres meeting in July 1986, long-standing contacts between Israel and Morocco, the despatching of an army brigade to Syria in 1973, and strong popular support for the Palestinians have had little real impact on the evolution of the Palestine conflict. Indeed, following the said meeting, Morocco further reduced its regional significance by relinquishing the chairmanship of the Arab League.

²⁷ A distinction is made here between policies towards the Palestine question and the Palestinian national movement and those related to the Arab-Israeli conflict.

²⁸ This applies even to Egypt. PLO-Egyptian relations were severed after former President Sadat's conclusion of the Camp David peace agreements with Israel, but since 1983 relations have been restored on a basis of mutual interest in countering Syrian influence and in promoting PLO participation in a peace process, although Egypt remains committed to the Camp David Accords.

The presence of large numbers of Palestinian civilians and of an armed movement, or their absence, has obviously been a primary factor shaping Arab government policy, but this does not explain the interventionism of Iraq and Libya, which have only small refugee communities, or the non-interventionism of Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, which have large ones.³⁰ Although demographic factors (the number of guest Palestinians, their proportion to the host population, and their position in local society and economy) and geographical ones (proximity to Palestine) are important, it is the factors of internal stability and regional rivalries that have been decisive in Arab policy-formulation. The main distinction between the two categories, therefore, is that the non-interventionists have been able to avoid dramatic roles by managing reciprocal interest arrangements with the PRM/PLO and with the other Arab states (Saudi aid to the PLO and Syria, or Egyptian diplomatic support for the PLO and Jordan, for example), while the interventionists have been motivated by the wish to repel challenges to their rule from within and threats to their position in the regional balance.

Of all the Arab countries, Jordan and Syria have been the most vital to the contemporary Palestinian national movement. Jordan is considered the 'natural' and 'main' base because it contains the largest Palestinian community anywhere, and has the longest Arab frontier with Israel and open bridges to the Occupied Territories, thus offering an ideal support base for both clandestine and guerrilla warfare against Israel.³¹ Syria is seen as the 'lung' the PLO breathes through because it

²⁹ It was the victorious FLN in Algeria that arranged Fateh's first meetings with senior officials in China and Vietnam in the early 1960s, and with 'Che' Guevara in Algiers in 1964. As part of its aid, Algeria replaced Fateh's weapons losses during the July 1971 showdown with the Jordanian Army and the March 1978 Israeli invasion of south Lebanon.

³⁰ On the motives and forces promoting the Gulf States' involvement with the Palestine question, see A H Cordesman, The Gulf and the Search for Strategic Stability, Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1984.

³¹ Between 100,000 and 150,000 Palestinians from the West Bank and visitors cross the Jordan River each year.

Accession Numbers
121561
310 occupies a central geographical position between Jordan and Lebanon and wields considerable leverage over them (military, political, and economic), thus controlling Palestinian access to, and operations in, the two countries.³²

For their part, Jordan and Syria have the longest record of active intervention in Palestinian affairs. Since there is a 60 per cent resident Palestinian majority there, the Palestine problem has been internalised in Jordan and integrated into its socio-political fabric. King Hussein has a vital stake in controlling Palestinian action capable of threatening the state itself or inviting massive Israeli retaliation. That control could only be achieved if Hussein adopted and managed the issues that concerned his Palestinian constituency (such as the PLO's status and restoration of the West Bank). For Syria, the Palestinian dimension has been important partly as an internal political issue, but much more as a tool of regional policy. Successive Syrian governments have supported Palestinian activities in neighbouring Jordan and Lebanon (and against Israel) as a pressure device to influence local policy or demonstrate Syrian regional power. Conversely, Syria's intervention has also been aimed at preventing the PLO from disrupting Syrian objectives, which would happen if the PLO formed its own power base in Lebanon or resumed independent relations with Jordan.³³

Each of the Arab interventionist states has employed one or other of four main forms of intervention in Palestinian affairs: sponsorship of specific guerrilla groups; imposition of regulations restricting the guerrillas' freedom of movement, basing, and action; physical assault on the forces or representatives of the movement; and public commentary on the political stands of rival guerrilla groups and the legitimacy of their leadership.

Sponsorship of guerrilla groups With the growth of the Palestinian guerrilla movement, several Arab states sought to guarantee their influence within it by sponsoring their own groups. As well as bolstering the militant, patriotic image of each regime, sponsoring guerrilla groups allowed these states to contain and divert enthusiasm for anti-Israeli action within their own people and decrease the PRM's freedom of action at the same time. Syria established Sa'iqa in 1968 and took effective control over the PFLP-GC in 1977. Iraq established the ALF in 1969. Jordan set up the (short-lived) Battalions of Victory as an agent provocateur group in 1968. And Libya has provided the PFLP-GC with substantial financial and military aid since 1978, besides more intermittent support for the PFLP, DFPLP, and PPSF.³⁴ Syria and Iraq soon gained the representation they wanted when Sa'iqa and the ALF were accepted within the Palestinian movement's various bodies. This happened despite Fateh's strong objections; by incorporating the Arab-sponsored groups, Fateh's main rivals increased their overall strength and countered Fateh's dominance. In response, Fateh hampered the activities of the sponsored groups in Jordan and Lebanon and worked to turn the PLO, rather than the PRM, into the central structure of Palestinian decision-making.³⁵

³² Following his expulsion from Syria in June 1983, Arafat expressed Syria's importance by saying 'if [the Syrians] close the front door I'll come back in through the window; they and I wage a common battle'. Palestine News Agency (Wafa) Bulletin, 19 July, 1983.

³³ For a discussion of Syrian-PLO relations since 1970, see R Khalidi, 'The Asad regime and the Palestinian resistance', Arab Studies Quarterly 6(4) 1984, pp 259-66.

The Jordanian civil war effectively eliminated the sponsored groups as viable political and military forces that could hope to represent some alternative to Fateh. Although Sa'iqa and the ALF continued to act as political pressure groups within the PLO, particularly in alliance with other factions, the Arab states had to seek new forms of sponsorship. Attempting to find a credible alternative to the guerrillas, the Syrian government wrested effective control over the Palestine Liberation Army's General Headquarters and Hittin Brigade (both based in Syria) in late 1971, provoking a mass exodus of the fighting forces of Fateh and most smaller groups into south Lebanon.³⁶ In 1974, Iraq encouraged Fateh's local representative, the now notorious Abu Nidal, to secede from his parent organisation and establish a 'rival Fateh'.³⁷ Similar Syrian and Libyan attempts made between 1976 and 1978 failed; Syria

³⁴ Among other items, the PFLP-GC was equipped by Libya with mobile SAM-9 launchers and 40-barrel BM-21 multiple rocket launchers.

³⁵ Besides Fateh's own sizeable representation in the PNC and PLO-EC, it had the support of a majority of independents and delegates from the various mass and professional unions (students, workers, women, and so on), none of whom attended or influenced the coordinating committees of the PRM.

³⁶ The issue of control over the PLA was to reappear during the Lebanese civil war in 1975-76, when the whole Qadisiyyah Brigade and large parts of the Hittin Brigade refused Syrian orders and deserted to the PLO, and during the Palestinian mini-civil war in late 1983, when 300 PLA men joined the PLO besieged in Tripoli.

³⁷ With tacit Iraqi approval, Abu Nidal occupied small arms factories and farms run by Fateh in Iraq and sequestered substantial quantities of weapons and supplies that were in Fateh's depots or that later reached the port of Basrah. 'Mudhakkarah min Harakat at-Tahrir al-Watani al-Filistini "Fateh" ilal-Hukumah al-'Iraqiyyah'" (Memorandum from the Palestine National Liberation Movement 'Fateh' to the Iraqi Government, in Arabic), Beirut: Palestine News Agency (Wafa), 16 July 1978, pp 6-8.

then tried to gain influence within Fateh by cultivating ties with specific individuals or factions (an approach that bore fruit in 1983, as will be discussed later). Other Arab interventionists have also supported the emergence of alliances within the PLO that would oppose Fateh. One such coalition was the Rejection Front, established in 1974 by the PFLP, ALF, and PFLP-GC, which received Iraqi and Libyan backing; Libya also convened several public meetings of Palestinian opposition leaders on anti-Fateh and anti-Arafat platforms between 1978 and 1981.³⁸

Restrictive regulations Every Arab government has at one time or another imposed regulations defining and limiting the guerrillas' freedom of operation within its territory. Three main issues have been at stake: the launching of military action against Israel from that Arab country; formal and practical relations between the Palestinian movement and the central government; and Palestinian political activity among the host population.

Syria has imposed the most stringent conditions on Palestinian military activity. It has exploited guerrilla activity to exert pressure on its neighbours, but has avoided uncontrolled military action that would provoke massive Israeli retaliation. From 1966 to 1973, the guerrillas were only allowed to infiltrate across Syrian lines after obtaining written permission from the Minister of Defence prior to each and every action.³⁹ Since then, guerrilla action on the Golan front has been totally prohibited. The Jordanian government, in contrast, in 1968–70 tried mainly to limit the extension of the PRM's military and political apparatus into the country's Palestinian population centres, realising that mobilisation of the Palestinian majority would alter the country's internal balance of power.⁴⁰ To this end, all movement of armed or uniformed Palestinian personnel and of military vehicles outside assigned border base areas was prohibited, and systematic efforts were made to disarm and disband the popular militia in the cities.⁴¹ The PRM's ³⁸ The main reasons for Libyan hostility to Fateh were the latter's interest in a negotiated peace settlement after 1973, its acceptance of a cease-fire with Israel and the stationing of UN troops in south Lebanon in March 1978, and its alliance with certain Lebanese parties, principally the Shi'ite Amal movement.

³⁹ This system was imposed as early as 1966, when the then Defence Minister, now President, Hafez Asad, drew up a secret memo which each guerrilla group had to sign if it was to operate in Syria. According to a Fateh battalion commander interviewed by the author in Amman, May 1985.

⁴⁰ The population of the capital and its surrounding governate has been estimated at 75 per cent–85 per cent Palestinian.

⁴¹ Because of massive support for the PRM, the Jordanian government had to negotiate all regulations and obtain Palestinian approval, whereas the Syrian and Iraqi governments simply notified the PRM of their conditions. Following the expulsion of the PRM to Syria in July 1971, the Jordanian government abrogated its bilateral agreements with the movement.

political activity was also seen as a threat by the Syrian and Iraqi governments, which feared exploitation of the emotive Palestine question by the regime's opponents. Both governments worked, therefore, to isolate the PRM from the local people. By 1971, it had become illegal for the PRM to hold public meetings, open offices, or distribute its publications without prior approval, and for Syrian and Iraqi nationals to join the PRM's political networks or to volunteer as guerrillas.⁴²

Physical repression Since 1968, the Palestinian national movement has suffered three main forms of physical repression by the Arab states. These have been the detention of PRM members; major military crackdowns; and the assassination of PLO leaders and representatives. Of the Arab interventionist states, Jordan has resorted to systematic security harassment and massive military repression most often. Jordanian security services arrested hundreds of suspected PRM members in the two years preceding the June 1967 War, and thousands more in the years since the 1970–71 civil war. During the same period, the Jordanian Army intercepted hundreds of guerrillas on their way to attack Israel, killing several in the process.⁴³ Besides such harassment, the Army attempted to enforce government decisions on several occasions during the rise of the PRM in 1968–70, leading to the major confrontations of September 1970 and July 1971 in which some 5,000 Palestinian civilians and 1,300 guerrillas were killed. Syria's physical intervention, in contrast, was usually connected with a conflict over Lebanon policy, rather than internal stability. As a result, there have never been armed clashes inside Syria, though any guerrillas carrying out unauthorised operations against Israel have been arrested, their action being considered detrimental to Syrian security. The major instance of Syrian physical intervention was in 1976, during which the Syrian Army assaulted PLO forces in Lebanon while security services detained hundreds of Fateh members in Syria. Lacking such direct leverage over the Palestinian movement, Iraq has attempted to counter the PLO's shift towards diplomacy by supporting the assassination of its representatives abroad. In 1978 and 1979, gunmen of the Abu Nidal group operating under Iraqi guidance shot the PLO representatives to London, Paris, Karachi and Kuwait, depriving the PLO of several of its veteran diplomats and weakening its public relations effort abroad.

⁴² At crucial moments, such as the September 1970 civil war in Jordan, the October 1973 Arab–Israeli war, and the March 1978 Israeli invasion of south Lebanon, thousands of Iraqis flocked to Palestinian offices in Baghdad to volunteer for action, but were prevented from doing so. Interviews with PLO officials by the author in Beirut, March 1982, and Amman, May 1985.

⁴³ During the October 1973 War, some 120 guerrillas were detained or injured at the Syrian border while infiltrating into Jordan on their way to attack Israel. See The Fourth Arab–Israeli War: Facts and Interactions, Beirut, PLO Research Center, 1974, p 160.

Political commentary In addition to the attempt to influence Palestinian decision-making through proxy groups or by restricting PLO activities, the Arab interventionists have made detrimental comments on specific PLO and Fateh policies. Most serious has been to dispute the PLO's claim to be the sole legitimate Palestinian representative. Jordan in particular has competed with the PLO to represent the Palestinians of the Kingdom (on both East and West Banks). This contest was particularly intense until 1974, when Jordan was obliged to fall in line with the Arab consensus that the PLO was the sole representative of the Palestinians everywhere. Jordan, although upholding the PLO's special status has at the same time continued to vie for influence on the West Bank and for a special role in any peace settlement on that front.

The other Arab interventionists have not publicly denied the legitimacy of the PLO's claim to unique representation, but they have often disputed the legitimacy of Arafat's or Fateh's right to lead the PLO itself. Iraq's objection to the PLO's possible participation in a Middle East peace conference prompted it to present Abu Nidal's faction as an alternative to Fateh in 1974, while Syria's opposition to the PLO's Lebanon policy led it to promote Sa'iqa's Secretary-General, Zuheir Mohsin, as a replacement for Arafat as PLO Chairman in 1976.⁴⁴ Moreover, each Arab interventionist state has at some time denied the PLO's right to take unilateral decisions on the twin issues of peace and war with Israel, asserting that the PLO's representation of the Palestinians does not negate the Arab say in the Palestine question. The Arab interventionists have used this argument to justify establishing or supporting alternative Palestinian political formations, such as the Rejection Front or the self-styled Unified Palestinian Committee in Iraq.⁴⁵ The effect has been to undermine the PLO's uniqueness as a representative.

Palestinian defence Palestinian defence against Arab intervention has taken three main forms. One is self-defence against military attack or repudiation of political criticism. Another is the consolidation of ⁴⁴ Posters even went up on Beirut's walls showing Mohsin sitting at a desk clad, for the first time, in a keffiyeh (Palestinian headdress), in an obvious attempt to imitate Arafat.

⁴⁵ The Unified Committee brought together representatives of the PFLP, DFLP, ALF, and Abu Nidal's Fateh faction in Baghdad, completely circumventing the official PLO office there.

Palestinian national identity and entity through the creation of autonomous goals, institutions, and military means. The third (discussed here) is the use of relations with individual Arab states, or with the Arab regional system, to provide a deterrent and counterweight to Arab interventionists.

Of the Palestinian mainstream groups, Fateh in particular has sought to build solid ties with as many Arab states as possible, in the hope both of obtaining material assistance and regional political protection. The smaller guerrilla groups have tended, conversely, to ally themselves with self-styled 'radical' Arab states, although they too have benefited from the financial support and political 'umbrella' that Fateh has woven together from its relations with the so-called Arab 'moderates' or 'conservatives'.⁴⁶ Fateh, whether operating through the framework of the PRM or that of the PLO, has tried specifically to ensure that it enjoys good relations with the major Arab countries, avoiding reliance on any one state politically or materially. During the PRM's 'honeymoon phase' in 1968–70, for example, Fateh repeatedly elicited President Nasser's intervention to dissuade King Hussein from undertaking military action against the guerrillas.⁴⁷ Fateh has also used inter-Arab rivalries to pit one Arab state against another, weakening Syrian leverage in 1968–70 by improving relations with Iraq, and confronting the Syrian onslaught in 1976 with Egyptian military and diplomatic support. The period of greatest Palestinian security commenced in 1974, when the PLO was incorporated as a member of the Arab regional order, enabling it to manipulate a broader network in support of its objectives. Ironically, its period of greatest vulnerability followed, when Egypt concluded a separate peace accord with Israel in 1979. Egypt's balancing effect against Syria was thus lost, and a series of inter-Arab feuds erupted (Syria against Iraq and Jordan, Egypt against Libya, Algeria against Morocco, North Yemen against South Yemen), dissipating the Palestinian 'umbrella' and increasing its vulnerability to Syrian pressure. The PLO therefore spent much of the 1979–82 period desperately trying to reconcile the Arab states and restore its regional safety net.

⁴⁶ See the excellent discussion of Fateh's Arab relations in Cobban, The Palestinian . . . , Chapter 9.

⁴⁷ Nasser's protective attitude is clear in the minutes of his meetings with Hussein, reproduced in A-M Farid (ed), From the Minutes of 'Abdul-Nasser's Meetings, Beirut: Arab Institute for Research, 1979, p 143.

The Palestinian 'state in exile'

Exile, destruction of the independent structures of Palestinian society, and Arab intervention have played the major role in shaping the development of the contemporary Palestinian national movement and of its internal and Arab relations. The Palestinian response has not been passive, nor merely reactive; rather, the movement's current leadership has constantly adopted a 'forward' policy of its own, seeking to deal actively with its environment.⁴⁸ Specifically, this leadership has sought to restore a sense of purpose to the Palestinians by formulating political goals, to change their material situation by undertaking military action against Israel and to provide them with a physical basis for political autonomy by establishing unified institutions.

Palestinian goals

The formulation of coherent political goals has been particularly important to the Palestinian movement in its attempt to deal with the effects of dispersal and exile. By defining clear, shared goals, the Palestinian leadership has been able to reforge a distinct national identity, and to mobilise and unite the scattered Palestinians. In turn, presenting clear goals has enabled the Palestinian leadership to interact constructively with its environment. Palestinian objectives have been distinguished, ending the subsuming of Palestinian interests to those of the Arab regimes, without negating the overlap between the two. Distinction of goals has made division of roles easier within the Arab regional system, allowing the Palestinian national movement to focus its own energies more effectively. Neither Arab intervention nor internal fragmentation has ended, but the Palestinian movement has gradually won a degree of political autonomy that it lacked before 1965. On another level, by presenting specific aims and proposals, the Palestinian leadership has been able to develop good relations with major states and blocs within the world community. The ties have reinforced the pressure on Israel to accommodate Palestinian rights, and have occasionally acted as a constraint inhibiting physical attacks on the PLO by Israel or certain Arab states.

⁴⁸ For a cogent analysis of the patterns and logic of PLO policy (despite some oversimplification and factual error), see M E Selim, 'The survival of a nonstate actor: the foreign policy of the Palestine Liberation Organisation', in B Korany and A E H Dessouki, The Foreign Policies of Arab States, Boulder, Colorado: Westview Press, 1984, pp 197-240.

Objectives Whether termed isti'ādah (restoration), 'awdah (return) or tahrīr (liberation), the retrieval of Palestine has been the ultimate goal of successive generations of Palestinians since 1948.⁴⁹ Nonetheless, the developments of the past twenty years have led to a gradual shift in practical objectives and even in the final goal of the contemporary Palestinian national movement. Prior to June 1967, the emphasis was on liberating that part of Palestine which had become Israel. This was a simple concept that appealed to all political tendencies and socio-economic strata in the Palestinian exile and so united them.⁵⁰ However, setting the liberation of Palestine as a primary aim ran counter to the actual (as opposed to the proclaimed) policy of the Arab states, which sought to avoid an immediate war with Israel, seeking instead to consolidate themselves socially, economically, and politically.

In 1967, the occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip introduced several new elements. First, the one million additional Palestinians who then came under Israeli military rule had some political, organisational, and military experience, unlike their brethren across the 'Green Line' in Israel. Second, the PRM was able to step into the vacuum created by the dissipation of Arab political authority in the newly occupied territories. The PRM benefited especially from the destruction of official Arab population control. Third, its goals changed, reflecting its awareness of the military imbalance between the Arabs and Israel. Its ultimate aim was now expressed as the establishment of a secular, democratic state uniting Jews and Arabs, while its practical objective narrowed down to restoration of the West Bank and Gaza Strip. The latter objective in particular was shared by the Arab states and supported by the world community. These elements stamped the growth of the PRM in the post-1967 period with a specific character. Within a year, guerrilla strength had soared from a few hundred to several thousand, the bulk of new recruits coming from the recently occupied territories. Although the top leadership still consists of Palestinians originating from Israel proper who founded the movement or joined it in its early years, since ⁴⁹ On the idea of 'return', see E Sanbar, Palestine 1948. L'Expulsion, Washington DC: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1984, Chapter 8 (in French). For an excellent discussion of the evolution of contemporary Palestinian political thinking and goals, see A Greish, The PLO: The Struggle Within, London: Zed Press, 1985.

⁵⁰ The Palestinian community of Israel was effectively isolated from developments affecting their compatriots, partly because they had lived under Israel's discriminatory Emergency Regulations for sixteen years. On the community's political and social conditions, see Jiryis, The Arabs . . . ; and Asmar, To be an Arab . . .

1967 the majority of middle-ranking Palestinian cadres have been former residents of the West Bank and Gaza Strip who joined up in 1967-70.⁵¹

The fourth Arab-Israeli war, in October 1973, reinforced this shift in the PLO's aims, moving from total liberation of Palestine by military means to the restoration of the territories occupied in 1967 through a combination of military and political pressures. From 1973 onwards, the primary objective of the PLO became the establishment of a Palestinian 'national authority' in any part of Palestine retrieved from Israeli occupation.⁵² The further implications of this aim were that the PLO would enter a political process in coordination with other Arab and non-Arab states, from which a mini-state would be established in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, accompanied by reciprocal recognition between the Palestinians and Israelis. Initially, only Fateh and the DFLP supported this shift in strategy, facing vigorous opposition from the other groups. By 1982, however, the basic tenets of the PLO's policy had been adopted by all its members, as demonstrated by their unanimous acceptance of Brezhnev's peace plan in 1981, which explicitly asserted Israel's right to exist and to enjoy secure borders.

Two factors prompted these changes in Palestinian strategy in 1974: the PLO's post-Jordan debilitation, and the opportunity offered by the post-1973 rise of Arab power. The expulsion of the guerrilla movement from Jordan in 1971 exposed the basic shortcomings in its political and military thinking, provoking intense internal debate and recriminations. The crisis became more acute between 1971 and 1973, as one Arab border after another was closed to guerrilla action and Syrian attempts to co-opt the movement mounted.⁵³ Given the Palestinian leadership's inability to develop effective politico-military alternatives, demoralisation and dissent spread within its organisational and military base. The rise of Arab political and economic power and the atmosphere of inter-Arab solidarity in the post-October 1973 War period, in contrast, presented the PLO with an opportunity to operate in relative security and attain certain objectives. The Arab regional system would help to protect the PLO in inter-Arab politics, and would back it in the conflict with Israel. In return, the PLO would be obliged to accept the legitimacy of the system and its member states, and to reduce its objectives in Palestine until they became modest enough to be achieved by more limited means than all-out war with Israel. After joining the Arab regional order, the Palestinian national movement dropped its image as a vehicle for revolutionary socio-political change in the Arab world, to become another [para-]nation-state seeking its own interests within the confines of post-colonial Arab divisions.

⁵¹ Most of those from the West Bank and the Gaza Strip holding senior positions who joined before 1967 did so in their places of employment or study in Arab exile and Europe.

⁵² The first formal expression of this policy came in the final political statement of the Twelfth PNC (held in June 1974). Article 2 called for a 'people's national, independent and fighting authority in every part of Palestinian land that is liberated'. See text of 10-point programme in Al-Kitab as-Sanawi lil-Qadiyyah al-Filistiniyyah 1974 (The Yearbook of the Palestine Cause 1974), Beirut: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1977, p. 25. (In Arabic).

⁵³ On Palestinian-Arab relations in this period, see F. Jabber, 'The Arab Regimes and the Palestinian Revolution', in W. B. Quandt, F. Jabber, and A. M. Lesch, The Politics of Palestinian Nationalism, Berkeley, CA: California University Press, 1973, pp. 186-98.

The strategy developed by the PLO after the October 1973 War has remained virtually unchanged since then, despite the set-backs it has suffered as a result of inter-Arab politics, the 1975–6 Lebanese civil war, and the 1982 Israeli invasion of Lebanon. According to this strategy, the PLO's attainment of its objectives depends on: developing bonds with the West Bank and Gaza Strip; building a supporting network of international relations; and maintaining military pressure on Israel.

Bonds with the Occupied Territories After the failure of their insurrectionary attempt in late 1967, the guerrillas exerted little effort towards developing political, as opposed to military, struggle within the Occupied Territories. The PRM formed no special committees to organise political action in the territories, nor did it assign clandestine cadres exclusively to the task. As a result, political struggle was limited to occasional instances of ad hoc civilian protest (strikes, marches, or signing petitions), which had little impact as they lacked organisation and overall direction. In fairness to the PRM, the scale of Israeli repression was daunting; between July 1967 and February 1986, the Israeli Army and security services deported 2,061 people (including mayors, unionists, and political and social figures) to Jordan or Lebanon, detained or interrogated 250,000 others, and demolished 1,425 houses belonging to convicted or suspected PRM members.⁵⁴

⁵⁴ In addition, 13,945 houses were demolished in the refugee camps of Gaza during anti-resistance operations in 1971. Figures from Shu'un al-Ard al-Muhtallah (Affairs of the Occupied Homeland), Amman: Ministry of the Occupied Homeland Affairs, 1986; and Ad-Daffah al-Gharbiyyah: Haqa'iq wa Arqam (The West Bank: Facts and Figures), Jerusalem: Arab Studies Society, 1985. (Both of these are in Arabic). The three villages of Yalu, Beit Nuba, and Umwas near Jerusalem were completely destroyed in 1967 because they lay in designated 'security zones'. B O'Neill, Armed Struggle in Palestine: An Analysis of the Palestinian Guerrilla Movement, Boulder, Colorado: Westview Press, 1978, p 76.

It was only in 1974 that mass political action in the Occupied Territories received major attention from the PLO. This reflected the growing importance of these areas to the organisation. Initially, the PLO expressed its support for the Palestine National Front (PNF) in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Although the PNF had actually been established in mid-1973, largely by the efforts of the West Bank branch of the Jordanian Communist Party, it only expanded into a major force when local PLO members and a number of independents joined it in 1974. The PNF was severely repressed by the Israeli military administration, prompting the PLO to seek an alternative. An opportunity emerged during the municipal elections held in spring 1976, in which PLO supporters won an overwhelming majority of mayoralities and seats in town councils throughout the West Bank.⁵⁵ A further organisational form for political action appeared in late 1979, when a National Guidance Committee emerged as the effective representative and coordinating body for PLO supporters in the Occupied Territories. In all cases, these various political groupings have translated PLO policies into local mass action, while influencing the organisation's decision-making on behalf of their own constituency. The importance of this relationship has been demonstrated by the inclusion of several deported West Bank figures in the PLO Executive Committee since 1974.⁵⁶ The effectiveness of PLO strategy in the Occupied Territories since 1974 is evident in the unending civil unrest there and in the Israeli inability to effectively suppress the increasing political activism of the Palestinians living in Israel proper (across the Green Line).⁵⁷

External relations Syria and Egypt waged war in October 1973 for limited aims. They hoped to regain territories lost in 1967, or at least to alter the military balance, so that a political process could be initiated leading to voluntary Israeli withdrawal. As this strategy affected the Sinai Peninsula and Golan Heights most directly, restoration of the West Bank and Gaza Strip became emphatically the PLO's responsibility. The implication for the PLO was that although it would enjoy broad Arab backing, it would have to develop its own means to achieve a settlement on these fronts. With this Arab backing, the PLO launched a concerted diplomatic campaign to win international support.⁵⁸

⁵⁵ Elections were held only in the West Bank, where Jordanian legislation called for them, unlike civil regulations in the Gaza Strip. Political developments in the West Bank since 1967 are reviewed in M Ma'oz, Palestinian Leadership on the West Bank: The Changing Role of the Mayors under Jordan and Israel, London: Frank Cass, 1984. This book is marred, however, by its uncritical attitude towards Israeli policy and motives.

⁵⁶ In 1974, four out of fourteen Executive Committee members were West Bank deportees. Since then at least four other deportees have served in the Executive Committee, while a ninth became President of the PNC in 1984.

⁵⁷ On the activism of the 'Israeli' Arabs, see M Segal, "'Palestinization' alarm bells', Jerusalem Post International 10 May, 1986, p 10.

Since 1974, PLO diplomacy has focused on four main areas of relations: the United Nations; other international and Third World groupings; the Socialist bloc; and the Western countries. The UN is important as the single international body whose moral, if not practical, authority is universally recognised. Obtaining UN resolutions favourable to the Palestine cause since 1974 has been especially significant in light of a long series of resolutions between 1948 and 1973 that had treated the Palestinians merely as refugees, not as a national community with the right to self-determination. At the UN, the PLO has depended to a large degree on the support it receives from Third World delegates; it has therefore maintained close ties with the Non-Aligned Movement, the Islamic Conference, the Organisation of African Unity, and similar groupings. The PLO has also developed special ties with individual non-Arab members of these organisations, such as India and Yugoslavia.⁵⁹ PLO relations with the Socialist bloc (including China) are not new, though consistent public support from the USSR and Eastern Europe only evolved in the early 1970s.⁶⁰ Since then, the PLO has enjoyed both material and diplomatic support from these countries, leading it to insist on Soviet participation in any international peace conference dealing with the Arab-Israeli conflict. Finally, the thrust of PLO diplomacy in other areas has aimed at influencing the position taken by the Western countries towards the rights of the Palestinian people and the PLO's status as their sole representative. In turn, in seeking to influence the position of West European countries, the PLO has aimed at isolating the United States in its rejection of Palestinian rights. Ultimately, the PLO's political strategy rests on its ability, through diplomatic manoeuvres or military pressure, to bring both the United States and Israel to a realisation that there will be no peace or stability in ⁵⁸ What PLO delegate to the UN, Zuhdi Tarazi, has termed 'the phase of commando diplomacy'. See Filistin ath-Thawra 15 (616) 2 August 1986, p. 12.

⁵⁹ An element of PLO foreign ties has been the assistance it has extended to various countries and liberation movements, most notably in Zimbabwe, Nicaragua, and Eritrea.

⁶⁰ On PLO-Soviet relations, see G. Golan, The Soviet Union and the Palestine Liberation Organisation, New York: Praeger, 1980. On PLO-Chinese ties, see H. Behbehani, China's Foreign Policy in the Arab World, London: Kegan Paul International, 1981, Chapters 2-5.

Palestine and the Middle East until Palestine rights have been recognised.

Palestinian Military Means

Two basic facts have influenced the development of Palestinian military action over the past twenty years. The scope for mobile guerrilla warfare inside Palestine itself has been extremely limited because the geographical area is small, the terrain is relatively exposed, and the risk of exposure to the hostile Israeli population is high. Conversely, the greatest opportunity for growth has been in the Arab exile, due to the presence of over half the Palestinian people there, sympathetic host populations, extensive border zones, strategic depth, and governments driven by inter-Arab rivalry to afford some support.

This situation has held several implications for the Palestinian national movement. First, virtually all its activities have had to be based in, or launched from, the Arab exile, particularly the confrontation states (Jordan, Syria, Lebanon). Secondly, the Palestinians could not hope to achieve liberation unaided, and would need the political, military, and economic support of their Arab brethren. But as official Arab support has stopped always short of waging all-out war or suffering intolerable levels of social and economic dislocation due to Israeli reprisals, the host governments have in fact severely limited Palestinian military activity. These considerations have finally led the contemporary Palestinian leadership into using military action as a political and diplomatic tool rather than a means to total, physical liberation.

The military instrument In 1968, the handful of guerrilla groups that had operated in near-total clandestinity for many years was transformed almost overnight into an armed mass movement undertaking open political, organisational and military activity in the Arab confrontation states of Jordan, Syria, and Lebanon. This change presented the PLO with new strategic opportunities (such as opening new fronts against Israel, increasing the freedom of operation in the Arab countries, taking over the PLO and entering regional and international politics), but it also stretched the ability of the limited number of guerrilla cadres to cope with the vastly expanded needs of the movement's military and civilian apparatus. As important a problem was the effect on relations with the host governments of the emergence of an autonomous armed force actively involved in the political and military mobilisation of local Palestinian communities and enjoying the support of the host populations.

Guerrilla expansion and anti-Israeli action reached their peak between the Battle of Karameh in March 1968 and the first round of the Jordanian civil war in September 1970. In that period, total guerrilla strength grew from 500 to well over 5,000 full-timers, backed by a popular militia of 20–25,000, most of whom were based in Jordan.⁶¹ Simultaneously, military action against Israel grew from eight to 235 operations a month. However, the Jordanian civil war radically altered this situation, closing a major border and driving the guerrillas into Syria. Between 1971 and 1973, the bulk of guerrilla strength (4,500 out of 6,000 men, including 2,000 deserters from the Jordanian Army) was concentrated in Syria, along with 4,000 out of a total of 5,000 PLA men. But the severe restrictions placed by the Syrian authorities on guerrilla movements and operations, combined with Syrian attempts to gain control of the movement, led the PLO to rebase all but the 3,000 men of the PLA's Hittin Brigade (under Syrian Army command, according to the provisions of the PLA's establishment in 1964) in Lebanon.

True, Lebanon was an inadequate substitute for Jordan as a base for anti-Israeli military action, but it offered a margin of freedom from Syrian hegemony.⁶² Reinforcing the PLO's freedom there were the weakness of the central state authority (which disintegrated totally in 1976) and the support the organisation enjoyed among broad sectors of the Lebanese population and the large local Palestinian community. Between 1973 and 1982, the PLO gradually built up an integrated military infrastructure in Lebanon, which paralleled the growth of Palestinian social, economic and political institutions.⁶³ By 1982, PLO forces numbered 5,000 full-timers backed by a loosely structured reserve of up to 20,000 part-timers and militia, fielding dozens of artillery pieces and rocket-launchers, several dozen obsolete tanks and light armoured personnel carriers, and hundreds of anti-aircraft and anti-tank weapons (including portable guided SAM-7 and Sagger missiles).

⁶¹ These and following figures are estimates based on interviews by the author with senior PLO officials and journalistic sources.

⁶² That Lebanon was a last resort is emphasised by PLO leaders quoted in A Hart, Arafat: Terrorist or Peacemaker?, London: Sidgwick and Jackson, 1984, pp 325–6 and 353–4.

⁶³ On the Palestinian military structure in Lebanon, see Y Sayigh, 'Palestinian military performance in the 1982 war', Journal of Palestine Studies 13 (1) Summer 1983, pp 1–24. On this aspect of the PLO's Lebanese base, see R Khalidi, Under Siege: PLO Decisionmaking in the 1982 War, New York: Columbia University Press, 1986, Chapter 1.

Political aims of military action Palestinian military action has always had three main aims: mobilising the Palestinian people; demonstrating their presence to the world; and actively wearing down the Israelis.⁶⁴ In all cases, it was the fact that Palestinians were fighting back, refusing to accept their plight, that was considered important.⁶⁵ This has been the driving force of all Palestinian operations since 1965. Indeed, it has been this perseverance of the guerrilla groups and the continuing willingness of Palestinian civilians to accept Israeli retaliation, rather than actual battlefield results, that has won broad international recognition for the Palestinian national movement and people. Reinforcing insistence on armed struggle has been the conviction that the world community forgot about the Palestinians after 1948, remembering them only when they resorted to organised, mass-based military action.

Prior to June 1967, the guerrillas hoped, by a chain of action and reaction, to draw the Arab armies into an all-out war that would end with the defeat of Israel and the return of the Palestinian exiles to their homes. The Six Day War dispelled this hope, prompting the PLO to present itself as the military force that would exhaust, if not defeat, the Israeli Army. The slogans of 'guerrilla warfare' and 'people's war' were raised in this period, though no specifically Palestinian military theory emerged.⁶⁶ The PLO's defeat in Jordan in 1971, and the subsequent closure of Arab borders to guerrilla operations, led to a questioning of these slogans and to a search for new military means. One result was to reorganise most Palestinian forces along semi-regular lines, introducing ranks, differential pay-scales, large formations, heavy weapons and appropriate training and tactics. Regularisation helped to reinforce discipline and cohesion during a period of disorientation, and to portray the Palestinian movement as a credible force.

Two developments in the 1973-82 period strengthened the trend towards semi-regular military forms. One was the gradual expansion of the PLO's Lebanese base under the impetus of the burgeoning civil war and Palestinian institutionalisation. The other was the PLO's adoption as its primary objective of the restoration of the West Bank and Gaza Strip through negotiations. By the late 1970s, the political use of Palestinian military means was well developed.⁶⁷ The PLO maintained sufficient force in Lebanon to deter or repel attacks by local parties, thus protecting its headquarters and main base, from where it launched its diplomatic offensive in the West. It also ensured its ability to mount raids against Israel or support clandestine operations within the Occupied Territories, in order to escalate the pressure on the Israeli leadership to negotiate and to derail peace initiatives that ignored the PLO's role. Finally, the PLO's ability to use military action in a controlled manner and to impose cease-fires, and its possession of an organised military force, reinforced its image as a capable, responsible regional actor.

⁶⁴ Commenting on Fatah's first military action, central committee member, Salah Khalaf, expressed Palestinian thinking succinctly: 'We wanted to mount a spectacular operation that would arrest the attention of the Israelis, Palestinians, Arab regimes, and world public opinion'. Abu Iyad (with Eric Rouleau), My Home, My Land: A Narrative of the Palestinian Struggle, New York: Times Books, 1981, p. 43.

⁶⁵ On the ethos of Palestinian military action, see M. Omar, 'Vingt ans de la lutte armée', Revue d'Etudes Palestiniennes (Paris) Number 14, Winter 1985, pp. 81-93 (in French).

⁶⁶ The PLO's military commander at the time wrote a book in which he reviewed the Chinese, Cuban, Vietnamese, and Soviet experiences, but failed to make more than superficial comments on the Palestinian case. Abu Hamam, Al-Muqawamah 'Askariyyan (The Resistance Seen Militarily), Beirut: Dar al-Tali'ah, 1972.

Palestinian institutions

Since 1968, a wide variety of Palestinian institutions have emerged, catering to the political and existential needs of the scattered Palestinian people. Mass organisations of workers, women, farmers, students, engineers, doctors, journalists, artists and others have mobilised the Palestinians at large, involving them in the political process and enabling them to promote their own special concerns within the PLO and host Arab countries. The Palestine Red Crescent Society has provided free medical care, nurse and medical technician training courses, and public health and preventive medicine education for the local Palestinian community and host population in several Arab countries.⁶⁸ The Education Department of the PLO has been responsible for the primary schooling of tens of thousands of Palestinian children, extra-curricular teaching, vocational training, and the distribution of thousands of study grants to universities abroad.⁶⁹ Local Popular Committees have overseen programmes for the improvement of sewage, road, and electricity networks in the refugee camps, while their inhabitants have been offered employment and training in Children of Martyrs Workshops (SAMED).

⁶⁷ For a discussion of this aspect, see Y Sayigh, 'Palestinian armed struggle: means and ends', Journal of Palestine Studies 16 (1) Fall 1986.

⁶⁸ The PLO's National Fund contributes $13 million annually to the PRCS, according to its head, Jawad al-Ghusain. See the PLO's central weekly, Filastun al-Thawrah (596) 1 March 1986, p. 15.

⁶⁹ On Palestinian education generally, see S G Brown, Education, Liberation or Repression: Palestinians, London: World University Press, 1984.

The PLO has also had to deal with the effects of military conflict with Israel and certain Arab parties on the Palestinian people. The Engineering Committee has constructed air raid shelters in the refugee camps and has helped to rebuild civilian homes damaged by hostile action, while the Social Welfare Office has provided pensions to over 50,000 families of guerrillas or civilians (including many non-Palestinian Arabs) killed, wounded, or captured over the last twenty-one years.⁷⁰ The total burden, both financial and administrative, of extending such support is enormous. The picture becomes complete, however, only when the costs of arming and training thousands of guerrillas and militia and of supporting Palestinian information and diplomacy abroad are added. Since 1979, moreover, the PLO has undertaken financial support for social and economic institutions in the Occupied Territories as a means to bolster resistance there.⁷¹ The need to obtain funds and provide basic security for the Palestinian civilian population is therefore a primary concern of the PLO (and a constraint), and goes far to explain the organisation's care to maintain good working relations with the Arab environment as far as possible.

However important, providing vital services and support in the Palestinian exile has not been the main driving force and achievement of Palestinian institution-building. More significant have been the political implications of institutionalisation. In the words of one PLO cadre: 'institutional achievement is an ambition of all revolutions . . . [in the Palestinian case] its first and foremost feature is that [the PLO] is the organised expression of Palestinian national identity'.⁷² After its revitalisation as an authentic Palestinian body when the guerrilla groups took it over in 1968-9, it was the PLO which became the central, representative institution embodying that identity. The crucial role played by the PLO since then has come from two main political functions it fulfils.

⁷⁰ For example, the PLO spent $37 million on repairs and compensation to Palestinian refugees in Beirut following the four-week 'camp war' launched by the Lebanese Shi'ite Amal movement in May-June 1985. In 1985, the PLO's share of social welfare payments amounted to $39 million. See interview with al-Ghusain in Filasun al-Thawrah, op. cit., p. 15. The head of Fateh's Social Welfare Office, Intisar Wazir, confirms in an interview with ABC's correspondent Peter George in Amman in May 1986 that total pensions amount to $100 million annually. More figures of pension beneficiaries in R Khalidi, 'The Palestinians in Lebanon: social repercussions of Israel's invasion', The Middle East Journal 38 (2) Spring 1984, pp. 225-66.

⁷¹ In 1979, the Arab Summit in Baghdad allocated $100 million to be distributed in the Territories by a joint PLO-Jordanian committee, and another $50 million to be administered by the PLO alone.

⁷² M Omar, 'Harb Ramadan al-Filistiniyyah: al-Mawqi' wal-Nata'ij' ('The Palestinian Ramadan War: position and results'), Shu'un Filistiniyya (119) October 1981, pp. 78-9. (In Arabic).

The PLO has provided the Palestinians with a common framework for their internal political processes, thus countering the effects of dispersal. The Palestine National Council acts as an effective Parliament-in-Exile which both elects the PLO's Executive Committee and holds it to account.⁷³ In turn, the PLO Executive Committee operates as the Palestinian cabinet, with individual members heading social, political, military, financial, educational, and other departments. Although it has been impossible for the PLO to hold free, general elections due to the physical dispersal and political subjugation of the vast majority of its people, many PNC members have in fact been chosen by electoral processes within the mass organisations, some of the guerrilla groups, and several Diaspora communities. As a result, not only has the PLO been the main arena for Palestinian 'party' politics, it has also provided independents with a forum and a share in Palestinian decisionmaking. By providing for the immediate existential and political needs of its people, the PLO has won the overwhelming support and confidence of Palestinians everywhere and has become the nearest thing to a Palestinian 'entity', to a state in exile, even though it has never had a firm territorial base.

Ultimately, however, it has been the PLO's ability to formulate comprehensive policies and develop strategies for providing solutions to the long-term problems facing the Palestinians that has won it mass support. In turn, this has allowed it both to present and represent the Palestine question to the international community, translating Palestinian sacrifices into political and diplomatic gains. Furthermore, by mobilising and focusing Palestinian material and moral resources, the PLO has provided itself with the strength to implement strategy. At this level, institutionalisation has indicated the political maturity of the Palestinian people and their leadership, and thus the legitimacy of their claims to nationhood.

The PLO since 1982

The 1982 Israeli invasion of Lebanon initiated a process which has had serious consequences for the PLO. Most important has been the split within Fateh, leading to the PLO's debilitation. The split took place largely as a consequence of the rupture of Palestinian-Syrian relations, during a period of cooling Arab ties, and has weakened the PLO's international standing. Nonetheless, both Fateh and the PLO have survived and still retain overwhelming support among Palestinians everywhere, a fact which bolsters their claim to represent them to the Arab and international communities. The background to this course of developments starts in 1981.

⁷³ A comprehensive review of the PLO's structure is offered in C Rubenberg, The Palestine Liberation Organisation: Its Institutional Structure, Belmont, MA: The Institute for Arab Studies, 1983.

In July of that year, Israeli air raids provoked PLO artillery fire against northern Israeli settlements. For two weeks the Israeli Army kept up its attack, killing 300 people when its aircraft bombed a residential quarter housing PLO offices in West Beirut, but the PLO refused to stop its return fire. A cease-fire was eventually brokered by Saudi Arabia and the US, bringing the PLO and Israel into their first bilateral agreement. For a year, despite constant Israeli incursions into the border area, the PLO maintained the cease-fire in south Lebanon, proving its sense of responsibility and its ability to control its ranks. The PLO continued its operations inside the Occupied Territories, however, as the cease-fire covered only the Lebanese border. By 1982, the PLO had shown itself to be a capable political actor: displaying diplomatic flexibility through its willingness to negotiate, but also demonstrating its insistence on a just solution through continued political-military struggle inside Palestine. Informal PLO-US contacts grew in this context, raising the prospect of a transition to open dialogue. This possibility alarmed a number of parties. Foremost was Israel, followed by certain American officials and Syria, which feared isolation if the PLO were to conclude a separate settlement. Conversely, the PLO's insistence on acceptable terms for peace and its cool reception of the 1981 Fahd Plan displeased its 'moderate' Arab backers, while its continued rejection of UN Resolution 242 as a viable basis for negotiations distanced the West Europeans.

This background goes far in explaining Arab inactivity during the 1982 war. Indeed, it explains the negative role played by Syrian and Saudi emissaries to Washington, who undermined Palestinian demands for US recognition of Palestinian rights in return for the PLO's evacuation from Beirut.⁷⁴ (In stark contrast, Egypt and France insisted on using the occasion to seek a solution for the Palestine problem.) An added aspect of Arab policy was the wish to avoid direct involvement in the Palestine problem. This meant support for the PLO, but only if it kept the problem from Arab doors. The Arab states were therefore reluctant to accept the PLO evacuees from Beirut. Of the eight that finally did, Algeria, Tunis, Sudan, and the two Yemens were too far from the battlefield to be threatened by the presence of a few thousand unarmed guerrillas. Neither Syria nor Jordan wanted to take in large numbers of PLO fighters, heroes in the eyes of the local people, but for the same reason neither could afford to refuse sanctuary entirely.⁷⁵ At the last moment, Iraq's willingness to assist the PLO prompted the Syrian government to switch from adamant refusal into accepting any number of guerrillas who wished to enter the country.

⁷⁴ For a full discussion, see R. Khalidi, Under Siege . . . pp 147-65.

The PLO's ability to withstand the Israeli onslaught virtually unaided for eighty-eight days and then extricate its entire leadership and the bulk of its fighting force intact, was a remarkable achievement. Yet the dismantling of the PLO's institutional base in Lebanon and the dispersal of its combat forces inevitably had their consequences. In the wake of the war, the Syrian leadership moved to exploit Palestinian differences over the causes leading up the exodus from Beirut. The Syrians benefited in particular from their physical control over thousands of guerrillas stationed in east and north Lebanon, and over other forces and support bases in Syria itself. In September 1982, PLO control over its forces was dealt a severe blow when its Chief of Staff, Brigadier-General Sa'd Sayel, was assassinated by unidentified gunmen in a Syrian military zone in eastern Lebanon. In the next few months Syrian officials met members of Fateh's internal opposition, and activated criticism by the PFLP-GC of PLO policies. Concurrently, Libya intensified its contacts with Palestinian rejectionists, condemning Arafat's move towards closer ties with Jordan.

The real basis for Syrian leverage against the PLO was the influence which Syria slowly had gained within Fateh by supporting certain individuals among its leadership.⁷⁶ This was demonstrated during Fateh's Fourth Congress, held in Damascus in May 1980, in which Syria's allies, led by the Fateh Central Committee member, Nimr Saleh, found themselves in a minority. When Saleh and his main supporters withdrew from the meeting, threatening to secede formally unless their demands were met, senior Syrian officials pressured the Fateh Central Committee into reinstating them and conceding their demands.⁷⁷ It was the same connection that provided the Syrians with the opportunity finally to split Fateh in 1983.⁷⁸ However, the secession of a Fateh faction led by Saleh Nimr, Abu Musa, and Abu Khaled al-'Amlah on 10 May 1983, was important to Syria for its political and moral, rather than its military, value.⁷⁹ This became evident when the Fateh split started to lose momentum, having failed to affect more than a couple of battalions largely officered by ex-Jordanian Army men, colleagues of Abu Musa and Abu Khaled.

⁷⁵ On Arab positions, see E F Sahliyeh, The PLO After the Lebanon War, Boulder, Colorado: Westview Press, 1986, pp 41-3.

⁷⁶ In fact, the first such Syrian attempt was in 1965, when Syrian Intelligence 'planted' two agents into Fateh's minuscule leadership. They took control of two of Fateh's five office-cum-bases in Damascus in early 1966, but the mutiny ended when they were killed by unidentified assailants in February. Interview by the author with former ranking member of the Ba'th Party's Palestinian branch, Amman, May 1985. Since 1980, the Abu Nidal faction has shifted its loyalty to Libya (briefly) and then to Syria, where it is firmly based.

During the next few weeks, the Fateh 'mutineers' (as the PLO termed them) tried to expand their support within Fateh itself and the Palestinian movement at large. This proved difficult, however, as the Fateh base generally rejected secession or alliance with Syria as a means for expressing opposition, despite sympathy for specific complaints.⁸⁰ Nor did the split gain strong backing from the PFLP and DFLP, although Habash declared support for the mutineers' demand for reform in June. Only Syrian-backed groups, the PFLP-GC, PPSF, and Sa'iqa, joined the secessionists in calling for a change in the PLO's leadership on 6 June.⁸¹ By this time, Syria was supporting military action against Fateh loyalists, although its official position remained committed to peaceful resolution of the internal conflict and to 'preventing all parties from resorting to military means'.⁸² On 29 May, Fateh mutineers accompanied by Syrian security men had occupied Fateh offices and depots in Damascus. Over the next week, several military bases in the Lebanese Bekaa Valley were attacked or isolated in similar action.

Developments moved more rapidly after 24 June, when Arafat was expelled from Damascus following his public criticism of Syrian involvement in the Fateh split. Libya's public opposition to Arafat since ⁷⁷ Interviews by the author with ranking Fateh members in Tunisia, February 1984, and Amman, March 1984 and May 1985.

⁷⁸ On background and development of the split, see E Rouleau, 'The Future of the PLO', Foreign Affairs 62 (1) Fall 1983, pp 138-56, and A M Garfinkle, 'Sources of the Al-Fateh mutiny', Orbis 27 (3) Fall 1983, pp 603-40.

⁷⁹ On the secessionists' reasons for action, see translated excerpts from M Shuqeir, 'The history of the split inside Fateh', Journal of Palestine Studies 13 (1) Fall 1983, pp 169-80. Pages 180-3 also contain excerpts from interviews in the press with Abu Musa and Nimr Saleh.

⁸⁰ An internal analysis by some Fateh secessionists criticises the mutiny's inability to attract support, or to develop clear alternatives. Reproduced in An-Nashra (64), (Nicosia), pp 10-15.

⁸¹ As-Safir (Beirut), 7 June 1983.

⁸² On May 30, the Ba'th Party set up an ineffectual three-man committee to initiate a dialogue within Fateh. As-Safir, 31 May 1983.

8 June was now matched by Syria's, with both states encouraging the use of force to occupy or evacuate loyalist bases. The Fateh mutineers were generally unable to fulfil this task alone, however, or unwilling to fight their former comrades-in-arms. The PFLP-GC was employed in this role instead, after reinforcing it with Syrian infantry and tanks. The Syrian Army finally intervened directly in late September, ordering loyalist forces out of central Lebanon and escorting them towards Tripoli. That leadership of the PLO was the issue at stake became clear when Arafat joined his men in northern Lebanon. The mutineers and PFLP-GC reaffirmed their intention to oust him, while Sa'iqa and the PLA declared Arafat's continued chairmanship 'illegitimate'. Arafat's success in embarrassing his critics was reflected in the stand taken by the PFLP and DFLP. Though critical of Arafat's return, both groups warned against the use of force to resolve the issue, and subsequently condemned opposition assaults on the Nahr el-Bared and Baddawi refugee camps. Indeed, even the Fateh mutineers ultimately refrained from joining the attack on the camps, forcing the Syrians to deploy the PFLP-GC and the PLA Hittin Brigade, backed by regular Syrian armour and artillery battalions.⁸³ The ensuing siege of Tripoli cost some 400 Palestinian lives, and ended in the evacuation of Arafat and 4,000 men on 23 December.

There has been little change in the basic position of most parties since the brief Palestinian 'civil war'. Repeated attempts at mediation between the PLO and the 'mutineers' by Algeria and South Yemen or between the PLO and Syria by Algeria and Saudi Arabia have largely failed, although Fateh, the DFLP, and the PCP now meet regularly. One consequence for inter-Palestinian relations has been the end of consensus politics; for example, having invited the other groups to attend the sixteenth session of the PNC in November 1984, the PLO convened it in their absence when they refused to participate without prior concessions from Arafat. This change has strained some of the PLO's Arab ties, particularly with Algeria (and South Yemen to a lesser extent). Algeria has consistently refused to host the PNC unless the PFLP and DFLP (especially) participate, although its support for Fateh and the PLO remains unaltered.

Since 1983, the main internal Palestinian development has been the division into three main trends: the PLO mainstream led by Arafat, including Fateh, the ALF and the PLF; the middle-of-the-road opposition including the PFLP, DFLP, and Palestine Communist Party (PCP); and the hardline opposition of the Fateh 'mutineers', PFLP-GC, Sa'iqa, and PPSF. Reflecting this division, two new political formations have emerged. The first is the Syrian-sponsored Palestine National Salvation Front (PNSF), established in March 1985 by the PFLP-GC, PPSF, Sa'iqa and the Fateh dissidents, with the support of breakaway factions from the PLF and PCP.⁸⁴ Although the PNSF has presented itself as the 'protector of the PLO and of national unity', it was in fact formed specifically to 'lead the PLO and topple Arafat'.⁸⁵ The PFLP, DFLP, and Palestine Communist Party (PCP) refused to join this front, establishing the Democratic Alliance instead.

⁸³ During the battle for the refugee camps of north Lebanon, some 300 PLA men deserted to the PLO. Syria finally threatened to use its own 'iron fist' if Arafat did not leave Tripoli. As-Safir, 1 December 1983.

The Democratic Alliance has played an increasingly important role in inter-Palestinian politics. Most significantly, it has consistently refused to undermine the PLO or deny the legitimacy of its bodies, though criticising its policies (notably the PLO-Jordanian accord signed on 11 February 1985). The Democratic Alliance has thus deprived Syrian policy of the unqualified support of the only Palestinian groups besides Fateh to enjoy some credibility among the Palestinian people. This has been made most obvious by the Alliance's statements condemning the savage war of attrition waged by Syria's Lebanese ally, the Shi'ite Amal movement, against Beirut's refugee camps. Indeed, Syria's involvement in the continuing suffering of Palestinian civilians in Lebanon, and its prevention of sustained guerrilla action against Israel in the south, have embarrassed its Palestinian allies and strained relations within the Palestinian opposition. Unless the members of the Democratic Alliance are willing to sacrifice their base in Damascus, however, they are unlikely to resume participation in the PLO's main bodies. Nonetheless, the Democratic Alliance's refusal to undermine the PLO has defeated Syrian attempts first to present the PNSF as an effective alternative and then to suggest the formation of a 'new PLO'. Syria's failure even led it, recently, to make the bizarre suggestion that the PNSF members form a new PLO Executive Committee by choosing a number of 'independents', although this would deny the PNSF's own relevance and amount to political suicide for its members.⁸⁶

⁸⁴ See PNSF's founding statement, reproduced in 'Abdul-Hadi an-Nashash, Al-Azmah ar-Rahinah lith-Thawrah al-Filistinyyah: Judhuruha wa Afaq Halluha (The Current Crisis in the Palestinian Revolution: Its Roots and Prospects for Resolution), Damascus: Dar 'An-Nadim Al-Wa'i', 1985, pp 168-72. (In Arabic).

⁸⁵ See statements by the PNSF on 16 May 1984, and the PCP-Provisional Leadership on 27 March 1985, reproduced in An-Nashash, op. cit., pp 185-90 and 181-2.

For its part, the PLO has worked to retain its centrality to the regional political process. The primary element in its response has been to strengthen its bonds with the Occupied Territories. The convening of the sixteenth PNC session in Amman in November 1984 reflected, among other considerations, the attempt to address the Palestinians under occupation directly. Similarly, the PLO-Jordanian agreement to form a joint delegation to any negotiations, and the acceptance of the principle of federation between a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza Strip and Jordan, indicated the PLO's concentration on consolidating its position within the Occupied Territories. The success of PLO policy and the continuing popularity of its leadership has been demonstrated by opinion polls in the concerned areas, statements by local figures, and by the massive turnout of 50,000 people at the funeral of the assassinated mayor of Nablus, Zafer Masri, who was a Fateh supporter.⁸⁷

A second element in the PLO's counter-strategy has been to reinforce its Arab and international standing, in response to the damage done to the PLO's credibility by the internecine strife. Combined with the PLO's remoteness from the battlefield, the internal split raised serious doubts about the organisation's continued ability to influence events. The PLO has therefore worked to gain a counterweight to Syria. Relations with Egypt and Iraq in particular have improved, though neither country is currently in a position to impose a relaxation on Syrian opposition to Arafat's continued leadership of the PLO. Furthermore, despite some coolness in the PLO's relations with Saudi Arabia in late 1983 and with Algeria in late 1984, ties with both countries have now stabilised. The PLO has also engaged in active diplomacy among non-Arab countries, in order to build its own foundations for international political action, independently of Arab support were that to be withheld.⁸⁸ An added element in the PLO's attempts to provide itself with regional protection has been the constant attempt to improve ties with the USSR, which cooled after the conclusion of the PLO-Jordanian agreement.⁸⁹ In April 1986, Arafat and the Soviet leader, Mikhail Gorbachev, met for the first time, indicating a renewal of Soviet support for the current leadership of the PLO.⁹⁰ Simultaneously, the PLO has sought to limit the regression in West European attitudes towards the Palestine question, relying on its ties with France, Greece and Austria especially to retain a voice in European circles.

⁸⁶ The minutes of the meeting between Syrian Vice-President Abdul-Halim Khaddam and the PNSF, suggest that Jibril was the most vehemently opposed to the proposal.

⁸⁷ Polls quoted by the Jerusalem Post on 1 July and 2 December 1983, for example, show support for Arafat among 92 per cent–94 per cent of respondents. A more recent poll place Arafat's personal popularity in the Occupied Territories at 74 per cent, against 1 per cent for Abu Musa. See D Kuttab, 'Opinions of the Occupied', Middle East International (London) Number 283, 12 September 1986, pp 14–15.

⁸⁸ During a two-week tour in spring 1986, Arafat brought the number of sub-Saharan African countries granting the PLO full diplomatic recognition to thirty-four. Successive issues of Filistin ath-Thawra.

The PLO's hopes for survival rest on its ability to generate support in the Occupied Territories, to obtain Arab protection and backing, and to convince the Western countries of the urgent necessity of recognising Palestinian rights in the form of a specific peace plan. Ultimately, the PLO's main card remains its ability to mount military action against Israel, if only for its nuisance value. Although armed struggle against Israel is now less the PLO's raison d'être than achieving tangible political and territorial gains, it remains a major element supporting the claim of any group to moral legitimacy in the eyes of the Palestinians. Equally, in their view, armed action remains necessary to remind the world of their plight and to provoke it into actively seeking a just solution. To this extent, the form and content of military operations, not to mention their actual results, are less important than the fact of their happening. The Fateh-Central Committee member, Khalil Wazir, a main architect of Palestinian military strategy, expressed this by saying: 'We try and we experiment. We succeed here and fail there. No matter. What is important is our insistence on pursuing our course'.⁹¹

⁸⁹ During the siege of Tripoli, the USSR urged Arafat to 'cooperate with Syria'. As-Safir, 29 November 1983. On PLO-Soviet ties since 1982, see G Golan, 'The Soviet Union and the PLO since the war in Lebanon', The Middle East Journal 40 (2) Spring 1986, pp 285-305.

⁹⁰ Filistin ath-Thawra 14 (604) 26 April 1986.

⁹¹ Interview by the author with A Saif, Shu'un Filistiniyya (152/153) November/December 1985, p 14.

The Afghan politics of exile

The contemporary Afghan case is very complex. Political exile has been the fate of many Afghan leaders, both of the present PDPA (People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan) Government and the opposition, over the last decade. Exile leaders of Afghan parties are currently living in cities in Pakistan, Iran and India. Other Afghan politicians are scattered as exiles in Western Europe and the USA.

There are degrees of exile, gradations which may not be simple to classify, but which nonetheless exist. Some political leaders find exile half-way across the world, in a country not only geographically distant but remote in culture too, as in the case of Leon Trotsky in Mexico. Others find refuge in a neighbouring country sharing some or many cultural traits with their homeland; Ayatollah Khomeini spent all but a brief interlude of his exile just across Iran's border with Iraq, in the self-contained subworld of the Atabat, the Shi'a holy places. Ayatollah Khomeini's fifteen year-long exile also illustrates well the persistent hope, faith and often delusion of so many exile leaders—that they will eventually return to their homeland in triumph.

The key date from which the present pattern of conflict developed is 27 April 1978 (the Saur Revolution) when a small Marxist party took power after a successful military coup in the capital Kabul. By the end of 1978, two distinct groups of leaders had begun to form in exile; the conservative opposition mainly in Peshawar, Pakistan, and key leaders of the Parcham (Banner) faction of the PDPA in Eastern Europe.

Peshawar was a natural place of refuge for Afghan political opponents of the new Kabul regime led by Nur Mohammed Taraki and Hafizullah Amin. Peshawar, the capital of Pakistan's North West Frontier Province (NWFP), lies close to the Afghan border with easy access to many of Afghanistan's most populous provinces. The Pushtun (Pathan) tribal population of NWFP still has much in common in culture, language and traditions with their fellow Pashto-speakers across the Durand Line, a British-created frontier arbitrarily cutting across tribes. The mainly Pushtun Afghan exile leaders would probably feel more at home in Peshawar than in any other city outside Afghanistan. Cultural affinities and links were not the only relevant aspects. It is an article of faith among Afghan nationalists that Peshawar, along with NWFP and Baluchistan provinces, are by right Afghan lands and should not belong to Pakistan. The irredentist policies pursued from Kabul since Pakistan's creation in 1947 have been the main factor poisoning relations between the two states. The long tribal borderlands stretching almost from Peshawar far into southern Afghanistan form a porous frontier, allowing easy access by many passes.

Already established in Peshawar was a small circle of obscure Afghan political exiles, members of a Muslim fundamentalist group known as 'Young Muslims'. Their radical Islamic ideology had won support among students at Kabul University, where the fundamentalists were the main rivals of the left-wing parties which developed from 1965. Young Muslim leaders had arrived in Peshawar as early as 1973, strongly opposed to the Government of President Mohammed Daoud. After the abject failure of their attempts in 1975 to provoke rural uprisings inside Afghanistan, surviving members of the Young Muslims soon split into three small rival groups living in exile; Jamiat-i-Islami (Islamic Society) led by Burhanuddin Rabbani, Hizb-i-Islami (Islamic Party) led by Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, and Hizb-i-Islami led by Yunis Khalis. The titles each of the three leaders went by was a clue to their backgrounds. 'Professor' Rabbani (born c 1940) had been a teacher in the Islamic department at Kabul University, 'Engineer' Gulbuddin (born 1948) had been a student in the engineering faculty, while 'Maulawi' Yunis Khalis (born c 1920) was a religious scholar (alim) of an older generation.

Activists of the Young Muslims and the parties which developed from this circle shared certain ideals and basic objectives, in spite of the differences (personal and other) which broke their original unity. They all treat Islam as a radical political ideology and aim to create by their parties' actions an ideal Islamic state. Whether they realise it or not, the intellectual sources for their often radical social and political views are certainly not restricted to their Muslim roots, but also include modern Western ideologies.

From Summer 1978, the Afghan fundamentalists based in Peshawar boldly seized the initiative in declaring a jihad (holy war or struggle) against the Taraki regime.¹ They had a headstart on rival Afghan political organisers in exile, having close links with the Pakistan authorities, besides enjoying the support of Pakistan's Jama'at-i-Islami, the fundamentalist party intimately associated with General Zia ul-Haq's military regime. The tighter organisation and discipline of the fundamentalist parties gave them advantages over the amorphous new parties—less true parties than broad coalitions.

¹ See further, Anthony Hyman, Afghanistan under Soviet Domination, 1964-83, London: Macmillan, 1984.

From Summer 1978, they were joined in Peshawar by many new exiles, conservative, religious or liberal democratic opponents of the regime. These included the heads of two influential Afghan families, with substantial religious prestige and popular appeal in Afghanistan's tradition-bound society. Sayyid Ahmad Gailani (born 1936) was a Sufi pir, a hereditary 'saint' of the Qadiriya order, venerated by Pushtun tribes of the borderlands. He was also a liberal and secular-minded Kabul businessman and landowner, linked by marriage to the royal family.

Professor Sibghatullah Mojaddedi (born 1929) was a surviving member of a prominent religious family in Kabul, most of whom were murdered by the Taraki regime soon after the April 1978 coup. The Mojaddedis were followed by Afghan members of the Naqshbandi Sufi order. He arrived in Peshawar from Scandinavia, where he had been directing a Saudi-funded Islamic mission. Unlike the other leaders mentioned, he had studied at Al-Azhar in Cairo, the greatest Muslim seminary. As a teacher of religious studies in Kabul lycées from the 1960s, he had the reputation of being an Islamic revolutionary and suffered imprisonment before leaving for self-imposed exile in Scandinavia.

A third leader was Mohammad Nabi Mohammadi (born 1920), a well-respected conservative nationalist figure known over a wide region of southern and western Afghanistan. Spanning the gulf between secular and religious, modern and traditional, Mohammadi was both a religious scholar (alim) and former member of parliament for Logar province. Unlike the other two conservative leaders, whose families were reckoned to have an alien or exotic status outside Pushtun tribal society, Mohammadi was an Ahmadzai Pushtun as well as a distinguished maulawi.

Though none of the three men had been major political figures before the 1978 coup, each soon emerged at the head of a new party based in exile. It was their religious and family status, rather than innate political abilities or intense ambition, which pushed them to the front against many would-be leaders. Gailani was head of the Mahaz (National Islamic Front of Afghanistan), Mojaddedi head of the Jabha (National Liberation Front of Afghanistan) and Mohammadi presided over Harakat (Islamic Revolution Movement). These six parties grew rapidly from 1979, incorporating dozens more small groups or factions in Peshawar.

A seventh party emerged in 1981, paradoxically out of an attempt to forge unity between the existing rival fundamentalist parties. This was the Islamic Alliance of Afghan Mujahidin, led by Professor Abdul Rasul Sayyaf (born 1947), a political activist who arrived in Peshawar only in 1980 after being released from Pul-e-Charkhi prison in Kabul. Sayyaf was a former teacher in Kabul University's Islamic department, who had earlier studied at Al-Azhar in Cairo and also in Mecca. An ambitious and clever man who speaks fluent modern Arabic, Sayyaf was rumoured to hold puritanical Wahhabi beliefs dear to the hearts of powerful patrons in Saudi Arabia who lavishly funded the Alliance.

The Afghan Left in exile

As for the Parcham faction of the PDPA, its leading members lost out in a vicious power struggle only months after the April coup, being dismissed from their posts or imprisoned from July 1978. Their rivals in the Khalq (Masses) faction—at this time virtually a separate party dominating the ruling PDPA—controlled the levers of power, but being very dependent on Soviet backing, were obliged to agree to Soviet requests to send away to exile and safety some key Parchami leaders as appointed ambassadors to foreign countries. Among these were the two men who in turn were placed in power after the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan at the end of 1979: Babrak Karmal, sent to Prague as ambassador, and Dr Najibullah, sent to the Tehran embassy and who finally replaced Karmal in May 1986.

The small group of Parchami leaders in exile during the eighteen months before the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan remained together for a time in Prague where Karmal had been appointed ambassador before being moved to Moscow in mid-1979. As exiles, the Parchami leaders were clearly under firm Soviet protection, but to most observers their political careers seemed over. With hindsight, they were being held ready to replace their Khalq rivals in the troubled PDPA in Kabul.

The veteran leftist politician Babrak Karmal (born 1930), appointed Deputy Prime Minister after the April 1978 coup, had earlier been elected as one of a group of left-wing MPs during Afghanistan's 'New Democracy' period under King Zahir Shah in the 1960s. Dr Najibullah, a medical doctor by training and still young (he was born in 1947), was a senior organiser of the party. In 1979 Najibullah was reportedly attached to the KGB in Moscow, in preparation for taking over as head of the Afghan secret police (State Intelligence Service, known from 1980 under the acronym KHAD).

Exile parties and the Afghan Resistance

The relationship between the parties based in exile and the internal guerrilla resistance has been far from straightforward. Resistance sprang up in many parts of Afghanistan during 1979, for the most part spontaneously, in opposition to the crude and often brutal attempts by PDPA activists in the provinces to impose a new order. Beatings, arrests and murders of village maliks (chiefs) and mullahs (Muslim clergymen) rapidly alienated the rural population from a regime and party which initially had some popular appeal in the country, offering reforms after the stultifying dictatorship of President Daoud. Nor was opposition all conservative. In the north-eastern region in 1979 and later, uprisings were led by the ultra-leftist grouping Setem-i-melli (so-called Afghan Maoists) under the direction of the Marxist revolutionary, Taher Badakhshi.

Each of the Afghan parties based in exile claimed to be playing a major role in the internal Afghan Resistance, though in 1979 their influence was actually often marginal to the various local struggles. The better organised were undoubtedly the fundamentalists. The party Jamiat-i-Islami was the most active in 1979, exploiting its extensive network of militants and sympathisers in non-Pushtun parts of Afghanistan to lead uprisings in the north-west and north-east, notably in Herat and Badakhshan.² In March 1979, cadres of Jamiat-i-Islami—some of whom had earlier taken refuge in Iran's border province of Khorasan in Mashad—started a successful uprising in Herat province, then staged a mutiny in the large military base in Herat city which was joined by many people from the city. The rebellion was suppressed only after air raids on the city and bombardments by Afghan armoured units loyal to the regime rushed to Herat.

None of the Afghan exile parties were able at this time to attract more than small amounts of money from foreign patrons in the Gulf States, and thus their ability to give arms in return for political influence over the many local independent guerrilla groups inside Afghanistan was strictly limited. It was among steadily growing numbers of Afghan refugees in Pakistani camps that the parties' influence was most direct. They could raise recruits for jihad from among the men, but money was still scarce even for ammunition and .303 calibre rifles made in Darra Adam Khel in the tribal belt of NWFP, let alone dearer, more sophisticated foreign infantry weapons. In 1979, the volume and quality of arms given by the Pakistani military in covert aid to mujahidin of the exile parties were very low. The major source of arms for the exile parties, as for internal guerrilla fronts, continued to be captured convoys, military posts and arsenals (as in Herat city) together with deserters from the Afghan army.

² See ibid. and Olivier Roy, L'Afghanistan. Islam et modernité politique, Paris: Seuil, 1985.

This situation altered overnight with the Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan at the end of December 1979. The stakes of guerrilla warfare were suddenly raised. What had been looked on as a small-scale civil war in a remote land became a conflict involving units of the Soviet armed forces, for the first time since the Second World War. Hitherto largely ignored, the guerrilla war inside Afghanistan now became of intense interest to the international media, and inevitably to some key foreign states and their intelligence agencies. The natural beneficiaries of this surge of interest were, of course, the exile parties.

The 1980 watershed

The exile parties developed spectacularly from 1980. A number of interconnected factors made the Soviet intervention a watershed. The nature of the war, the numbers of refugees, the amount of foreign interest and aid for the Afghan Resistance—all were affected. The war itself changed qualitatively with the arrival of strong Soviet army and air force units. At a total figure which soon reached some 120,000, the Soviet 'limited military contingent' was considerably larger than total Afghan military strength. Their alien presence helped alter a localised civil war into a nationwide guerrilla resistance, whose sole unifying element at this stage was a general hostility to the foreign occupying forces. The exile parties, with their claims to represent the Afghan people as a whole rather than a particular region, tribe or ethnic group, were well placed to exploit the situation. The USA, China and the Gulf States all stepped in to offer aid on a bigger scale than seen before the intervention. At last the largely ignored exile parties were the focus of considerable foreign interest.

The Soviet military presence in Afghanistan alarmed all the states of the region. Their concern was stirred not only on strategic grounds, but also in some cases because of claims of 'Islamic solidarity', a sympathy with a Muslim people's resistance to foreign and communist aggression. There was a tradition in Saudi Arabia and other Arab states of funding and giving moral support to the Palestinians and other Muslim peoples, claiming to be fighting a jihad for independence or autonomy, as in Mindanao in the Philippines. Of the Arab states, Egypt under President Anwar Sadat was the most open in admitting sending arms to the Afghan Resistance from 1980. Sadat described in an interview in 1981, shortly before he was assassinated, how, soon after the Soviet intervention, the Carter Administration had requested him to provide infantry weapons from the extensive stocks of Soviet-made arms in Egypt. These were reportedly flown from Cairo to Pakistan in US planes.

Pakistan's role in the Afghan struggle since 1978 has been the subject of bitter polemics. As the host of the exile parties based across the border in Peshawar and Quetta, Pakistan was crucial to the parties' growth and development. The Pakistan military authorities not only permitted foreign funds and military aid for the Resistance to be channelled through Pakistan, but they themselves actually organised their distribution to the parties. However, the scale and significance of these operations before 1980, together with the covert provision of military training facilities in Pakistan, have been grossly exaggerated in a propaganda campaign orchestrated from Kabul and Moscow, really aimed at justifying and explaining the Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan.³

The proof of this is best seen in the rapid expansion of influence inside Afghanistan of each of the exile parties from 1980. Their sudden growth in influence was directly due to greatly increased quantities of foreign funds and arms, without which they had little to offer the several hundred internal local resistance fronts and guerrilla groups. The impact of these developments was felt unevenly by the various exile parties. The party to benefit most was at first Hizb-i-Islami of Gulbuddin Hekmatyar. By general consensus, it was the best organised of the six, and certainly its activists in Peshawar had the most flair for publicity. To influential American and Chinese officials keen to foil the threat of Soviet expansion from military bases and airfields in Afghanistan, as well as to fundamentalist circles in Saudi Arabia, Pakistan and Iran, Gulbuddin's party seemed to represent the brightest hope in efficiently organising and leading the Afghan resistance.

³ See, for example, Undeclared War, Kabul publications, third edition, 1984, and White Book, 'Pakistan's subversive activities against the Afghan Revolution', 1984.

Another important cause of post-1980 growth in influence of all the exile parties was the Pakistan system of distributing international relief aid to ever-increasing numbers of Afghan refugees. Bombardments and air raids on villages in many areas of Afghanistan were stepped up greatly from 1980, generating a huge increase in numbers of refugees into Pakistan and Iran. Numbers of refugees rose fifteen-fold in just five years from 1980, to reach some 2.8 million in Pakistan alone. Relief aid was channelled partly through the parties, whose activists were responsible in each of hundreds of refugee camps in NWFP and Baluchistan provinces for distributing aid to new arrivals. In registering new arrivals they claimed new party members, and from the men in the camps they recruited volunteers for jihad. This indirect relief system must have helped reduce the burden of Pakistani administration at a time of crisis, but one indirect consequence was to increase the patronage and membership, and therefore the power, of the exile parties.

The fundamentalist parties were favoured over and above the moderate nationalist parties in the area of camp administration in the early years, largely, no doubt, due to the influence of certain sympathetic senior officials belonging to Pakistan's Jamaat-i-Islami. This favouritism altered, though, to a more even-handed approach in 1983, when a new Commissioner for Refugees was appointed for the NWFP.

Pressures on exile parties

Three main sources existed for pressure on the Afghan parties based in exile; the host government, other foreign states giving support in money or arms, and guerrilla groups and fronts, together with representative Afghans from inside Afghanistan itself. The host governments of Pakistan and Iran have had considerable potential for leverage over the Afghan parties based in their countries. If they have failed to get their way over the parties on a number of key issues, it is certainly not for want of trying. The ultimate sanctions—the expulsion of leaders or the dissolution of an exile party—have not been used by Pakistan, though Iran has expelled Afghan leaders. Pakistan's military regime under General Zia ul-Haq trod warily in its relations with the Afghan opposition parties, and from the very beginning their relationship was on an essentially different footing than Revolutionary Iran's with the Afghan exiles. In Pakistan's case, it was almost a process of symbiosis, of mutual benefit through mutual support. General Zia's regime had antagonised or alienated Pakistan's Western and Gulf Arab friends, alike by the hanging of former Prime Minister Zulfikar Ali Bhutto in 1979, and for the most important of the foreign states one of the few redeeming features of his regime was its support for the Afghan opposition.

At times, there was serious friction between the Afghan parties and the Pakistan authorities. On the issue of the 'leakage' of weapons (the illegal selling off in Pakistan by party officials of arms intended for guerrillas inside Afghanistan), there have been serious disagreements, creating a lot of friction. Pakistan has been deeply embarrassed over the years by the parties' bringing over the border into Pakistan dozens of their Soviet prisoners of war, to hand them over to the International Red Cross or simply to gain foreign publicity. Another issue causing problems has been the degree of unity or disunity between the parties.

It is often argued by Afghan nationalists in exile that Afghan attempts at creating unity between the parties have failed through deliberate obstruction by Pakistan. It may well be true that Pakistan had reason to be concerned if a single, united (and well-armed) Afghan resistance organisation based in Pakistan emerged, comparable to the Palestine Liberation Organisation in Jordan and Lebanon in the 1960s. This was, however, hardly a realistic option, in the medium term at least. The evidence actually points the other way, for Pakistan officials did take repeated initiatives to obtain unity in the form of an alliance of the exile parties. That the various alliances formed have so far proved ephemeral, incomplete or even counter-productive has scarcely been the fault of Pakistan. The blame lies probably more in the nature of Afghan society, with its diverse ethnic, tribal and religious background—differences accurately reflected, after all, in the composition of the parties themselves.⁴ Personality conflicts compounded by basic tribal and ethnic divisions have been the most serious obstacles to opposition unity, and these also exist, significantly enough, within the PDPA ranks.

The inability of the Peshawar parties to form a cohesive political unity had been recognised even in 1979 to be damaging to their joint interests and fatal to any prospect of declaring a viable government-in-exile. A number of initiatives for unity took place from Spring of 1980, in the aftermath of the Soviet intervention. The first one was prompted by Pakistan officials, and probably by Saudi Arabia and other interested foreign states. The others came about by pressure from inside Afghanistan.

⁴ The ethnic element is crucial to understanding the spread of support for the various parties. Jamiat-i-Islami has attracted mainly Tajiks and Uzbeks, while the other parties based in exile have a mainly Pushtun following. See further A Hyman and Olivier Roy, ibid.

Unity was anticipated from the formation in March 1980 of the Islamic Alliance under a compromise figure, Professor A. R. Sayyaf. This paper alliance of five of the Peshawar parties—the sixth (Hizb-i-Islami of Gulbuddin) refused to join—was formed under direct pressure on the reluctant parties by Pakistan officials, according to reliable accounts. It was intended to put an end to the rivalries between the parties and to provide an efficient means for channelling foreign—essentially Saudi and Kuwaiti—aid to the Afghan resistance. Instead, the Islamic Alliance under Sayyaf's management developed by 1981 into something akin to a seventh rival party. It did not succeed even in uniting the fundamentalist-inclined parties. A blistering public exposé of Sayyaf's manipulation of Alliance funds to serve his own ambitions was made late in 1983 by one of the most widely respected Peshawar leaders, Yunis Khalis—the only leader, incidentally, who for much of each year lived across the border in Nangarhar province in southern Afghanistan, sharing the dangers of the guerrilla war. Khalis at the same time attacked the Arab countries for giving over their aid to 'stooges' who, he claimed, represented neither significant political parties nor the guerrillas inside Afghanistan, blaming the meddling Arabs for the disunity of the Afghan mujahidin.

From inside Afghanistan, the shock of the Soviet invasion and the state of division and rivalry between the exile parties jointly produced a striking initiative during the early months of 1980, to hold a Loya Jirga, a general assembly of representatives from every province of the country. The Loya Jirga is a traditional form of Afghan assembly called by rulers to decide or give assent to important policy decisions. This Loya Jirga was different, of course, in being called by a large number of local leaders throughout the country against, rather than for, the Kabul government. For the same reason, the assembly could not be held in the capital city of Kabul, so the decision was taken to summon it just across the border in Peshawar for April 1980, giving time for the delegates from the far-flung regions to the west and north of the Hindu Kush to make their way there.

The Loya Jirga was a bold, imaginative but doomed venture to get real unity for a national struggle against a Soviet-imposed communist regime. Its leaders hoped to merge the internal fighting groups and the six rival parties into an effective and party-less alliance. Over two thousand representatives from the twenty-nine provinces and the nomadic tribes had arrived in Peshawar by April 1980, including some eminent and influential local maliks, especially from the southern Pushtun tribes. The elected president of the Loya Jirga was Omar Babrakzai, an urbane and secular-minded judge, aged forty and a graduate of the Sorbonne.

Babrakzai explained the Afghan struggle as being essentially one for independence. As a recognised state, Afghanistan had the right to a separate and independent existence, and 'Soviet imperialism' had no business in their country. He denounced Soviet imperialism as being even more deadly than other types of imperialism or colonialism; while the British had only been interested in exploiting a colony's raw materials, the Soviet Union attempts also to destroy its culture, religion, history and traditions.⁵

The delegates elected a 68-member revolutionary council in May 1980. A number of members of smaller groups or parties (such as Afghan Mellat, a Pushtun nationalist party founded in 1966) joined the delegates of the Loya Jirga. But it represented a threat to the interests of the six established exile parties, and may also have been looked on with disapproval by the Pakistani authorities. The Loya Jirga's unity was shattered in July 1981, when a majority of its Pushtun representatives were persuaded to back the National front of Pir S A Gailani.

Grassroots internal pressure for national unity, and impatience over the anarchy within the Afghan resistance, produced another initiative in April 1981. A band of some three hundred mullahs (Muslim clergymen) from many areas of Afghanistan arrived in Peshawar to press for unity. They also sought an end to harmful rivalries producing gun-fights between local guerrillas and the activists of some of the exile parties—notoriously, Hizb-i-Islami of Gulbuddin, which was trying to expand its power in many areas. The mullahs' efforts to promote unity attracted praise from many sides, and may have helped to spur the exile parties to form new alliances later that summer.

In June 1981, the three so-called moderate nationalist leaders—Nabi Mohammadi, Gailani and Mojaddedi—announced the formation of their alliance, the Islamic Unity of Afghan Mujahidin. This loose alliance, in the form of a common council in Peshawar and close relations in the field between the three parties' guerrilla commanders has held well since then. The moderates have proved more successful in working together, though an important section of Mohammadi's party at once broke away, declaring it was now part of the fundamentalist grouping under Professor Sayyaf. In August 1981, the fundamentalists declared their own response, a new alliance of the three parties of Gulbuddin, Rabbani and Khalis, together with Sayyaf's. The large assembly announcing this decision took place in a Peshawar mosque under the slogan of 'one leader and one banner'. Unfortunately, they never decided upon implementing this slogan, and fierce rivalry persisted between the fundamentalist alliance's respective parties.

⁵ A Hyman, ibid., p 144-5.

A second Loya Jirga meeting in October 1981 was promoted by the moderate Alliance, this time held in the city of Quetta in Pakistan's western province of Baluchistan. Again, it attracted much interest from inside Afghanistan, and several thousand delegates came to Quetta. They demanded the creation of a Grand Council to make decisions binding on the Afghan people as a whole. The hopes of the organisers were fatally damaged by the fundamentalist parties, who denounced the Quetta assembly and refused to take part. However, a considerable number of individual guerrilla commanders linked to the fundamentalist parties did attend the Loya Jirga in Quetta, probably indicating a strong Afghan desire to reach unity, irrespective of exile party orders. The Quetta assembly was in the end broken up by Pakistan police, probably in collusion with the fundamentalist leaders Gulbuddin and Sayyaf.

Rumours of support for the Jirga from Afghanistan's former King Zahir Shah caused a surge of interest among Afghan nationalists. Reports that the ex-King, (living in exile in Rome since 1973), was in close touch with leaders of the three conservative parties were credited widely among the Afghan population as a whole. At this time and since, a potential rallying-point for Afghan unity has been the symbol of monarchy, grown more attractive for most Afghans nostalgic for the 'Golden Age' of peace before the 1973 coup which had ended Zahir Shah's reign. But there was also fierce antagonism to the idea of any role for Zahir Shah, coming from the fundamentalists. And there was little sign that the timid ex-King himself was willing to embark on a crusade to forge unity, or to restore peace to the land.

Since 1981, a number of new, grandly named alliances between the Peshawar-based parties have come and gone. Their actual significance has been minimal. More important has been the state of relations between the internal commanders of the respective parties. These have steadily improved, on the whole. The essential lines have emerged as a close working relationship between the five more moderate parties—the three forming the Islamic Unity (led by Mohammadi, Gailani and Mojaddedi), together with the Jamiat-i-Islami of Rabbani and Hizb-i-Islami of Khalis. The aggressively independent Hizb-i-Islami of Gulbuddin has lost ground inside Afghanistan, and suffered from defections from its commanders. As for Sayyaf's grouping, it has failed to develop into a party as such, and stands somewhat isolated.

There has been a growing realisation on the part of Afghan exile parties of the need for a formal degree of unity so as to help towards the goal of international recognition of the Afghan Resistance as a government-in-exile, rather than a mere collection of rival parties. All the parties at least agree in denouncing the UN-sponsored indirect talks in Geneva, which have taken place over eight (so far inconclusive) rounds, between Pakistan and Afghanistan. In particular, the Afghan parties have stated that the fate of Afghanistan will be decided by the Afghans, and that Pakistan is not their representative at Geneva. The shadow of Geneva looms large over the Afghan exile parties.

The seven Peshawar-based parties agreed to allow Rabbani, head of the Jamiat-i-Islami (emerging as the most important single party inside Afghanistan) to serve as spokesman for the Afghan Resistance in January 1984, at a summit of the Islamic Conference Organisation (ICO).⁶ Yet they made no institutional progress towards unity for over a year, until at the end of March 1985, 'a very senior Pakistani official called the leaders in and told them that they had to form an alliance that could represent them jointly'.⁷ Henry Bradsher writes that the direct result of this piece of advice was the formation by the seven parties of the Islamic Alliance of Afghan Mujahidin, seeking to gain representation at the United Nations and other international organisations.

The seven leaders decided on a rotating chairmanship, so as to allow each party leader in turn a three-month period in which to represent the Alliance as a whole. In the ICO the Alliance spokesmen and their influential backers among the Muslim states are pressing hard to be granted the vacant seat of Afghanistan, possibly early in 1987, at the next summit meeting of the ico. The most dramatic international trip undertaken by Alliance representatives recently was a visit to the US in June 1986, in the course of which four Afghan party leaders met President Reagan in Washington. Nothing of real substance emerged from this meeting, but the very fact that it took place at all is significant. Though Reagan refused to concede official diplomatic recognition—a formal request for such recognition was made, but Reagan said this was 'premature'—the White House meeting cannot fail to have encouraged the Afghan leaders. In Paris and other West European capitals, the Afghan delegation was also warmly received.

⁶ The ICO gives the Unity, not Jamiat-i-Islami, observer status, as the entity representing the Afghan Resistance as a whole. A delegation of Afghan representatives of the seven major exile parties attends the regular meetings of the ICO.

⁷ Henry S Bradsher, Afghanistan and the Soviet Union, Durham, USA: Duke University Press, 1985, p 296.

However, only four out of the seven leaders had agreed to go on the visit to the USA, and Rabbani (the Alliance chairman at the time) on his return to Peshawar in July 1986, sounded more conciliatory towards the inveterately hostile Gulbuddin and Sayyaf who had strongly opposed the US visit. Rabbani stressed that the first priority for the Alliance must be gaining recognition by Islamic states as the rightful representative of the people of Afghanistan. The Alliance plans to open in the near future some offices in order to lobby actively for international recognition, with offices planned initially in Jeddah as well as New York.

Iran and the Afghan Resistance

The basic ethnic and tribal alignments within Afghanistan which have acted as the key to the development of the party system have already been briefly alluded to. Also important is the sectarian split between Sunni and Shi'a Islam. At least 80 per cent of the Afghan population are Sunni Muslims, with the Shi'a minority nearly all imami (Twelver Shi'as), in common with the majority of Iranians. (An Isma'ili Shi'a community also exists in Badakhshan, but it has produced no parties in exile). Shi'as are concentrated in central and western Afghanistan, and have long maintained religious links with Iran, where their ulema study at the famous seminaries in Qum and Mashad. The Afghan Shi'as have long been a despised minority in their own land, often subjected to persecution. The main body of Afghan Shi'as are from the Persian-speaking Hazara minority, a desperately poor ethnic group of Mongol-Turk origin, living in the central mountain region of Afghanistan, who have settled in Kabul and all the big Afghan towns.

Iran's role in the Afghan Resistance has been far less important than Pakistan's since 1978. One explanation for this is the fact that Iran has been in turmoil since 1978, first with its Islamic Revolution, then with the war with Iraq to distract it from the Afghan struggle. Iran's interest in the Afghan struggle is essentially different from Pakistan's on several levels; Iran does not permit any foreign arms to reach the Afghan exile parties with offices in its cities—not even allowing, until 1983, the UNHCR's offer of strictly humanitarian relief aid of medicine, food and tents for about one and a half million Afghan refugees in Iran. The Iranian government jealously guards its own monopoly of dealings with the Afghan parties, and has in the past closed down some Afghan party offices, and expelled leaders on suspicion of their 'plots' with foreign powers—in particular the 'Great Satan', the USA.

Iran's leaders and state-controlled media regularly brand Soviet support for the PDPA regime in Kabul as 'Soviet imperialism', and pledge Iran's backing for the 'just and Islamic cause' of the Afghan mujahidin. The four fundamentalist parties of Sunni Afghans based in Peshawar also maintain offices in Tehran, Mashad and Qum. Seven specifically Shi'a Afghan parties are also represented in Iran—some of which also maintain offices in Quetta, in a part of Pakistan not so distant or alien as Peshawar to Shi'a centres inside Afghanistan. They do not form a united movement.

Inevitably, it is the Afghan Shi'a parties which are more at home in Iran, in the fervently Shi'a atmosphere of the Islamic Republic. But only those small, militantly Shi'a Afghan parties which abandon pretences to independence vis-à-vis the Tehran regime have been given privileged treatment, weapons and training. These are the Afghan groups known as Jihad Islami, Hizbollah and Pasdaran, described by a recent shrewd visitor to Iran as, 'straightforward emanations of the Tehran regime'.⁸ Iran's help for these groups has been actually counter-productive as far as the war against the Kabul regime is concerned, for the Pasdaran and associated militant Shi'a groups have fought not against the Soviet-Afghan government forces, but against other Shi'a groups for control of the Hazarajat region of central Afghanistan.

Relations with the regime's representatives have often been strained for the more important and independent Afghan parties in Iran, whether Shi'a or Sunni. The major Afghan parties are still funded mainly by voluntary contributions of money from those Afghan refugees working in Iran. Many of the refugees in Iran regard it as their sacred duty to give over to the parties a portion of their miserable wages as labourers, and some volunteer to go to fight in Herat or other regions across the border. The party offices in Mashad, close to the Herat border, have many wounded Afghans from the war fronts on their hands, for whom they find medical treatment once they have brought them across.

⁸ See Chris Kutschera in The Middle East (London) August 1986, pp 43–7.

Many Afghan party organisers based in Iran have become sceptical of the depth of Iranian commitment to their cause, because they continue to face serious difficulties in their relations with the Pasdaran (Iranian Revolutionary Guards) at the borders, as well as with local komitehs in Khorasan province, Tehran and other parts of Iran where they have settled. Afghan guerrillas have frequently had their arms confiscated at the borders with Herat province, others claim to have been robbed of their possessions by Pasdar units. Afghans are not permitted the freedom of movement within Iran which they enjoy in Pakistan, being forced to register with local komitehs, and request official permits from the Iranians. The parties bitterly resent Iran's refusal to allow them to transit through Iran or stockpile there the arms and ammunition badly needed in Herat and other western regions of Afghanistan.

The two major independent Afghan Shi'a parties based in Iran are Harakat Islami (Islamic Movement), and Nasr (Victory). Harakat Islami was founded in 1978 by a well-known Shi'a religious leader of Kandahar, Shaikh Asef Mohsini. His independence of the Iranian authorities was shown when the party was banned for a time from Iran, on the fatuous charge of being US agents. The party is said to be the sole Afghan Shi'a party still seriously fighting the Soviet-Afghan forces on fronts all over western Afghanistan. Harakat captured early on in the war heavy artillery, and it has cooperated well with the strongest Afghan party of all, Jamiat-i-Islami. Nasr, on the other hand, is embroiled in the intra-Shi'a power struggle in the central region, though its spokesmen claim Nasr is also active against Soviet forces on a number of fronts. Nasr is a radical Shi'a political party with its own distinct identity and origin. It was formed from a circle of intellectuals and ulema in Kabul before the 1978 Saur Revolution, and is not simply a reflection of Iranian interference in the Afghan political scene.

War and peace

Hopes for an Afghanistan settlement to end the war have continued

through four years of protracted negotiations at Geneva, under the auspices of the UN Under-Secretary, Diego Cordovez. The latest brief round, the eighth in the series of indirect talks between Pakistan and Afghanistan, ended in August 1986, with Mr Cordovez reportedly concentrating on the problem of monitoring effectively the implementation of agreements which would have to be signed before any phased withdrawal of the Soviet 'limited military contingent' could begin. Mikhail Gorbachev announced on 28 July in Vladivostok a unilateral token withdrawal of six Soviet regiments (6,000–8,000 troops) by the end of the year.

Spokesmen for the Afghan Resistance are extremely critical of the fact that the UN-sponsored talks are taking place without any representation by the Afghan alliance. They claim that it is unrealistic for the Geneva talks not to include both the Resistance and the Soviet Union, arguing that it is these two unrepresented parties which actually control Afghanistan, rather than the puppet regime in Kabul imposed by Soviet military forces at the end of 1979, or Pakistan for that matter.

The serious prospect of being shut out completely from a negotiated settlement of the Afghan crisis is something which has helped to concentrate the collective mind of the Resistance parties of the Afghan Alliance. It has not yet, however, forged either firm unity or agreement on strategy between the Alliance's component parties. Without greater unity of purpose, there can be little realistic expectation of forming, let alone gaining international recognition for, an Afghan government in exile. This is widely recognised by Afghan opposition spokesmen as essential towards the long-term goal of challenging the PDPA government's right to hold the seat of Afghanistan in the UN General Assembly. Of the many experienced professional diplomats who have resigned from Afghan posts abroad since 1979—including former senior Afghan representatives at the UN General Assembly—few believe that progress at the UN will be anything but slow, with or without observer status. (International moral backing for the PLO and ANC has won little for their causes at the UN.) De-recognition of a state is rare at the UN. Even where a government has lost effective control of its national territory, or the support of the bulk of its population, as long as it retains control of the capital the government has claims to represent the state.

It is difficult to dispute the substantial accuracy of Afghan opposition assessments that what is being attempted by the UN-sponsored Geneva talks is to reach peace by a sell-out—a settlement guaranteeing the stability of an unpopular, unrepresentative and essentially unstable Kabul regime. Whether or not the guerrilla struggle inside Afghanistan could survive, or would effectively die down if Pakistan agreed at Geneva to close its borders and not allow arms through for the Afghan Resistance, is very difficult to predict, and beyond the scope of this article. The fact that Pakistan is under increasing strain, political as well as economic, to resolve the Afghan crisis, by ending the war, getting a withdrawal of Soviet troops and the return of some three million Afghan refugees, does increase the likelihood of an eventual agreement being reached at Geneva. But whether such a settlement would stick, let alone accomplish the voluntary return of all Afghan refugees from Pakistan and Iran, is quite another matter.

Much speculation has gone on in recent years by well-meaning regional specialists about the possible 'Finlandisation' of Afghanistan. This would be a very happy conclusion to the terribly destructive war, but it may be over-optimistic, even naive, to expect that this is really likely, given the fact that Afghanistan occupies the sensitive place it does along the Central Asian borders of the USSR—in the Soviet Union's 'backyard'. It will continue to be a matter for discussion and polemics whether there is a willingness on the part of the Soviet Union to compromise over Afghanistan's independence. Certainly it was easier for the Soviet Union to enter Afghanistan than to leave it, battered but still defiant. I think the Indian specialist, Professor Bhabani Sen Gupta, is more realistic in his recent assessment;

Afghanistan cannot be a Finland; there is no reason why the Soviets should have a Finland across its southern border in the mid-1980s, when they can have a fully-fledged pro-Soviet Marxist-ruled state with considerable future political and strategic implications for the sensitive regions of the Persian Gulf and South Asia.⁹

⁹ Bhabani Sen Gupta, Afghanistan. Politics, Economics and Society, London: Frances Pinter, 1986, p. 155.

SWAPO of Namibia: a movement in exile

'The world has forgotten us. We sit here and write our atrocity stories and no one cares.'
Editor of The Namibian, the Windhoek weekly newspaper.

Namibia has indeed been forgotten, despite the world's momentary interest in the prospects of change amidst turmoil in South Africa, Namibia's occupying power. The twenty-sixth of August 1986 marked the twentieth anniversary of the start of the guerrilla war waged by the South West Africa People's Organisation (SWAPO) against the South African occupation forces, estimated at between 50,000 and 100,000.

The twenty-sixth of August, which SWAPO commemorates annually as Namibia Day, is also a date of significance to the Herero community of central Namibia, who shared with the southerly Nama the brunt of German exploitation and even genocide when, from 1884 to 1915, their country was colonised as German South West Africa. On that date in 1923 their chief, who had died in exile, was buried at their sacred burial place at Okahandja, where a great gathering has been held annually ever since, to keep alive the spirit of Namibian independence.

At a pre-Namibia Day rally in Windhoek on Sunday, 24 August 1986, the main speaker, Mokganele Tlhabanelo of SWAPO, also Assistant General Secretary of the Council of Churches in Namibia, told the 8,000-strong gathering that the Namibians had taken up arms in 1966 against a background of colonial violence:

Was it SWAPO who in 1904 exterminated almost half the Herero speaking people, or was it General von Trotha? Was it SWAPO who in 1917 killed Chief Mandume and his men, or was it Louis Botha? Was it SWAPO who in 1922 killed the Bondelswarts nation in the South? On 10 December 1959, in the Old Location, many people were murdered. Was it by SWAPO?

Tlhabanelo called upon South Africa to accede to the cease-fire offered by SWAPO, since 'South Africa with all her sophisticated machinery cannot win this war,' after twenty years of 'attempting to wipe SWAPO off the face of the earth.' The veteran Acting President of SWAPO, Nathaniel Maxuilili, read a message from the exiled President, Sam Nujoma, threatening a general strike 'which will cripple Botha's regime in Namibia'. Maxuileli, whose courageous bearing during over twenty years of house arrest and banning was an inspiration to many Namibians, remarked that while the then South African Prime Minister, P W Botha 'saw fit to call SWAPO a terrorist organisation, he himself was terrorising the whole of the sub-continent.'¹

The speeches, the celebration of Namibia Day, and the enduring armed struggle by guerrillas drawn from Namibia's small population of 1.5 million, underline both the determined nationalism that has motivated the long resistance to foreign occupation, and its continuity. The Nujoma message read by his substitute, Maxuileli, also emphasises the twenty years of interaction between on the one hand, the exiled body of SWAPO leaders and followers and on the other, the mass of membership and local leaders within Namibia. A major obstacle the Namibians have had to surmount has, however, been the indifference and ignorance regarding them that has enabled South Africa to keep the United Nations at bay for forty years, including the last twenty years of illegal occupation.

The twenty-year struggle towards independence led by SWAPO was inspired at the outset both by an acute sense of economic deprivation and racial oppression, and by the determination of Namibians in exile to recover their lost sovereignty. Much has been written of the extreme form of colonial exploitation which the South Africans have maintained, as successors to the Germans, for half a century.² It has been in defence of their own share in this exploitation that the USA, Britain and West Germany have constantly weakened efforts by the UN to bring it to an end: this aspect, too, has been studied with some thoroughness. The role of South Africa, both political and military, in Namibia is equally the subject of much analysis.³ This ground is not covered below, except in so far as it has a direct bearing on the theme of this article, the rise of SWAPO as a movement in exile. It is hoped that this chronological recital will convey some of the character of SWAPO, of the forces that have moulded that character, and of its impact on a world only too ready to ignore the intractable problem posed by South Africa's illegal occupation of Namibia.

¹ Namibia Communications Centre, London Release, Windhoek, 25 August 1986: 'Commemoration of Namibia Day in Windhoek'

² See Tore Linné Eriksen, The Political Economy of Namibia: An Annotated, Critical Bibliography, Uppsala: The Scandinavian Institute of African Studies, 1985. Two useful summaries are: R H Green, M L and K Kiljunen (eds), Namibia. The Last Colony, London: Longman, 1981; SWAPO Department of Publicity and Information, To Be Born a Nation, London: Zed Press, 1981

³ Eriksen, The Political Economy of Namibia, pp 107-71, 244-56.

Origins of exile

The will to end their exile, even within the borders of South West Africa, was a driving force for the Hereros from the days of their destruction as a nation in 1904, by the Germans. The prayer of their aged chief, Hosea Kutako, whose life spanned both the German-Herero War of 1904-46, and the pre-Sharpeville Windhoek shootings of 1959, poignantly expressed the reality of their dispossession, first by the Germans and from 1915 by South Africa, then still a British dominion: 'O Lord, help us who roam about. Help us who have been placed in Africa and have no dwelling place of our own. Give us back our dwelling place'.⁴ A few thousand Hereros escaped General von Trotha's 'extermination order' of 1904 (recalled by Tlhabanelo at the Windhoek meeting), some of them taking up exile where their descendants remain, in what is now Botswana. In 1947 they asked the Reverend Michael Scott in South Africa to gather evidence among the Namibians remaining under South African rule to disprove the claim made to the United Nations by their rulers, that they were willing to be incorporated into South Africa. Thus, it was through the efforts of exiles that Namibians themselves were able to bring the issue of Namibia to the attention of the UN, despite the virtual imprisonment of the majority of their own country, and the exile of many more.

The rise of a sense of nationhood among the Namibians and of colonial independence throughout the world further stimulated resistance to South African rule. The Namibians knew themselves to be wards of the world community, whose duty it was to free them from the control of a power, mandated by the defunct League of Nations to administer their territory after the defeat of Germany in 1945. To the old oppression of contract labour, the denial of education, and a catalogue of economic hardships, was added the apartheid policy in 1948, which was to increase their burdens beyond endurance. Some, like the young railway worker Sam Nujoma, were first aroused to revolt by the realisation of the low value placed upon Namibians as human beings.⁵ Others, especially from Ovamboland in the north, were awakened by the discrimination against their fellow-workers in the labour market, which forced them to submit to paupers' wages, brutal treatment and the total lack of rights through the hated contract labour system. Despite the denial of education and the harsh repression of suspected 'trouble-makers', the workers' compounds became seed-beds for political growth in the 1950s.⁶

⁴ Michael Scott, A Time to Speak, London: Faber and Faber, 1958, p 266.

⁵ Liberation Support Movement (ed), Namibia: SWAPO Rights for Freedom, Oakland, California: LSM Information Center, 1978.

Some from the north broke their labour contracts and moved illegally into South Africa. In the still relatively liberal atmosphere of Cape Town in the late 1950s, one of them, Andimba Toivo ja Toivo, was to take the lead in forming the Ovamboland People's Congress, later part of the Ovamboland People's Organisation (opo) in Windhoek. The leaders, notably the President of opo and dynamic labour organiser, Sam Nujoma, were prominent in opposing the forced removal of residents of the Old Location in Windhoek to the new, apartheid-style 'townships' of Katutura. This opposition led to the events of 10 December 1959 in Windhoek, which left twelve peaceful demonstrators dead and forty-five injured in a hail of bullets. The organisers were subjected to imprisonment or banishment: Sam Nujoma was among those who escaped across the border.⁷

During 1960 many young political activists who had escaped from white-ruled South Africa were welcomed in Dar es Salaam, then the nearest independent African capital. A number of the Namibians among them appeared in New York soon afterwards, as petitioners who had followed Michael Scott to the United Nations. These early Namibian exiles were from the South West African National Union, (SWANU) founded by students in 1959, and from opo, renamed and reconstituted as the South West Africa People's Organisation (SWAPO) in April 1960. SWANU was seen as sophisticated, perhaps elitist, and Peking-orientated; SWAPO as inexperienced, populist and non-aligned. Both were recognised internationally and were drawn into the 'Casablanca' or 'Monrovia' groupings with, for the most part, artificial doctrinal differences.

A clear line of demarcation was to appear in 1964, however, when the Liberation Committee of the newly formed Organisation of African Unity (oau) put to each a straight question as to their preparedness to take up arms against the South Africans occupying their country. The unequivocal 'yes' from SWAPO led to its recognition, and SWANU's refusal to the withdrawal of oau support.⁸ In the years that followed, this recognition was justified by the growth of SWAPO to its present status as the 'sole and authentic representative of the Namibian people'⁹ in the eyes of the UN General Assembly and of the vast majority of its constituent member-states.

⁶ Vinnia Ndadi, Breaking Contract. The Story of Vinnia Ndadi, Richmond, British Columbia: LSM Press, 1974, passim.

⁷ John Ya Otto, Battlefront Namibia. An Autobiography, London: Heinemann, 1981, pp 49-54.

⁸ Peter Katjavivi, 'The Rise of Namibian nationalism and its international dimensions', Unpublished D Phil thesis, University of Oxford, 1986, p 165. A different viewpoint can be seen in Richard Gibson, African Liberation Movements: Contemporary Struggles against White Minority Rule, London: Oxford University Press, 1972, pp 123-4.

An initial congress of the party in 1960 had elected Nujoma President and Nathaniel Maxuulili, already a popular symbol of national resistance, Acting President in Nujoma's absence abroad. This policy was followed with other posts, the incumbent in exile always having an acting opposite number within the territory. The second Annual General Conference of the executive committee, held in Dar es Salaam in 1965, was concerned to improve communications with SWAPO headquarters in Windhoek, to tighten financial control as funds increased from the OAU, socialist countries and support groups in the West, and to streamline the functioning of the departments.¹⁰

The party in exile had made strides. Offices were established in Cairo and Algiers, and at the UN, with many more to follow. The leadership had undergone a hard apprenticeship, rapidly overcoming what might have been crippling disadvantages in terms of the Namibians' early isolation and lack of educational opportunities. Observers were impressed with the dedication, high principles and self-discipline displayed by most of the SWAPO leaders, qualities soon lost by many other exiled politicians. These leaders have survived two decades of exile, leaving others to return to Namibia on South Africa's terms.

The work of SWAPO in exile seemed in these early years to be a very minor affair compared to the momentous events in train among the UN member-states, whose judges at the International Court of Justice deliberated on Namibia's future. The issue had first come before the Hague Court as a result of South Africa's refusal initially to hand the territory over to the UN Trusteeship Council, and later even to acknowledge its duties under the League of Nations mandate. An Advisory Opinion favourable to Ethiopia and Liberia, who claimed the right as League members to seek a 'contentious judgment' on South West Africa, was followed in 1966 by calamity. The World Court reversed its earlier opinion, and years of argument were nullified as it ruled that Ethiopia and Liberia had no locus standi and that the case was thus inadmissible. The circumstances (in which the Australian presiding judge gave the casting vote destroying the case) were almost as damaging to the reputation of the Court as to the object of the hearings. Those who had for years prevailed upon SWAPO to await the judgment of the Court as the first, essential step before the UN could prepare the Namibians for independence, were confounded. To SWAPO it immediately became clear, as Ja Toivo was to put it, that 'we could secure our freedom only by fighting for it.'¹¹

⁹ UN General Assembly Resolutions 3111 (1973), 31/146 (1976).

¹⁰ Katjavivi, Rise of Namibian Nationalism, p 164.

Launching the armed struggle

On 18 July 1966 Sam Nujoma announced that SWAPO had taken up arms against South Africa, proclaiming 'we must at once begin crossing the many rivers of blood on our march towards freedom.'¹² Training had begun earlier and in August 1966 the first units had penetrated northern Namibia through the Caprivi Strip, following the long trek from Tanzania. On 26 August 1966 an engagement with South African forces at Omgulumbashe led to the killing of two guerrillas and the capture of twenty-seven. The following May the guerrilla commander, Tobias Hainyeko, was killed in action crossing the Zambezi river. In 1968 the prisoners taken at Omgulumbashe and other internal leaders, including Ja Toivo, were by means of retrospective legislation, put on trial for their lives in Pretoria. Death sentences were narrowly averted as a result of world pressure and twenty-nine of the thirty-two were sent to Robben Island prison with long sentences, twenty of them for life.¹³

SWAPO had had a very short life inside Namibia before many of its leaders had escaped abroad. Conditions for its survival inside the territory were grim indeed. As in the dark post-Sharpeville years in South Africa, the security police in Namibia had a free hand in dealing with African political activists. There was, though, a difference: SWAPO did not suffer the bans which virtually closed down the ANC and Pan Africanist Congress (PAC) in South Africa for a dozen years. South Africa, while repudiating the League Mandate, paid lip-service to its provisions by concentrating its troops inside the 100 square miles of Walvis Bay, to which it laid territorial claim, and by allowing SWAPO and other smaller parties to exist. Their existence was made precarious, however, by the proscription of leaders such as Maxuilili, by the jailing of Ja Toivo and others, and by the repression in the Katutura compound outside Windhoek and in all urban locations. In the heavily populated north, indirect rule was harshly maintained through traditional chiefs and councillors protected by armed bodyguards, together the enemies of the rural SWAPO activists.

¹¹ Statement, Supreme Court of Republic of South Africa, Pretoria, 26 January 1968.

¹² Statement, SWAPO Provisional Headquarters, Dar es Salaam, 18 July 1966.

¹³ Andimba Ja Toivo was released unconditionally in 1984 as were the other prisoners at later dates. In 1985 Ja Toivo was elected, unopposed, to the vacant post of Secretary-General of SWAPO.

Abroad, the handicaps were immense. In addition to a lack of training, experience and learning, their numbers were small: an important consultative conference held at Tanga in Tanzania in 1969, was attended by thirty members. Ignorance of their cause was so great that they had constantly to demand for it recognition other than as a South African minority issue. Yet they rose instantly to the military challenge presented by the World Court débâcle, and turned the disasters that followed into rallying calls for national regeneration. As with the establishment of 26 August as Namibia Day, the memory of their first commander, Hainyeko, as a national hero was kept alive, and the Namibians with Ja Toivo on Robben Island were remembered as symbols of sacrifice and suffering for the cause of freedom.

Their human calibre commended SWAPO to the governments of countries friendly to their cause. Military training schemes were agreed with Algeria, Egypt, Ghana, North Korea, the Soviet Union and Tanzania, the majority of personnel being trained in Africa. New African missions were established in Congo (Brazzaville), Ethiopia, Nigeria, Senegal, Zambia (to which Provisional Headquarters were moved at the end of the 1960s) and, following their independence, Angola and Zimbabwe. Luanda succeeded Lusaka as Provisional Headquarters in 1979. In Europe, offices were opened in Britain (where in 1969 after the Tanga conference, the UK representative, Peter Katjavivi, was additionally charged with maintaining contact with the leadership inside Namibia), East Germany, France, Romania, Sweden, West Germany and Yugoslavia. Offices in New Delhi and Melbourne more recently extended SWAPO's reach to all five continents.

South Africa's presence outlawed

Many countries—notably in the Caribbean, West and Central Africa and Scandinavia—have assisted SWAPO, despite the ostensible remoteness to some of them of the Namibian cause. The start of the armed struggle enhanced the status of SWAPO in some countries, but it took another great event to bring the case for Namibian freedom into focus for many more. The collapse of the case at the World Court in 1966 was acclaimed by South Africa as a victory. It also stung the UN General Assembly into terminating the League Mandate under Resolution No. 2145 of that year, thereby placing the territory directly under the UN.

In 1967 the General Assembly, again without Security Council concurrence, set up the UN Council for Namibia as the de jure government of the territory, with a Commissioner as its executive, in 1968 renaming the territory Namibia. All these actions were belittled and rejected by South Africa's Western trading partners, which, with very few exceptions, did not apply to join the UN Council for Namibia. Britain, for one, still refuses to recognise the authority of the Council. Support for the measures taken by the General Assembly, and for Namibian independence as a popular issue, was lacking in many countries which have since developed popular links with SWAPO. Seeming to lack the courage of its convictions, the Assembly made no immediate attempt to fill the post of UN Commissioner for Namibia, and the Council appeared to have little purpose other than to undertake occasional 'safaris' to hear evidence from Namibians in exile and sundry experts on the issue.

At a time when African liberation movements were being corralled into one Cold War camp or the other, SWAPO was nominally in the 'Casablanca' group, together with the ANC of South Africa, FRELIMO of Mozambique, the MPLA of Angola and ZAPU of Southern Rhodesia. The party nevertheless maintained a highly distinctive non-aligned profile. It was as if the Namibians' long memory of foreign exploitation and a colonial oppression of singular harshness had bred a deep suspicion of the modern blandishments of powerful states. The SWAPO leaders, as Namibians the 'last at the feast' of modern development, perhaps felt themselves as yet ill-equipped to serve as equal partners with the imperial powers of East or West.

Rebuffed by the Americans and British, with whom they felt some affinity, SWAPO's leaders were apprehensive at the presumption of authority by the Soviet Union. An awareness that the African neighbours fighting for their own independence assumed that they were superior in numbers as well in education and experience fostered a degree of reserve towards the South African and Southern Rhodesian liberation movements. SWAPO thus maintained a separateness which helped to preserve the unity of its members while the other liberation movements in exile were often wracked with dissent. Yet, its isolation created its own problems. SWAPO was reluctantly obliged to depend for bases on newly-independent African states which had not undergone the bitter struggle facing the Namibians. From some Western bloc leaders came scarcely veiled hostility. United Nations support was largely confined to the General Assembly. The Western permanent members of the Security Council held aloof.

As if, however, to redeem its disgrace in 1966, the World Court at the request of the Security Council gave a crucial Advisory Opinion in June 1971:

The continued presence of South Africa in Namibia being illegal, South Africa is under obligation to withdraw its administration from Namibia immediately (and) member states of the UN are under obligation to recognize the illegality of South Africa's presence in Namibia . . . and to refrain from any acts . . . implying recognition of the legality of (the) administration.¹⁴

Despite in toto dissent from the British and French judges, the illegality of the South African occupation was clearly established. In the succeeding years the Security Council performed its belated duty in supporting the earlier actions of the General Assembly. In 1974, the first UN Commissioner for Namibia was appointed. He was the redoubtable Mr Sean McBride, later a Nobel Peace Prize winner, who brought to the office a creativity that his successors have seldom managed to reproduce.¹⁵

The contract labour strike

The event which mobilised world opinion towards a genuine understanding of the Namibian cause was not directly brought about either by SWAPO or by the UN. At the turn of the years 1971-2, a national strike by the Namibian contract labour force was engendered by the same forces which had ensured an immediate following for SWAPO at its inception. The strikers were neither articulate publicists nor skilled negotiators, but SWAPO, with its network of offices abroad and its publicity and information channels, energetically promoted their cause throughout the world. The strikers were forcibly returned to the north and, though a pretence was made of meeting their demands, the changes were for the most part minimal. Their sacrifice did, however, bear fruit outside.

The student and intellectual community was turning increasingly towards working-class interests and socialist loyalties, a trend which operated strongly in SWAPO's favour, provoking a heartening response to the exiled leaders' efforts. A Namibian International Conference held in Brussels in 1972 was enthusiastically supported by SWAPO's new constituency, in which support groups, new friends and valuable contacts rapidly proliferated. Above all, SWAPO, both in exile and internally, was put on the map. Here was a text-book example of a major worker's strike against a colonial-type oppressor. In support of this strike was a liberation movement with impeccable proletarian credentials, largely free of the bourgeois elements so often to be found in the forefront of similar movements.

¹⁴ Advisory Opinion of the International Court of Justice, 21 June 1971 (from Namibia: a Unique Responsibility, New York: United Nations, 1983, p 10).

¹⁵ Decree No. 1 for the Protection of the Natural Resources of Namibia, UN Council for Namibia, New York, 27 September 1974.

The contract labour strike, the 1971 Advisory Opinion and SWAPO's active campaigning on both issues helped to create an atmosphere conducive to action by the UN. In 1972-3 the Secretary-General, Dr Kurt Waldheim, and his representative, Dr Alfred Escher, visited Namibia and South Africa for talks with the South Africans and, to a much lesser extent, the Namibians. The initiative petered out and events surrounding SWAPO and its guerrillas (by now known as the People's Liberation Army of Namibia, or PLAN) began to revive the long process towards independence which was properly the historical and moral responsibility of the UN.

Internal resurgence, 1972-4

The infiltration of PLAN into northern Namibia threatened the power and credibility of the South African administration of Namibia to a degree that seems out of all proportion to the 'kill rate' or military successes of the insurgents. Much of the attack was directed against the traditional, government-supporting chiefs in Ovamboland, with whom the real battle for popular allegiance was being fought. News of PLAN actions quickly reached Windhoek and other population centres south of what was already becoming known as the War Zone. SWAPO support grew, especially among the young, who, ahead of their brothers in the Rand townships of South Africa, were becoming the spearhead of political attack on the South African occupation.

In 1972-4 SWAPO rallies and meetings in Katutura and Ovamboland were answered with harsh repression. The public flogging by tribal courts in Ovamboland of young SWAPO leaders, both men and women (totally unjustified, by any tradition of such vicious punishments, despite South African claims to the contrary), brought the state of affairs in Namibia into the world headlines, and to the attention of the UN, which demanded that these punishments cease. The SWAPO national chairman, David Meroro, was held and tortured: as with the floggings, one object was to prove links with PLAN which would justify the suppression of SWAPO internally, despite its status at the UN.¹⁵ The other object, of course, was to defeat PLAN, thus restoring the authority of the chiefs and of the South African regime behind them. In this way the indirect-rule, 'Bantustan' policy of apartheid could be developed in Namibia, whereby no fewer than eleven 'Native nations' would occupy less than half of the land surface, the whites retaining the major share. In 1975 the assassination, allegedly by PLAN cadres, of South Africa's main instrument in Ovamboland, the Chief Minister, Chief Philemon Elifas, was followed by a reign of terror among SWAPO supporters throughout Namibia which was reminiscent of the cruelties of the German colonial days.

SWAPO campaigned internationally for the defence of its officials, Aaron Mushimba and Hendrik Shikongo. The State nevertheless demanded—and initially achieved—the death penalty for their alleged connection with Elifas's killers. Special Branch filching of defence documents was, however, dramatically exposed almost at the last moment and the case was dismissed by the Appeal Court in South Africa. David Soggot, defence counsel in the Mushimba-Shikongo case wrote:

What was intended to strike a blow at the heart of Namibian nationalism ultimately strengthened it. The release of Mushimba, Shikongo and the two nurses was greeted by jubilant crowds in Windhoek. It was seen as a victory for SWAPO and the Namibian nationalist cause.¹⁶

The enthusiasm for SWAPO was also heightened by events north of the Kunene river, where, on 25 April 1974, the Portuguese flag was hauled down after nearly 500 years of dominating Angola. Inspired by this gain, numbers of committed young Namibians, many of them SWAPO Youth Leaguers, were ready to follow the example of the men and women of the early 1960s by continuing the struggle in exile.

External revolt

The opening of the Angolan border, a totally artificial one for the Kwanyama people who live on either side of it, transformed the opportunities both for PLAN, now able to penetrate the north through the Angola route, and for Namibians leaving their country. Within a matter of a few months nearly 4,000 people, perhaps 20 per cent of them women, made their way out of the country, many to join up with SWAPO in Lusaka, others as refugees from the horrors of the South African military presence in the north.

¹⁶ David Soggot, Namibia, the Violent Heritage, London: Rex Collings, 1986, pp 151–62.

The problems for the SWAPO officials in Lusaka were immense and their resources limited. There was also plainly a lack of imagination in their handling of the hot-blooded young men and women who had been in the forefront of the struggle in Windhoek and the other towns. These people had developed sophisticated political ideas and strategies virtually unknown to the first exiles of 1960, and they expected to be welcomed and accepted into the party's highest councils. As well as lacking proper accommodation and provisions, many of the Youth Leaguers took offence at the failure of the leadership to recognise their status. When stories of discontent in the PLAN camps reached the Youth Leaguers in Lusaka, and they found one or two of the old leaders willing to stand with them, the situation became extremely volatile.

Andreas Shipanga, Secretary for Information and Publicity, seemed the leader the Youth Leaders needed and, though with motives deemed by a later enquiry to be very different from their own, encouraged their revolt. The threat was defused by rapid action on the part of the Zambian Government, partly aimed at averting the kind of situation they had faced during a ZANU rebellion which had led to the assassination of the Secretary-General, Herbert Chitepo. Nine of the leaders, including Shipanga and the Secretary for Labour, Solomon Mifima, both original members of the OPC in Cape Town, were flown to Tanzania where no habeas corpus writ could be served. There they spent two years in detention. Six hundred of the rank-and-file Youth League rebels were rehabilitated while others chose not to return to SWAPO and were cared for by the UN High Commission for Refugees.

The rebellion had been successfully contained and the leaders imprisoned and neutralised. SWAPO's enemies, especially in Western capitals, made much of the incident, however, and Shipanga emerged from prison in 1978 to a hero's welcome in Britain and West Germany. A man of much urbanity and charm, Shipanga's popularity was high in the West, where the bluntness and apparent lack of fitness of Nujoma was held against him by politicians and diplomats who liked their African counterparts to be good company as well as good leaders. Yet at home in Namibia, the tenacity, dedication and integrity of Sam Nujoma survived constant onslaughts of adverse South African propaganda (and the almost obsessional desire of Prime Minister Vorster to bring him down), and SWAPO's rise continued unchecked. Shipanga's rival SWAPO-Democrats, which he led on his return to Namibia in 1979, failed to fulfil the promise of his Western backers' imaginings.

SWAPO was abused for the detentions and the relatively peaceful quelling of the revolt. No credit has been given for the Commission of Inquiry it held, perhaps because news of it had very limited circulation, within a virtually closed circle. The commission was chaired by John Ya Otto, a Central Committee member and former SWAPO official in Namibia, from which he had escaped during the great exodus. Ya Otto was to succeed Mifima as Secretary for Labour.¹⁷

While not directly addressing itself to the problems of absorbing the new arrivals from the Youth League, the Ya Otto Report dealt unequivocally with many other failings that were bound to be endemic in a movement so many years in exile. These failings ranged from the need for a new constitution and political programme to 'complacency, sheer laziness and lack of sense of urgency on the part of those in positions of leadership'. Among many other recommendations was that to eliminate 'the dichotomy between the political and military wings . . . all SWAPO members are soldiers. As a rule all SWAPO officials should spend at least two months a year at the front.' While the last sentence is unlikely to have been put into effect, the concept of the integration of the military and political functions in SWAPO was sensibly reiterated.

SWAPO's new programme

A new 'Constitution and Political Programme'¹⁸ did result, its publication preceding and upstaging South Africa's own puppet programme, propagated in the same year by the Democratic Turnhalle Alliance. The 'Discussion Paper' of 1975 setting out liberal ideals for a future constitution was followed, and to a great extent superseded, by the Political Programme agreed at the Nampundwe conference in 1976. The new Political Programme rectified the weakness that the Ya Otto commission had identified in the relationship of PLAN to the Executive, by formally constituting a Department of Defence and Transport, to ¹⁷ Katjavivi, Rise of Namibian Nationalism pp 396-401.

¹⁸ Constitution of the South West Africa People's Organisation (SWAPO) and Political Programme of the South West Africa People's Organisation (SWAPO), Lusaka: SWAPO Department of Information and Publicity, 1976. Current editions: Luanda, 1983.

whose Secretary (the late Peter Nanyemba) PLAN's commanders and Military Council reported.

The new Political Programme pledged SWAPO to 'unite all Namibian people, particularly the working class, the peasantry and progressive intellectuals into a vanguard party capable of safeguarding national independence and of building a classless, non-exploitative society based on the ideals and principles of scientific socialism'.¹⁹ Though now using the phraseology of Marxism, SWAPO had not strayed from the main aims of the OPO Constitution, among which were 'to secure and maintain the complete unity of the people of Ovamboland, Hereroland and Namaland' and 'to promote the political, social and economic emancipation of the people, more particularly those who depend directly upon their own exertion by hand, or by brain, for the means of life.'²⁰

The teachings of Marx, Lenin and Mao which accompanied much of the training in the socialist countries were expounded in the camps by Political Commissars, full members of the Military Council that reported to the Executive Committee or to the President as Commander-in-Chief. The Namibians had grown up with exploitation at its worst in the contract labour system, and had imbibed the egalitarian principles of Christianity in a country where the masses worshipped the living Christ. They were thus ready for those high principles of Marxism that spread so rapidly through Southern Africa in the 1970s.

SWAPO in exile interacted not only with its Namibian-based counterpart, but with church leaders, some of whom also sought or were driven into exile. Three Anglican Bishops were exiled in succession, Bishops Mize, Winter and Wood, the latter two making a particular deep impression on SWAPO with their Christian commitment. Black clergy were imprisoned and tortured. Lutheran leaders such as Bishop Auala and Bishop Dumeni confronted the illegal occupiers only to see their church property destroyed for their pains. Pastor Hendrik Witbooi and the American Methodist Episcopalian church leaders, Karuaera and Tjirimuje, brought an estimated 32,000 Namibians into the SWAPO fold, the present Catholic and Anglican Bishops and other leaders, black and white, were or are members or close allies of SWAPO. SWAPO, in turn, has valued the role of the Namibian churches at home, in the camps and abroad, whatever the materialism of Marxism may prescribe.

¹⁹ ibid.

²⁰ Constitution of the Ovamboland People's Organisation, Windhoek, 1959, 'Aims and Objects', pp 3, 6.

Consolidating the exodus

The great exodus of 1974 and onwards brought most of its participants into SWAPO's Health and Education Centres in Zambia and Angola. Nyango, the first of these, a farm given to SWAPO by the Zambian government in the early 1970s, had a population of 5,000 by 1978, with its own hospital. Many more were settled in Kwanza Sul in Angola, where schools, craft centres, and clinics were run largely by women refugees, most of the able-bodied men—and some women—undergoing military training. Many others went abroad as students under UN or Commonwealth schemes, to Britain, Cuba, Jamaica, Malta, Sierra Leone, and elsewhere. Among other local projects, the International Labour Organisation has opened a vocational training school, and the Norwegian Namibiaforeniging a secondary technical school (at Loudima in Congo Brazzaville). Also, a distance-learning literacy programme is in operation in the Angolan centres, partly financed by the Commonwealth Fund for Technical Co-operation.

The figure of 80,000 is quoted as the number of Namibians under SWAPO's control in Zambia and Angola—a major responsibility, not least in the realm of security. The first main SWAPO refugee centre was established outside a small mining town called Kassinga, at what was thought to be a safe distance, more than 150 miles north of the Namibian border. At the time of the troubles in Lusaka in 1974, there was relatively slow progress in the international arena. The UN Commissioner, Sean MacBride, greatly hastened the pace of development of the future Namibia by instituting in 1976 both the Nationhood Programme to prepare for government by Namibians, and the UN Institute for Namibia (UNIN) in Lusaka, to accelerate the training of Namibians in many administrative skills, as well as for remedial basic education programmes. Under the direction of SWAPO's former representative at the UN, Hage Geingob²¹ UNIN was essential to combat the demoralisation and neglect of education within Namibia, observable in many of the refugees and exiles.

²¹ Namibia: Perspectives for National Reconstruction and Development, Lusaka: UN Institute for Namibia, 1986.

Internal survival

Within Namibia the South African regime, anxious as always to buy time rather than face the imminent future, set about a new dispensation. SWAPO had held a national congress in Walvis Bay in May 1976, which confirmed the exiled leadership despite a propaganda offensive by the Administration. It was essential to render SWAPO politically harmless, and a number of South Africa's nominees were duly convened to meet in conclave in a Windhoek gymnasium called the Turnhalle to produce a new internal settlement. From the elections held in 1978 until it reached the height of its influence in 1980, the Democratic Turnhalle Alliance (DTA) worked hard to capture the initiative from SWAPO. Despite huge unattributed expenditures in vote-buying and the unconcealed support of the new Administrator-General, Judge M T Steyn, whose mistaken appointment had been intended as a sop to the West, SWAPO's support did not cease to grow. Even Afrikaner Nationalist sources estimated at the end of 1978 that the curiously precise figures of 83 per cent of Namibians identified themselves with SWAPO.²²

SWAPO was said to be dominated by Ovambos, who would oppress an independent Namibia if South Africa did not save the non-Ovambo half of the African population from this fate. Yet in 1977 Pastor Karuaera and Pastor Tjirimuje brought in an entire section of the Herero people, who had broken with Hosea Kutako's successor, Clemens Kapuuo. Once an ally of SWAPO, Kapuuo was keeping very suspect foreign company at the time of his assassination in 1978 (despite South Africa's accusations of SWAPO's complicity in his murder his family have rejected this suggestion).²³ These 17,000 Hereros, whose Association for the Preservation of the Tjamuaha-Maharero Royal House was disbanded, followed the four main Nama communities, under their traditional supreme chief, Pastor Hendrik Witbooi, great-grandson of Hendrik Witbooi who had led his people against the Germans with great valour and skill. Witbooi accepted the vice-presidency of SWAPO. All three men were able to travel out of Namibia and meet the SWAPO leaders and their friends abroad, receiving a wider and warmer public welcome than that accorded to the large party of DTA emissaries sent to the USA and Europe in an unsuccessful attempt to win support for the new regime.

²² Ivan Himmelhoch, 'ex-boss agent', The Star (Johannesburg) 21 August 1980 (in Soggot, Namibia, The Violent Heritage, p 285).

²³ Katjavivi, Rise of Namibian Nationalism, pp 257-8.

By 1983, P W Botha's Government had realised that continued support for the DTA was equivalent to throwing good money after bad, and despite vociferous protests from its most ambitious front man, the acknowledged leader of the white members of the Turnhalle, Mr Dirk Mudge (or 'Mudgorewa' to pro-SWAPO observers of the somewhat parallel Rhodesia-Zimbabwe situation), the Turnhalle chapter was closed, another victim of SWAPO's 'mysterious vitality'.²⁴

SWAPO's abiding success in Namibia could be attributed only in part to the work of its leaders at home. The regime made it as difficult as possible for them to operate. The acting President, Maxuulili, was under a seemingly perpetual banning order in Swakopmund. Bredan Simbwaye, first vice-president, leader of the Caprivi African National Union, with which SWAPO had merged in 1964, had been abducted back to Namibia and had there simply disappeared. Many officials, of whom the outstanding figure was Axel Johannes, had endured appalling periods of solitary confinement and torture. Weaker brethren were subject to bribes and blackmail which are hard to resist where the basic necessities of life are often only in the gift of the white man.

The endurance of so many SWAPO men and women was heroic, but they were sustained by the knowledge that throughout the world, and above all at the UN, there existed SWAPO offices with fellow Namibians working for their liberation, caring for the host of exiles (comprising a significant number within Namibia's 1.5 million population) offering education and training denied them at home. Similarly, in the bush and grasslands of Namibia were the freedom fighters, sacrificing everything in the fight against 'the Boers' occupying their country as the Germans had before them.

From Resolution 385 to 'linkage'

The protracted processes of the UN led at last to recognition by the Security Council of the illegality of South Africa's occupation of Namibia, and under Resolution 385 of 1976, to the demand for its withdrawal. This development was the product of many factors which had weakened South Africa's standing with its Western allies. The Afrikaner Nationalist Government had been forced onto the defensive by the Soweto uprisings of 1976, the first sign of losing the control that had been maintained ruthlessly since 1963 with the aftermath of the ²⁴ Soggot, Namibia, The Violent Heritage, p 179.

Sharpeville Emergency. The withdrawal of South Africa's invading column from an advanced position in Angola in 1975, and the US's moral vulnerability following Vietnam and Watergate, helped to create a conjunction of forces which instigated progress in the long haul towards Namibian independence.

Though the Western powers supported UNSC 385, they twice vetoed General Assembly measures aimed at enforcing it. Partly to avoid a third such 'triple veto', Andrew Young of the US Carter Administration, together with Dr David Owen, Britain's Labour Foreign Secretary, and their colleagues from France, West Germany and Canada, set about an initiative aimed at accomplishing South African withdrawal. These efforts would have failed in their aims had the strength of SWAPO's exiled leadership and its solidarity with the party inside Namibia not been incontrovertibly proven to the Western 'Five', all Security Council members at the time. Their acceptance of SWAPO as a negotiating partner could by no means have been taken for granted. SWAPO had long been the target of a series of dismissive charges by Western politicians and journalists: the Namibians must be saved from the Ovambo domination of SWAPO; external SWAPO was at odds with the 'internal wing'; Ja Toivo, on Robben Island, was the true leader and the membership considered Nujoma a usurper; PLAN actions in the war zone had alienated the local people; SWAPO was a Soviet catspaw; SWAPO was undemocratic and would force itself on Namibia undemocratically and create a one-party state. Most insidiously, SWAPO it was claimed, did not represent the Namibians at all and the erroneous nature of the 'sole and authentic representative' title conferred by the General Assembly obliged the Western powers to show equal favour to the numerous small parties whose existence the Turnhalle exercise had preserved. (In Southern Rhodesia, by contrast, the insurgents were constantly berated for their failure to speak with one voice but separately as ZANU and ZAPU.)²⁵

The single, major liberation movement of Namibia, whose members had fought and died in the war zone, or suffered cruelly at the hands of police and military gaolers and torturers, and which had represented the Namibians to the outside world for more than fifteen years was abused for claiming to speak for the Namibians. It must share its negotiating status with splinter groups and collaborators with South Africa. Paradoxically, SWAPO had repeatedly shown its willingness to enter into alliances with groups of smaller movements at home, refusing only, as with the DTA, when such groups were blatantly creations of the South African regime.

²⁵ Namibia Information Service, London, Releases.

The Five were now obliged to reverse their former dismissal of SWAPO and to proceed with negotiations. SWAPO, in turn, had to respond despite misgivings at the transfer of responsibility away from the UN to five of South Africa's main trading partners. The Five achieved early success and by 1978 had extracted agreement from both SWAPO and South Africa to the terms of what became UNSCR 435; the prescription, in very vague outline, for South Africa's withdrawal from Namibia.

Any secret hopes that South Africa might be concerned other than to deceive the Five by a show of negotiation were destroyed when South African paratroopers attacked the 'safe' and hence undefended refugee camp at Kassinga on 4 May 1978, killing 600 Namibians and wounding 1,000. The victims were largely women and children. Kassinga's name was added to the calendar of solemn Namibian days of re-dedication. The Western media, despite early reports and later UN confirmation of the nature of the raid, largely ignored this monstrous South African crime.²⁶

Delays, prevarication, and dissimulation by South Africa over the status of Walvis Bay, the number and location of SWAPO bases, the numbers of their own troops, de-militarised zones, and election processes were followed early in 1981 by a so-called 'pre-implementation' UN conference in Geneva. The DTA and their South African advisers were anxious to procrastinate while the new Reagan Administration formulated a policy on which they pinned high hopes.

The DTA successfully nullified all discussions by demanding an end to 'UN bias' towards SWAPO before any further steps could be taken. They had successfully played for time: the Reagan Administration duly rewarded South Africa by an act amounting to unprincipled treachery. In 1982 Vice-President George Bush, on an African tour, formally endorsed the 'linkage' of Cuban troop withdrawals from Angola to South Africa's departure from Namibia. The departure of the Cubans was to be a 'pre-condition' (and as such was eagerly seized upon by South Africa) for the implementation of Resolution 435.²⁷

²⁶ Remember Kassinga: Fact Paper on Southern Africa No. 9. London: International Defence and Aid Fund, 1981; To Be Born a Nation (see Note 2 above), pp 242-3.

²⁷ Vice-President George Bush: A New Partnership with Africa, Washington DC: US Information Service, 1982.

SWAPO's misgivings towards the Five were sadly proved to have been justified. South Africa's continued presence in Namibia was virtually guaranteed by Reagan's 'constructive engagement' policy towards South Africa, reinforced by 'linkage', however many shuttles, rounds of talks and missions Reagan's emissary, Dr Chester Crocker, might indulge in. 'Linkage' heralded the bleak period of the mid-1980s. Events in Namibia were almost totally obscured by the dramatic scenes of insurrection in South Africa. Namibia was nowhere mentioned in the report of the Eminent Persons Group (7 June 1986) to the Commonwealth Heads of Government. SWAPO was itself subject to a well-orchestrated attack from South African-financed offices abroad, which were promoting its latest 'internal settlement' move, the Transitional Government of National Unity formed out of the Multi-Party Conference, successors to the DTA.

South Africa's new offensive has not been exclusively directed at PLAN militarily, and internal and external SWAPO politically. Linked to the new attack is the story of the recent uncovering of agents infiltrated into PLAN and the camps, many of them broken by blackmail or threats to family hostages. SWAPO's neutralising of the agents is bad for South Africa but already the propaganda composed of stories of SWAPO's response is yielding dividends of another sort.

The SWAPO leaders in exile and at home, and the growing numbers of young trained men and women serving with them are not dismayed by the latest version of the long campaign to traduce their organisation. They have, despite a reservoir of good will towards the West at the outset, come to expect betrayal, neglect and contempt from, in particular, the USA, Britain and West Germany. Just as putting burglars in charge of the silver would be, entrusting the Five with negotiations for their independence from South Africa was never less than a source of the deepest distrust for SWAPO.²⁸

Yet, despite repeated accusations of intransigence against President Sam Nujoma and his able Secretary for Foreign Affairs, Theo-Ben Gurirab, SWAPO has, usually under pressure from the Frontline States, made concessions in order to allow the negotiating process to continue. To give but one example: at Lusaka in 1984, SWAPO endured a further meeting with South Africa's 'internal settlement' collaborators, jointly chaired by President Kaunda and South Africa's Administrator-General, which was as pointless as its predecessor at Geneva. When sections of the Multi-Party Conference (the radical wing of SWANU, and the Damara Chiefs Council) chose to sit with SWAPO as one bloc, SWAPO yielded yet again to pressure and agreed to negotiate alone.

²⁸ Among the most glaring, almost symbolic, justifications for such distrust is the management by the Rio Tinto Zinc Corporation of the Rössing uranium mine and the supply of uranium to British Nuclear Fuels, in clear defiance of UN Decree No. 1 of the UN Council for Namibia, which forbids such export, except under licence. See Alun Roberts, The Rössing File: The Inside Story of Britain's Secret Contract for Namibian Uranium, London: Namibia Support Committee Campaign Against the Namibian Uranium Contracts, 1980, pp 34-8

SWAPO's ceasefire offer is almost permanently on the table, and was reiterated in Vienna on 7 July 1986. Addressing the UN International Conference for the Immediate Independence of Namibia, President Sam Nujoma said:

Already in 1978, I signed and deposited a letter with the Office of the Secretary-General, expressing SWAPO's readiness, which I have repeated several times since, to sign a cease-fire with Pretoria as a first step in the implementation of Resolution 435. As we approach August 1, which is offered [by South Africa] as a possible date for implementing the UN Plan, I wish to state, once again, that SWAPO is ready, provided that no irrelevant and diversionary elements are introduced.

Cease-fire letters had long since been prepared by the UN Secretary-General's office for the signature of both SWAPO and Pretoria. Pretoria's letter remains, of course, unsigned and 1 August 1986 has come and gone—another meaningless date in the twenty years of deception and stalling since the termination of the League Mandate, or the ten years since UNSCR 385. The record should be closely studied by those who would like to believe that, in South Africa, Pretoria will seriously negotiate with SWAPO's old ally, the African National Congress. Western attempts at negotiations with South Africa over the apartheid crisis which has intensified since 1984 have been exposed in all their futility. SWAPO's decision of twenty years ago to take up arms has now, in principle, been vindicated.

SWAPO's preparedness to make concessions should be interpreted not as weakness but as the strength drawn from the certainty of its unassailable position in Namibia, twenty-six years after its executive went into exile. Its parallel organisation outside the country, President, Central Committee, PLAN, Youth League, Women's Council, Elders' Council and the National Union of Namibian Workers, has maintained high morale through the long years of exile. The capacity to endure was hard earned by the parents and grandparents of the present leaders, and they know that, despite their unceasing demands for immediate independence and their relative readiness for it, time is unquestionably on their side.

Sam Nujoma, as a small child, saw South African bombers flying overhead on their way to bomb the capital of the patriot northern chief, Ipumbu Tshilongo, in 1932. The old people of that time had lived most of their lives before the Germans colonised central and southern Namibia. The century since that disastrous event was aptly commemorated in 1984 with conferences in London and at the United Nations. In the end the illegal South African occupation will cease and the first of SWAPO's stated objectives will be met: 'to fight relentlessly by all possible means, for the immediate and total liberation of Namibia from colonial and imperialist occupation.'²⁹

SWAPO's growth from the mustard seed of 1960 to its present influence and position—UN observer status, full diplomatic recognition by the Non-Aligned States, its links with the Commonwealth and membership of UN agencies as well as regional bodies such as the Southern African Development Co-ordination Conference (SADCC)—has not been achieved without a daring and determination not commonly found in long-exiled liberation movements. Interaction with 'internal SWAPO' had assisted the process, and so, even more, has the commitment to the armed struggle, now in its twenty-first year of 'low intensity' warfare, by tying up 100,000 South African and Namibian troops and conscripts. At the Vienna conference, Sam Nujoma linked their struggle with the 'grave situation now facing our comrades, brothers and sisters in South Africa, who are courageously fighting and dying, under the leadership of the African National Congress, to end apartheid and replace it with a just, democratic and non-racial society . . . on the principle of one person, one vote'. He asked the conference whether the world was going to allow the Botha regime 'a repeat performance' of its treatment of its own citizens under the State of Emergency in South Africa. Would the South Africans continue to have a free hand in killing citizens of the black majority in Namibia by 'turning off all the lights' through the intimidation of foreign and local press?' He continued:

The answer is no. Nazism and fascism were defeated not by any constructive engagement or shuttle diplomacy. The world declared war, mobilised human and material resources worldwide and brought Hitler and his followers to their knees. That is the answer.

He reminded the Europeans and Americans that 'Africans crossed over the oceans and died to save Europe from Nazism.' Perhaps recalling the exploits of Afrikaner Nazis such as Robey Leibbrandt, who was brought from Nazi Germany to South Africa via the Namaqualand coast in 1941, he juxtaposed African servicemen (such as Secretary-General Ja Toivo and the Secretary of the SWAPO Elders Council, Simon Kaukungua) against 'the Afrikaner terrorists, whom you are today supporting and honouring'. They 'also came over, on the side of Hitler, killing your people and occupying your lands. Fascism is fascism, whether the victims are white or black.'³⁰ In such a statement can be seen the nature of SWAPO's ultimate requirement of the nations of the world, whose ward in international law their country remains. Its spirit also informs SWAPO's acceptance of the fact that, should their requirement not be met, and should the Namibians continue to be forgotten, they must fight on alone.

²⁹ Constitution (1983), 'Aims and Objectives', B(1).

³⁰ Address by Comrade Sam Nujoma, President of SWAPO, UN International Conference for the Immediate Independence of Namibia, Vienna, 7-11 July 1986, pp 12-13.

ANNABELLE SREBERNY-MOHAMMADI AND ALI
MOHAMMADI

Post-revolutionary Iranian exiles: a study in impotence

*'There was a reason to fear that, like Saturn, the Revolution might devour each of its children in turn.'*¹

An estimated two million people have left Iran for exile since the tumultuous days of the popular revolution of 1978-9 which culminated in the establishment of the Islamic Republic. Like many previous post-revolutionary epochs, a sizeable segment of this exile population comprises the 'children of the revolution', those who were actively involved in the popular movement against the Pahlavi regime and who subsequently found themselves once again in active opposition to a regime which was intolerant of their views, and who sought refuge and a base for renewed political activity outside the country. We consider briefly the immediate post-revolutionary context and the reasons for the development of opposition in exile.

The revolutionary transition and the post-revolutionary diaspora

The sixteenth January 1979 was a day of great rejoicing across Iran. Mohammad Reza Pahlavi, the second Pahlavi shah who had styled himself Light of the Aryans and Farmandeh, Commander-in-Chief, of the Great Civilisation, had been forced to leave the country, ostensibly on 'holiday' but never to return. The massive popular movement, a coalition of many classes, interests and ideologies, had achieved its central goal, the removal of a corrupt and despotic monarchy. But the moment of triumph was also the moment of fragmentation. The popular movement suddenly lost its cohesion, the unity of negative opposition, and began to divide into countless parties, groups and orientations as discussion developed about the future shape of the Iranian polity.

¹ Pierre Verginiaud, 1753-93, quoted in Lamartine, Histoire des Girondins, Book XXXVIII, Ch 20.

By 11 February 1979, with the proclamation of the Islamic Republic under the symbolic leadership of Ayatollah Khomeini, fundamental questions about Iran's future political shape were raised and fundamental divisions within the popular movement were already visible. Issues of political expression and participation, economic restructuring, the rights of women and minorities, which had motivated many to participate in the popular mobilisation, became the focus of bitter disputes and the basis of political manoeuvring for power.

The Islamic Republican Party (IRP), created by Ayatollah Beheshti, Hojjat-ol-Eslams Rafsanjani and Khamenei, rapidly began to dominate and control the new political system in which Khomeini was no longer a mere charismatic leader but the Vali-ye Faqih, the supreme religious jurist with power above and beyond the scope of the new Islamic Constitution. An extreme religious fundamentalism began to spread through all institutions, organisations and cultural arenas. The brief 'Tehran Spring' of free and open discussion, publishing and meetings was broken by the summer of 1979 with the banning of anti-clerical publications, attacks on secular assemblies and a new atmosphere of repression.

Mehdi Bazargan, the first Prime Minister of the new Republic, found himself trying to hold together many newly created and competing power centres, but possessing little authority himself. In November 1979 students of the Imam's line occupied the US embassy in response to America's admittance of the Shah for medical treatment. This crisis became a diversion from many critical domestic issues, establishing the 'Great Satan' of the USA as the source of Iran's woes, and creating yet another populist Islamic grouping which challenged the more moderate line of Bazargan. This new political climate of militant Islam allowed the further silencing of critics, and the elimination of many sincere participants in the revolutionary process, as Westernized 'tie-wearers', agents of imperialism or Zionism, or simply as anti-Islamic.

Different waves of opposition have moved into exile, from various monarchists who fled even before the revolution had finally succeeded, to religious liberals and secular and socialist elements who found no room for their political activity in the new republic. A younger generation of asylum-seekers is even now fleeing conscription into the interminable war with Iraq.

Mapping out the groups of political exiles active against the Islamic Republic is like trying to describe a perpetually moving kaleidoscope of changing political patterns and colours. In this article we focus on the major clusters of political activists in exile, analysing their reasons for opposing the Islamic Republic, the trajectories of their politics in exile and their recent and current activities. We end by considering the efficacy of these groupings, and describing some scenarios for the future.

The major exile groupings

The Council of National Resistance

The Council of National Resistance was created in October 1981 in Paris. It consisted of major political groups and individuals who had supported the formation of the Islamic Republic, playing brief political roles in its early years, only to find themselves isolated and suffocated in the renewed atmosphere of Islamic repression, and eventually forced into exile. The Council included the Mojahedin-e-Khalq under Massoud Rajavi, the Kurdish Democratic Party of Iran under Abdul-Rahman Qassemlou, the National Democratic Front under Hedayat Matin-Daftari, the United Left of small socialist groupings, and Abolhassan Bani-Sadr.

Initially the Mojahedin, the major Islamic guerrilla group during the time of the Shah, supported the Islamic Republic, participating in the referendum of March 1979 and campaigning for Massoud Rajavi to be elected to the new Council of Experts in August 1979. He was not elected. The Mojahedin were supportive of the seizure of the US embassy in November 1979, increasing their demands for the severing of all economic, political and military treaties with the US. Followers of Shariati and his critique of the reactionary clergy, the Mojahedin had a considerable popular following among lower middle-class students, the petty bourgeoisie and the working class, and rapidly developed a populist critique of the IRP's monopolisation of power and suppression of debate. They talked of two kinds of Islam, the clerical form associated with class and exploitation, and an authentic, popular form which would triumph over the former. In January 1980, Rajavi decided to run for President but was considered ineligible by Khomeini and prevented from pursuing his candidacy. Within a year of the popular movement's success, the Mojahedin were warning of a creeping fascism which deprived people of their civil liberties while amassing power in the name of Islam. The regime replied by labelling the Mojahedin as hypocrites, monafeqin, apostates, and as an even worse threat than the Marxists. The clergy-supported take-over of the American embassy in Tehran in November 1979 not only aimed to strengthen the IRP against the liberal elements in the government headed by Bazargan, but was also used to portray the IRP as a revolutionary force and thus win over the massive student following of the Mojahedin.

Unlike Rajavi, Abolhassan Bani-Sadr, one of the triumvirate who had worked closely with Khomeini in Paris during the popular mobilisation, was allowed to run for President and was endorsed by Ayatollah Pasandideh, Khomeini's elder brother. Bani-Sadr was elected by some eleven million votes, 75 per cent of the popular vote, far outstripping the 500,000 votes of the contending IRP candidate. However, the IRP managed to dominate the elections to Parliament, amid widespread charges of election rigging and fraud, and their man, Rajai'i, became Prime Minister; the party also controlled the broadcasting media, and enjoyed the cooperation of the revolutionary guards, the Reconstruction Crusade and other old and new Islamic organisations, thus increasingly isolating the President from any formal political base. While sharing their anti-imperialist stance, Bani-Sadr proffered a more radical nationalisation programme than the IRP cared for, and through his newspaper Islamic Revolution (Enghelab-e Eslami) he argued against the growing atmosphere of clerical dominance, political repression and torture, and censorship and violent 'cultural revolution' particularly in the universities. Bani-Sadr, himself the son of an ayatollah and like Ali Shariati concerned with developing an Islamic modernism, also identified with the National Front legacy of Mossadeq and Bazargan, and aimed to bridge the widening gap between the secular modern middle-class and the Islamic Republic. The National Front and sections of the bazaar as well as other groups increasingly opposed to the clerical regime, such as the Mojahedin, minority Fedayin and Maoist Rangbaran, expressed solidarity with Bani-Sadr's fight against clerical intolerance in the spring of 1981. His rallies and speeches were the occasions for violent confrontations with Hezbollahi supported by the IRP, which worked hard to isolate and dislodge him.² After a long struggle, in May 1981, Khomeini dismissed Bani-Sadr, the first elected President of the Islamic Republic, from his position as Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces, and the Parliament impeached and later dismissed him, dealing a crushing blow to all moderate and left groupings. When no military uprising or popular force came to his aid, Bani-Sadr was forced underground.

² Further details about this period can be found in Shaul Bakhash, The Reign of the Ayatollahs, New York: Basic Books, 1984.

On 29 July 1981, Bani-Sadr and Rajavi together fled Iran for Paris. In October 1981 the Council of National Resistance (CNR) was established as an umbrella opposition grouping intended to unite all 'freedom-loving' Iranians. A provisional government of the Islamic Democratic Republic declared itself ready to take charge after the overthrow of Khomeini, with Bani-Sadr to be reinstated as President and Rajavi as head of the provisional government. The Council proclaimed the need to return power to the hands of the Iranian people, and argued that this provisional government was a temporary measure until a new and acceptable constitution, elections and parliament could be established; the provisional government was considered to derive its legitimacy from the just popular resistance to the 'reactionary Khomeini regime' which denied the Iranian people their hard-won rights. Yet this hastily written accord between Bani-Sadr and Rajavi embodied its own exclusionary clause, reflecting their own political elitism and desire for power, and failed to attract the support of very many exile groups.

In December 1981 the Kurdish Democratic Party of Iran (KDPI) led by Qassemlou, and the National Democratic Front of Hedayat Matin-Daftari, did join the Council. Jointly they called for the establishment of a Democratic Islamic Republic supported by a nationwide system of people's councils, for the nationalisation of foreign trade and for the revival of national industries, egalitarian land reform, and guaranteed rights for women, non-Persian nationalities and religious minorities.³ The Council maintained respect for private property and capital as long as private wealth was not excessive, did not contribute to 'dependence', was not 'harmful' to society, and was nationalistic not comprador in nature. A special concern for the interests of the lower middle classes, shop keepers and artisans, small merchants and civil servants, was acknowledged. CNR was financially supported by some prominent bazaaris who also sought exile in France; it also maintained contacts, particularly with Mojahedin cells, inside Iran.

Rajavi vehemently argued that Khomeini's regime could not be changed by peaceful means and declared the start of mass armed struggle against it.⁴ In the summer of 1981 street warfare broke out in

³ Platform of the Provisional Government of the Democratic Islamic Republic of Iran, Muslim Students Society, Long Beach, California, 1981.

⁴ Paper of the Islamic Student Organisations in Europe and America, Nashriye-Anjomanhay-e-Daneshjooyane-Mosalmâne-europa va Emrika, No 21, 8 January 1981.

Tehran between urban guerrillas, mainly Mojehedin, and the regime's forces of the Islamic revolutionary guards, the pasdaran, and Hezbollahi. Terror tactics against the Islamic Republic were stepped up. On 28 June 1981 a huge bomb in IRP headquarters effectively demolished the party leadership, killing the Secretary-General, Ayatollah Mohammad Beheshti, four cabinet ministers, six ministerial under-secretaries, twenty-seven parliamentary deputies and many other party and government officials. On 30 August 1981 a second bomb in the prime minister's offices killed Mohammad-Ali Raja'i, the President who had replaced Bani-Sadr, Bahonar, the Prime Minister and party chief, and Dastgerdi, the Chief of Police. A week later Qodussi, the revolutionary prosecutor-general, was killed in yet another bomb blast. Prayer-leaders in Tabriz, Kerman, Shiraz, Yazd and Kermanshah were killed, as were the governor-general of Gilan province, the warden of Evin prison, the IRP ideologue, Hasan Ayat, various revolutionary judges and more Majles deputies. Fedayeen Minority and Paykar (Maoist) members also went underground to take up arms, and the Union of Communists, Ettahadi-ye Kommunist-ha tried unsuccessfully to capture Amol, a town in the northern province of Mazandaran, at the cost of over seventy lives.

Immediately, and for the next eighteen months, the Islamic Republic answered violence with violence, armed struggle with brutal repression: demonstrations were suppressed, publications seized, safe houses raided, and prisons crammed with political prisoners. Executions became the normal procedure of revolutionary justice. The Mojahedin has documented over 7,700 deaths through executions, street battles or torture in the period June 1981–September 1983, and suggests the real figure is closer to 20,000 deaths. The urban guerrilla groups were shattered, and prominent among those killed were Moussa Khiabani, the head of Mojahedin guerrilla operations in Iran, and Massoud Rajavi's wife. Subsequently, and with what many felt was undue haste, the political relationship between Bani-Sadr and Rajavi was sealed in the marriage of Bani-Sadr's daughter to Rajavi.

Mojahedin have been active in canvassing opinion and soliciting funds abroad in order to support their efforts. They have secured endorsements by American congressmen and senators, British members of Parliament and French intellectuals, and have periodically organised small but dramatic demonstrations in many cities, including Washington, Vienna, London, New Delhi and Karachi.

However, the Council's political honeymoon was not destined to last.

Major splits developed in 1984-5, the most crucial being between Rajavi and Bani-Sadr. In January 1984 Rajavi held meetings in Paris with Tariq Aziz, the Foreign Affairs Minister of Iraq. Bani-Sadr opposed this move and resigned from the Council, later accusing Rajavi of being a fifth column of the Iraqis and a traitor to Iran, as well as an opportunist and liar. The split between the two men was sealed when Rajavi and Bani-Sadr's daughter were divorced. He then married the former wife of his second-in-command and made her co-leader, arguing that this action demonstrated the Mojahedin's acceptance of gender equality.

Conflict also developed between Qassemlou, the leader of the Kurdish Democratic Party of Iran, and Rajavi. The Kurds had participated in the popular mobilisation against the Pahlavi regime, and after its fall had presented a programme of demands to the provisional government of the fledgling republic which included self-determination for all Iran's peoples within a federal state.⁵ Clashes between the Kurds and the central government erupted into full-scale struggle in the summer of 1979, yet when Iraq invaded Iranian territory the KDPI proposed a cease-fire and a collaboration against the Iraqis provided that the central government would accede to its demands. Instead the central government fought both the Kurds and the Iraqis, and the KDPI joined the Council of National Resistance while also becoming increasingly dependent on Iraq for aid. The overthrow of the Khomeini regime became its chief goal, even taking precedence over any specifically Kurdish demands, and until 1983 the KDPI managed to control extensive 'liberated' areas in Kurdistan. But the Islamic Republic forces regained this territory in the summer of 1983, and the KDPI moved its headquarters into Iraq. But in 1984, perhaps recognising that the opposition to the Islamic Republic was not gaining much ground, the KDPI decided to try once more to negotiate with the Islamic Republic. This created a major clash in the CNR particularly with Rajavi, and the KDPI left the Council in January 1985.

Exile politics are not readily separable from international politics. In May 1986 a visit to Paris by the Iranian Deputy Prime Minister fuelled speculation about new attempts to normalise relations between the two countries. Iran pressed three demands: the extradition of certain Iranian exiles whom the Islamic Republic considers to be 'terrorists', widely acknowledged to mean the Mojahedin; the return of the $1 billion dollars which the Shah had invested in a French nuclear reprocessing plant, a deal from which the Islamic Republic withdrew; and the cessation of the supply of French armaments to the Iraqis. The French, in return, wished the Islamic Republic to use its influence among Shi'ite groups in Lebanon to secure the release of the French hostages held there. Clashes between Mojahedin supporters and minority Fedayin at Rajavi's headquarters in the suburbs of Paris, created local resentment and triggered the new right-wing French government's action against the Mojahedin which was also aimed at improving relations with the Islamic Republic. In the first week of June 1986, French police descended on Mojahedin headquarters in Auvers-sur-Oise, and within hours Rajavi together with his entourage were on a private plane heading for Baghdad where he was accorded vip treatment. His one-time political comrade, Bani-Sadr, declared Rajavi's move to be like 'a dead man committing suicide'.⁶ Rajavi nonetheless declared himself leader of the new democratic revolution of Iran and, after making a pilgrimage to the Shi'ite shrines of Imam Ali in Najaf and of Hossein in Karbala, his prayers were answered by Saddam Hossein in the form of arms, ammunition and money to fight against Khomeini.⁷ When two French journalists were freed in Beirut, Jacques Chirac pointedly thanked the Islamic Republic for its intervention, yet other matters between the two nations remain unresolved.

⁵ For a recent discussion of the Kurdish situation, see Martin van Bruinessen, 'The Kurds between Iran and Iraq', MERIP Reports (141) July-August 1986.

Rajavi evidently planned to extend the armed struggle against the Islamic Republic by creating a Mojahedin base in the Iranian city of Mehran, captured by the Iraqis, and establishing there a provisional government, with which to lead the armed struggle to take over Iran, city by city. Skirmishes escalated between Mojahedin troops and Pasdaran in the border area, but the plot was foiled even before it began, in June 1986, when Mehran and other Mojahedin encampments were bombarded by Iranian jets and many Mojahedin were killed. This border activity was paralled by a brief but terrifying wave of random bomb blasts in Tehran in which many were killed.

Exile politics directed against the Islamic Republic are thus intimately tied up with the Iran-Iraq war. Iraq has supplied financial, material and military support to the Mojahedin, including a radio transmitter which carries eighteen hours of Mojahedin coverage into Iran. Yet despite, or because of such activities, it appears that the Mojahedin have lost considerable popular sympathy among the Iranian population at large who have endured the severe hardships of prolonged war for over six years and increasingly consider Mojahedin activity to be treacherous in its opposition to the national interest. The haste and spectacle of Rajavi's marriages has also alienated many believers who consider such behaviour quite unbecoming to a leader. The summer wave of bombings in Tehran, widely considered to have been the responsibility of the Mojahedin, appear to have further alienated people from the group. The Mojahedin have never gained the support of Iranian moderates because their outlook was often considered extreme, and secular elements were wary of even the Mojahedin version of Islamic modernism. To many, Rajavi appears unable to contemplate the sharing of power, to work collectively with other groups or even to respect their democratic rights, and often seems to propound contradictory positions regarding the rights of minorities, foreign policy, and trade questions. Students and youth remain the Mojahedin's main source of support, which has been whittled away by the taste of real power and authority that many have found in the Pasdaran, the Basij and other new institutions of the Islamic Republic. Certain exile figures of the democratic left currently liken the Mojahedin to Pol Pot's Khmer Rouge in Cambodia and predict an even worse blood-bath of revengeful slaughter should the Mojahedin ever attain power in Iran, a prospect which appears increasingly unlikely.

⁶ Iran Times 16 (13) 13 June 1986.

⁷ See article by Esmail Pourvali, 'The Report of Massoud Rajavi to Imam Hossein', Rouzegar-e-No, June 1986, p 32.

The Fedayeen-e-Khalq and Tudeh Party

Both the Fedayeen-e-Khalq marxist guerrilla group and the Tudeh (Communist) party reemerged as organised political groupings during the popular movement of 1977-9. The Fedayeen played a significant role in the tumultuous days of street fighting against Pahlavi forces that paved the way for a republic. In the early plebiscite in March 1979, the Tudeh and National Front both readily supported the establishment of the Islamic Republic.

The Fedayeen, while initially in critical support, rapidly became bitterly divided. They differed in their analysis of the class nature of the Provisional Government and the Revolutionary Council, the relationship of the ascendant petty-bourgeoisie to the working class, and the ascendancy of so-called liberal, pro-capitalist elements. The major split in the summer of 1980 came over their attitude towards imperialism. The majority faction accepted the anti-imperialist struggle as paramount and argued that, above all, the Islamic Republic had to be supported against all outside attempts to undermine it. Since then, this faction has enjoyed a very close relation with the Tudeh and has almost been absorbed into that party. Majority Fedayin supporters still publish Kar (Labour) in Paris.

The minority faction, led by Ashraf Deghani, became anti-Khomeinist, and argued that the revolution remained unfinished. It maintained a concern for democratic rights, supported the Kurds and Turkomans in their struggles with the central government, was involved in the early workers' and student councils, and has been involved in sporadic armed combat elsewhere inside Iran. Its numbers have been decimated, and crucial intellectuals and symbolic leaders such as Said Sultanpour, the poet, have been executed by the regime. The Fedayin minority also characterise the Mojahedin/Bani-Sadr alliance as 'liberal reformist', anti-working class and idealist, since it only promoted the cultural battle of Islam against Western influence without demanding the severance of the structural economic relations that tied Iran to imperialism.⁸ Sporadic activity within Iran is matched by sporadic acts outside. Fedayeen have organised demonstrations in many European cities over political repression and Kurdish rights, and in 1984 took over and ransacked the diplomatic offices of the Islamic Republic in The Hague, beating the ambassador.

Though the Tudeh appeared to be useful fellow-travellers while the Islamic Republic institutionalised itself, and seemed to have assisted in the provision of strategy and training during the hostage crisis, in early 1983 the Republic moved against them. Printing houses were closed down, the Secretary-General of the Party, Nureddin Kianouri, and its leading ideologue, Ehsan Tabari, as well as over a thousand other members were arrested and imprisoned. Its military leaders were executed. Many fled the country to the Soviet Union and Afghanistan. Tabari was forced to recant his political past on Iranian television, and the party has disappeared as a visible actor on the domestic political scene, although rumours of considerable Tudeh penetration of Islamic organisations, and influence in policy-making, still persist. A new Central Committee of the Party has been formed with Ali Khavari as Secretary-General. In June 1986, it broadcast over a clandestine radio channel that, despite the massacre and imprisonment of many Party members, the political activities of the Party would continue. A further split in Tudeh ranks appears to be developing as one section proposes a more grass-roots process of decision-making in opposition to the traditional centralised hierarchy of the Central Committee. Tudeh papers and journals are still published, including Name-ye Mardom, People's Bulletin, from Sweden and Setad (Star) from London.

⁸ See 'The Recent Events in Iran and Our Position', Kar (Labour) journal of OIPFG, No 2, Oct-Nov 1981.

The monarchists

Monarchists fled into exile during the popular movement, and while their ostensible goal, and their financial support, might have been expected to contribute to unity, they have proved as divided as other elements of the political exile spectrum.

The royal family itself has been engaged in a variety of exploits while in exile. Farah Pahlavi, the ousted queen, initially installed herself quietly in Williamsburg, Massachusetts, where her younger children attended school and she maintained a low political profile, and in 1985 she moved to Greenwich, Connecticut. The ex-Shah's investments and holdings have been a major item of contention between the Islamic Republic and the US government, and money has also caused great friction amongst the monarchists themselves. Farah has clashed with Ardeshir Zahedi, ex-Ambassador to the US and former son-in-law of the Shah, currently resident in Switzerland. Zahedi looked after the Shah in the United States and settled his various medical and travel expenses. After considerable wrangling, it appears that Farah has agreed to pay Zahedi $2 million for services rendered.⁹ Solving this financial problem may now encourage Zahedi to play a more active, organisational role in the monarchist ranks. He has recently been joined in Geneva by his brother-in-law, Dariush Homayoun, a former Minister of Information in the Amouzegar cabinet, and they evidently intend to open a publishing house.

Ashraf, the ex-Shah's sister, is ensconced on Central Park South in Manhattan. Her wealth financed the activities of General Oveissi and the running of a radio station in Baghdad until Oveissi was gunned down in a Paris street in 1982.

Princess Azadeh organised the Azadegan (The Free People) group which in 1980 highjacked a boat about to be delivered by France to Iran; it was taken to Spain for a while but later returned to the French. Little has been heard of the group since, and one of its key figures, General Aryana, died in 1985 in Washington.

⁹ Jebhe 5 (4) September–October 1986.

The pretender to the throne proclaimed himself Reza Shah II, the new Shah of Iran, in Paris on 9th Aban, his birthdate, in October 1980. Four years later on the same date he tried to organise a Constitutional Council, Shoraye Mashrutiat, in order to create cohesion amongst the competing monarchist factions. Bakhtiar, however, who was against the proposed structure and some of the elements involved, refused to join and the Council was dissolved.¹⁰ Reza Pahlavi has toured the USA and Western Europe to encourage and galvanise his supporters, although recently the young man has appeared more involved with wooing his new bride than new political support. The marriage to Yasmin Etemad-Amini, which took place in the New York metropolitan area in June 1986, provided glossy photographs for consumption by supporters, and revealed some interesting absences, most notably Ardeshir Zahedi and Reza Qotbi, cousin to Farah and ex-director of National Iranian Radio and Television under the Shah.

The monarchist politicians have spent the past seven years wrangling as divisively as other sectors of the political exile spectrum. Ali Amini, a Prime Minister of the Shah in the 1960s who carried out the land reform programme and had a reputation as an independent politician, still carried political weight in the popular movement of 1978. Late in 1978 the Shah asked Amini to mediate with the religious elements but it was already too late to defuse the popular mobilisation; he was also offered the prime ministership, but declined. Before the declaration of the Islamic Republic, Amini left for Paris. In 1980 the right wing of the monarchists approached Amini to create a monarchist front, Jebhe Nejat, the Saviour Front, to rescue Iran from the hands of the fundamentalists. This organisation publishes a paper and operates a radio station in Cairo which broadcasts to Iran.

Shahin Fatemi, once a leader of the Iranian Student Confederation against the Pahlavis, radically changed his political colours. After the revolution, in July 1980, he opened a Centre of Iranian Documentation, and now publishes a paper called Iran va Jahan (Iran and the World). Later he joined Amini's Saviour Front and then helped to organise the Constitutional Council, Shoraye Mashrutiat, aiming to bring in exiled Iranians in Europe and the USA to support the restoration of the ¹⁰ Iran va Jahan (Iran and the World) 5 (215) 5-12 November 1984.

Pahlavi dynasty, albeit with constitutional guarantees modelled on the Spanish pattern.¹¹

Shahpour Bakhtiar, also a veteran politician of the 1950s, was the Shah's last prime minister, taking on a position that Amini, Sanjabi and others had refused. This move also came too late. Bakhtiar held on to the reins of what remained of government when the Shah 'went on holiday' in January 1979 until he was overthrown by Khomeinist forces in February 1979, and escaped to Paris. A Western-style political figure, Bakhtiar has called Bani-Sadr a clown, the Mojahedin fanatics, and the Tudeh an administrative group which is remote-controlled from Moscow.¹² After years of bickering and failure to cooperate, in July 1984 a coalition was patched together between Amini and Bakhtiar. On the date of the Constitutional Revolution in Iran, 14th Mordad, they issued a joint communiqué against the Khomeini regime, established the day as a national holiday, and asked people to march against Khomeini. A substantial turn-out of cars in North Tehran managed to block a section of the city for some time, perhaps constituting the only recent demonstration actually conceived and orchestrated from exile. There thus appears to be a sector of the secular middle class remaining in Tehran which is accessible to the appeals of Bakhtiar. Yet this group must by now be comparatively small and ineffective, beyond such symbolic demonstrations of disaffection.

Early in his exile Bakhtiar had clearly stated that he did not simply want the return of the Pahlavis, but proposed a public referendum in Iran on the monarchy question and supported a constitutional monarchy on Swedish or British lines. In a recent interview, however, Bakhtiar evidently decried the process of referenda in Third World countries since they 'demand a political knowledge that these countries do not possess', and also appeared now to favour Reza Pahlavi's assuming the throne 'after receiving the people's endorsement'.¹³

Both Bakhtiar and Amini have joined the new Advisory Council established by the Shah's son, and relations between Amini and Bakhtiar are at least temporarily more cooperative. Like Massoud Rajavi, Bakhtiar has received substantial support from Iraq and is on record as saying he prefers Saddam Hossein to Khomeini. His radio station in Baghdad broadcasts what he calls 'forthright nationalist propaganda' into Iran.

¹¹ Jebhe 90 (11) July 1986.

¹² See interview with Shahpour Bakhtiar in 'Khomeini and the opposition', MERIP Reports, No 104, March-April 1982.

¹³ Excerpts from an interview with Shahpur Bakhtiar in the French magazine, Arc en Ciel, reprinted in Iran Times 26 (12) 6 June 1986.

Despite their wealth and supposed political experience, the monarchist elements have achieved little over seven years of exile. Only in the last year has a broadly based monarchist coalition emerged in which the major figures have made at least a temporary truce in the name of some common goals. There appears to be renewed recognition of the importance of mass political communication. On 24 June 1984 the publication of Kayhan as a weekly newspaper from London began under the management and editorship of Mostaf Mezbazadeh, Kayhan's founder in Iran during the Pahlavi period. Apparently well-founded speculation suggests that financial difficulties led to the financial involvement both of the Saviour Front organisation of Amini and of Manouchehr Ganji, ex-Minister of Education in the Amouzegar cabinet of the late Shah, as well as support from Bakhtiar's organisation, and the appointment of Abolfathe Vaziri, one of Bakhtiar's men, as editor-in-chief to make Kayhan a major monarchist print channel.¹⁴ Monarchist publishing extends geographically from Nehzat (Movement), in California, to Gam (A Step) in Australia.

Over the summer of 1986 the monarchists held a meeting in France to review the current situation and in early September 1986 another new international communications strategy was revealed. A clandestine transmitter broadcast an eleven-minute message from Reza Pahlavi over the two unused channels of Tehran television. Radio stations broadcasting from Baghdad had announced the planned message and instructed their listeners to tune to the blank channels. So far the size of the viewing audience and their reactions remain unclear, yet it appears that the war of the air-waves is heating up once more. While it has been argued that the lack of any political alternatives and the increasingly difficult situation inside Iran have created a longing for the 'good old days' under the Shah, the monarchists have shown themselves to be as riven with competing egos and divergent strategies as are other exiled activists, and there is little concrete sign of extensive monarchist support or activity within Iran beyond slogans supporting Reza Pahlavi daubed on the walls of Tehran. Given the populist base of the Islamic Republic and the social institutionalisation of the system through new Islamic organisations, coupled with the mass exodus of the very class elements most sympathetic to royalist claims, the necessary social base of support for any attempted monarchist return appears to be lacking.

¹⁴ Jebhe 5 (2) July 1986.

Nationalistic republicans

Perhaps the most overt opposition to the Islamic Republic remains inside Iran, centred on Mehdi Bazargan, who held the post of first Prime Minister of the Islamic Republic for nine months. Bazargan, since his deposition, has continued to sit in the Majles and maintained a high profile of outspoken criticism against the excesses and 'un-Islamic' actions of the Islamic Republic. He has continued the activities of his Nehzat-e Azadi (Freedom Movement) despite periodic attacks by Hezbollahi, and reputedly enjoys Khomeini's special protection.

Bazargan also represents the legacy of the Mossadegh and the National Front, a political legacy still very much alive inside and outside Iran. In February 1986, tens of thousands of people, with significant bazaari representation, gathered in Tehran for the funeral of Mossadeq's eldest son, although the gathering was attacked by Hezbollahi, followed by a protest to Khomeini by Bazargan.¹⁵

Later, in May 1986, veterans of the National Front and Radical Movement in Iran proclaim the formation of a new organisation, the Association for the Defence of Freedom and Sovereignty of the Iranian Nation, Jamiat-e Defa az Azadi va Hakemiyat-e Mellat-e Iran. They declared that the group was not against Khomeini, nor seeking the overthrow of the Islamic Republic. They expressed their support for the revolution and the 1979 constitution, but also wished to defend certain political rights and demands, aiming to promote democratic politics in Iran. The signatories include many who were former members of the early Provisional Government of the Islamic Republic, such as Bazargan himself, Reza Sadr, Hashem Sabaghian, Ebrahim Yazdi (another of the original triumvirate around Khomeini in Paris), Yadollah Sahabi, Ali-Akbar Moinefar, Ali Ardalan, Shah-Hosseini, Mahmoud Manian, etc.¹⁶ The Central Committee of this new group issues a monthly bulletin, Khabarnameh, which tries to coordinate activities inside and outside Iran. Later in the month, Bazargan, Sahabi and others were seized by Islamic secret police as they left the Tehran cemetery of Behesht Zahra, blindfolded, taken into the desert, badly beaten and abandoned, a dramatic indication of the very hard times in store.

Yet this did not prevent Nehzat-e Azadi from issuing a very critical six-page open letter in September criticising Khomeini's leadership and the continuation of the war with Iraq. The group argues, citing thirty-four major Islamic texts, that the current activities of the Islamic Republic are anti-Islamic. The letter argues that war between two Moslem nations will only benefit the superpowers and Zionism, while Moslems reap only its agony. It criticises Khomeini for his hubris, arguing that the Vali-ye Faqih is not above the Prophet Mohammad who himself, although directly inspired by God, always valued consultation. It argues that Abraham never used vigilantes against the idol-worshippers, nor did Hussein use his martyrdom to demand that others accept his religion or to try to create a state, but only to defend justice. The communiqué argues that outright rejection of a peace treaty is against Islam and the traditions of Mohammad, and vehemently criticises the purchase of arms from the 'enemy' (implying Israel) for the purpose of killing Moslems. This letter has been one of the most outspoken and critical statements to circulate inside Iran for some time and may be expected to create quite a public stir, garnering support from bazaaris, civil servants and the middle class who feel that many of the aims of the revolution remain unrealised. It has been suggested that Ayatollah Montazeri, the successor to Khomeini, is particularly well disposed to this grouping, which seems to represent a highly significant recent development in the opposition within Iran, and merits careful monitoring.

¹⁵ Jebhe, National Movement of Iran, No 88, London, February 1986.

¹⁶ Jebhe (89) April 1986.

Other aged National Front figures are now scattered across Europe and the USA, and are involved in a variety of publishing ventures, cultural activities and so forth, soothing the frustrations of exile without overcoming them. Jebhe Melli, The National Front's European faction publishes a paper called Iran Azad (Free Iran), in West Germany and has been active in organising discussion groups in West Germany, France and in the USA on the future of Iran. Jebhe, an independent newspaper published in London by Ahmad Anvari, a veteran journalist and lifelong supporter of Mossadegh, supports the National Front line and also maintains direct personal contact with Nehzat-e-Azadi and prominent members of the new Group. A new publication, about to appear in West Germany, involves financing by the son of Ayatollah Shariat-Madari with the editorship of Hassan Nazih, the ex-head of the Lawyers Association and briefly Oil Minister in Bazargan's Provisional Government. These publications play an important role in disseminating current information about events and developments inside Iran, and the network of contacts between exiled National Front figures and those still inside Iran is amongst the strongest of all the exile groupings.

Independent left/progressive factions

A variety of progressive, democratic socialist and other leftist factions are scattered across Europe and the USA, licking the wounds of the last few years and trying slowly to develop a more coherent politics, balancing recognition of crucial Third World issues such as imperialism and dependency, with the development of practical domestic strategies for implementing democratic and socialist demands. Here, issues such as reorganising and ascribing priorities to economic production, the rights and roles of women and national minorities, democratising the workplace, and cultural and intellectual freedoms have become crucial. The variety of non-party affiliated publishing ventures provides a dynamic environment for exploring and developing such themes in print, within the exile community. The most influential and interesting include Dowlat va Enghelab (State and Revolution) and Nimeh-ye Digar (The Other Half), a feminist journal, both published from London; Ketab-e Jome (Friday's Book), and Socialisme va Enghelab (Socialism and Revolution), from Paris, which was also the home of Alef-Ba (ABC) of Gholam-Hossein Saedi until his death in 1985; and Nazm-e Novin (The New Order), and Elm va Jame'e (Science and Society), from Washington DC. The satirical paper Ahangar published in London has also developed the visual aesthetic of political cartooning, as well as a strong argument for an independent left struggling against both Western imperialism and the social imperialism of the Soviet Union.

Political organisations also maintain their own organs. These include Raha'i (Liberation), of Etehad-e Kommonist (Communist Unity); Jonbesh-e Socialisti (Socialist Movement), of Sazamane Socialisti Iran, ('Organisation of Iranian Socialists); Rahe Kargar (The Way of Labour), of the group of the same name, and numerous others. Frequently preoccupied with internecine arguments concerning Marxist interpretation, and often consisting of a handful of ideologically committed individuals, their publications appear erratically, and while such groupings add to the vitality of left discourse they have never had nor will ever have substantial followings.

Conclusion: Iranian politics in exile 1986

The past seven years of exile politics is a metaphoric graveyard of would-be political leaders and analysts predicting the imminent downfall of the Islamic Republic, its defeat in the war with Iraq, its descent into civil war and the emergence of a dramatic new and successful leadership. Such posturing has proved totally without foundation and reveals a profound failure to analyse the true nature of the Islamic Republic, its sources of support, its institutionalisation, and its evident political and military successes. The Islamic Republic has proved itself far more resilient than anyone had expected. The loud claims of opposition groups and would-be leaders (such as Admiral Madani and Hassan Nazih) of their imminent take-over of the still-fledgling republic have all been shown to be baseless.

On the contrary, Iran seems to be winning the current round of military engagements with Iraq, creating in many exiles the highly ambivalent response of feeling pleased that their country is winning a war which they neither support nor comprehend. The strategy adopted by the Mojahedin, Bakhtiar and others of receiving support from the national enemy appears to have backfired; war does mobilise patriotic feelings, when too much has been suffered and lost to allow the devaluation of the process, and it became politically almost naive to argue support for the 'people' while disavowing the 'nation'. Similarly, the Iraqi support to the Mojahedin, the Kurds, and others has not proved cost-effective to them or produced the desired military results. On the other hand, Iranian propaganda directed into Iraq, and support for Ayatollah Bagher Hakim as leader of the Supreme Assembly of Iraq, Majles-e Ala'ye Iraq, and the major opposition alternative to Saddam Hossein has not proved very effective either. The Dawa party, opposing Saddam Hossein inside Iraq, has not rejected Hakim but neither has it endorsed him. Recently, Iranian war rhetoric seems to have taken a strongly nationalistic turn, away from the promulgation of revolutionary Islam which first dominated it.

Thus most of the major dangers to the regime, such as coup attempts, urban guerrilla struggle, loss of significant oil revenue, invasion of large portions of territory, have been weathered. Internal dissent has become more evident, as in the strikes of doctors and butchers over the summer of 1986, but populist support still appears strong. The key question is no longer will the regime remain, but more precisely what form and shape will it take after Khomeini's death, and how fundamentalist will it remain. Bazargan has argued that this Islamic Republic is the costume that fits Khomeini, and that much will alter to suit the new wearer(s). Answers to such questions most probably lie inside Iran, perhaps with Bazargan or among new groups and tendencies that have grown inside the Islamic Republic, and not amongst the motley, disunited and disorganised groupings that are the remains of the Iranian opposition in exile. One scenario that lies within the realms of possibility is a reconciliation between Bazargan's groupings and the Mojahedin. There is a love-hate relationship between these two Islamic factions, with the Mojahedin as the angry young men who broke out of the too-moderate Nehzat-e Azadi in the 1960s. The combination of age and experience with youth and militancy could be extremely powerful.

The exile groupings are, after all, in part the products of the Pahlavi era and suffer its same deformities of political culture: severe mistrust amongst participants, an intense egoistic jostling for leadership, and an individualism which constantly prevents any coalition of forces from lasting very long. Many groups also manifest an ideological rigidity which allows the 1 per cent of disagreement to triumph over the 99 per cent of shared views, thus preventing compromise or a more pragmatic, and therefore more effective, politics. Yet at the same time well-conceived and thought-through political analyses and strategies are lacking.

Clearly this massive move to exile carries within it one enormous political irony, it has totally eroded the size of the base inside Iran that would support an alternative politics. The massive popular movement coalesced around the charismatic figure of Khomeini and the readily understandable rhetoric of a politicised Islam that supported the oppressed against the oppressors, the meek against the corrupt. No other political rhetoric has provided a language as clear to the Iranian masses, as filled with the necessary cultural connotations and values to arouse collective identification and passion. However coherent, therefore, revolutionary socialist or feminist analysis may appear to a few exiled intellectuals, if it fails to coincide with the perceived identities and experiences of the Iranian popular classes, it will not move them. The dilemmas of exile include the inability to communicate readily and directly with one's desired audience, so that rhetoric from exile becomes ever more abstract and hollow to those who remain at home. It also weakens the possibilities for engagement with the regime on specific issues. Dramatic ideological change and mass political mobilisation are rare within a polity; how much more difficult to orchestrate and achieve from outside. Thus, the bulk of exile publishing is read by other exiles, and while radio broadcasting penetrates Iran, its messages are undermined by the Iraqi connection.

Clearly, not all Iranians in exile are involved in political activities nor have they taken on activist roles vis-à-vis the Islamic Republic. Yet with the Islamic Republic's attempt to overcome the separation of religion from politics and culture, even drinking a glass of wine becomes a gesture of defiance. The struggle for hegemony between Iranian and Islamic identities has produced a dramatic cultural politics. It is impossible, however, to reflect here on the totality of groupings, arguments and events that have filled the past seven years. Some groups with long names have short lives, an organisation may consist merely of a handful of people, a publication puts out five issues and dies.

There are substantial communities of Iranians in the USA and across Europe. California, particularly the Los Angeles area, has always attracted a sizeable community, even during the time of the Shah, because of the climate and comfortable life-style; that community now boasts over 300,000 people, with an Iranian business telephone directory as thick as an ordinary phone book, which caters for most Iranian needs from bakeries to brain surgery. West Coast political communication includes Nehzat (Movement) and Mellat-e-Bidar (The Awakened Nation), a magazine published by Mohajer which is nationalist; Radio Iran, which also has a pro-Bakhtiar orientation, and is run by Iraj Gorgin, former head of National Iranian Radio Television's Channel Two in Tehran; there are also television companies broadcasting on the public network, one of which belongs to Sattar, a popular singer and favourite of Reza Pahlavi. Substantial numbers of Iranians live in the metropolitan areas of Washington DC and New York. Iran Times, a weekly publication which bills itself as 'an independent newspaper for Iranians around the world' has been published in Washington since 1970, and Persian-language radio and television broadcasting is well established. Monarchist groups are strong and include Mahnaz Afghami, the Pahlavi ex-Minister for Women's Affairs, who has established the Foundation for Iranian Studies and publishes a quarterly journal called Iran Nameh. In New York there is a monarchist radio channel. US census figures have revealed the very high level of education of in-coming Iranians, many Iranians are integrated into or affiliated with universities and professional organisations, and new academically oriented and progressive groupings such as the Center for Iranian Research and Analysis (CIRA) have been created. Conferences on the War and on Women have been organised by the Committee in Defense of the Democratic Rights of the Iranian People, and a supposedly non-partisan organisation, the Iranian Cooperative Movement Foundation, aims to help Iranians in their encounters with the US Immigration and Naturalization Service.

Sizeable communities of Iranians exist in West Germany, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, Belgium, France and Britain, as well as Canada and Australia. There are signs that some of these new immigrant communities will not be allowed to grow substantially. With the new wave of draftees fleeing the war, and the discovery of the East German connection, in the summer of 1986 there was considerable international discussion over the handling of Iranian refugees, which produced a subsequent tightening of immigration and asylum requirements in West Germany. Frictions between Iranians and the host community, and often simply amongst Iranians, in Sweden and France have raised questions about continued entry, and narrowed quotas for political asylum. Spain, which for a number of years required no entry visa from Iranians, and has a large community, now requires such a visa; many Bahaii have moved on from Spain to Costa Rica through the help of the Bahaii millionaire, Hojabr Yazdani. As immigration procedures tighten in the West, draft-dodgers and other Iranians managing to leave are creating new and much less fortunate communities in Istanbul in Turkey, and Lahore and Karachi in Pakistan. This new wave of exiles tends to be younger and less highly educated, and exits illegally with little money and few possessions into countries with poorly developed social security structures and limited employment opportunities; recognition of their plight has led Iranians in New York to organise an embryonic network of financial support from West to East. Clearly, the facilities both to survive economically and to be active politically have constituted important criteria for Iranian settlement. Comparative sociological research is badly needed on the nature of the adaptation of Iranians to these various host societies; particularly on these new communities-in-limbo which so dramatically reveal the real human cost and tragedy of exile.

Since the revolution, much pent-up creative and intellectual energy has found new forms and channels of expression—in painting and photography and film, through poems and short stories and novels—some of which indeed focuses centrally on the dilemmas of exile and a considerable amount of which is indeed published and available inside Iran.¹⁷ For Iranian political exiles the current period is one of retrenchment and self-reflection, a productive period of research and analysis, writing and other creative activity. There is also a growing concern for the loss of Iranian cultural identity, especially with regard to the children of exiles, evidenced by the increase in seminars, educational materials and language classes, music recitals, museum and gallery exhibits, and cultural programming on radio and television.

¹⁷ On exile, see the novel Sorraya in a Coma, by Esmail Fassih, London: Zed Press, 1985; a recent issue of the journal Iranian Studies focused on contemporary Iranian writers and critics, pre- and post-Pahlavi, and a forthcoming issue will focus specifically on the theme of Iranian exile. 'Sociology of the Iranian writer', Iranian Studies 28 (2-4) Spring-Autumn 1985.

The longer the exile, the more difficult the return, although we fully expect a debate to grow concerning the possibilities and the need for a return to Iran. For would-be exiled activists, the major danger is to become frozen in opposition, increasingly out of touch with the mood 'back home' and increasingly integrated into the life of the host country. So far it appears, as Khomeini tells his Assembly of Experts, that the major winner in the political war directed from exile is the regime of the Islamic Republic, not the exiled protagonists.

South Korea: dissent from abroad*

In modern Korean history, foreign interventions, forty years of Japanese colonial rule, the division of the country by the United States and the Soviet Union after the Second World War, and a series of repressive regimes means the exile movement has been an indispensable part of the struggle for independence and reform.

At the end of the nineteenth century, the Korean kingdom was pulled into the power struggle for dominance in East Asia, and contact with a wide variety of political thought and a growing nationalist surge brought calls for internal reforms. The first political and civil rights movement, the Independence Society (IS), was formed in 1896 under Dr Soh Jae-pil. Dr Soh and a group of 'enlightened intellectuals' staged a coup for political reform. After the failure of this coup in 1884, Soh fled to the USA and became a US citizen with the name Philip Jason. He later returned to Seoul with the ideas of Western-style liberalism, and established the first newspaper printed only in the Korean alphabet, The Independence. The Independence Society's advocacy of independent neutral diplomacy, civil rights and self-help culminated in a 'People's Assembly' at Chongno Plaza in October 1898. The Assembly urged the King to accept the rule of law. The IS soon faced government repression and Dr Soh, partly acting on 'advice' from the US consul, left the country again for the US, but he returned to Korea briefly in 1945 as an adviser to the US military government.

Other well-known leaders included Ahn Joong-keun, Syngman Rhee, Kim Koo and Ahn Chang-ho. After Japan took effective control of Korea in 1905, Ahn Joong-keun organised an armed struggle unit which eventually assassinated Hirobumi Ito, the leading Japanese proponent of Japanese imperial expansion in Korea and Manchuria. Syngman Rhee, always controversial because of his egocentric partisan politics, was based in the US between 1913 and 1945. Kim Koo led a Provisional Government in Shanghai (later in Chungking), and organised commandos against the Japanese from 1919 to 1945. The massive flow of refugees to Manchuria provided the base for guerrilla actions by both nationalists and leftists, and the Korean US immigrants, especially those in Hawaii, actively supported the exile movement.

* In the writing of this article, Michael Fonte contributed much, especially to the section on US policy. However, the responsibility for this article lies with the present writer.

The exile movement in that period fell into two broad categories, those committed to a diplomatic approach and the armed national liberation movement. Maintaining communications with underground organisations inside Korea, these movements sought the support of international opinion as well as that of the Korean overseas community.

Even though the US trained a group of young Koreans in Chungking in the last stages of the Second World War and at the same time Korean units in Mao's army in Yenan were numbered in thousands, no group received internationally recognised provisional government status. After the US-USSR occupation of Korea in 1945, all exiles returned home but only in their capacity as private citizens. The US military government successfully urged Kim Koo not to return as head of Provisional Government, and when about 40,000 Korean soldiers from Yenan crossed the Yalu River, the Soviet military government disarmed them all.

In the north, Kim Il-sung, who returned with the Soviet Army, seized power with the backing of the USSR and purged other factions, including many returned exiles. Kim Il-sung has dominated the politics of the north ever since. In the south, US policy concerns have dominated the political arena, as shown by the cases of two prominent exile politicians, Syngman Rhee and Kim Dae Jung.

South Korea: US containment policy and political power

US planners asked the same questions about Korea that they did regarding the post-War disposition of other former colonial areas. The essential issues were the same everywhere: power and control. The desire to put together a 'manageable world' needed to be squared with pledges made in the Atlantic Charter for independence and self-determination.

Trusteeship was one answer. Former colonies would be given over to the Five Great Powers (US, UK, USSR, France, China) in trust until such time as they could be fully independent. The British and French were not particularly happy with this American approach, and Sir Anthony Eden, the British Foreign Secretary, put the British view succinctly in his memoirs: '[Roosevelt] hoped that former colonial territories, once free of their masters, would become politically and economically dependent on the United States, and had no fear that other powers might fill that role.¹

As Bruce Cummings pointed out:

Trusteeship was one path to the goal of extending and consolidating American power and influence. American planners were determined to create in Korea a government friendly and responsive to American interest. They preferred to go about this in an atmosphere of trust and co-operation, which fed the presumption of American innocence. But they were prepared to use force as a de facto means to the end. Trusteeship was the liberal alternative, occupation was the assured method.²

Given the development of the war in the Pacific, occupation was chosen. With the swift and strong entrance of the USSR into Asia the US feared the Soviet Union and was aware of the need to build a bulwark against the tide of revolution which the USSR threatened to bring in.

This planning by the USA did not take into account one vital ingredient, the Korean people themselves. Many Koreans inside Korea and in the exile movements had clear ideas of what was needed: a revolution that would rid their country of the legacy of Japanese colonial rule and bring land re-distribution, labour reforms and real political participation and power. After the August 1945 Japanese surrender, a Committee for the Preparation of Korean Independence (CPKI) was formed under the leadership of Lyuh Woon-hyung. Local People's Committees were set up, and on 6 September 1945 a national group called the Korean People's Republic (KPR) was formed. Korea, however briefly and imperfectly, was unified. According to Cummings, 'The entrance of American forces was the prime factor in the KPR's demise, both because the Americans opposed it, and because American power provided conditions in which the Japanese and the native Korean Right could work against it.'³ Syngman Rhee arrived in Korea on 16 October 1945 aboard one of General MacArthur's private planes, and he quickly assembled a loose coalition of the Right under an organisation called the Central Council for the Society of the Promotion of Korean Independence (SPKI). The US occupying forces set about constructing a policy that would guarantee the US position in Korea and used Rhee as the key figure in this exercise. Cummings describes this strategy: 'The new policy had four aspects: strengthening the alliance with the Right, including the proposal that it be used to establish a new Korean government; building up a reactionary police force; developing separate South Korean national defence forces; and suppressing the Left.'⁴

¹ Sir Anthony Eden, Memoirs: The Reckoning, Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1965, p 593.

² Bruce Cummings, 'American policy and Korean liberation', in Frank Baldwin (ed), Without Parallel: The American-Korean Relationship Since 1945, New York: Pantheon Books, 1974, p 44.

³ ibid., p 54.

Rhee was willing to use and be used, as Palais explains: During this period Rhee outmaneuvered, discredited, and repressed the socialists and communists with the aid of the police, right-wing youth groups and gangs, and the American military government. In a situation in which only disorganized conservatives remained as participants in politics, Rhee emerged as the single most powerful political leader.⁵

Rhee came to power as the first President in 1948 and put together the components of autocratic rule. He served US interests well, fitting perfectly into Truman's containment doctrine of 1947 and using the Korean War to enhance his power and prestige. In change, the US saw chaos; in reaction, stability. The US chose to back the stability and reaction provided by Syngman Rhee.

Kim Dae Jung, on the other hand, does not fit into perceived US interests. Kim, a politician with strong grassroots support, challenged Park Chung Hee for the Presidency in 1971 under the banner of the New Democratic Party. Major-General Park had taken control of the South Korean government in the coup of May 1961, and his highly centralised and tightly controlled organisation, the Democratic Republican Party (DRP), dominated the government from 1961 through to the 1971 elections. Kim Dae Jung built his challenge to Park around the South Korean public's growing dissatisfaction with Park's leadership and the nature of the political system under the DRP. In the official count, Kim received 46 per cent of the vote, but the opposition claimed that there were widespread voting irregularities by the government.

Park's response to Kim's challenge was to revise the Constitution so as to preclude the possibility of a future political victory for the opposition. This Yushin Constitution of 1972 reversed the democratisation of the 1960s and was a setback for the cause of democracy and civil rights. Kim Dae Jung was in Japan at this time; he asked for political asylum and then went to the USA where he organised the US headquarters of the United Movement for Democracy and

⁴ ibid., p 66.

⁵ James B Palais, "'Democracy' in South Korea, 1948-1972", in Baldwin, p 321.

Unification of Korea (UMDUK). Afterwards he travelled to Japan to establish a UMDUK branch, but he was abducted in Japan by the Korean Central Intelligence Agency (KCIA) on 8 August 1973.

Kim's abduction was a catalyst to the movement for change inside South Korea. Students challenged the Park Government, blaming it for Kim's abduction and calling for the repeal of the Yushin Constitution. While US government reaction to the Kim abduction influenced the Park Government and Kim's life was spared, there was no effective protest by Washington to the repression that followed. Park, and the 'stability' he stood for, were seen as too important to compromise.

The aftermath of Park's assassination in 1979 was an outpouring of public support for the revision of the Constitution and the construction of a real democratic political system. But the real struggle for power, within the military, was won by Major-General Chun Doo Hwan, then Military Security Commander. The final act in Chun's political coup was the Kwangju massacre, during which, according to estimates by Roman Catholic sources in Korea and Japan, over 2,000 citizens were murdered by the military. (The official government figure is now 191). The massacre stands as an indelible stain not only on the Chun Government but also on the USA.

The massacre has also become a symbol of US support for dictatorship, since the US commander of the UN forces with jurisdiction over Korean forces either permitted or condoned the transfer of Korean forces from the front line to aid in the suppression of Kwangju civilians.⁶

This same US commander, General John Wickhan, in an interview with The Los Angeles Times on 8 August 1980, summarised the US position:

Peace and stability are important to the United States here, and national security and internal stability surely come before political liberalization. . . . I'm not sure democracy the way we understand it is ready for Korea or the Koreans ready for it. . . . Korea seems to need a strong leader. For a variety of reasons, many of them rather curious, Chon (sic) seems to have emerged as a leader, an unnatural one—but nonetheless a leader. And Lemming-like (sic), the people are kind of lining up behind him in all walks of life. . . .

By 27 August, Chun had himself elected president under the Yushin Constitution. In the meantime, Kim Dae Jung and twenty-three others were put on trial on sedition charges related to the Kwangju uprising. These charges included violation of martial law decrees, conspiracy to foment revolution, and the formation of an anti-state organ. On 17 September the court martial sentenced Kim to death and his co-defendants to sentences of up to twenty years.

⁶ Asia Watch, Human Rights in Korea, New York: Asia Watch Report, 1986, p 43.

The Japanese government, largely because of its concern about public sentiment following the KCIA's abduction of Kim on Japanese soil, suspended aid and made clear that Kim's execution would force a re-evaluation of its relations with the Republic of Korea.

In the USA, the weakened Carter Administration would only cautiously express its 'intense and deep concern'. A deal was struck with the incoming Reagan Administration—Kim's sentence was commuted and reduced to a life sentence with the quid pro quo that Chun would be the first foreign Head of State to be received by Reagan. For the new US Administration, with its emphasis on support for authoritarian regimes personified by the former ambassador to the UN, Jeane Kirkpatrick, this move made good sense. Chun's legitimacy was underscored, and the potential security and stability threat that Kim's execution might have caused was undercut.

The Reagan policy is similar to the general post-World War II US pattern, but the South Korean situation has changed dramatically, both within South Korea and in East Asia as a whole. During the Korean War, the main 'enemy' for the US changed from being the Soviet Union to the People's Republic of China (PRC). Today the US and the PRC are friends, the Soviet Union and China are moving toward détente, and Japan seeks to keep the peace with all its neighbours. No superpower wants to be drawn into another conflict in Korea. Change within Korea, then, does not mean chaos. Reaction does not ensure stability.

US policymakers now face the question of how to square their choices with the emerging South Korean feeling that South Korea's national pride has been, and continues to be, hurt by an unchanged US policy. For the exile community, the dilemma is how to find an effective position for their work in the USA. Does the community take an idealistic position and call for complete US withdrawal? Does it work as a checking force to US policy? Hard choices have to be made, and unity must be forged.

The return of Kim Dae Jung and its impact

Kim Dae Jung was exiled to the USA on Christmas Eve 1982, on 'health grounds' according to the government. During his two-year stay in the US, he focused his efforts on two concerns: maintaining his influence on South Korean politics and influencing US policy. Kim worked to draw media attention to the issue of Korean democracy, to broaden contacts with the US Congress, European and Japanese leaders, organisations and opinion makers.

On the grounds that he was not an official representative of the Korean opposition, the Reagan Administration rebuffed Kim's attempts to develop contacts with the Executive branch, providing only meetings with the officials at the assistant secretary level. Kim, based in a suburb of Washington DC, established a network within the US Korean community for the support of his activities.

Given the connection between US policy and Korea's history, Kim's concerns were not basically contradictory. However, two political facts of life made him return to South Korea. Firstly, he clearly became frustrated with the prospect of a changing US policy. In a New York Times interview, he stated: 'I've made an effort to support the cause of democracy and human rights in our country, but I don't think I've fully succeeded, especially in persuading the American government to change its Korea policy.'⁷ Secondly, he faced the dilemma of being away from South Korea for so long that he would lose his political influence.

Kim's intention to return was a serious challenge to the Chun regime. Because he was a symbol of the South Korean people's drive to end military rule ever since 1971, both the Park and Chun Governments had gone to great lengths to ostracise Kim. Even though his political base was not strong in grassroots organisations, Kim was able to mobilise people behind him both because of his own talent and because of the growing aversion to prolonged military rule. Park's abduction of Kim added an aura of myth about Kim, and the death sentence by Chun and the failure to actually carry it out, paradoxically increased people's interest in Kim. Kim's ability during his self-imposed exile to make foreign friends was an effective challenge to Chun's desire to make Kim a forgotten man.

Thus, when he announced his return in September 1984, Kim Dae-ung was more influential than ever. His announcement did not receive much media attention at first, but General Choi Chang Yoon, political advisor to Chun, let it be known that Kim would be arrested when he returned. Given the assassination of Benigno Aquino in the Philippines and the parallels with Kim's political position, press attention and foreign support began to increase.⁸

⁷ The New York Times, 12 November 1984.

Kim arrived at Kimpo International Airport on 8 February 1985 with a supporting US delegation and a large press presence. In an airport mêlée, Kim was hustled away by waiting security forces and his escorts, including two US Congressmen and several other prominent Americans, were jostled. Powerful press coverage resulted in much embarrassment and concern to the Chun Government. Kim was put under immediate house arrest but his influence on the National Assembly elections of 12 February was startling.

Almost all the opposition candidates in the election used Kim Dae Jung's name, in tandem with Kim Young Sam's, to show that they were clearly opposition members.⁹ The election results surprised both the government and the tame opposition Democratic Korea Party (DKP). The New Korea Democratic Party (NKDP), formed under the influence of the two Kims a few weeks before the election, became the leading opposition party against the expectations of many observers. The NKDP received 29.2 per cent of the nation-wide vote compared to 19.5 per cent for DKP and 35.6 per cent for the ruling Democratic Justice Party (DJP). The DKP soon collapsed as its elected Assembly members defected as a group to the NKDP, and the ruling party was faced with the reality that the combined opposition actually won the election. In five major cities, votes for the NKDP outnumbered the DJP. In Seoul, the NKDP received 43.3 per cent while the DJP took 27.3 per cent.¹⁰

⁸ cf. R Gregory Nokes, Associated Press story, 'Kim's American backers hope for democratic pay-off', 7 February 1985, in which he identifies the International Centre for Development Policy as one of the organisations which worked to build press attention and foreign support. Nokes quotes the Centre's executive director, Lindsay Mattison, as saying that the centre's goal is to 'build a relationship between democrats in Korea and powerful Americans who will then continue to care about Korea.' Other organisations involved included the International Human Rights Law Group and the North American Coalition for Human Rights in Korea.

⁹ Kim Young Sam, a contender for presidential nomination by the NDP in 1971, took control of the NDP when Kim Dae Jung was in exile and under house arrest. Kim Young Sam played a very important role in 1979 by challenging the Park Government. His expulsion from the National Assembly led to the Pusan uprising. Ten days later Park was assassinated. In 1980 Kim Young Sam was a key figure within the NDP during the spring of Seoul and was put under house arrest by Chun Doo Hwan for two years.

The third of the 'three Kims', Kim Jong Pil, was the key organiser of the 1961 coup. He organised the KCIA and was responsible for the rapprochement, during the 1960s, between Japan and Korea. Kim Jong Pil cultivated a public image as the successor to Park Chung Hee, but Chun Doo Hwan pushed him aside in 1980. Since his base was largely in the military and the younger generation of officers have rejected him, his days of political power seem over.

¹⁰ cf. The Korea Herald, 15 February 1985 and also The Monthly Review of Korean Affairs 7(2) March/April 1985 (published by The Council for Democracy in Korea).

The 84.6 per cent voter turn-out for this election was the nation's highest. This was not only an indication of the frustration with the Chun regime but also of the desire for a change of government, and Kim Dae Jung's return greatly contributed to the opposition's strength. Having learned of Kim's return via leaflets, thousands of people lined the streets of Seoul and turned up at the airport. Their presence was an indication that more and more people were no longer afraid of the government and that the government was losing control and was afraid of the people.

The formation of the Youth Alliance for Democracy in September 1983 was the first major move to institutionalise dissident organisations. During the severe repression of 1980-3, very few grassroots efforts were possible. Young organisers who were former political prisoners began the Youth Alliance to mobilise a non-violent, mass-oriented movement. The Youth Alliance encouraged the formation of labour, farmer and religious organisations, all of which supported the NKDP in the election. In May 1984 Kim Young Sam fasted for twenty-three days in protest against government repression, and his fasting awakened those politicians banned from political activity by Chun in 1980. Soon they formed the Council for the Promotion of Democracy (CPD), jointly led by Kim Dae Jung and Kim Young Sam, and CPD was the mother organisation for NKDP. Kim Dae Jung's physical presence in Korea clearly became a strong political rallying point. Unable to join the NKDP because his political rights were suspended, Kim took the post of CPD co-chairman and began to exert political influence.

After the collapse of the DKP, the two Kims organised a signature campaign for the direct election of the State President, a campaign that united all the opposition groups. The campaign was formally begun on 12 February 1986, the first anniversary of the controversial National Assembly elections. Though the relationship of the two Kims is sometimes called 'a political marriage' and seems vulnerable, they are under pressure from the movement and the public to continue their alliance.

Kim Dae Jung has been under frequent house arrest, suggesting that he is the most serious threat to the military-backed, unpopular regime. As Kim said in his New York Times interview, his presence itself greatly encouraged South Koreans and sparked a more vigorous political debate. 'Even if I'm not able to be in contact with the people, my return itself, my staying in Korea will be a most powerful message to encourage people to participate in the struggle for democracy.'

The presence of Kim Dae Jung as a political force has underscored the failure of the government to make him a nonentity. This fact, in conjunction with Chun Doo Hwan's step-by-step retreat from his original position on constitutional reform,¹¹ has taught the South Korean people a very important lesson: that the military hardliners are not omnipotent and the people can win through unity. Kim Dae Jung has served as a political rallying point as a man of principle and commitment, whatever his own personal motivations might be.

Kim's impact on US policy is far more difficult to assess. The Kimpo Airport scene received strong media coverage in the USA. The US Ambassador, Richard Walker, soon blamed Kim's party for the incident. Walker has refused to meet either Kim Dae Jung or Kim Young Sam, and it was only as recently as 4 July 1986 that both Kims were invited, along with 1,000 other guests, to a US Embassy party. It was the first such invitation in fifteen years for Kim Dae Jung and in eight years for Kim Young Sam. Given the clear personal disfavour which Walker holds for the two Kims, it is interesting that even he could not but finally recognise Kim Dae Jung as a political leader.

Other influences, of course, have had their impact on recent US policy in South Korea. Developments in Buenos Aires, Port-au-Prince and Manila have led the Reagan Administration to at least pay lip-service to democracy and 'people power'. The Administration has shifted from its early hard line on international terrorism and the East-West struggle as the basic concerns for its foreign policy, as opposed to Carter's human rights emphasis, moving slowly to a position that equates democracy with human rights. The realities of power behind democratic facades—as in El Salvador, for example—have not been important to the Administration, but Kim's return, the rise of the NKDP and calls for constitutional reform to bring about real democracy are testing the future direction of US policy in South Korea.

Regardless of some observers' pessimistic view of his chances for the presidency, Kim Dae Jung is still the most influential political figure in the country, both by attracting the attention of the international media and by speaking out as a symbol of the repressed people of South Korea.

¹¹ When the signature campaign started on 12 February 1986, Chun put all opposition leaders under house arrest and warned that there would be no constitutional amendment until after the 1988 Olympic Games. Faced with serious challenges to this position, Chun announced on 30 April that the Constitution could be amended before his term expires in February 1988 if the National Assembly could reach an agreement on constitutional amendment.

Government policy toward exiles and dissidents abroad

The South Korean Government's attitude and policy toward dissent abroad has varied from period to period, and person to person.¹² Before the 1970s there was no conspicuous exile movement abroad because of the democratic opportunities, limited though they were, under the Constitution. Park Chung Hee's Yushin Constitution of 1972 created a far more repressive situation internally, and created the conditions for a strong exile and dissident movement abroad. In the 1970s a policy of intimidation was used. As a US Congressional investigation by the Fraser Committee revealed, the KCIA was actively involved in various activities in the US to discourage dissidents.¹³ Harassment and intimidation were used on hundreds of South Korean nationals in the USA.

KCIA agents directly or indirectly threatened Koreans or Korean-Americans using family relations, business ties and manipulation of their travel documents. South Korean officials attempted to directly control the Korean-language media and also tried to stifle the media by exerting pressure on advertisers.¹⁴ The KCIA closely monitored anti-government demonstrations and photographed the participants. Lee Jai Hyon, former chief cultural and information attaché at the South Korean Embassy in Washington from 1970 to 1973, in his testimony described a 'highly sophisticated' plan by the KCIA in the spring of 1973 for clandestine operations. One of the nine points he described was 'to intimidate "unco-operative" South Korean residents in the US through their families, relatives and close friends in South Korea, to silence dissidents and to make already silent ones more co-operative.'¹⁵ Highlights of this plan were the abduction of Kim Dae Jung from Japan and the disappearance of the former KCIA director, Kim Hyung Wook, in Paris during 1979. Kim Hyung Wook is widely believed to have been killed by South Korean agents.

The South Korean Government's guidelines in this period seem clear enough: to dispose of those who seriously threaten to undermine the government, and intimidate or buy off the rest.

¹² The term 'exile' is used to describe a few activists from Korea with prison terms or those wanted by the Seoul government. 'Dissident' is used for those Korean residents or naturalised Korean-born American citizens who are actively engaged in anti-Chun activities.

¹³ Investigation of Korean-American Relations, Report of the Subcommittee on International Organisations of the Committee on International Relations, US House of Representatives, 31 October 1978, Washington DC: US Government Printing Office.

¹⁴ ibid., pp 94-6.

¹⁵ ibid., p 97.

In the 1980s the South Korean Government continues to cast an ominous shadow across South Korean-American communities.¹⁶ The KCIA, under the new name of the Agency for National Security Planning, 'has become more covert, more sophisticated', in Lee Jai Hyon's words.¹⁷ Joseph Cho, publisher of The Korean Street Journal in Los Angeles, was quoted as saying that he has had financial problems because of '[Korean] government pressure on Koreans and Korean-American businessmen to keep advertising out of his newspaper.'¹⁸ In a series of articles in his newspaper, Cho mentioned specific cases of intimidation.¹⁹ He said that the Korean consul, Park Min Soo, requested him to dismiss his managing editor in December 1981, and he added that consular officials put pressure on the sponsors not to place advertisements in the paper. He also testified that writers and interviewees were threatened with exclusion from the list of eligible members of the so-called Advisory Board for Peaceful Unification of Korea.²⁰

After the Korean Association in Los Angeles issued a declaration of conscience in support of constitutional amendment in South Korea, an important move for the formerly pro-Chun organisation, South Korean agents also exerted pressure on officials of the Association and other organisations.²¹ Similar pressure was exerted in Canada. The Minjoong Shinmoon, a weekly Korean-language newspaper in Toronto, suddenly lost advertising in 1985, allegedly as a result of consular offices. A dissident leader in Toronto, Park Chang Ung, has long been denied renewal of his passport by the consular office.

Pressure from Korean authorities has been exerted on many Korean-language newspapers. When Kim Dae Jung gave a speech in Los Angeles in 1984 to the largest gathering (4,000) in the history of that city's Korean community, the papers were 'persuaded' not to print Kim's photograph and not to report related news on the front pages. When students from the University of California, Los Angeles, and the University of Maryland organised forums on Korea, inviting myself in May 1986, Korean consular officials approached the students

¹⁶ San Francisco Chronicle, 25 June 1986.

¹⁷ ibid.

¹⁸ ibid.

¹⁹ The Korean Street Journal, 16 October 1985 and 30 October 1985.

²⁰ cf. Article 68 of the Chun constitution. Members number over 7,000. The government developed networks of ABPU overseas. In the Washington area there are 45 members who are known pro-Chun figures.

²¹ The Korean Street Journal, 14 May 1986.

responsible in an effort to stop the events. It is widely believed that dissident activities in the Korean communities in the US are closely monitored by agents and infiltrators, and that the Korean Embassy runs citizen spy-rings. The so-called 'student spy case' in which two South Korean students from Western Illinois University were charged and sentenced to death by a South Korean court was described by human rights organisations as 'an attempt to discredit the student movement and to discourage Koreans living abroad'.²² The fact that the Korean consular office in Chicago knew about the identities of the thirty-five participants when a documentary film on Kwangju was shown at the Western Illinois University, indicated the existence of infiltrators according to a professor there.

The establishment of a television broadcasting company named Korean Television Enterprises Ltd (KTE) in Los Angeles shows the South Korean Government's desire to control the US Korean community. Since its establishment in March 1983, KTE has been disseminating political propaganda. It admitted this in its 11 March 1986 registration as a foreign agent with the US Justice Department, revealing that it had received $33,000 a month since October 1984 for political propaganda purposes from the South Korean Government-owned KBSE (Korean Broadcasting System Enterprises) in Seoul.²³ One of the documents the Korean-American Free Press Committee attached in its complaint against KTE showed that KTE's mother corporation in South Korea, KBS (Korean Broadcasting System),²⁴ corresponded with the US broadcasting firm whose call letters are KSCI to cover up the involvement of the South Korean authorities. A copy of a 1983 agreement between KBS and KSCI states that 'the presence, involvement and activities of KBS and KBSE in KSCI-KTE will appear to be minimal to the general public in order to avoid the impression of foreign intervention in local US broadcasting'.²⁵ When the government established KTE, it was believed that the Seoul authorities tried to monopolise tv programmes in the Korean community in the USA in an effort to control Koreans overseas. The news programme of KTE has never covered dissident activities. As pointed out by Jhang-gil Song,

²² The Chicago Tribune, 3 February 1986 and Asianweek, 7 February 1986.

²³ cf. KTE registration with the US Justice Department, attachment page 8.

²⁴ KBS is a 100 per cent Korean government-owned TV station in South Korea. In 1980 the Chun-appointed Special Legislature passed the Basic Press Law by which the government 'purified' the media and banned privately-owned tv and broadcasting companies. As a result KBS took over other civilian tv networks.

²⁵ cf. KTE registration and The Washington Post, 10 October 1985.

executive managing director of KTE, KTE views the South Korean Government as 'the most orthodox organisation, the most reliable organisation in Korea'.²⁶

It is not surprising, then, that the US Federal Communications Commission (FCC) found KTE was established 'for the purpose of presenting programming acceptable to the South Korean government'.²⁷ KTE never reported the Kimpo Airport incident when Kim Dae Jung returned, yet it broadcasts through nine TV networks in the US.²⁸

The influx of Korean immigrants to the USA numbers approximately 30,000 a year, and travellers to and from South Korea number roughly 5,000 a day. These numbers have made it imperative that the South Korean Government concentrates on controlling the US Korean community. As this community began to mobilise people and funds to influence American politicians, and began seriously to lobby Congress and influence the media, especially after Kim Dae Jung's stay in the US, the Korean government increased these efforts.

It is widely known that the Korean Embassy and consular offices send facsimile copies of all the Korean- and English-language newspaper reports to the relevant government authorities, reflecting the weakness of the Chun regime that it worries so much about the influence of dissidents. With a series of strong demonstrations against Chun's US visits and protests against the human rights abuses of his regime, few observers expect a decrease in control and intimidation activities by the government in the near future.

The exile and dissident movement today and opposition in Korea

The US dissident movement has been engaged in various actions for more than fifteen years: rallies, demonstrations, the publication of newspapers and newsletters, lobbying and publicity efforts, and activities to provide psychological and material support for the movement in South Korea with direct or indirect links with political and democratic opposition forces across the Pacific. (It should be noted that the distinction between political and democratic opposition forces is an important one in the Korean context. Democratic groups, such as the ²⁶ The Los Angeles Times, 11 February 1986.

²⁷ cf. 'Notice of Apparent Liability' on 10 November 1986 by the FCC with its $10,000 fine imposed upon KSCI-TV.

²⁸ KTE registration as a Foreign Agent (11 March 1986) attachment, pp IX-IX-2.

United Movement for Democracy and Unification, have specific grassroots constituencies, e.g. within labour, religious, student and farming groups. A gap has existed between this movement and the political opposition for some time. While hundreds of democratic activists have been gaoled, the political opposition leaders have not suffered the same level of repression.)

Regardless of the extent of these activities, they contribute to the movement because they both encourage people in Korea and educate both the Korean and American communities. The US dissident movement has recently enlarged its influence by recruiting more participants and developing new strategies and tactics. Direct links with democratic forces in South Korea have improved because of the presence of more activists in the US and an increased contact with activists in Korea who are not afraid of government retaliation for their telephone or other communication with dissidents outside the country. Smear tactics by the government have been somewhat successful against activists in Japan. By announcing spy cases and imprisonment of students and others from Japan, as well as by having the South Korean Supreme Court declare the Japan Headquarters of the United Movement for Democracy and Unification as 'an anti-state organ' in 1978,²⁹ the South Korean Government has in part succeeded in isolating Korean residents in Japan from people in South Korea.³⁰ The existence of a large pro-North Korean organisation in Japan called chochongnyon gave the government's claim some plausibility. Since 1980 there have been claims that the US Korean community is also under growing North Korean influence. Quoting the increased number of visitors from the US Korean community to North Korea, and the emergence of 'neutral' (according to the organisations themselves) or 'pro-North' (the South Korean Government's terminology) groups, the Korean Government has tried to split the Korean movement and dissidents. In this situation, the existence of former activists from Korea has contributed to the maintenance of strong links between the movement in the US and that in Korea, in spite of the government campaign.

Despite many positive aspects, the dissident movement abroad has some weaknesses. There are more than fifteen groups listed in the Los Angeles area and yet only ninety people may show up for a demonstration. Some American observers point out that, except for a few groups, most of the Korean organisations talk only to Koreans. It was a year and a half before the KTE TV case, for example, became an issue in the US media. Although the Korean-language papers in Los Angeles had made this a big issue for some time, it seemed insignificant to the American press and the case was only brought to the attention of two American groups after October 1985. The counter-information and lobbying efforts of the dissident movement, though greatly improved, still needs strengthening.

²⁹ cf. Amnesty International, Report on South Korea, June 1986, pp 24-28 and pp 78-85.

³⁰ Most observers do not believe that the Korean government has presented any hard evidence for these claims. They believe that the Chun Government has used these charges to sentence Kim Dae Jung to death.

Tension in South Korea between political opposition groups has affected dissident groups with a political orientation. Tension between the political opposition in South Korea and democratic groups on strategy creates parallel tensions in the exile and dissident movements abroad. In the Korean context, one difference concerns the role of the US. Some groups argue that the fundamental cause of the tragedy in South Korea is US intervention, and they regard this issue as a high priority. Others insist that the role of the movement overseas must be to support, materially, psychologically and with publicity, the movement inside Korea and do not see US withdrawal as a priority issue.³¹ Given the present level of consciousness in the US Korean community, the former approach might best be called 'idealistic' and the latter 'realistic'. Fears still linger in the hearts of many Koreans in the US after experiencing a long period of repression in Korea, a McCarthy-like political culture and the war between the two parts of the country. Such a legacy is a very serious obstacle to free discussions in dissident circles. It is not surprising, in this context, that no united front has been achieved and no umbrella organisation has developed to exploit the community's potential.

As the likelihood of a constitutional amendment becomes more 'real', another kind of friction may develop. The ruling military hardliners will not allow direct popular presidential elections. Instead, there is talk about a parliamentary government system, which Kim Dae Jung has rightly described as a plot to manipulate and steal the election. The election phobia of the military establishment is a result of the fact that in thirty-eight years of 'constitutional democracy' the military has ruled for twenty-six of these years; as a result the South Korean people want a change of government that excludes politicised army officers. Because the government can manipulate all government officials and the police in any election campaign, the mainstream opposition believes that only direct election of the President would provide a strong impetus for change. However, as Kim Dae Jung has noted, the government's plan seems to be that by 'delaying as long as possible in the National Assembly, it would try to split the opposition, and then try a plebiscite on a cold winter's day in January in accord with the ruling elite's plan.'³²

³¹ There are many small groups in the USA and Canada. They line up under two main umbrella organisations, the United Movement for Democracy and Unification (UMDUK) in Korea and the Federation of Democratic Koreans in North America (FDKNA). UMDUK puts more emphasis on human rights, criticises US support for military dictatorship, and does not advocate US troop withdrawal at this time. EDKNA does advocate troop withdrawal and takes more 'ideological' positions. UMDUK is by far the larger of the two organisations.

Whatever the result of the next election, it will affect the future of the movement in foreign countries. If there is real democratisation, probably coming only because of strong popular pressure, the exiles would go back and the dissident movement in the USA may debate other issues such as unification. If a 'compromise' between the current government and some of the political opposition results in another regime basically backed by the military, this will not be an acceptable solution to the democratic opposition. The dissident movement overseas might then become more divided and polarised, and the dilemma will be how to figure out practical and effective projects under these circumstances.

Conclusion

Exiles and dissident movements have played unique historical roles in Korean politics, and they continue to do so. The South Korean Government has always concentrated energy on trying to divide and discourage such movements, and it still aims to control the community together with a systematic manipulation and influence on public opinion in the growing US Korean community. The government has used various tactics to undermine dissident activities and isolate exiles and dissidents from broad support.

Will US policy support real democracy in South Korea? Will a 'compromise' that keeps 'stability' in place be arranged? What should be the exile movement's role? The dilemma is how effectively to mobilise a viable countervailing force in the USA to the classic leanings of US policy and to underscore the long pent-up desire of Koreans for true democratic reform.

³² Dong-A-Ilbo, 30 July 1986.

SOUTH KOREA: DISSENT FROM ABROAD

The Korean overseas dissidents must expand to an ever broader Korean community support base in order to reach out to more Americans. This demands an effective theory and methodology that will provide not only self-satisfaction but effective support work for the movement in South Korea. Unity is essential if the long hoped for goal of real democratisation is to be achieved.

ALAN ANGELL AND SUSAN CARSTAIRS

The exile question in Chilean politics

The Chilean Government of President Pinochet has used exile as one of its instruments of social and political control. A fiercely authoritarian Government, it employs a variety of methods to try to ensure the necessary social tranquility to pursue its goal of creating a free market economy and a 'liberal' state. Thirteen years after the coup of 1973, there is neither social peace in Chile nor a free market economy, let alone a liberal state by any definition. Political protest, beginning in May 1983, has periodically shaken the country, reaching a climax in the massive demonstration of rejection of the government and its policies on 2-3 July 1986.¹ The government's main answer to this protest is repression. Exile is one form of repression, and it continues to cause acute human suffering for thousands of Chileans. Exile is no political novelty in Chilean history. It has been used by governments following periods of political conflict in 1851, 1859, 1891 and 1927-31. But the sharp contrast with the present is that in previous cases amnesty followed quickly.

The coup of 11 September 1973 and its consequences

The exile question cannot be isolated from the politics of the Unidad Popular (Popular Unity, UP) and from the aims of the military plotters who overthrew President Allende. From 1970 to 1973, the brief UP government embarked upon a programme of fundamental political, economic and social change. Allende and his governing coalition of six parties (basically the Socialist and Communist parties) intended to transform Chile peacefully—the so-called 'Chilean road to socialism'. Whatever the failures of that government, and the reasons for failure, its supporters and members had a vision of a new society, a different economic system and a fundamentally distinct political order.

¹ A comprehensive set of essays on the Pinochet government is Military Rule in Chile Dictatorship and Oppositions. J Samuel Valenzuela and Arturo Valenzuela (eds) London and Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1986. A recent assessment of the regime is Alan Angell, 'Why is the transition to democracy proving so difficult in Chile?' Bulletin of Latin American Research 5(1) 1986.

In the eyes of the military who came to power, the supporters of Allende were not just political opponents but dangerous revolutionaries. To 'restore' traditional values in Chile, military action could not be limited; it had to be massive and drastic because a military at war with the forces of international communism must use all means at its disposal to 'save' the nation.

Although Chilean political life has seen outbreaks of violence, nothing compares with the intense repression that followed the coup. Numbers of victims are always difficult to estimate, but thousands were killed, perhaps as many as 30,000 people. In the first six months following the coup, there were as many as 80,000 political prisoners, though not all being held at the same time. This scale of repression did not continue, but torture of political suspects, imprisonment, exile and even murder were vital elements of political control centralised in the DINA (National Intelligence Department), later renamed the CNI (National Information Centre).

There are several reasons why the coup was so brutal. Even though Chile had no powerful urban guerrilla movements to compare with those in Argentina (the Montoneros) or Uruguay (the Tupamaros). Talk of arming the workers was mostly speculation; some political activists undoubtedly possessed weapons, but the scale was tiny compared with those of the armed forces. However, social disintegration and polarisation had sharpened and civil war seemed imminent. In these circumstances, members of the UP were defined as the enemy, not as mere political opponents. Secondly, the military in Chile had left intervention very late, and a more interventionist military such as in Argentina or Brazil would probably have intervened much earlier when the political temperature was lower.

Thirdly, the brutality of the coup reflects the feeling that military involvement with politicians as had occurred with the UP Government was a grave mistake. Initially at least, solutions had to be military and not political. Fourthly, the coup was a move against all politicians, and not just those on the left. The plotters aimed to abolish political parties, not to do a deal with right-wing parties, however much those parties supported them. The Christian Democrats and President Frei (1964-70) were seen as the 'Kerenskys' of the Chilean process; they had prepared the way for the communist takeover. Finally, the intention of the military was to eliminate entire political and social movements. The military did not assume that the parties of the left were creatures of a small political class. Alien parties had to be rooted out; after all, they had had decades in which to flourish.

Given this analysis, exile was politically justified and convenient for the regime. Exiles were not seen as 'true' Chileans, but as agents of sinister foreign powers. The fear of exile was manipulated to exact political passivity from those who might be tempted into opposition, and exile was less likely to produce international criticism than imprisonment in Chile.

This article will outline the size of the exile problem, and attempt to assess its political significance. Our argument is that in the overall political battle being fought in Chile today, exile is only one of a number of issues at stake, and is far from being the most important. It is easier to overlook the suffering of Chileans abroad than the plight of the shanty-town dwellers subject to constant police harassment; or of political activists like the three communists brutally murdered in 1985; or the eight Chileans who lost their lives in the protests of 2-3 July 1986, one of whom was an exile. But exile has had an impact on the ideas and behaviour of political parties, including the left, though not a uniform impact on all parties.

It is unknown exactly how many Chileans have suffered exile since 1973, nor how many are still in exile. In mid-1986, the authorities admitted that 3,717 cannot return, while the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees talks of 30,000 and the Comite Pro-Retorno in Chile estimates the numbers at between 100,000 and 200,000. The government denies that there is any pressure from the exiles themselves to return. Of the 6,000 authorisations granted since 1985, it claims that only 949 have returned.²

It is not easy to produce accurate information on the size of the exile population, or of its composition and distribution, but in the following section we summarise the general picture.

Who are the exiles and where are they?

The coup of 11 September 1973 was far more violent than generally expected. By 1973 many people saw that a military takeover was a real possibility but few were prepared for the ferocity and thoroughness with which it was carried out. The widespread use of tanks and aircraft against an unarmed civilian population, and the initial twenty-four-hour curfew, created a climate of fear for thousands of people which turned into a nightmare as news of many detentions spread by word of mouth while the state-controlled media suppressed all reports of repression. As news of detentions and brutality spread, people began to seek help from foreign embassies and churches. The earliest systematic reaction was the establishment of the National Refugee Commission (CONAR) a few months after the coup, by a group including Bishop Helmut Frenz, the representative in Chile of the Lutheran churches. This small group—in effect the precursor of the Committee for Peace in Chile—acted as a liaison between potential refugees and embassies, often conducting people to asylum in foreign embassies at grave personal risk. In the early months the first organised effort was on behalf of foreigners in Chile. There was a large number of refugees from the military dictatorship in Brazil, and UP sympathisers from other Latin American countries. According to the UNHCR mandate, clear channels existed to assist this group and by March 1974 3,400 people had been moved from Chile.

² All figures in this paragraph are quoted in El Mercurio (Santiago) 12 June 1986, p 6; and Hoy (Santiago) No 467, 30 June 1986, p 25. This issue of Hoy contains an interview with the priest in charge of the Pastoral del Exilio. The Church has played the principal role in defending the basic human rights of Chileans, including the right to live in Chile.

A special programme of assistance was soon established through ICEM (the Inter-governmental Committee on European Migration) to overcome UNHCR's procedural difficulties in dealing with those seeking asylum within their own country. By the end of 1974 a total of 6,700 people had been resettled. Initial assistance went to people who feared detention or re-arrest, but increasing numbers of detainees were in prisons and concentration camps throughout Chile. In December 1974 an agreement was signed between ICEM (the International Committee of the Red Cross), CONAR and the Chilean government to allow for the transfer to exile of those detained without trial under the provisions of the State of Siege. This was followed by a similar agreement in April 1975 permitting those who had been tried and sentenced to apply under Decree Law 504 to have their sentence commuted to exile. Once visas were negotiated for prisoners, ICEM handled their travel arrangements and in total assisted around 3,000 prisoners to leave under this programme.

In March 1978 the government issued an amnesty for all crimes committed since the coup. This measure attracted much domestic criticism as it was seen as designed primarily to extricate officials from increasing pressure over the issue of disappeared prisoners. Initially, the Interior Ministry spoke of 2,071 people who would benefit under the amnesty, of whom 1,021 were already in exile. In fact, those in exile were required to ask for permission if they wanted to return and it was by no means guaranteed. In April 1978 a veteran Communist Party member was refused entry, and many people continued to opt for exile. By May 1978, 153 prisoners had left through ICEM as a result of the amnesty; the overall total is probably around 300.

As well as those seeking asylum directly within Chile, there were many thousands who fled to neighbouring countries, and as early as 1974 there were estimated to be at least 15,000 Chilean refugees in Argentina and 1,500 in Peru. The numbers for Argentina are especially difficult to establish. There is a continuous migratory flow from Chile to Argentina and many people undoubtedly fled across the border, particularly from country areas where repression is less well documented, and have never registered themselves formally with any official body. Within Argentina the political situation deteriorated throughout 1975, and with the 1976 military coup many refugees there were in real danger. UNHCR offered assistance but as their reception hostels became a target for attack from right-wing groups, many people were unwilling to register themselves formally. The UNHCR appealed to member countries to take in refugees and people gradually obtained entry visas and left mainly for Europe, other countries of America and Australia. The final figures for official resettlement are around 30,000 Chilean exiles. The difficulty in reaching a realistic total lies in different governments' attitudes towards immigrants and refugees. In the UK, for instance, where controls are strict, the number of Chileans additional to the official figures would be fairly small. In other countries the discrepancy is likely to be enormous. It has proved difficult to obtain detailed figures from UNHCR of final numbers. To provide some measure of the magnitude of the discrepancy we have used figures from ICEM of their total resettlement from Latin America from October 1973 to May 1979. The bulk of these numbers are Chileans and most refugee transfers were completed by the end of 1979. These figures thus provide us with a reasonable guide to the final situation. The official figure for France is 3,030 whereas the Chilean Commission for Human Rights in its 1982 annual report estimated 15,000. For Spain the official figure is 204 whereas the Interior Ministry in 1984 estimated the Chilean population at 25,000. Venezuelan and Canadian ICEM figures from 1979 are officially 507 and 405 respectively but the Chilean Commission for

Human Rights put Venezuela at 80,000 and Canada at 12,000.³

The latest estimate from the Chilean Commission for Human Rights in its 1982 annual report is 163,686, while an article appeared in a Chilean weekly, Hoy, in January 1984 which gave a total of 179,268. Also in 1984 a study was carried out in Chile and abroad by the Centre for Research and Development in Education (CIDE) which gave a total of 200,000–250,000.⁴

It is even more difficult to be precise about exactly who the refugees are. About 3,000 went to exile directly from prison, and many others had experienced short periods of detention and been released inside the country. Many fled from detention orders issued against them or because they heard that they were being pursued by the secret police. Others left the country due to fear of persecution or the very real difficulties of subsistence in Chile for people dismissed from their jobs, either for political reasons or because of the drastic changes in economic policy brought about by the new regime. There have been attempts to look at the exiles as two separate groups—those motivated by political reasons and those with a purely economic motivation—but it is very difficult to evaluate this clearly as circumstances are so confused and motivation inevitably mixed.

The point is often made, probably accurately, that a larger proportion of middle-class and professional people found refuge than the working class. Accepting the inaccuracy caused by larger numbers of working-class exiles not being among official figures, the following analysis of the social status of exiles was carried out by CIDE in 1984 based on interviews with 800 families in six countries (Venezuela, Canada, Spain, France, Sweden and the German Democratic Republic).

The vast majority of exiles are related to the political parties that formed the UP alliance, and the revolutionary party the MIR (Movement of the Revolutionary Left). There were a number of prominent Christian Democrat (Partido Demócrata Cristiano, PDC) exiles, but they comprised a small proportion of the total number. The major parties of the UP were the Socialist and Communist Parties, part of the Radical Party, and the much smaller MAPU (United Popular Action

³ All figures in this paragraph are drawn from Provisional Report on Movements Effected by the Intergovernmental Committee for European Migration under the Special Programme for Resettlement from Latin American Countries (June 1979); and, Inserción Laboral para el Retorno: el caso de los exiliados Chilenos, Santiago: Centro de Investigación y Desarrollo de la Educación (CIDE), 1984.

⁴ All figures in this paragraph are taken from CIDE (op. cit.) and an article by Alfonso Alacalde in Hoy, January 1984.

Table 1: Occupational status of refugees: 1984 (in percentages)

University educated	53.6	Without university education	43.7
Managers	3.2	Tech qualification	5.9
Engineers, architects	7.9	Technician without qualification	5.6
Social professions	11.8	Admin and clerical	15.6
Teachers	9.9	Skilled manual	16.6
Other	6.0	Unskilled manual	6.1
		Other	3.8

Source: Patricia Cariola and Josefina Rossetti, Insercion Laboral Para el Retorno: el caso de los Exilados Chilenos, Santiago: CIDE 1984.

Movement) and the Christian Left. Although many politicians were killed in the coup, the General Secretaries of the parties survived and went into exile; in the case of Luis Corvalan of the Communist Party (CP), this was only after long imprisonment and a much publicised East-West exchange. There were various attempts to set up central bodies for the whole of the opposition. The Chilean Trades Union Congress (the CUT, Central Unica de Trabajadores de Chile) based in Paris was a centre for a while, as was Chile Anti-Fascista, based in Berlin. None of these groups, however, was able to maintain a continuous unifying force over a disparate and embattled exile community.

The majority of refugees are probably from the Socialist Party (PS), a party with a substantial mass membership in Chile but with little or no preparedness for illegal organisation. The CP was probably under-represented among exiles because of its former experiences with underground operations; it had been banned from 1948 to 1958. Of the smaller parties, MIR and MAPU were probably over-represented among exiles, the latter because of its high middle-class intellectual membership with easier access to friends abroad than the average working-class party member. MIR members experienced very heavy repression because of their policy of armed resistance to the military junta. In so far as it is possible to construct a chronology of repression between different parties, MIR appears as the major target in the first few years, culminating in September 1975 with the death of the General Secretary, Miguel Enriquez, in a gun battle with the military. In 1976 the CP and the PS became targets as their central committees were infiltrated and assassinated.

It is hard to make a geographical division of party sympathies among exiles. Sweden was outstanding in responding swiftly to urgent cases, and therefore initially may have received a higher proportion of MIR members in need of immediate assistance. The numbers of refugees in the USSR are small and probably all communists, though among the larger population of East Germany there are a substantial number of socialists, most notably Clodomiro Almeyda, Allende's former Foreign Minister. Paris was always seen by Chilean intellectuals as the cultural centre of Europe and they opted for France when they had a choice. Cuba was particularly sympathetic to MIR.

Return

Although the political situation in Chile has not changed dramatically, there has been a continual trend towards return. Throughout the late 1970s people were formally invited to return, subject to the provisions of two Decree Laws (81 and 604) which effectively gave the government complete discretion to refuse entry to applicants suspected of being a potential threat to state security. A slight trend towards return can be observed from the late 1970s when the economy started to experience its short-lived 'boom', but many were refused entry and others objected as a matter of principle to submit to this procedure.

This situation continued until October 1982, when Pinochet convened a short-lived commission to examine the problem of exiles. A list was issued in December 1982 of 125 people authorised to return, and this was followed throughout 1983 and part of 1984 by the issuing of a series of lists covering about 4,000 people. In September 1984 the policy changed and a list was made of 4,942 people not allowed to return. During 1985 this list was subjected to three major revisions and 1,347 names were removed. In 1986 there were three amendments in the period up to June, each of approximately 50 names bringing the total of those excluded down to 3,717. Many criticisms of the lists were made as they have included children, people who have already returned to Chile and dead people. Some people who had appeared on the lists as authorised have been refused entry. Since February 1985 the government has given a formal guarantee that those not named in lists will be allowed to return, but there is still some understandable apprehension on the part of exiles about trusting such statements.

From 1976 to May 1985, 2,112 people returned to Chile through ICEM and the UNHCR. Others finance their own return or receive assistance from the country of asylum, and the overall figure has been estimated by CIDE at between 2,640 and 3,017. While there has been a steady trickle of returnees, most of those who have gone back have done so from 1983 onwards when the relaxing of certain restrictions in Chile and the growth of the opposition gave people the confidence to go back. Numbers have declined again with the reinstatement of the State of Siege in November 1985 and the clear determination of Pinochet to hold on to power.

Exile politics

Although exiles were scattered in a number of countries, they were sufficiently numerous to form communities which could reflect upon their experiences. The question that was uppermost in their minds was: 'why did we fail?'.⁵

The tragedy of exile is first and foremost of human suffering. Isolation, depression, family break-up, suicide and despair were bitter products of an exile that dragged on year after year.⁵ But the tragedy was also political, in two senses. Firstly, the very centrality of the question of why they failed, intensified the ideological divisions that had always been present in the UP coalition—above all in Allende's own Socialist Party. Did the government proceed too fast, or too slow? Was the economic policy correct? These and other questions were endlessly debated, but in the absence of any obvious way of resolving the dispute they were debated fruitlessly.

In another sense, the tragedy was greater because the issues being discussed in exile were less and less those being discussed in Chile. In the years immediately following the coup, Chileans both in exile and at home were preoccupied with questions related to the failure of the UP Government. But for exiles, tension arose from the pressures to integrate into their host society, in which the issues of Chilean politics were fairly marginal, or to remain in a kind of ghetto where the political issues remained centred on the events of 1973.

In Chile a new generation of adults grew up without real memory of these years, and the memories of older people began to fade. The central questions of 1986—how to remove Pinochet, construct a united opposition and devise a stable and popular alternative—are not best answered with reference to what went wrong in 1973. There are positive lessons to be learnt from the experience of the UP and some have undoubtedly been learnt, but Chile has changed greatly since 1973. The trade union movement is now much weaker, the population of the shanty-towns much larger and poorer, social divisions are wider, the economy has changed in many ways and the international context is distinct. It is far from easy to analyse these changes from inside Chile, but how much more difficult it is to make sense of them in exile.

⁵ A moving account of exile is contained in one of the chapters of the book by Patricia Politzer, Miedo en Chile, Santiago: CESOC, 1985.

Exile as a means of political control

Discussions of exile tend to concentrate on the view from exile and the impact on the community abroad. This would be a one-sided perspective in the case of Chile, for exile is used deliberately by the government to strengthen its grip over political life. The government uses the exile issue in its 'divide and rule' tactics. For example, it may announce the publication of a list of those entitled to return and then delay the specific list, which is in any case less complete than hoped for. Permission to return may be granted and then capriciously withdrawn, or exiles may be allowed to return and are then expelled. There is little hope of legal redress as the courts, in spite of some positive developments in recent years, have been faithful to the government's wishes in this area.⁶

Although this issue is crucial for exiles, it is not the only area of abuse of human rights and other issues concern human rights campaigners in Chile. It is not the central political issue for the opposition in Chile, including the Church which has made no secret of its distaste for exile. Trade union rights are constantly under assault, organising parties is dangerous, economic hardship is a permanent concern for the growing numbers of poor and unemployed, and university students are constantly agitating for respect for basic academic freedom. With these preoccupations, the opposition can devote only limited resources to exert pressure on the government to allow exiles to return.

A weak government, or a government responsive to international concern, would be very vulnerable to pressure on this issue. Allowing ⁶ The government announced in mid-1986 amid a mixture of surprise and derision, the creation of a Commission on Human Rights. One of its members, a Supreme Court judge, has already stated in a press interview that he thinks exile is justified if the government thinks that the person concerned is a potential terrorist. The fact that it does not have to be legally proved reflects the supine attitude of some judges—though there are notable exceptions—before the government, Emilio Filippi, 'El Exilio y la Comisión', Hoy, 7 July 1986, p 5.

exiles to return would not have a major political impact on the strength of the opposition, assuming that a few key leaders were still exiled, but it would be a gesture warmly approved in human terms, not just in Chile but abroad. Occasionally the government makes gestures, but only token ones, to try to deflect attention from other areas such as torture and mass arrests. Chile has been constantly criticised by international organisations for its abuse of human rights, and even the USA has joined in this criticism.⁷ By making concessions to exiles, Pinochet can claim that he is solving the problems of political order in Chile, but he cannot allow return without control because that would be tantamount to admitting that Chile was not surrounded by potential enemies. Pinochet is part prisoner of his own rhetoric: if negotiation is defined as a climb-down, then supporters may draw the wrong conclusions from humanitarian gestures.

Chile has been internationally isolated almost since the day of the coup, and this weakens the ability of the international community to persuade the government to change its policy.

The US government is still the single most important foreign influence in Pinochet's Chile, in spite of the limited trade between the countries and the US embargo on arms sales to Chile since 1977. The activities of the US Ambassador Harry Barnes, appointed in mid-1985, are a sharp contrast with those of his predecessor. Barnes has spent considerable time meeting opposition politicians and stressing his government's commitment to support for human rights and a peaceful return to democracy.

However, other less public reassurances are probably being given to the regime; in the present climate of political uncertainty, any prudent US government would want to keep its options open. The economic relations between the USA and Chile are of less importance than they used to be, but Chile is the world's largest single exporter of copper, a product that still has strategic and economic importance. There is increasing private investment, mostly North American, in the copper sector, and the USA presumably seeks a political outcome that safeguards investment in, and the supply of, copper. Moreover, the USA has recently gained the agreement of the Pinochet Government to establish a satellite tracking station on Easter Island. This has been opposed by nationalist opinion across the political spectrum in Chile, and again the USA will want to safeguard its base there.

⁷ In March 1986, the USA approved the UNHCR report which criticised the Chilean government's continued abuse of human rights.

The major political opponent of the Pinochet Government is the PDC, and it makes sense therefore for the USA to make overtures to the PDC. The USA will also want to ensure that the CP remain far from power, and a continuation of the Pinochet regime would be preferable to a CP government. Pursuing a clear foreign policy in these circumstances is far from easy.

The single issue on which Chile is most vulnerable is repayment of its huge US $23 billion foreign debt, most of which is debt to private international banks rather than the US or other foreign governments. Neither the international banks nor the IMF are likely or willing to make loans to Chile, conditional on human rights issues, let alone take up the question of exile.⁸ International criticism from other sources or countries is attributed by the government to the activities of international communism, and are used to further justify authoritarian measures.

The exile question would receive more political prominence if there was an undisputed national figure in exile, ready and able to return. But there is no exile leader who commands the kind of support that Benigno Aquino in the Philippines, or Juan Domingo Perón in Argentina or Romulo Betancourt in Venezuela did when they were in exile. The two major political figures of recent Chilean history, Salvador Allende and Eduardo Frei, are both dead. The government has assassinated two possible leaders of the opposition—General Prats, a former Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces, in Buenos Aires in 1974, and the Socialist leader Orlando Letelier in Washington in 1977—and seriously wounded Bernardo Leighton, a well-respected Christian Democrat, after an attempt to kill him in Rome.

Exile and the political parties

All parties and persuasions have had to rethink their basic political beliefs in the last two decades. Some 200,000 Chileans (at the very least) have been scattered in countries all over the world, and they have often been politically experienced and intellectually aware of the major debates in world politics. They have had an impact on societies that received them, above all those societies where the political configuration bore some resemblance to that of Chile—notably Italy and France. In both those countries the debate on the ‘lessons of Chile’ led to a rethinking of political strategies on the Left, and the Chilean exiles were deeply affected by the political discussion around them. The debate over Eurocommunism seemed to result in the victory of a more moderate and pragmatic Left which gave great weight to the maintenance of a democratic system, even at the cost of abandoning goals of state control over the economy and greater equality. The European Left developed ideas on planning, the desirability of the mixed economy and the need for cooperation between capital, labour and the government that have profoundly affected the Chilean exiles, especially those in the socialist parties.

⁸ The US did refuse to approve credits to Chile at meetings of the Inter-American Development Bank in February 1985, and of the World Bank in March and May 1985. This action was aimed at getting Pinochet to lift the state of siege he had declared in November 1984. It was successful, though the effects were only marginal as the country is still governed under emergency decrees. The US cannot push such measures too far, especially as Chile is a model 'debtor' country, unlike, say, Argentina or Mexico. Carlos Portales, 'De 1985 a 1986: Estados Unidos y la Transición a la Democracia en Chile'. Cono Sur (Santiago) 5(2) April 1986.

The Socialist Party

Political parties play a central and dominant role in the organisation of political life in Chile—even after thirteen years of dictatorship.⁹ Electoral competition has been fierce in the past, and is likely to be as fierce in the future. Most social organisations, such as trade unions, have been closely linked to one or more parties, and still maintain these links, though with greater autonomy. One of the major aims, if not the major aim, of the dictatorship was to break the hold of parties over political life in Chile, and a principal method used was to exile leaders. Although this aim has clearly not been achieved, the impact of repression and of exile has had important effects on the parties.

The party most affected by exile and repression has been the PS, the largest party on the Left under Allende and always more divided and less cohesive than its major rival on the Left, and CP. The PS is now divided into two major blocs—the party of Ricardo Nuñez, which forms part of the Democratic Alliance along with the PDC, and the party of Almeyda, which forms part of the Popular Democratic Movement (MDP) along with the Communist Party. There are factions and divisions within these two main blocs.

These divisions are hardly surprising given the brutal political assault by the Pinochet regime on the party. In the words of one of the major leaders of the moderate (Nuñez) Socialists, Ricardo Lagos:

How can a party exist when practically all of its leadership has been exiled, ⁹ See the chapter on opposition parties in Valenzuela and Valenzuela, Military Rule in Chile . . .

imprisoned or 'disappeared'? All the regional committee of La Serena, of Atacama, of Calama, of Antofagasta, of Iquique, died. In Chile, there are only two parties that managed to maintain a unified leadership in the period of dictatorship—the PDC and the Communist Party. The rest were incapable of overcoming the organic crisis created by the dictatorship, and we were, no exception. This explains the diaspora of socialism today.¹⁰

Apart from the murder of Allende, José Tohá and Orlando Letelier, those socialist leaders who escaped a similar fate have not been allowed to return. Amongst them are Carlos Altamirano, a former Senator and Secretary-General of the party, and Clodomiro Almeyda, Allende's Foreign Secretary. Even moderate socialists such as former Secretary-General Aniceto Rodríguez have not been allowed to return. The suffering this causes is immense, and Aniceto Rodríguez writes from Venezuela: 'This illegal and inhumane sanction of exile continues crushing me worse than a sentence of perpetual imprisonment—yet I have committed no crime.'¹¹ Chilean socialism after 1973 entered a period of profound self-analysis, and this process produced two major rival interpretations of policies for the future—one towards a 'Eurosocialist' tendency, the other towards closer alliance with the communists. This debate took place largely in exile after the party in Chile was subject to fierce repression, and in effect these rival interpretations were imported back into Chile as party activity of a subdued kind gradually became possible in the 1980s.

The first major statement agreed in a clandestine meeting in Chile stressed, according to Carmelo Furci: 'an organisation based on Leninist democratic centralism homogeneous in its ideology and programme, a party that must constitute the disciplined and homogeneous revolutionary vanguard of the masses.'¹² But this apparently clear ideological line conflicted with the confused reality of the party; various exile groups claimed to be the authentic leaders of the party, and links with the small underground movement in Chile were complicated and tenuous.¹³

¹⁰ From the interview in Qué Pasa? (Santiago) 27 March 1986, p. 26.

¹¹ Hoy, 30 June 1986, p. 26.

¹² Carmelo Furci, The Crisis of the Chilean Socialist Party in 1979, Working Paper No 11, Institute of Latin American Studies, University of London, 1984. This is an invaluable source on the 1979 split. See also the exile publication Chile—America (Rome), Dossier No 54–55, 1979. An interesting reflection on the past, present and future of Chilean socialism is to be found in the book by the exiled socialist Jorge Arrate, La Fuerza Democrática de la Idea Socialista, Santiago: Ediciones Ornitorrinco, 1985.

¹³ Aniceto Rodríguez a former secretary-general of the party, exiled in Venezuela, complained bitterly that in six years of exile (1973–9) there were only two apparently representative assemblies—in Cuba and Algiers. But both in his opinion were used by manipulative minorities trying to prolong their power. See Chile—America, op. cit., p. 112.

The major split came in 1979, following a session of the central committee of the party in Algeria in 1978. It was a complicated event involving ideological differences, personal ambition, problems of communication and, presumably, foreign influences on the major groups inside the party, not least through financial pressure—though details of that kind of activity are shrouded in mystery.

The pro-communist wing of the party appointed Clodomiro Almeyda as Secretary-General, and this group forms part of the MDP alliance in Chile today. The more moderate socialists continued with Carlos Altamirano as Secretary-General, but this group was much more a 'federation of various ideological tendencies, . . . united in rejecting the Leninist party style.'¹⁴ This tendency was weakly represented in Chile at the time of the split in 1979, but it has developed rapidly since then, though autonomously from the exiled leaders; Altamirano has little influence on, or authority over, the moderate (Nuñez) socialists in the Democratic Alliance.

The Nuñez socialists seem to be more influenced by intellectual and comparative examples than by a unified line of leadership coming from exile, and they support a less utopian and less sectarian version of socialism. Ricardo Lagos, for example, stresses the necessity of constructive dialogue with the entrepreneurial sectors: 'this is the influence of European Socialism on Chilean Socialism today.'¹⁵ He points to another major influence, that of Gramsci, in the sense that he sees socialism not as a seizure of state power, but as the widespread diffusion of socialist values.¹⁶ This kind of analysis has been reinforced by the entry into the Socialist party of important sectors of the intelligentsia, once part of the MAPU party.

This moderate group has made inroads amongst the intellectuals, but the Almeyda socialists remain the dominant group with the rank-and-file. Their view of socialism remains intransigent. Almeyda defends his beliefs by the ideas expressed in the Communist Manifesto, Marxism-Leninism, and the 'dictatorship of the proletariat'. The ideas of this group reflect the belief that permanent gains for the working class can only be secured by effective control over state power, which is understandable in the context of the bitter repression that they have suffered. Their criticism of the moderate socialists is that they run the risk of becoming a mere appendage of the Christian Democrats, and that their ideas are little more than thinly disguised social democracy. The Almeyda socialists argue that they represent the historic tradition of Chilean socialism.¹⁷ Of course, this group is in danger of becoming an appendage of the communists, but their more radical policy seems to have greater appeal to the popular base of the party, though only a free election would demonstrate that.

¹⁴ Furci, Crisis . . . , p 12.

¹⁵ Interview in Qué Pasa?, 27 March 1986, p 27.

¹⁶ This is also the sentiment of one of the major theoreticians of Chilean socialism, Raúl Ampuero. Chile—America, op. cit., p 94.

Chilean socialism has always been receptive to outside influences, and has often divided over questions of ideology and of political alliance, above all with the CP. Exile has increased the variety of ideological influences on the party, and has given rise to two very different versions of socialism. Without the unifying process of electoral competition with other parties, without the strong impulse for unity that comes when the rank-and-file are able to participate fully in party activities, and with the primacy of ideological dispute that affects parties in exile, it seems that two distinct varieties of socialism will persist in separate parties.

The other parties

The CP suffered a huge loss of middle level leaders after the coup, but several dominant figures in the party were either abroad at the time of the coup (Volodia Teitelboim), or were released from Chile (Luis Corvalán). The exile leaders are firmly in control with the backing of Moscow. The CP copes reasonably well operating clandestinely, having had experience when banned in Chile for ten years after 1948. Exile does not mean loss of funds, international support and prestige, or contradictory pressures leading to splits. But there is tension between the exile leadership—with its background in congress or the union movement and adept in the Popular Front style of politics—and the rank-and-file in Chile, increasingly drawn from the young and unemployed poor of the shanty-towns who are prone to see violence as the basic political tactic.¹⁸

The CP shifted towards a more insurrectionary tactic in 1980, when it argued that violence was a legitimate tactic in the struggle to overthrow Pinochet. It seems that the change reflected a shift in the attitude of the international communist movement which emphasised the armed struggle to achieve socialism, rather than the peaceful path. The communist movement was anxious not to be always last on to the revolutionary barricades, as happened in the movement that overthrew President Somoza in Nicaragua, but there are also internal reasons for the change. The social base of the party has changed with the decline in the power of organised labour and the rise of radical unemployed youth in the shanty-towns. Anxious to tap this potential source of opposition to Pinochet, the party was prepared to use political tactics appropriate to those who could exercise influence not by going on strike but by organising protest in the shanty-towns. Moreover, this strategy appears to be paying dividends in increased support for the CP and the small urban guerrilla group unofficially associated with it, the Frente Patriótico Manuel Rodríguez.

¹⁷ See the interview with Almeyda socialist, German Correa, in Hoy, 23 September 1985.

¹⁸ The Secretary-General of the CP, Luis Corvalán is reportedly seriously ill in exile in Moscow. Partly as a result of the need to think about a successor, also on the agenda is the question of moving the party leadership back to Chile. Hoy 7 July 1986, p 11.

However, this change of line is not necessarily any more than a tactical change which can be altered again if circumstances dictate. Many experienced cadres of the CP are old-style union leaders whose approach emphasises patient work in the factories rather than impatient violence in the shanty-towns. After all, historically the CP has been rather unsuccessful in attempting insurrection, but relatively successful in engineering broad alliances of the kind embodied in the Popular Front and the Popular Unity. Chile is not Nicaragua or El Salvador, and the Frente Patriótico is not the Sandinista movement. It is doubtful if the ideological commitment of the unemployed youth is the unwavering, often life-long allegiance that has characterised communist militants in the long history of that party in Chile.

Exile has not had the same disunifying effect on the CP which it has had on the PS. The reasons are fairly clear. The CP has long been an orthodox party, very loyal to Moscow, and most leaders were exiled in the USSR or Eastern Europe. Even more than before the CP depends upon Moscow for support, not least of all for financial support. As Valenzuela and Valenzuela point out, the communists have 'benefited significantly from access to highly powerful short-wave radio broadcasts from Moscow to Chile, which have kept the regular party leadership before militants and followers while providing them with information on the internal situation and party activities.'¹⁹

The PDC has suffered from fewer traumas than the parties of the left. It has remained the largest party of the opposition, and this has led to increased international support and prestige for the party. The number of PDC exiles have been fewer and their period of exile shorter, and the presence of such obviously moderate leaders as Jaime Castillo in Venezuela and Andrés Zaldívar in Madrid (where he was President of the Christian Democratic International) has been designed to improve the image of the PDC with foreign governments and to intensify the international isolation of Chile, though there is some evidence of tension between the exiled leaders and those who remained in Chile. Exiled leaders often lived in comparative comfort, though they still had to suffer the unique problems that exile brings. Those who remained in Chile sometimes resented the return of exiles to positions of power in the party. The major dilemma for the party, however, is whether to move to the right or the left in Chile and this is only marginally affected by the issue of exile.

¹⁹ Valenzuela and Valenzuela, Military Rule in Chile . . . p 211.

The effect of exile upon the Radical Party has been broadly similar to that of the PS, but the Radicals were so badly divided before 1973 that the loss of support and the divisions of the party have been exacerbated and not caused by exile. The Radical Party in Chile, led by Enrique Silva Cimma, forms part of the Democratic Alliance and advocates policies similar to those of European social democracy. But the party in exile is dominated by one of the Vice-Presidents, Anselmo Sule, whose position is closer to that of the MDP and the communists, and whose power in the party is partly based upon control of the international funds that help to keep the party alive—for example, from the Socialist International, of which the Radical Party is a member.²⁰

The Radical Party divided into three distinct parties during the UP Government, and its electoral support declined considerably. As a weak party whose electoral base is uncertain, the additional problem of exile contributes to continuing uncertainty and impedes the unity of the old Radical constituency.

The effect of exile on the union movement is by now fairly marginal. Most union leaders of any importance on the left were killed or removed from their unions after the coup. The real weakness of the unions is the product of systematic policy by the government and would not be changed by the return of those union leaders still in exile. Immediately after the coup, many union leaders were removed from their posts, or murdered or exiled. The government dismantled protective union legislation established by the workers after years of struggle. In 1979 the government promulgated its Labour Plan which made effective collective bargaining all but impossible, and gave employers almost complete rights to dismiss workers at will. Moreover the union world has changed in many ways since the coup and returning leaders might not always find that they enjoyed the same prestige as they did under the UP. Attempts to recreate the old CUT in exile have not been notably successful. A new generation of union leaders has emerged—men like Manuel Bustos of the textile workers, Rodolfo Seguel of the copper workers and Jose Ruiz di Giorgio of the petroleum workers. Although these men, apart from Seguel, had union experience before 1973, it is only after the coup that they emerged as leaders. Their leadership stems from their contacts with the rank and file in Chile, not from links with union movement in exile.

²⁰ The ascendancy of the Silva Cimma wing seems assured with his recent election in July 1986 as one of the Vice-Presidents of the Socialist International. Quē Pasa, 26 June 1986.

Conclusions

A final solution to the problem of exile is highly unlikely unless the regime of General Pinochet is replaced by a democratic government. After the protests of 2–3 July 1986, such a change looks more likely than at any time since 1973. But the odds are against complete change while the monolithic unity of the army remains intact. Even if Pinochet stands down in 1989 (when the Constitution comes into force and the choice of President has to be ratified by a plebiscite), the problem of exile would remain unless the authoritarian Constitution is also dismantled.

Exile is not a capricious excess of authoritarian rulers in Chile: it is an intrinsic and indispensable part of that authoritarian system of rule. The rulers of Chile define their opponents as anti-patriotic and as agents of foreign powers. It is quite logical, by this reasoning, that such people be exiled, forbidden to return and in extreme cases even deprived of their nationality. War demands such extreme measures, and the rulers of Chile see themselves as engaged in a war against international communism.

If exiles are allowed to return tomorrow, it is difficult to envisage any dramatic change in the politics of Chile. The parties of the left would be reinforced by the return of prominent leaders, but such returns would be unlikely, for example, to bridge the gap between the rival socialist parties or alter the policy direction of the CP. After all, there is no one like Perón ready to return in triumph to assume political leadership of the left as he did in Argentina in 1973.

The effect of exile on the political parties has already been described.

THE EXILE QUESTION IN CHILEAN POLITICS

It is only one factor that has produced policy changes, changes of style, new ideas and new partners in the shifting world of Chilean party competition. Quite how permanent those changes are will only be known once free competitive elections are held, and the population can respond to the programmes offered by the parties.

The Government of the Saharawi Arab Democratic Republic*

History offers examples of governments or peoples in exile, particularly during the process of decolonisation, but rarely have there been instances of states in exile. There is, however, the one: the Saharawi Arab Democratic Republic (SADR).

In 1975, after the Madrid Accords, the Moroccan and Mauritanian armed forces seized the territory of the Western Sahara.¹ The Saharawi people fled from the persecution of the military and found refuge near the town of Tindouf, in Algeria. There they developed their model of state socialism. Ten years later, the Saharawis are still living in exile in the Tindouf region, but their state is recognised by the governments of sixty-five countries, and is a full member of the Organisation of African Unity (OAU). Moreover, the most recent legal studies suggest that the SADR is a true state.²

The Saharawis are represented by their national liberation movement, the Front for the Liberation of the Saguiat al-Hamra and the Rio del Oro (POLISARIO), more commonly known as the Polisario Front. Founded in 1973, the Polisario employs the same tactic as other

* Originally commissioned in French and translated by Ruth Bowden.

¹ The Madrid Accords were a tripartite agreement between Spain, Morocco and Mauritania. Under the agreement Spain effectively handed over control of the Western Sahara to the two other countries by agreeing to withdraw its troops. In return, Spain secured concessions on Ceuta and Melilla, and rights to fish off the Moroccan and Saharan coasts, and kept its 35 per cent stake in Fosbucraa, giving the compensation for the other 65 per cent to Morocco.

² Works on this longstanding controversy include: M Barbier, La Formation de la RASD, Les Fondements juridiques et institutionnels de la République Arabe Sahraouie Démocratique, Paris: Harmattan, 1984, the Proceedings of the International Jurists' Conference held in Paris, 20 and 21 October 1984, pp 42–58, and Le processus historique de la formation du peuple sahraoui, La question sahraouie, un problème historique-politique, Rome: la Fondation Lelio Basso, 1985. Proceedings of the Bologna International Conference, 15–16 November 1984, pp 26–34. Barber defines the problem in European terms, and believes the SADR is still in the process of becoming a state, and will remain in this transitory condition until the land is reintegrated. S C Saxena, on the other hand, in Le statut légal de la RASD, Les fondements juridiques, op. cit., pp 59–78, considers the SADR to be a true state in spite of its exile. Others of similar opinion are: C Bontems, La guerre du Sahara Occidental, Paris: Presse Universitaire de France, 1984 and B Terki, La république Arabe Sahraouie Démocratique, un processus d'édification nationale, duplicated doctoral thesis, Toulouse: 1986. This viewpoint seems to be shared by B Scarsia—The SADR, Naples: Fondazione Internazionale Lelio Basso, 1985—although the author argues from a purely political point of view, and does not enter into any legal analysis.

liberation movements: constant attrition of the colonial occupant, in order to speed up the transition to independence. In this respect, Spain is considered the main enemy, the aim being to banish it from the national territory.

The years 1975–6, in particular the last quarter of 1975 and the first quarter of 1976, marked a decisive turning-point in the formulation of Saharawi strategy. The Green March and the invasion of the Western Sahara territory left a lasting impression on the movement.³ Not only was the decolonisation process disrupted, African colonisers replacing European ones, but the indigenous population was driven from its own territory. The Saharawis sought refuge in one of the most inhospitable regions of the Maghreb, the Hammada del Sraa in Algeria. Despite Algerian support, settlement was a particularly painful process, and nearly half of all new-born babies died in the first few months. The Saharawi leaders realised the difficulties facing them and were aware that their land would be recovered not by military force alone but by a more subtle attempt to gather support for their claim. Between 1975 and 1976 the world hardly took the idea of a Saharawi state seriously.⁴ The future Saharawi state was portrayed as an anomaly consisting of a few thousand nomads whom history had neglected. International observers believed it would only be a matter of months before Morocco and Mauritania would take permanent control of the former Spanish colony.

The Polisario leaders were aware of the threatened extinction of the Saharawi people. Not all the Saharawis were refugees in Tindouf,⁵ but the future of the SADR depended on those who were. Aware of the Saharawis' weakness in number and of the extremely harsh conditions inhibiting their survival, the leaders believed that the population could only grow within the framework of an organised society:

Certain liberation fronts devote their efforts essentially to armed combat . . . and dedicate themselves to building their country afterwards. . . . The Polisario Front laid the foundation of the independent Saharawi society as a strategic mission in the cause of national liberation, using as its starting-point the idea that a people's purpose is to create not only military protection but also a civilised society that constructs, and evolves constantly towards, superior material and moral conditions.⁶

³ Named after the holy colour of Islam, the Green March was made by 350,000 Moroccan volunteers across the Western Sahara border to assert Morocco's claim to the land.

⁴ The articles published in the press at that time are significant. The Western Sahara is presented as a micro-state bringing more danger than advantage to the stability of the Maghreb (cf Le Monde (Paris) 8–9 and 10 December 1974; Le Monde, 27 and 28 November 1975).

⁵ For several years the Polisario maintained that the population amounted to 800,000, when it was difficult to arrive at a figure higher than 150,000 in the camps. A more realistic estimate is of 165,000 Saharawi camp residents, rather than the hypothetical 800,000.

Polisario officials wanted to avoid another exodus, in which a badly-supervised and loosely-knit population would risk being exterminated. The Saharawi people had to be prepared to confront any challenge, not only as a means of recovering its sovereignty, but also of gaining true cultural, economic and political independence. A refugee population, in cutting itself off from its roots, risks becoming a disorganised mass, shunted from one area to another, with no choice but to lose its cultural identity and be assimilated into any country that will accept it. By developing their own form of self-government, the Saharawis have avoided this fate. Their institutions have not become ossified but have remained flexible, adapting to changing domestic and international circumstances.

Institutional organisation: from exodus to state

As the exodus of the Saharawi people reached its peak during the first three months of 1976, many foreign observers spoke of 'Palestinians in the Maghreb'.⁷ Though superficially apt, this comparison is fundamentally mistaken. Like the Palestinians, the Saharawis were driven from their land by a foreign invader, but having learned from the mistakes of the Palestinians, the Saharawis have taken every action possible to preserve the unity of their people. This commitment to unity operates on two levels. The first level concerns the international community, where the commitment anticipates or is conditioned by events; the SADR's successive constitutions reflect this point. The second level concerns the Saharawi people, a constant effort being made to integrate the elements of Saharawi society into a single entity: the Saharawi state. The process entails adopting the terminology of the West, while relying on Saharawi traditions, endeavouring to mobilise the people in a way that is relevant to modern life.

Background to the Constitution⁸

In February 1976 Spain announced that it would finally withdraw from ⁶ Sahara Libre, 15 June 1982, p 10.

⁷ 'Les Palestiniens du Maghreb', Libération, 2-8 February 1976.

⁸ In addition to the works mentioned above, the following may also be consulted: C Bontems, Réflexions sur les institutions du peuple sahraoui, Sahara Info, January-March 1985, 72, pp XVI-XXI; C Bontems, Le fonctionnement des institutions de la RASD, Les fondements juridiques et institutionnels, op. cit., pp 108-21; La questione del Sahara Occidentale: Profilo Storico e Documentazione, Rome: Fondazione Internazionale Ielio Basso, 1985, p 34.

the Western Sahara by 26 February 1976. The Spanish presence had given the Western Sahara a colonial identity, and the departure left a constitutional void which Morocco and Mauritania could have used to their advantage, by annexing the Sahara and destroying its autonomy.⁹ To oppose Moroccan and Mauritanian claims, the President of the National Sahawari Provisional Council (NSPC) declared the birth of the SADR at Bir Lahlou on the evening of 27 February 1976, witnessed by some forty foreign journalists.¹⁰ A brief constitutional text consisting of eighteen articles was subsequently made public. When the Third Congress of the Polisario Front was held on 26–30 August 1976, a more complete text of thirty-one articles was adopted. It was further completed at the Fifth Congress in October 1982 and the Sixth Congress in December 1985. The final text comprised thirty-eight articles.¹¹

These constitutions are partly aimed at an international public and they affirm the existence of an organised Saharawi people. Each text has two sections. The first lays down the general principles governing the SADR; the second describes the main institutions of government. The general principles link the SADR with the international system, while the governmental institutions are conducive to a democratic system and give the state its own identity.

Principles of the Constitution

These principles were set out in the first Constitution and were only slightly modified in August 1976. The text revised at the Third Congress was further developed in 1982 and 1985.

First, 'the Saharawi people are an Arab, African and Muslim people. They opt for a policy of non-alignment.'¹² Consequently 'the SADR belongs to the Arab nation, the African family and the Third World community'.¹³ By defining itself in relation to its people, the SADR

⁹ This legal void had been well identified by Morocco. Thus, on 14 January 1976, it enlisted the cooperation of the President of the Djemaa (an organisation set up by the Spanish in 1967 to represent the Saharawi people) in ratifying the Madrid Accords.

¹⁰ The Council was created on 28 November 1975 and was intended to replace the colonial Djemaa. See T Hodges, Historical Dictionary of the Western Sahara, London: The Scarecrow Press, 1982, p 290.

¹¹ The different constitutional texts have been published in the following editions: Constitution of February 1976: North African Yearbook, Paris: Centre Nationale de la Recherche Scientifique, (15), 1976), pp 906 onwards; Constitution August 1976: M O Hinz, The Western Sahara's Right to Self-Determination, Bonn: Dritter Welt Verlag 1978, pp 135 onwards; Constitution of October 1982: Les fondements juridiques et institutionnels, op. cit., pp 152 onwards; Constitution of December 1985: Sahara Libre, December 1985, p 5.

¹² Preamble to the Constitution.

¹³ Constitution, Article 2.

indicates its loyalties. It takes as its model the group of societies to which it is attached by history and geography, rather than European society. The Arab, African, Islamic and Third World philosophies each contribute to the Saharawi identity. The Arab culture has contributed its history, language, tradition and culture. The African affiliation binds the Saharawis to a continent which is striving to surmount its colonial past, achieve unity and thereby establish its independence in the face of a second drive for colonial hegemony by the West. This connection has been very important since 1976, and Africa has given the strongest support to the SADR. Islam commits SADR to a set of values that have recently enabled previously dominated people to safeguard their identity and reassert their independence. Nevertheless, Islam's anti-colonial values lose much of their relevance here since the aggression the Saharawis suffer itself stems from Muslim countries. This fact explains the distinct place given to Islam in the Saharawi constitution, as it pertains much more to internal affairs and the Saharawi people than to international ties.¹⁴ Lastly, the affinity with Third World countries testifies to the Saharawis' avowed involvement in the struggle of developing countries against developed nations which attempt to impose their economic order on the rest of the world.

This solidarity has two aspects. First, the SADR asserts that its struggle is universal to Third World countries seeking real independence. Second, this quest for a common identity entails the use of certain structural ties as a means of gaining independence. The contradictions between the three groups—Arab, African and Third World—must somehow be overcome.¹⁵ The contradiction between African and Arab cultures may for instance be resolved by positing a Maghrebian unity as an intermediary stage.¹⁶

¹⁴ Constitution, Article 3: 'Islam, the state religion, is the source of legislation . . .'

¹⁵ These groups are qualitatively differentiated. Thus it is a question of the Arab 'nation' (Ummah), the African 'family' and the Third World 'Community': Constitution article 2. The distinction between these groups was well established in the National General Programme adopted at the third congress in August 1976 (M O Hinz, The Western Sahara's Right . . . op. cit., pp 127 onwards). Arab unity may be achieved in a cultural and structural way, on condition that reactionary Arab regimes are ended. (It is obvious that this is aimed at Morocco and Saudi Arabia). African unity is a product of geopolitics, that is, the unity of the Third World develops from the international class struggle: 'The struggle, within the context of the Third World is a major contribution to the overturning of the plots hatched by imperialism against the will of the people, against their true emancipation, so they may continue to pillage their rich natural resources.' (ibid., p 130).

¹⁶ Constitution. Article 4: 'The search for the unity of the peoples of the Arab and Maghreb peoples is a step towards Arab and African unity'.

The first chapter of the Constitution deals specifically with the rights of the Saharawi citizens: they are equal before the law. They are guaranteed the right to education, health and social care and freedom of expression.¹⁷ Private ownership is not abolished but is protected on condition that no exploitation occurs.¹⁸ Some writers have attempted to calculate, from the basis of these few written declarations, the extent of socialisation achieved by the Saharawi regime.¹⁹ This method does not produce any convincing conclusions, since it fails to reveal any of the SADR's originality, simply measuring the SADR's Constitution against the ideal democratic model.²⁰

System of government

A simple reading of the Constitution does not indicate how the institutions of government work, nor how the Polisario Front overlaps with the state machinery. In the Constitution, these aspects are dealt with in Western terms. Thus the Arab-African-Third World powers are formally stated in an unrealistic way. The legislature does not make laws and the judiciary has no power.²¹ Numerous other examples illustrate the extent to which the Constitution simply borrows terms from the Western world, apparently bowing to the supremacy of the Western democratic model.²²

The SADR, however, does not conform to the European model and its originality lies in its institutional framework. The concept of the people takes precedence over that of the nation and occupies a key position in the state.²³ This is the first break with Western thought, and the idea of the nation is deliberately excluded. By this exclusion the SADR

¹⁷ Constitution, Articles 6 and 7

¹⁸ Constitution, Article 8.

¹⁹ M Barbier, Le conflit du Sahara Occidental, Paris. Harmattan, 1982, p 205.

²⁰ It is important, however, to note that certain specific points (Arab or Islamic) have been reintroduced into this model of the democratic ideal, in particular the role of the family (article 5: 'The family, the basis of society, is founded on morality and religion'), and that of religion, which is closely linked with the construction of the state (Article 3).

²¹ Constitution, articles 21 and 27. The Constitution lays down the consultative powers of the legislature. In a public interview in Sahara Libre (February 1986, p 8), the President of the Saharawi National Council declared the following on judicial power: 'It is based on the principle of the separation of powers, which enables complete independence for sentences to be passed and legal codes to be developed'. This shows the extent to which the concept of 'separation of power' carries a meaning other than that attributed to it by European constitutional thought.

²² This readiness to refer to the European model is illustrated by the Memorandum relating to the proclamation of the Saharawi Arab Democratic Republic, published 20 May 1976, M O Hinz, The Right op. cit., p 91 onwards.

²³ On the importance of the concept of the people in Saharawi ideology, see C Bontems, Les fondements, op. cit., p 110 and Memorandum relating to the proclamation of the SADR, M O Hinz, op. cit., p 92 onwards.

deliberately distances itself from the historical tradition that has founded nations, and been written by colonialists, hence rejecting Moroccan claims on the grounds of their being based on tradition and history rather than on people's needs. The idea of the people's primacy is immutable. It is based on Saharawi cultural and communal values. As the Saharawis justifiably point out, in international law people have rights as well as states.²⁴

The people confer legitimacy on each of the Saharawi institutions. Every year they attend the Popular Base Congress.²⁵ This congress votes for the popular committees and their presidents, and every three years chooses representatives to the General Popular Congress.²⁶ The General Popular Congress in turn selects the seven members of the supreme organ of the SADR: the Council for the Command of the Revolution (CCR),²⁷ as well as the twenty-seven members of the Political Bureau.²⁸ This Congress also discusses and adopts the national plan and the political manifesto. Leadership is assumed by the CCR and its role is to remain a joint one with the Polisario Front's Executive Committee²⁹ until full sovereignty is achieved. This provides an example of ideological machinery (the Polisario Front) overlapping closely with state apparatus (the CCR). This lack of distinction is dictated by the need to preserve the unity of the population. Since 1982 the General Secretary of the Polisario Front has also been the Head of State.³⁰ The competence of the CCR is general: 'matters of sovereignty and legislation fall within the competence of the Council for the Command of the Revolution, and it decides on the general policies of the State'.³¹ The CCR ensures ideological acceptance of the national plan adopted by the General Popular Congress.

²⁴ Ibid., p 92: 'Today, there are the rights of peoples, and not merely the rights of states, so they may exercise their sovereignty'.

²⁵ Constitution, article 34, which was added at the Popular General Congress of December 1985. This clause sanctioned what was already common practice. The Constitution, a purely formal document, was enriched by rules deriving from practices already part of the Saharawi lifestyle.

²⁶ The Popular General Congress has met at variable intervals, originally every year (May 1973, August 1974), then every two years (August 1976, September 1978), then every four years (October 1982), and finally every three years (December 1985).

²⁷ The number of members of the CCR has varied since its foundation. It was originally 9. In 1982, at the Fifth Congress, this figure was down to 7, and stayed the same in 1985.

²⁸ The number of members of the Political Bureau has also varied. It has increased at each congress. Originally 21, in 1982 it went up to 25, and to 27 in 1985. This increase is bound to the growth in the number of daira (whose presidents are automatically members of the Saharawi National Council), and the increase in posts with immediate access to the Political Bureau (the office of wali, for example).

²⁹ Constitution, Article 38.

³⁰ Ibid., Article 13.

³¹ Ibid., Article 12.

The CCR's duties include that of nominating the thirteen ministers.³² The ministers perform the increasingly technical role of implementing the Council's decisions and have no political power. Certain changes have taken place since 1984. Until 1984, pre-eminence seemed to have been granted to the ideological apparatus, the Polisario Front taking precedence over the CCR. Since the accession of the SADR to the OAU, and its election to the vice-presidency of this regional organisation, however, emphasis has shifted to the issue of the SADR's statehood. The Polisario Front is becoming eclipsed by the Republic, and greater efforts are being made to lend more credence to the SADR's status as a bona fide state. Moreover, the ministerial team was considerably strengthened at the last General Popular Congress, as the number of ministers rose from nine to thirteen. This enlargement highlights the Saharawis' interest in certain sectors, especially the economy. Various ministries emerged concerned with economic development, transport, construction, as well as the economic infrastructure as a whole. The Office of Information, which until then had been directly responsible to the Prime Minister, came under the CCR. It is clear that the Saharawis intend to devote their energies equally to fulfilling their right to sovereignty and solving the problems resulting from the population growth in the Tindouf region.

The Saharawi National Council is intended to wield legislative power, but in practice this function belongs more to the CCR.³³ Nevertheless, the National Council does occupy a very important position, and consists entirely of elected members with specific functions. It brings together the twenty-seven members of the Political Bureau as well as the twenty-five presidents of the different Councils in the camps (the daira). The former are elected by the National Congress and are responsible for issues of national concern, while the latter, appointed by members of the camp, are responsible for local matters. In this way, the National Council provides the means of fusing both the people's and the CCR's aspirations. There is no separation of powers in the National Council.

Seven of the Constitution's articles are devoted to judicial power. The Constitution lays down courts of first instance, a court of appeal, a supreme court and a state security court.³⁴ Although this hierarchical structure was referred to in a recent interview it is doubtful whether it is being implemented.³⁵ The state security court was conceived to counter dissident movements that might threaten the unity of the Saharawi revolution, a threat that has so far not materialised. In other areas of jurisdiction, a system is elaborated which is far too cumbersome for the life-style of the camps' inhabitants. In practice, a committee for social affairs in each camp deals with the minor differences within the community. These committees make complex judicial machinery unnecessary. According to the Constitution, the judiciary wields no power, as magistrates are nominated. In practice, the judiciary does have power because the members of the popular committees are elected by the members of the camps.

³² Ibid., Article 14.

³³ Ibid., Article 21. All of the Constitution's clauses relating to the Saharawi National Council (Articles 21 to 26) appear in Chapter III, under the heading 'The Legislature'.

³⁴ Constitution, Articles 32 and 33.

The SADR has a small decision-making body which is elected by the people, while the power of negotiation rests in the hands of local government leaders. This system is profoundly democratic, and conducive to the preservation of SADR's unity.

The few people in power remain loyal. The majority of the CCR's present members have been in office since 1976.³⁶ The same applies to the Council of Ministers and the Political Bureau. Contrary to Western practice, officials enter political office (the Political Bureau, for example) via administrative jobs. Thus the wali (members of the Political Bureau appointed by the Minister of the Interior and backed by the CCR) automatically become members of the Political Bureau, and the same opening exists to officials of mass organisations such as women, workers and young people. Election to the top of such an organisation opens the door to membership of the Political Bureau. An increasing number of women hold political and administrative positions and three women are members of the Political Bureau: Fatimatou Allali (Principal of the Women's School of 27 February), Senniya Ahmed (Wali of Smara) and Guejmoula Ebbi, officials of the National Union of Saharawi Women (NUSW).

Tradition and modernity

The SADR's constitution is derived largely from European thought, but the day-to-day running of Saharawi society rests on tradition. Traditional values are preserved to enable the Saharawis to survive in difficult conditions. These values also mediate between Saharawi society and the modern world.

³⁵ Sahara Libre, February 1986, p 8.

³⁶ On the members of the CCR, see Tony Hodges' Historical Dictionary, op. cit.

In 1976 the Saharawis who took refuge in the Tindouf region were divided into three large groups called wilaya, which were divided into daira (camps).³⁷ Until 1985 there were twenty-one camps, twenty of which were officially registered by the SADR.³⁸ In 1985 a fourth wilaya was set up; the number of registered dairas increased to twenty-five, and the total number of camps to twenty-six.³⁹ The dairas are evidence of the link between tradition and modernity.

Each administrative area (wilaya and daira) is named after a Western Sahara locality. In the early days of exile, the refugees used this geographical reference to re-assemble on the basis of their native areas, hence preserving former social links and encouraging continued mutual cooperation. This process was designed to make the reintegration of the population easier once independence had been achieved. Eleven years on, this motive has lost much of its importance. Marriages between Saharawis from different daira and wilaya have reduced the geographical reference to a mere symbol. The Tindouf is seen not as a totally foreign land,⁴⁰ but as a miniature Western Sahara, a temporary substitute for the homeland.

The daira integrates tradition with modern life. Each daira is divided into four sections, each quarter comprising rows of tents, generally in multiples of five. The tents are assigned to one of the five Popular Committees. The row, the quarter, the daira and the wilaya are as much an administrative arrangement as the old system of family tents, tribal divisions, and groupings of tribes.

The Saharawi tradition of solidarity is constantly emphasised. The ³⁷ Tony Hodges, ibid., pp 359–60. The three wilaya are called El Ayoun, Dakhla and Smara.

³⁸ The daira of El Ayoun are: Bou Craa, Boujdour, Daora, Echderia, Guelta Zemmour and Hagounia; of Dakhla: Aoussert, Argoub, Bir Enzaren, El Foula Gleibat, La Guera, Mijek and Tichla. The Smara wilaya consists of: Amgala, Bir Lehlou, El Farsia, Haousa, Jdiriya, Mahbes and Tifariti. Near the school of 27 February is a camp (the twenty-first) not yet constitutionally a daira.

³⁹ From then on the wilaya were as follows: Aoussert, El Ayoun, Dakhla and Smara. Six new daira were created. The daira were allocated to the wilaya as follows—the wilaya of Aoussert: Aguenit, Bir Gandous, Zug (all new), La Guera, Mijek and Tichla (all ex-Dakhla). Wilaya of El Ayoun: Amgala (ex-Smara), Bou Craa, Daora, Echderia, Guelta Zemmour and Hagounia. Wilaya of Dakhla: Ain Beida, M'Dreiga, J'reifa (all new), Boujdour (ex-El Ayoun). Argub, Bir N'zaran, and El Foula Gleibat. Wilaya of Smara: Birt Lehlou, El Farsia, Haousa, Jdiriya, Mahbes and Tifariti.

⁴⁰ The status of the Tindouf region merits closer attention. To the international community, Algeria holds firm to its claim to sovereignty over this territory. In the eyes of the Saharawis, Algeria behaves as if the camps were in Saharawi territory. So frontier posts have been put up in this zone. The advantage of this system is that it creates a true sanctuary for the Saharawis (any attack on the camps would be considered an attack against Algeria), and also that the Saharawis may more easily establish their own identity and so achieve complete independence.

reference to the assabiyya, described by Ibn Khaldoun,⁴¹ is always present. The Saharawis can only survive if they embrace solidarity with enthusiasm. An element of fanaticism is necessary in every struggle for independence. The decolonisation of the Muslim world was given impetus by a particular expression of religious zeal, the jihad. This ideology was indispensable in convincing the fighters to accept their own martyrdom. The Polisario, fighting against a Muslim occupier, cannot rely on jihad ideology. The population is mobilised by a more Saharan, less Arab or Muslim, tradition. The mutual support among Saharawis results in the uniformity of family heritage. Every aspect of life is a common concern, one example being the Saharawi wedding, where the marriage of two Saharawi people is a collective matter. The members of the community make the tent, the matting, and the bedcovers for the newlyweds, and each time a new home is set up it is provided with the same contents. The whole community organises the wedding. Saharawi communities encourage the continuity of religious traditions, while emptying them of their individualist and materialist content. According to Islamic tradition, the groom gives a gift (cadaq) to the bride at the end of the marriage ceremony, but the absence of money in Saharawi society makes this impossible. Instead, the qadi gives a small amount of the community's money to the groom, who gives it to the bride, who then returns it to the qadi.

Administration and cohesion

According to the Constitution, each camp meets annually for a Popular Base Congress at which the various administrative institutions are set up.⁴² In fact, the Congress merely names the President of the Popular Council responsible for running the daira. The other members of the Popular Council are mainly officials on the five Popular Committees and they attend the council as representatives of their respective committees. Other people working for the wilaya include officials of large organisations and representatives of essential services (Red Crescent, qadis, local militia officials, etc). The President is not the only one to be elected; all officials are given the people's vote of confidence, even the Committee officials are elected by their respective committee. The Popular Council resembles the former djemaa which, under an elected leader, was composed of people selected for their competence, ⁴¹ Ibn Khaldoun, Al-Muqaddima, Paris: Sinbad, 1978. Vol. 1, ch 2, para 7 onwards.

⁴² Constitution, Article 34.

THE GOVERNMENT OF THE SADR

and each member is admitted by the community.⁴³ This way of meeting camp members' needs has direct repercussions on the level of the wilaya. Each of the four wilaya has a Popular Council in turn made up of the presidents of the dairas' Popular Councils and the five directors of the specialised departments. All important matters debated in the daira, are transferred to the agenda of the wilaya. The wilaya Popular Council is presided over by the wali. If questions regarding day-to-day life in the camps reach the wilaya via the presidents of the Popular Councils, responsibility for overall policy is transferred to the wilaya and from there via the wali to the daira. As the body in which the people's aspirations and centralised power are fused, the wilaya professes to favour dialogue.

Economy and mobilisation

The fact that the Saharawis have not merely remained refugees, awaiting rescue by international aid, is largely due to the economic and social infrastructure set up by the Polisario. The key word used by Saharawi leaders is still self-sufficiency. Since 1976, the leaders have realised the importance of believing independence to be attainable.⁴⁴ The effort towards self-sufficiency is more important than the degree of success in achieving it. The ultimate purpose of seeking self-sufficiency is to mobilise all the people enabling them to realise their full potential. The Saharawis must believe that they can attain this goal, even if exile makes it impossible.⁴⁵ This commitment to self-sufficiency keeps the people active and prevents them from assuming the passive mentality of a disaster victim, as well as providing the world with evidence of the Saharawis' ability to govern themselves. The results of the Saharawis' socio-economic policy will not be analysed here; their achievements in health and education, their arable agriculture and craft industry testify ⁴³ B Terki, Le République Arabe Sahraouie, op. cit., p 315 onwards.

⁴⁴ This will to self-sufficiency existed before exile started, as early as the second Congress in August 1974. It was strongly asserted in the Programme adopted at the third Congress in August 1976: "count on our own strength" is the principle to be imperatively carried out so that our people may assert their full capability and achieve total independence' (M O Hinz, op. cit., p 132).

⁴⁵ Although remarkable advances have been achieved in health, education and production, the situation may become critical from now on. It is not certain that the Hammada del Draa region can accommodate a population with a prolific rate of demographic growth, particularly when the price of certain products threatens the economies of the Third World countries who have been the SADR's best defenders and allies. Production, still relatively low, will not be able to keep pace with the population growth, and more food will have to be provided by international aid agencies. The secondary education sector faces the same predicament. Only healthcare seems little affected by the demographic growth.

to their success.⁴⁶ The economic structures which have led to these successes will, however, be discussed below. The economic activity of the population is organised at the daira level. The inhabitants of each quarter in the camps are assigned to one of five Popular Committees:⁴⁷

- the Popular Committee for education, responsible for literacy and the efficient running of the schools;
- the Popular Committee for Health carries out health education programmes and manages the local health care centres;
- the Committee for Social Affairs deals with small legal disputes and family issues;
- the Committee for Provisions distributes food and runs the warehouses; and
- the Committee for the Craft Industry preserves traditions of craftsmanship and manages the workshops that supply the camps.⁴⁸

In this way, each Tindouf refugee belongs to a Committee and participates in essential economic activity. This participation enables each Committee not only to service the economy, but also to provide a training ground for the whole community.

The economic mobilisation of the population is hierarchically organised. Each row of tents is represented on a Popular Committee and each quarter has its own committee with its appointed representative. The same principle applies to the daira. The five daira Popular Committee officials who are also members of the daira Popular Council, are elected by this procedure. Many Committee officials are women. Each daira has five specialist departments, one per Popular Committee, and each of these departments has a Director, appointed by the supervisory Minister (eg: the Minister of Health appoints the Director of the Department of Health). The wilaya has no specialist system of economic representation, because its function is administrative; the wilaya's Council consists of presidents of wilaya Popular Councils and directors of specialist departments.

Ideology and national identity

Ever since the first few congresses, the Polisario has seen its task as the development of national identity and the training of those to develop ⁴⁶ B Terki, La République Arabe Sahraouie, op. cit., p 299 onwards.

⁴⁷ There were originally nine Popular Committees. Four were abolished in 1977: commerce, transport, livestock breeding and the Red Crescent.

⁴⁸ B Terki, op. cit., p 302 onwards; and L'Armée de Libération Populaire Sahraouie, de la colonisation espagnole à l'agression marocaine, Reghoua, Algiers: SNED Department of Information 1980, p 214 onwards.

it.⁴⁹ At the fifth Congress in 1982 the national consciousness was considered to have evolved,⁵⁰ although the training programme was incomplete.⁵¹

The row of tents with its five-committee representation plays an important role in promoting a unified ideology. Its inhabitants comprise a cell. Each cell appoints the person responsible for group activities and these representatives constitute a daira body that comes under the Department of Planning. This Department is run by a political prefect appointed by the Minister of the Interior. The wilaya also has a Department of Planning which encompasses all the political prefects as well as the presidents of the Popular Councils. Each wilaya's Department of Planning is managed by the wali, who acts as political prefect for the wilaya.

The originality of the SADR lies in the positive use that is made of the Saharawis' deficiency in number. Every inhabitant of the Tindouf region has political, economic and ideological roles—the state and ideological machinery completely intertwine. Political and economic activities are not separated under this democratic system, and election to a position of technical responsibility (economic or administrative) often leads to one of political responsibility. The reverse is equally true.⁵² Although this system is perfectly adapted to the exiled population, it is neither temporary, nor solely circumstantial to the conflict with Morocco. The Polisario has a considerably more comprehensive, global vision of the Saharawi people and their government.

⁴⁹ These aims are very clearly stated in the various texts adopted at each of the National Congresses of the Polisario Front. Examples are the Political Manifestos adopted at the 1974 and the 1978 Congress, as well as the Programmes of National Action adopted in 1974 and 1976. Few alterations were made in 1985: 'To politicise, organise, train the masses, within the framework of the Polisario Front' (Programme of National Action, 1974, cf M D Hinz, op. cit., p 118) 'To carry out the work of cultivating political awareness and the consolidation of political organisation'. Programme of National Action, 1985, cf Sahara Libre, December 1985, special issues, p 7

⁵⁰ 'The majority of our people are trained within the Polisario Front. The political awareness of our people has spread and deepened thanks to the political organisation' Political Manifesto of the Fifth Congress, cf Fifth Congress of the Polisario Front, Paris: Harmattan 1983, p 26.

⁵¹ 'To increase mass participation in the running of state affairs, by the election of popular authorities and the training of executives to a level of competence and specialisation that will equip them to settle state matters.' Programme of National Action, 1985, Sahara Libre, December 1985, special issue, p 7.

⁵² Contradictory examples include officials of mass organisations (General Union of Workers of Saguia el Hamra and Rio de Oro (GUWSARIO), National Union of Saharawi Women (NUSW) etc) automatically becoming members of the Political Bureau, by virtue of their being elected to a position of responsibility; conversely, the walis are chosen from the members of the Political Bureau.

Institutional dynamics: the state today and tomorrow

In place virtually since SADR's inception, these institutions have had to adapt to the problems caused by population growth. The solution has been to set up a fourth *wilaya*⁵³ and an account of how this was done will indicate the SADR's possible future strategy. While those sections of the population living in Morocco and Mauritania and in the Moroccan-occupied Saharawi land are taken into account in political decisions, many questions are being asked regarding the future integration of all the groups of Saharawi society following independence.

The state and population growth

The population growth in the camps has three causes. First, the higher fertility of Saharawi women; demographic growth is the only possible response to the threat of genocide for any people outnumbered by their enemy. Second, the improvements in hygiene which the Saharawis consented to have yielded rewards and infant mortality is remarkably low. Third, the Saharawi's growing national identity and determination to win back their homeland have led to an increasing number of settlers in the Tindouf region.⁵⁴ One of the problems caused by population growth has been a shortage of water. Because of the difficulty in sinking wells, and the limited water output, large numbers of people cannot live in the same areas and the people have had to disperse throughout the land conceded by Algeria. This is the reason for the creation of the fourth wilaya.⁵⁵

In April 1986 I visited the wilaya of Aoussert and had a long conversation with the wali of Aoussert, Lahcen Lehratani. The first task in starting another wilaya was to find a site. The crucial factor here was the phreatic level. A layer of drinkable water had to be found.⁵⁶ Before

⁵³ 'It should be remembered that the recent construction of the wilaya of Aoussert is in response to the demographic growth of our citizens, out of a concern to bring them closer to the authority and out of a wish to serve them better'. Interview with Abdelkader Taleb Omar, Minister of the Interior, Sahara Libre, February 1986, special issue, p. 12

⁵⁴ Some 'internationalists' maintain with great conviction, although they have not actually been to the Tindouf camps, that the latter are staged by the Algerians. According to this argument, there is no such thing as a Saharawi people, but Tuaregs, Malis and citizens of Niger placed there by the Algerian government to give the impression of a Saharawi people who, according to these fervent fictionalists, are all zealous followers of Hassan II. The camp inhabitants all speak Hassaniyya, a language indigenous to the Saharawis. Moreover, it is difficult to imagine how the Tuareg, Mali and Niger people would have agreed to live for ten years in one of the world's most inhospitable regions, when it would be easy for them to leave and return to their home countries or, even simpler, to travel the few kilometres to Morocco.

⁵⁵ cf note 56.

⁵⁶ It may seem obvious that deserts lack water but this is not the case. The Hammada del Draa does not lack a phreatic layer, but it is often salty. The site of Aoussert was chosen for its fresh water moving the people, the community's infrastructure had to be built: schools, dispensaries and administrative buildings. Members of various popular movements ensured that the permanent structures were erected. Only then were the people brought to the wilaya. Saharawi families from a cross-section of age-groups were chosen to make the journey and consented because they knew it was the most logical solution, not because there were no alternatives, nor due to any definite agreement. Those who went to Aoussert found themselves in conditions identical to those which they had left. They accepted the situation because they had to survive, and their attitude demonstrates the Saharawis' ability to adapt to new surroundings.

The state and the people

The important role granted to the people in Saharawi ideology applies not merely to those in Tindouf, but to all those who identify with the same culture. Their politics have not evolved solely because of circumstances—the will for greater democracy existed before the exodus, and even during the Polisario's Second Congress, there was an insistence on 'the return of the political exiles to live among the natural inhabitants . . .'.⁵⁷ Before 1976, the Polisario defined the Saharawis as one people, including all those living in the Western Sahara as well as those who had taken refuge in neighbouring countries after the 'Ecouvillon' and 'Ouragon' operations, and Spain's retaliation against Saharawi demands for independence.

From 1976 the idea of the people acquires a new dimension. The concept evolved in Tindouf under the impetus of state socialism and combat. Far from being isolated, the Saharawis in Moroccan-occupied territory are constantly referred to by Polisario leaders and no distinction is made between those in exile and those who have stayed—all are part of the struggle for independence.⁵⁸ Certain Saharawis have for various reasons rallied to the Moroccan monarchy,⁵⁹ but this is never mentioned.

⁵⁷ M O Hinz, op. cit., p 115.

⁵⁸ 'Part of the SADR still suffers under Moroccan occupation. The Saharawis' resistance there is admirable. Their endurance and perseverance brings together the struggle of the whole Saharawi population. The Saharawis intend, first and foremost, to preserve their culture, their way of being, by standing firmly by it.' The Saharawi Arab Democratic Republic, past and present, SADR: Ministry of Information, 1985, pp 53–4.

⁵⁹ One such person is Bachir Figuigui, better known under the pseudonym of Edouardo Moha, founder of the Resistance Movement of the Blue Men (MOREHOB), who, in return for some payment, transferred his allegiance to the Moroccan monarchy. T Hodges, Historical Dictionary, op. cit., p 248.

The Saharawis are stronger and more united than might be expected. There are four groups of varying importance. In addition to the exiles in Tindouf and the Saharawis in Moroccan-occupied zones, there are the small communities in the lands liberated by the Saharawi Popular Liberation Army (SPLA). Their lifestyle and economy are very close to the ancient nomadic traditions. The final group are those who fled from the Franco-Spanish military operations, Ecouvillon and Ouragon, in 1958, and settled in Mauritania.

Links exist between all these groups. Cooperation between the SADR and the Saharawis living under Moroccan rule is compelled to secrecy, but the instances of passive resistance and the number of Saharawis entering the camps to escape oppression confirms the durability of this liaison.⁶⁰ There are more obvious links between the other groups.

The Saharawis living in the liberated zones are in touch with SPLA units. Their failure to join the camps does not mean that they reject their compatriots' efforts to build a new state, but more simply that they wish to preserve their traditions. This position is recognised by the SADR who have never sought to impose their model of state socialism on them. The same applies to the Saharawis in Mauritania. Some have adapted to the Mauritanian culture while others continue to see themselves as Saharawi. Relations are growing between these communities. The Mauritanian-based Saharawis periodically visit the camps and there is modest trade between the groups, which is tolerated by the authorities.⁶¹

These various observations suggest that the Saharawis are one people in culture and tradition and are engaged in the same struggle. The whole people gives the Polisario Front its terms of reference and this fact provides the answer to the questions about what will happen after independence: How will the inhabitants of the currently occupied zone live with those returning from exile? The answer is that the Polisario Front accepts diversity and that a new society will result from the integration of communities which are united by their past and have a common cultural heritage. Only the present struggle has separated them.

⁶⁰ This liaison was ensured by the repressive policies of the Moroccans in the occupied territory. To add credibility to the myth of Moroccan sovereignty in the Western Sahara, the Moroccans tried systematically to destroy the Saharawi culture. Hassaniyya is a taboo language in educational establishments, and it is forbidden to wear Saharawi costume. The enforcement of such rules and the punishment accompanying refusal to comply have strengthened the Saharawis' spirit of resistance.

⁶¹ Although it is difficult to verify the truth of these assertions, it would seem that money does circulate, in small amounts, in the camps. The money comes from pensions that some Saharawis still receive from their former Spanish employers (public and private). A further allegation is that there are places where a few small luxuries may be bought. The goods are brought by the Saharawis living in Mauritania, who are at the forefront of this embryonic 'free economy'.

Conclusion

The Saharawi institutions seem profoundly contradictory. At the level of discussion, they appear to be replicas of the European constitutional model. However, certain aspects of Saharawi political practice deserve closer attention. The mobilisation of the people is very effective, every Saharawi being made aware of his contribution towards building of the country and of working towards real progress. This effectiveness explains how the SADR has been transformed from a tribal to a national system in such a short time. This success is due to two factors:

- 1) The use of Saharawi social and cultural traditions. Modernism is seen not as a break with the Saharawi past, but with the colonial past. Establishing new institutions seems to have brought about an evolution that might have occurred had colonisation not intervened. Contrary to experience elsewhere in the Muslim world, there is no antagonism between tradition and modernity in Saharawi society.
- 2) SADR officials have skilfully mobilised key sectors, particularly education, health, and the economy. Although generally neglected by international aid, the people feel no loss of control over their destiny, but rather that they are contributing to its advancement. Visitors have confirmed that the Saharawis do not behave like refugees waiting to be rescued by international charity. There is a difference in attitude between certain African peoples driven from their land by drought and the Saharawi people who live on far more arid land, which can be explained by the political and ideological commitment sustained by firm and effective social structures. The Saharawis in the Tindouf region have ceased to be refugees and have become fighters for independence. Furthermore, the experience of the SADR has been elevated to a symbolic level and the Saharawis living under Moroccan rule have placed all their hopes in the SADR. For these people, freedom can be achieved only if it is practised in the camps. Their confidence stems from the Saharawi leaders' ability to embody their people's hopes and without exploiting them for ulterior motives.

Often, freedom has failed to bring the benefits it promised. New governments have not learnt to promote the democracy the people aspired to when oppressed. The Saharawi experience suggests that it is possible for a people to free themselves from colonial tutelage and at the same time preserve their ideal of freedom and democracy.

Civil war and the coalition government of Democratic Kampuchea

The so-called 'Coalition Government of Democratic Kampuchea' must be recognized for what it is—neither a coalition, nor a government, nor democratic.

Ben Kiernan¹

An exiled person is ordinarily thought to be a sub-species of the category, 'refugee'. More specifically, an exile is one who is a refugee for political reasons, and is also in some sense a leader, or otherwise of high social status. A refugee is formally defined as any 'person who, owing to well-founded fear of being persecuted for reasons of race, religion or nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion, is outside the country of his nationality and is unable, or owing to such fear, . . . is unwilling to return to it.'² Definitions such as these can assume great importance, as for example when a country may define refugees not as such but rather as 'illegal immigrants'.

Whether or not the Coalition Government of Democratic Kampuchea (CGDK) can technically be considered an 'exile' government is, correspondingly, an interesting question. Certainly the CGDK is exiled from political life in the national capital, Phnom Penh, which is ruled by the Vietnamese-backed People's Republic of Kampuchea (PRK). Democratic Kampuchea (DK), however, has retained political control and physical possession over small parts of Kampuchean territory continuously since the Khmer Rouge state was overthrown in 1979. DK continues to represent itself to the world as a sovereign government within its own country. The United Nations as an institution, a majority of its members, and numerous inter-governmental organisations still regard DK as the legitimate government of Kampuchea.

¹ Ben Kiernan, 'A Proposal for peace,' Inside Asia, February–March 1985, p 37. See also Ben Kiernan, How Pol Pot Came to Power, London: Verso, 1985.

² This definition was established in 1951 by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. See William Shawcross, The Quality of Mercy: Cambodia, Holocaust, and Modern Conscience, New York: Simon and Schuster, 1984, pp 81–2.

In practice, the physical reality of the CGDK is largely of a handful of small settlements and armed camps in remote areas of the Thai-Kampuchean border. The troops of the various factions making up the CGDK are billeted, and the civilians under their control are located, in territory of uncertain nationality. In many places the precise location of the border is uncertain. In others, the demarcation between Thailand and Kampuchea is more in the nature of a frontier zone than a line, resulting from centuries of border changes and disputes. Among other things, this uncertainty allows the PRK and the Socialist Republic of Vietnam (SRV) to claim that the rebel camps are in Thailand, while the Thais maintain that they are in Kampuchea. In fact, they are in a twilight zone between the two.

The question of the exile status of the CGDK is not one for mere academic curiosity. The ambiguous territorial situation and legal status of Kampuchean refugees in the border zone greatly complicated the efforts of international relief agencies to aid civilian victims of the Third Indochina War.³ Conditions in the rebels' border camps, and the United Nations-sponsored relief camps deeper in Thailand, have improved greatly from their hellish state in 1979, when a flow of emaciated wretches seemed to erupt from wounded DK into the hastily erected camps. The failure of the Kampuchean rice-planting in 1979-80 and the ensuing famine in some provinces created an event for the world media and a mission for relief organisations.⁴ The relief organisations, at least, responded as best they could in extremely difficult geo-political and logistical circumstances. Many lives were saved, among them many cadre and soldiers of the brutal Khmer Rouge regime of Democratic Kampuchea. These would come to form the foundation of the CGDK.

³ See David Elliott (ed), The Third Indochina Conflict, Boulder, Colorado: Westview Press, 1981; William Turley and Jeffrey Race, 'The Third Indochina War', Foreign Policy (38) Spring 1980; and Bernard Gordon, 'The Third Indochina conflict', Foreign Affairs, Fall 1986, pp 66-85.

⁴ Both the media event itself (William Shawcross, 'Cambodia: some perceptions of a disaster', pp 230-58 in David P Chandler and Ben Kiernan (eds), Revolution and Its Aftermath in Kampuchea: Eight Essays, New Haven: Yale University Southeast Asia Studies, Monograph Series No. 25, 1983; Michael Vickery, Cambodia: 1975-1982, Boston: South End Press, 1984, Mikko Valtasaari, et al., 'The question of Kampuchea in the mass media', in Kimmo Kiljunen (ed), Kampuchea: Decade of the Genocide, London: Zed Books, 1984; and, Noam Chomsky and Edward S Hermann, After the Cataclysm: Postwar Indochina and the Reconstruction of Imperial Ideology, Boston: South End Press, 1983), and the relief mission (see William Shawcross, The Quality of Mercy, op. cit.; and Kimmo Kiljunen (ed), Kampuchea: Decade of the Genocide, op. cit.) have generated secondary literatures.

Origins of the CGDK

Most analysts discuss the CGDK in terms of three factions. This convenient shorthand serves to communicate the outlines of the situation in an economical fashion, and does bear a close resemblance to public appearances. It also vastly over-simplifies an exceedingly complex reality. These three factions, now and in the past, actually consist of many separate, loosely allied groups, which are now and then at odds. They have fielded their flags using a wide variety of names and espousing a diverse assortment of policies, ranging from monarchical to nationalist, republican to communist. A tangled web of alliance, betrayal and counter-alliance tends to complicate the neat 'three factions' description.

In general, however, one may begin by characterising the CGDK as a loose alliance of exiles and refugees from the previous three Kampuchean (or Cambodian) governments. Norodom Sihanouk, placed on the throne as a boy in 1941 by the French, with Japanese consent, governed the country first as King and later as Prince and Head of State, until he was overthrown in 1970. The Prince, his retainers and extended entourage, form one faction; they have variously been known as Sihanoukists, the Khmer Rumdo, the Moulinaka, or more recently, the FUNCINPEC (National United Front for an Independent, Neutral, Peaceful and Cooperative Cambodia) and its military arm, the ANS (Army of Nationalist Sihanoukians). In 1970 Sihanouk's Defence Minister, General Lon Nol, and another Sihanouk rival, Prime Minister Sirik Matak, overthrew Sihanouk's 'kingdom of Cambodia'. Their Khmer Republic quickly allied itself with the US in the Second Indochinese War, but succumbed after only five years to the now infamous Khmer Rouge guerrillas. Refugees from the Khmer Republic account for the bulk of a second so-called faction of the CGDK, Son Sann's Khmer People's National Liberation Front (KPNLF). After the fall of the Khmer Republic, the Khmer Rouge established DK, led by Pol Pot. From the promulgation of its constitution on 5 January 1976, DK existed as a government for exactly three years and two days, until its defeat on 7 January 1979. Loyalist DK refugees form the largest faction of the CGDK, which still calls itself 'Democratic Kampuchea'. Their military forces, known as the 'National Army of Democratic Kampuchea' (NADK), continue fiercely to defend the sovereignty of the state apparatus, despite its deteriorated state. An understanding of the tense nature of the CGDK begins with the recognition that the exile groups which make up the organisation all originally became exiles by over-throwing one another, one after the other.

Origins of the Sihanoukist faction

In 1941, Norodom Sihanouk was selected by the French Governor-General to be crowned King of Cambodia. In 1953 he used his skill to ensure that he benefited when France granted independence to his country. After the French withdrawal, in an effort to consolidate his political control of the country, Sihanouk abdicated the throne in favour of his father and formed an umbrella political organisation called the Sangkum Reastr Niyum. Using his stature as former 'God-King' and now Prince of the realm, Sihanouk projected the Sangkum into a vehicle with which he would dominate Kampuchean politics for more than fifteen years.

It is interesting to note that during his struggle against French colonialism Sihanouk forged alliances with numerous anti-French guerrilla groups, both on the Left and on the right. After independence, however, Sihanouk allied himself principally with politicians on the right of the political spectrum. Sihanouk did attempt to co-opt certain members of the political left, such as Khieu Samphan—Khieu, who at the same time covertly held high office in the Kampuchean Communist Party, served in several Sihanouk governments during the early 1960s—but Sihanouk's relations with his domestic left were perfunctory and at most tactical. The Prince encouraged his security forces to persecute the mass organisations of the Left, especially the main Leftist one, the Pracheachon, and its covert sister organisations in the countryside and the cities. This pattern continued throughout Sihanouk's reign, and accelerated after the Battambang peasant rebellions of 1967 and 1968.

Conflict over Sihanouk's conduct of relations with Vietnam, rather than his repression of the domestic Left, was the main motivation for the right-wing coalition's finally deposing the Prince in 1970. After his overthrow, Sihanouk retreated to Peking where he immediately formed a coalition with the Khmer Rouge. Though he had been at war with them for several years, he became the figure-head for their struggle against Lon Nol's nascent Khmer Republic.

Origins of the KPNLF

The KPNLF, as noted, is largely led by exiles from Lon Nol's Khmer Republic, and largely populated by refugees from Pol Pot's DK. Yet Son Sann, founder and sometimes-disputed leader of the KPNLF, spent almost the entire duration of the Khmer Republic in exile, mostly in France. Sann was appointed by Sihanouk as Deputy Prime Minister, then Prime Minister of the 'Government of the Last Chance' early in 1968. Soon realising that he had little real power against either Sihanouk or the increasingly assertive forces backing General Lon Nol, he resigned after a few months. Sann fled into self-imposed exile after the 'Kingdom of Cambodia' crumbled in a coup less than two years later. He returned briefly in 1974, in an abortive effort to challenge Lon Nol's leadership of the Khmer Republic.

The KPNLF connection with the Khmer Republic is also well personified by General Sak Sutsakhan. Sutsakhan had risen rapidly through the upper echelons of the Force Armée Nationale Khmer (FANK the army of the Khmer Republic). On 12 April 1975 Sutsakhan was named the Commander-in-Chief of the FANK. On 13 April 1975, only four days before the Khmer Rouge captured the seat of government, Sutsakhan took the oath of office as what was to be the last President of the Khmer Republic. Sutsakhan has served as Vice President of the KPNLF, and Commander-in-Chief of the KPNLF military forces. He holds no formal position in the CGDK.

The remote jungles and hills of north-western Kampuchea are an excellent place to hide from the central authorities in the distant capital. Bandits, smugglers and revolutionaries have taken advantage of this remote location for centuries, the twentieth century being no exception. Throughout the period of French control (1863-1954), numerous groups of rebels cum smugglers operated from this region. The right-leaning groups gradually coalesced under the name Khmer Issarak, meaning 'Free Khmer'. These groups were precursors to the loosely-labelled Khmer Serei (also 'Free Khmer'), which emerged in the early 1950s in opposition to Sihanouk's rule. Several groups of Khmer Serei played aggressive roles in the coup against Sihanouk in 1970, and were politically active in the Khmer Republic. Some have since maintained their political resistance in Thailand and overseas. One such Khmer Serei leader, General In Tam, a key activist in the 1970 coup against Sihanouk, rose to prominence in the Khmer Republic. In Tam is currently Vice President of Sihanouk's FUNCINPEC, and has served as commander of the Moulinaka army. He is also Sihanouk's representative to the CGDK's 'Coordinating Committee for National Defence'. Ex-Khmer Republic and Khmer Serei leaders such as In Tam and Sak Sutsakhan may have seen Son Sann's proclamation of the KPNLF in 1979 as a last chance to return to Khmer political life, and thus helping to rescue the country from the Vietnamese domination inadvertently brought about by Pol Pot.

Origins of the Khmer Rouge

The origins of the Khmer Rouge must be considered in terms of three loose groupings: 'old' revolutionaries, 'young' revolutionaries and regional warlords. The roots of the Khmer Rouge stretch back to the break-up of Ho Chi Minh's Indochinese Communist Party in the late 1940s and early 1950s, and before. Sihanouk publicly referred to the Kampuchean leftists of the 1940s and 1950s as the 'Khmer Vietminh', thus simultaneously impugning their integrity and highlighting their historical ties with Vietnamese communism. The so-called 'Khmer Vietminh' actually consisted of dozens of separate organisations with complex inter-relations and sundry conflicts.⁵ These groups, like the Khmer Serei, operated in the remote western (and eastern) reaches of Kampuchea. These are the 'old' revolutionaries, and not by accident, people who form one of the groups of the PRK currently in Phnom Penh.

The name Khmer Rouge—meaning 'Red Khmer'—was given to the Kampuchean Communist Party (KCP) by Sihanouk in the 1950s. This name has come to be associated with a group of 'young' Kampuchean communists who had few ties with the older generation of Khmer Leftists known as the Khmer Vietminh. In the early 1960s this younger group gained control of the KCP apparatus, successfully challenging the stewardship of the older revolutionaries. Known variously as the 'Paris Group' or the 'Pol Pot Clique', they maintained effective dominance of the organisation thereafter. There has been much debate among scholars of Cambodia over the extent to which this group was able consistently to impose its policy preferences during this long period, but it is undeniable that the so-called 'Paris Group' (including Pol Pot, Ieng Sary, Son Sen, Khieu Samphan, Ieng Thirith, Thionn Mum, Hu Nim and Hou Yuon) held key positions in the KCP continuously from 1963 to 1981, though of course they themselves were divided, and the latter two were amongst the prominent victims of the purges in DK.

⁵ Craig Etcheson, The Rise and Demise of Democratic Kampuchea, Boulder, Colorado: Westview Press and London: Pinter Publishers, 1984; see Figure 4.1 on pp 46–7, and Figure 6.1, pp 78–9; see also Ben Kiernan and Chanthou Boua (eds), Peasants and Politics in Kampuchea, 1942–1981, New York: Sharpe, 1982.

Account has, however, to be taken of other powerful players. Among these are the cells of 'bandits' who seem to have existed in Kampuchea under many if not most governments in recorded history, in the manner of regional warlords. Ta Mok, for one, seems to have exploited this tradition in his base in south-west Kampuchea. Pol Pot formed an alliance with Ta Mok during the internal struggle for control of Kampuchean revolutionary politics in 1973-77, using Mok's military prowess to purge the Khmer Rouge of rivals real and imagined. Today Mok continues to serve as Chief of the General Staff of the NADK and Vice Chairman of the 'Supreme Commission' of DK.

Pol Pot's Paris Group met as students in France, developing radical political theories which they converted into practice as soon as they returned from their schooling abroad. Though they had managed to take over Cambodia's communist movement by 1963 or 1964, their success in Cambodian society was much less impressive. Hounded by Sihanouk's security forces, their urban strategy was not a success. When peasants spontaneously revolted in the important agricultural province of Battambang in the late 1960s, Pol Pot and his party belatedly declared open armed struggle, attempting with marginal success to become a vanguard for the peasant revolt. After two years of combat against Sihanouk, they had little to show for their efforts. This state of affairs was to change with the coup against Sihanouk.

Following the coup in 1970, Sihanouk fled to Peking where he rapidly established an exile government, the Royal Khmer Government of National Unification (GRUNK), and a front organisation, the National United Front of Kampuchea (FUNK). Through FUNK, Prince Sihanouk became the public figurehead for the Khmer Rouge, a fact of great strategic significance for the communists in terms of international propaganda, but of even greater moment in winning the hearts and minds of the peasant masses of Kampuchea. Following their victory in 1975, the Khmer Rouge persuaded the Prince to return to Kampuchea from exile in North Korea and the People's Republic of China (PRC), and continue as ceremonial Head of State. Sihanouk little understood, however, the literal nature of the offer; he was soon placed under house arrest, and brought out only for ceremonial occasions. By this time, most of Sihanouk's family and supporters had been liquidated by Pol Pot's security forces. More than a million Kampuchians died.

The harsh nature of Pol Pot's DK was not limited to abuse of its nationals. Soon the xenophobic Khmer Rouge turned their aggression outward. Throughout 1977 and 1978, DK mounted increasingly vicious cross-border attacks into Vietnam, featuring atrocities against civilians living on the other side of the Kampuchean border. After repeated diplomatic initiatives and a limited military incursion had failed to discourage this activity, SRV finally responded at the end of 1978 with the decision to invade DK, and depose Pol Pot and his Khmer Rouge regime.⁶

Thus, the groups that make up the CGDK share a common history of intrigue and violent conflict. The record of factionalism even within the so-called factions of the CGDK must be taken into account in any realistic assessment of the nature of the organisation. As suggested at the outset, it is as mistaken to view the 'Khmer Serei' or the 'Khmer Rouge' today as unitary organisations as it was forty years ago to so view the 'Khmer Issarak' or the 'Khmer Vietminh'. These generalised labels mask many different groupings and factions beneath a convenient but misleading shorthand.

The formation of the CGDK

It is characteristic of Khmer rulers and the Khmer people alike to shelve their internal differences in order to make common cause against foreign adversaries. This is at least the mythology promoted by the CGBK, though the extent to which it operates in practice is less certain. The motives involved are perhaps more complex than patriotic solidarity against the Vietnamese invader.

Pol Pot's Khmer Rouge regime reeled before the Vietnamese advance during the last days of 1978 and the first of 1979. DK suffered crushing military defeats in the eastern region, especially in the 'Parrot's Beak' area of Svay Rieng province and the 'Fishhook' area of Kompong Thom, where almost half of the divisions Pol Pot had committed to the border war were destroyed by Vietnamese arms and artillery. To combat this assault, Pol Pot and his colleagues decided to abandon the cities and return to guerrilla warfare, in a sense, their natural mode. The decision has borne fruit. Though the Vietnamese took Phnom Penh in a two-week campaign, and eight years after their invasion, still have an estimated 140,000 troops in Kampuchea, they have yet to take the entire country. Pol Pot retreated under a scorched-earth policy to strongholds in the remote western and northern reaches of Kampuchea, where resistance, funded and armed via Thailand, has continued unabated.

⁶ For DK's side of the story, consult the Department of Press and Information of the Democratic Kampuchean Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Black Paper: Facts and Evidences of the Aggression and Annexation of Vietnam Against Kampuchea, September 1978; the Vietnamese version of events is recounted in Kampuchea Dossier (3 volumes), Hanoi: Le Courier du Vietnam, 1978.

Still functioning as Secretary of the KCP and as DK Prime Minister, Pol Pot pledged in May 1979 to kill 20,000 Vietnamese in five months. Over the next five months, however, the military and political position of DK deteriorated continuously. Pol Pot and his second-in-command, DK Foreign Minister, Ieng Sary, were tried during the summer and convicted of genocide by a tribunal in Phnom Penh. Though the outcome of the trial was hardly in doubt, the verdict nevertheless left a stain on the defendants' records. This fact was prominently cited by Heng Samrin, Chairman of the PRK's Council of State, in his autumn challenge to the credentials of the DK delegation to the UN. In the wake of these psychological and diplomatic assaults, DK made efforts to reduce the visibility of the now strongly symbolic personage of Pol Pot. In December 1979, Pol Pot handed the Prime Minister's portfolio to his trusted comrade, Khieu Samphan, while keeping his titles as Secretary of the KCP and Chairman of the DK Military Commission. Under Vietnamese military pressure, the territory of DK continued to shrink towards the Thai border. Unable to cope with these developments, Khieu Samphan appealed to the USA by declaring that 'all peace-loving, justice-loving countries ought to realise that it is in their interests to stop Vietnamese and Soviet expansionism'. Apart from the PRK, however, potential foreign patrons remained aloof.

At approximately the same time, in the autumn of 1979, Son Sann took action. On 9 October 1979 Sann crossed a short distance over the Thai border into Kampuchea, and there proclaimed the founding of the KPNLF. This action brought together five of the most powerful Khmer Serei guerrilla bands in action along the border. Some of these groups had been operating from Thailand against Pol Pot since the fall of the Khmer Republic in 1975. Sann proceeded to consolidate his control over the remaining right-wing warlords and bandits inhabiting the border. The assertion of Sann's authority proved a bloody affair, but within one year he had established the supremacy of his command over these groups. This leadership gave the KPNLF control of several strategically-located rebel bases, including those at Nong Samet, Nong Chan, and Sok Sann. Meanwhile, the leadership of the NADK—Pol Pot and his field commanders, Ta Mok and Ke Pauk—looked askance at these developments. They regarded the KPNLF as a potentially worse threat to the sovereignty and legitimacy of DK even than that posed by the Vietnamese, for this challenge came from within the exile community. The NADK acted accordingly, probably causing more KPNLF casualties in this period than had resulted from combat with the ostensible 'enemy', Vietnamese and PRK units.

Not all of the Khmer Serei groups defected to Sann. A few decided to repatriate themselves to Kampuchea, such as In Sakhan, who took roughly one hundred guerrillas to the PRK. Several other groups of Khmer Serei declared loyalty to Prince Sihanouk. The largest of these, the Moulinaka (Mouvement Pour la Libération Nationale du Kampuchea), founded by Kong Sileah in 1979, eventually formed the basis for Sihanouk's Army of Nationalist Sihanoukians (ANS). The Prince, however, was wary of becoming involved with these groups, having had similar experiences thirty years previously in his struggle against the French. At the chaotic climax of the fall of Phnom Penh in January 1979, the Khmer Rouge arranged for Sihanouk to be flown to Peking for 'safe-keeping'. In a matter of only two months, however, Sihanouk had publicly renounced his ten-year alliance with the Khmer Rouge. Nonetheless, at the urging of the Chinese, the Prince soon began to explore alternative means of resisting the Vietnamese occupation of Kampuchea. For Sihanouk, the obvious alternatives lay with the Khmer Serei groups declaring loyalty to him, and/or with Son Sann and his KPNLF. It was reported that over the course of 1979, both the Khmer Rouge and Son Sann repeatedly offered Sihanouk a leading role in their respective organisations, with Sihanouk constantly refusing. These refusals had created much frustration for Sann, but continued throughout 1980.

International pressure for the formation of a Khmer resistance coalition began to mount in 1981. The inability of DK's leaders to induce cooperation among the Kampuchean exile factions began to irk DK's principal international sponsor, the PRC. On a visit to Thailand in February 1981, PRC Premier, Zhao Ziyang suggested that Sihanouk and Sann would make better leaders of the resistance than would Samphan and his associates. Within days, Khieu Samphan was en route to Sihanouk's home in Pyongyang, North Korea, where the DK leader again approached Sihanouk with a view to offering him a role in the Khmer Rouge government. All too familiar with DK methods, Sihanouk stipulated certain unspecified 'guarantees' concerning his role and the policies of the DK leadership, which Samphan was unable to provide. Sihanouk consequently rejected the DK proposition. 'Personally,' he said, 'I have no sympathy for the Khmer Rouge. They killed several members of my family. I want the whole truth to be told of them. That is why I require guarantees. If I do not obtain them, I will not cooperate.'⁷ An escalation of Chinese pressure on DK followed.

For the first time, in March and April 1981, the PRC openly delivered weapons to the KPNLF. At the end of April 1981, Son Sann met and was positively received by US Secretary of State Alexander Haig in Washington. These moves by Washington and Peking apparently gave Sann sufficient encouragement for him to reconsider a deal, enabling Sihanouk to announce the formation of a united front between himself and Sann. Within days, however, Son Sann denied that any such agreement had been reached. In response to the continued failure of negotiations among the Kampuchean rebels, the USA increased its pressure. Assistant Secretary of State John B Holdridge reportedly told a gathering of US businessmen in Peking that if the factions in the Kampuchean resistance could form a united front, the US would consider arming them. At the UN, the DK's Foreign Minister, Sary, continued to insist that while a united front with Sihanouk was still possible, an alliance with the KPNLF was out of the question.

On 4 September 1981 Sihanouk and Sann signed an accord of joint resistance to the Vietnamese occupation of Kampuchea. At the same meeting in Singapore, Khieu Samphan appeared as representing DK, and all parties agreed on the principle of forming a tri-partite united front. There remained, however, the matter of Pol Pot and his Kampuchean Communist Party. International pressure continued to mount in November 1981 as the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN, consisting of Thailand, Singapore, Malaysia, the Philippines and Indonesia) rejected a proposal to provide arms for the Kampuchean resistance, while Malaysia and Singapore individually made it known that they would do so if the rebels formed a united front. Son Sann remained adamant in his refusal to collaborate with the KCP. Under pressure from the US, the PRC, Japan, Australia, the European Economic Community, Thailand, Malaysia and Singapore, the KCP acted decisively. On 7 December 1981 it dissolved itself.

The dissolution of the KCP left the state apparatus of DK intact; the elimination of the political organisation left all KCP personnel in place in their dual roles as officers of the government. Yet this superficial change was enough to prompt renewed diplomatic activity. A proposal two weeks later formed a watershed: ASEAN suggested to the Khmer Rouge that a coalition government be formed with the other groups in the Kampuchean resistance. Early in January 1982, DK rejected the proposal, but Chinese interest was now intensifying. The Chinese had always supported Sihanouk as one of their 'cards', giving him arms and aid in the pre-1970 period, hosting his exile GRUNK in Peking from 1970-75, and supporting him after the fall of DK in 1979 with a handsome stipend, a home and servants. They also continued to support the Pol Pot-organised communists. In 1982 the Chinese gave Sihanouk what seemed to be the required guarantees, and on 21 February 1982 Sihanouk and Samphan announced plans for a tripartite coalition. Sihanouk said, however, that the coalition depended on the agreement of Son Sann, who meanwhile remained unsatisfied. While rejecting Sann's demand that Pol Pot be exiled from any coalition, Samphan tried to reassure Sann by asserting that 'Pol Pot will bow to the orders of a government elected by the people'.⁸

⁷ New Solidarity, 3 May 1981.

In June 1982, the resistance of Sann's people to a coalition with Pol Pot finally crumbled. Sihanouk, Sann and Samphan met in Kuala Lumpur to sign the agreement founding the Coalition Government of Democratic Kampuchea, with Sihanouk as President, Sann as Prime Minister and Samphan as Vice President for Foreign Affairs. All retained their previous roles in their respective movements. The agreement was carefully worded to preserve the sovereignty of the 'existing' state of DK, specifying that the coalition 'shall have no right to take any decision infringing or restricting . . . political identity or freedom of action' of the parties to the agreement. Furthermore, an explicit priority clause preserved the supremacy of the Khmer Rouge: in the event that an impasse has developed which renders the coalition government of Democratic Kampuchea inoperative . . . the current state of DK led by Mr. Khieu Samphan will have the right to resume its activities as the sole legal and legitimate state of Kampuchea. . . .

One observer succinctly summarised the achievement: 'At the end of the 1960s it would not have seemed credible that just over ten years later, Sihanouk would be simultaneously allied with both the Khmer Rouge against whom he fought a civil war and the Khmer Serei which overthrew him in the Lon Nol coup . . .'.⁹ Even today in 1987, this situation lacks credibility for many.

⁸ Los Angeles Times, 3 November 1982.

⁹ Kiljunen (ed), Kampuchea: Decade of the Genocide, op. cit., pp 56, 57.

Form and function of the CGDK

The CGDK's so-called alliance of factions is burdened by their history of mutual animosity. Sihanouk—who believes that five of his children and fourteen of his grandchildren lost their lives in DK—says simply of the Khmer Rouge, 'They are not like us.'¹⁰ Son Sann is more colourful in his language: 'Choosing between the Vietnamese and the Khmer Rouge is like choosing between plague and cholera.'¹¹ For their part the Khmer Rouge tend to be discreet in public about their attitudes toward their coalition partners. The steadily mounting toll of KPNLF and ANS troops killed in NADK ambushes over the years, however, indicates the limitations of Khmer Rouge commitment to the unity and democracy of the resistance.

The NADK is perhaps inappropriately named. It is not a regular army, and it would be difficult to argue that it in any way represents the combined interests of even the CGDK, let alone the Khmer nation as a whole. The NADK is a collection of dispersed guerrilla bands, controlled by DK regional military commanders. The two largest bands have been led by Ta Mok and Ke Pauk, former chieftains of the Southwest and Central Zones of DK. All that really remains of the once absolute totalitarian power of DK resides in these bands. Beyond the obvious fact that military authority belongs to field commanders such as Mok and Pauk, there have been persistent rumours of political rivalry within the upper ranks of the DK apparatus. In July 1984 a Khmer Rouge defector alleged that DK Defence Minister Son Sen was challenging Pol Pot, a rumour bolstered the following month by the defection to Thailand of two Pol Pot supporters, DK Finance Minister Thionn Thioum and Keat Chhom (an official of the DK Prime Minister's office). Thus it appears that years of exile have taken a toll on Pol Pot's regime. The fragmented nature of real power even within this, the most disciplined of the CGDK factions, speaks eloquently of chances for unity within this coalition.

The actual institutions of the CGDK are equally indicative of the nature of the coalition. Early in 1984 Sihanouk revealed plans to open joint offices of his and Sann's organisations in Canberra and Tokyo, in addition to two joint KPNLF-Sihanouk offices in existence in Europe. He cited these four offices, plus the tri-partite offices at the CGDK mission(s) to the United Nations, as proof of the unity of the CGDK.¹² Yet he admitted that in all of these offices the three groups maintain their separate administration. Later in the year this impressive evidence of unity was augmented by the announcement of plans for 'unification' of the ANS and the KPNLF. Some reports suggested, however, that the much touted 'unification' actually entailed absorbing stragglers from Sihanouk's defeated militia, following the destruction in the 1983 Vietnamese dry season offensive of the ANS base at O Smach.¹³ It was nearly a year before the 'joint command' idea resurfaced with an announcement in June 1985 that a single command for the ANS and the KPNLF was to be established, led by Sak Sutsakhan. By August 1985 Sutsakhan was named Commander-in-Chief of the Joint Military Committee, to operate from O Bok. Sutsakhan was to report to the 'Permanent Military Committee for Coordination'. His deputy would be General Teap Ben of the ANS; General Toan Chay (ANS) would be chief-of-staff, and Peang Meth (KPNLF) would be his deputy.

New York Times, 7 September 1982.

Canberra Times, 5 December 1983.

The next month, Khieu Samphan announced on behalf of the government of DK that the NADK High Military Commission had been abolished, that DK Defence Minister Son Sen was to chair the new High Command of the NADK, and that Pol Pot had retired to academia to do 'research'. This development presumably cleared the way for true joint CGDK military action. Sihanouk soon asserted that the new tri-partite coordinating committee was working well, and that 'we are no longer three factions but a solid coalition. . . .' This may have reflected Sihanouk's enthusiasm; it had been nearly six weeks since his son, Prince Ranaridh, had reported another 'incident', this time with thirty-eight ANS troops killed in an ambush by the NADK. Nonetheless, military unity proved elusive. Before the end of 1985, Sutsakhan and a group of supporters in the KPNLF staged a coup against Son Sann. Calling themselves the 'Provisional Central Committee for Salvation', Sutsakhan, Peang Meth, Chak Bory and Huy Kanthoul challenged Sann's leadership, citing differences on matters of strategy and politics. The Joint Military Committee for Coordination was again at a standstill.

By January 1986, Pol Pot had offered to retire, in reality this time, in exchange for Vietnamese withdrawal; Sann had asserted that 'CGDK factionalism is on its way to being resolved and will be resolved very soon'; US congressmen had warned that rebel in-fighting jeopardised additional US aid to the CGDK; and Sihanouk had cited figures on troop strength which pertained only to his ANS. Much of the remainder of 1986 witnessed increasing contention among coalition members concerning their very purpose: the settlement of the 'Kampuchean problem'. Fundamental disagreements over whether to negotiate (or fight), who to negotiate with (SRV or PRK or both or others), how to negotiate (in direct, 'proximity', or proxy talks) and most importantly, what to negotiate about, still divide the coalition. With the continued existence of the state apparatus of DK, prospects appear encouraging neither for rebel unity, nor for Kampuchean peace and independence.

¹² Indochina Chronicle, 3(1) Jan-Mar 1984, p 14.

¹³ Beat U Wieser, 'Khmer Resistance to Vietnamese Domination', Swiss Review of World Affairs, July 1983, pp 11-13.

Conclusion: plus ça change, plus c'est la même chose

It has been said that academic politics is a vicious discipline because so little is at stake. Academics might be cautioned in this respect by the experience of the CGDK. Rent by factionalism, dominated by fanatics, possessed of scanty resources, little territory and dim prospects for regaining control of Kampuchea in the foreseeable future, the CGDK struggles for mastery over a country which has for years appeared at the very bottom of the World Bank's list of nations ranked by wealth. The factions comprising the CGDK appear to expend more blood, money and energy in internecine struggles than they do in opposing their ostensible enemies, the PRK and the SRV. The exiled CGDK leaders are mostly old and tired veterans of Indochina's war-laden post-World War II history. They have existed together along an imperceptible line between war and politics for their entire adult lives. Perhaps unsurprisingly, the collective experience of exile has done little to change their manifest lifelong tendency towards mutual, violent, politico-military conflict. On the contrary, exile has done much to reinforce it.

Return ticket to Brazil*

Exile

Exile is perhaps as old as humanity itself, and has certainly been a constant feature of the history of Latin America, leaving a deep impression on the life of its people. It is estimated that a substantial proportion of the population of Paraguay lives outside the country, while waves of Bolivian exile recur as frequently as the military coups in that country. In Central America, exile has been a pervasive phenomenon, and more recently, since the 1960s, exiles have fled countries which were themselves traditional sanctuaries for those in flight, such as Chile and Uruguay.

Exile is a form of political violence, an indicator of the violence of the state in its relation to civil society. It is a form of radical repression, which forcibly removes the actor from his natural environment, his country. The growth of the phenomenon of exile in recent decades indicates how political crises have been polarised and how a new type of contradiction has thrown states and their people into opposing camps. The evidence suggests that the process of internationalising the economy has been accompanied by the development of radical, authoritarian forms of government-military dictatorships. States have been more intent on following the logic of internationalisation than on attending to the interests of local bourgeoisies or to the majority of the population in each country. The dictatorships established in Latin America throughout the 1960s and 1970s seem to conform to this pattern and were marked by a cycle of generalised and, in some cases, genocidal violence. The deaths in Chile and Argentina, the dead and tortured in Uruguay, were, by their very scale and dramatic nature, virtually unprecedented in the history of Latin America. They invite comparison only with the deaths incurred in the Mexican revolution and in the Guatemalan massacres. The precise figures for those killed and tortured in these countries are, however, a part of their history which may only come to light in the future.

* Originally commissioned in Portuguese and translated by Peter Flynn, Director of the Institute of Latin American Studies, University of Glasgow.

The recent, widespread collapse of authoritarian regimes seems to indicate a general crisis of authoritarian forms of government, and the emergence of a popular democratic movement, still in the process of developing. Furthermore, it presages a mass return of exiles to their countries. Yet, though liberalisation has brought back some exiles, others are still not free to return. Thousands of Chileans still await the end of the Pinochet regime, not to mention the Paraguayans who cannot return, and the Central Americans who continue to endure 'civil war' and unending counter-revolution.

In this context, Brazil has its own distinctive history. Brazilian exile was never massive, but selective. The political violence, which has always existed there, manifests itself in other less evident forms, such as migrations, the concentration of income and property, marginalisation, unemployment, infant mortality and racism. Ever since colonial times, political violence has been selectively applied against the opposition in an 'exemplary' form, as a deterrent to others. The Portuguese initiated this policy and the Brazilians acquired their methods. In the colonial period, for example, the Portuguese Crown punished the rebel 'Tiradentes', today a hero, with hanging in order to deter potential followers. The struggles for power in the Empire and the Republic were always marked by state violence against the opposition, involving frequent use of torture and assassination, while exile, when it existed, was used sparingly. In the period of Getúlio Vargas, who governed Brazil between 1930 and the 1950s, exile was directed against the liberal opposition. Some dozens of political leaders sought refuge in various countries of Latin America and Europe, and it was in this period that the liberal, Euclides de Figueiredo, took up exile in Argentina. He was accompanied by his son, João Batista de Figueiredo, who later, as General and President during the last period of military dictatorship, signed the amnesty won for exiles through the struggle of the Brazilian people.

In the period from the end of World War II until the 1960s, Brazil seemed to have ended its authoritarian cycle, and its political leaders seemed to be building a new order, which was liberal, even reformist. Brazil seemed to have discovered a path combining both liberal democracy and development.

From the time of the Plano de Metas of the government of Juscelino Kubitschek (1956-60), 'transnationalisation' became the government's main plank. Through the Plano de Metas, transnational companies, particularly in the automobile sector, came to occupy a strategic place in national production, becoming, in effect, a new political actor intent on dictating the political direction of the state. The national sovereignty of the state was thus called into question, and this crisis of national identity came to a head in the Goulart period. The coup of 1964 decided the loyalties of the Brazilian dominant class, sealing an alliance with transnational capital which still continues today. In order to be decisive in this respect, however, the coup had effectively to remove all those political forces committed to a national, popular and reformist future. Thus arose the modern form of Brazilian exile.

One of the first measures taken by the military government of General Castello Branco in 1964, was to publish a list of names of hundreds of people who were to be deprived of their political rights for ten years. In this period those people were forbidden to undertake any political activity whatsoever; they were, in effect, banished within their own country. Among this group were ex-presidents, governors, senators, deputies, prominent politicians, and military and trade union leaders. The political police, both civil and military, immediately began to detain party leaders, those elected to political office, members of the Goulart government, trade union and religious leaders, intellectuals and students. This political repression was carried out in the name of a future democracy, whose way was to be paved by the purifying actions of the state. Within a few months, those who had not submitted to the authority of the recently established government, sought exile in Uruguay, the first sanctuary for several hundred Brazilian exiles, and in several other countries. Midway through 1964, more than fifty leading representatives of the opposition to the new regime gathered together in Montevideo. Another group of exiles fled to Santiago de Chile, and yet another to Europe, notably to France.

The opposition to the military government re-formed from about 1965 onwards and took up the political struggle, especially through public street protests by students, artists and intellectuals. In 1968, Brazil played its part in the great wave of student demonstrations which swept through the major cities of the world. The political leaders of the opposition tried to regain the initiative by forming the Frente Ampla, which brought together the most influential leaders, both within the country and in exile (Juscelino Kubitschek, João Goulart and Carlos Lacerda). The regime's response was to decree Institutional Act No. 5, a kind of coup within the coup, granting the Executive absolute and arbitrary control. With all doors closed to legal, liberal and reformist opposition, Brazil become trapped in a cycle in which the increasingly radical political opposition was met with increasing violence on the part of the state. There now began armed action, kidnapping, bank robberies, and the establishment of a system of state terror through military and paramilitary organisations, indiscriminately arresting, torturing and murdering leaders of the opposition, regardless of the different methods or objectives of each political group.

Brazilian exile then entered a second phase, its numbers swelled by student and military leaders from the revolutionary organisations, who left via the frontiers of the Southern Cone, or, following kidnappings, in the resulting exchange of prisoners. If the first exile was composed of leaders of the reformist, liberal opposition, the second was characterised by the revolutionary militants, who arrived in Chile, Algeria, Mexico, Cuba and various countries of Europe. From 1969-79, the number of Brazilians in exile was estimated to be about 10,000, of which probably half were in Latin America, particularly in Chile under Unidad Popular, and the other half in Europe.

The phenomenon of Brazilian exile touched virtually all the principal capitals of the world, but was mainly concentrated in Santiago de Chile and in Paris. In the course of their long journey, which for some lasted fifteen years, many exiles lived in a succession of countries. There, they experienced other coups and met new exiles, as, during the 1970s, the majority of Latin American countries, including those receiving exiles, succumbed to military dictatorship. In the Panamanian Embassy in Santiago de Chile, an apartment of two bedrooms and two living-rooms, a gathering of more than 300 people graphically illustrated the way in which exiles were overtaken by political events in their countries of refuge. Brazilians, Chileans, Bolivians, Uruguayans, Hondurans, Panamanians, Guatemalans, Salvadoreans, Paraguayans and people of other nationalities waited in hope of a flight which would take them to some other country, though not their own, while armed soldiers threatened to invade the building. Some Brazilians who were there had already experienced the coups in Bolivia; now they were living in Chile at the time of the 1973 coup and were later to become acquainted with Argentina in the post-Perón period.

Following the end of the rule of President Garrastazu Médici in 1973, which had brought political repression in Brazil to unprecedented levels of violence, there grew a broad movement for amnesty both within Brazil and abroad, which united differing groups within Brazilian society in a struggle against the military regime. The Geisel period (1974-8) ended with the announcement of an amnesty, which was, however, only to be fulfilled in September 1979, during the presidency of General João Batista Figueriedo, himself the son of a former liberal exile.

The long period of exile saw a silent struggle between the exiles and the government, with the exiles formulating campaigns denouncing the crimes of the dictatorship, and the regime in turn denying its critics even the basic rights of citizenship. In terms of documentation, for example, the Brazilian government denied passports to all exiles and their children, as well as refusing them any type of assistance or protection in their countries of residence. In some cases the political police extended their persecution across the frontier, openly acting against members of the Brazilian opposition after the coup in Chile, and interrogating political prisoners in the national stadium, which had been transformed into a concentration camp.

Return

The amnesty campaign mobilised and affected the whole of Brazilian society, reaching such a pitch that the regime was forced to grant an amnesty on 15 September 1979, though the government tried to present its gesture to the public as an act of generosity on its part. Immediately afterwards, the exiles returned to the country amidst scenes of excitement and celebration, which lasted, almost continuously, from September to November 1979.

The joy of realising the dream of return was, however, mingled with fear. The structure of repression remained intact and the military dictatorship was not yet ended: the government had succumbed to pressure, but had made it clear that though the exiles could return to the country, they would continue to be excluded from political life. Moreover, after 1979, there were already signs of an economic crisis—the end of the Brazilian ‘miracle’—which was marked by unemployment, now made worse by the return of thousands of people and their families. The state apparatus, at every level, remained closed to the exiles. The intelligence services prevented their entry into public life; the federal universities also kept their doors closed, while the private sector, suffering under the impact of the crisis, afforded few opportunities.

Once the initial euphoria had passed, the exiles found themselves facing unemployment and felt themselves to be strangers in their own country. Political life in Brazil had changed. It was now filled with new people and often the exiles were seen as intruders or competitors. The reform of political parties, imposed from above by the government, and the prospect of elections, completed a picture in which the exiles constituted a threat or were seen as a source of trouble. Some political leaders, even among the opposition, propounded a bizarre theory attempting to demonstrate that everything of worth in Brazil was necessarily new, and that, as relics of a bygone era, the exiles constituted a mere return to the past. Since the coup of 1964 was also a thing of the past, there arose a strange association between exiles and the threat of some kind of political regression à la 1964. The original victim of the coup came to be seen as a possible catalyst for a new coup to which everyone would in turn fall victim.

Between 1979 and 1982, the exiles were obliged to take care of themselves, struggling for employment in the midst of a recession and striving for political influence in the new parties and for an opportunity to come to terms with a country which they no longer recognised. Brazil had indeed changed, and yet exile, in a certain sense, remained. Naturally, the process of reintegration varied, the most outstanding political leaders showing that they and their experience still deserved to be taken seriously. Miguel Arrães, Leonel Brizola, Darcy Ribeiro, and various others, took their place among political activists. The most notable intellectuals returned to the universities and to the pages of the principal newspapers and journals. The majority, however, lived through great difficulties during this period, despite the academic and professional qualifications which they had often acquired abroad. The fact was that the amnesty had not changed the state, which kept its doors firmly barred to former exiles.

After the elections of 1982, with the victory of opposition governors in the majority of states, the outlook changed for the better. Brazil saw the political reintegration of exiles, who won elections (Leonel Brizola was elected Governor of Rio de Janeiro, with Darcy Ribeiro as Vice-Governor), or were absorbed through the opening-up of the state apparatus at state and municipal levels, to trained personnel, people in the liberal professions and intellectuals. In the three most important states, Rio de Janeiro, São Paulo and Minas Gerais, the opposition government became accessible to a substantial group of exiles, the same being the case at the level of local government. The election of 1982 also facilitated the election of people who had previously held office, and who were therefore able to regain the posts from which they had been ousted by earlier military governments. By these means, some of the accumulated experience of exile found its way back into parliament.

With the end of the Figueiredo period, the indirect election of Tancredo Neves in 1984, and the direct election of mayors in 1985, the political opening-up of the state apparatus was complete: the work of politicians, previously deprived of political rights, and returning to political life, largely remains to be done, as does that of the formerly exiled political militants who hold key positions, both in the executive and in the legislature. The consequences of the amnesty did finally extend to offices of state and the universities, so that the fear of unemployment ceased to be a nightmare for former exiles. Obviously, the private sector had always absorbed qualified people, but the majority of Brazilian exiles were party leaders, members of political organisations and intellectuals, who had traditionally made their careers within the state apparatus or in academic research institutions. The eventual resolution of the employment problem is of major significance. It indicates that the process of re-integration of exiles into the life of the country has virtually been realised, enabling those who have returned to put the fact of exile behind them. Nonetheless, it took seven years to reach this point.

The politics of exile and the exile in politics

The coup of 1964 was radical. It signified that a choice had been made for Brazil in favour of transnationalising the country, and integrating its economy, in a subordinate position, within the system of world capital. This system was henceforth to have industrial capital in its transnationalised form as its modern mode and the national state as its primary agent. Brazil's integration into the world economy was not in itself a unique event, but the distinctiveness of Brazil's experience lay in the overtly political form taken by that process of integration.

In its first phase this radical transformation of Brazil took place through the 'dictatorship' (1964-74). In its second phase, through the process of transition (1974-84). We are currently living through the third phase in the form of the New Republic (1985-). In the first phase, the state submitted civil society to its arbitrary control and, by means of the doctrine of national security, defined mass mobilisation as the internal enemy of the state. The dominant class governed from 1964-74, by means of the Institutional Acts and by military and police coercion.

The second phase entailed an effort to overcome the absolute divorce between state and society by institutionalising the authoritarian regime. In governing from 1974–84, the dominant class attempted to institutionalise its control without depriving itself of the arbitrary use of military coercion.

The third phase is characterised by the contradiction between the transnational and the national, the authoritarian and the liberal aspects of the state. The New Republic is, at the same time, both old and new in its content and form. If authoritarianism has been losing ground, transnationalism retains its strength and leads the government to speak the language of liberalism while often, at the same time, acting in an authoritarian manner.

The phenomenon of exile, seen as the political product of the state's policies, has been a boomerang. In the first phase it forced a whole generation into both internal exile (having to go underground) and exile abroad. This process affected thousands of people, and though regarded as irreversible, lasted for fifteen years (1964–79). The first phase initially involved reformists, liberal opposition members, who were soon followed by the leaders and militants linked to the armed struggle. The second phase involved the process of return of the more reformist exiles and, with the amnesty in 1979, the return of more 'revolutionary' exiles.

The boomerang brought back all those who had been expelled supposedly for ever, from politics. The election of Brizola as governor of Rio de Janeiro in 1982 showed that exiles themselves had returned to contest the power of the state. Social democracy, democratic socialism, revolutionary socialism, had entered the scene as political programmes by means of the returning exile. In the MDB, later the PMDB, the Partido Democrático Trabalhista and the PT, these various currents contend for hegemony, not to mention the radical proposals jostling for influence within different parties and popular movements. 'Revolutionary' exile is the other facet of the boomerang. The repression of the first phase killed various leaders of the radical militants, but failed to kill their aims and ideas. They, too, have returned.

From 1974–83, former exiles occupied an important place in parties and within the state: Miguel Arraes (ex Governor of Pernambuco, exiled for fifteen years in Algeria) was elected Federal Deputy and once again became a leader in the north-east. Leonel Brizola (ex-Governor of Rio Grande do Sul, exiled for fifteen years in Uruguay) was elected Governor of Rio de Janeiro. Exiles again became deputies, senators, councillors, mayors, teachers and leaders of political parties and organisations. The ideas and people which the coup of 1964 had tried to expel from the country returned, together with new ideas, though admittedly, some died before they could return. João Goulart died in exile, and Juscelino Kubitschek and various other political leaders died prior to the amnesty.

In the third phase of the New Republic, 1984-86, former exiles entered the contest both for power in the state, and to elaborate new political programmes. Former exiles were appointed to ministerial positions (Celso Furtado, Waldir Pires) or won the posts as mayors. In the elections of November 1986, exiles are running for governor in three states: Miguel Arrães in Pernambuco; Waldir Pires in Bahia; Darcy Ribeiro and Fernando Gabeira in Rio de Janeiro. The majority of political leaders who were previously in exile are contesting elections for the Congress which will act as the Constituent Assembly.

In Brazil today the struggle between authoritarianism and democracy is being enacted through the competition between rival political programmes or tendencies: liberalism, social democracy, democratic socialism and revolutionary socialism. The contradictory liberalism of the PMDB, which, together with the PFL, today forms the Aliança Democrática, was born largely out of a struggle within the country against dictatorship. The other tendencies are in greater measure the fruit of exile, or are derived from it, and are represented in the Partido Democrático Trabalhista, Partido Socialista, the Communist parties, and various other small parties. In the New Republic, particularly after the elections of 1986, the political cycle of exile is reaching its end as exiles are being integrated into the political life of the country. This conclusion, however, does not mean that the nation has been reconciled with its people nor that the state has been reappropriated by civil society. If exile has come to an end, its fundamental causes may still be said to persist.

Fragments from a Paraguayan autobiography*

I was born in Asunción, Paraguay—at least, so I am told. It is impossible to be certain, given that real men (as opposed to characters in fiction) are always absent from the two most important moments in their life—birth and death. And there is something gratifying in that—it makes you feel ageless somehow.

I studied nothing in particular, other than a piecemeal introduction to music and painting. At the age of fourteen I enlisted as a volunteer in the Chaco War between Paraguay and Bolivia; my intention (though it never materialised) was to become a war correspondent. I was luckier in my twenties: I managed to be in London when the Second World War ended. I wrote reports, articles and a little book of my impressions. After the bombs were dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki, I sent a dispatch to my agency called 'Not yet the end of the world', and another under the title 'Today the 21st century began'. Neither was published and my credentials were withdrawn. I wandered through a Europe in ruins. I walked through the clouds of smoke rising from the burning extermination camps. Then I returned to Paraguay, where concentration camps were being built for the first time. When I drew the parallels, they expelled me for the first time—that was forty years ago. The second time was thirty-seven years later.

And yet I have not been away from my native country for a single day. I brought with me into exile my language, always the refuge of the persecuted. And slowly, over time, exile enabled me to become the universal man we all aspire to become, whether we know it or not.

Why do I write? Perhaps because it is the least offensive thing I can do. But I am not a professional writer; indeed lately I have only written from time to time, to keep the habit at bay, you might say.

I write because the silence of the word inspires more fear in me than writing. Writing reduced to the status of a virus; the infinite reduced to silence. 'The infinite, my dear friend,' said Monsieur Teste, 'is no big thing; it's matter of writing. The infinite exists only on paper'. So: I write to try and prevent the fear of death from becoming, on this planet threatened with extinction, a fear of life itself.

* Originally commissioned in Spanish and translated by Mike Gonzalez, Lecturer in the Department of Hispanic Studies, University of Glasgow.

Literature and exile in Latin America: the case of Paraguay Exile is and always has been a constant in Latin America's political and socio-cultural history. It has arisen in a variety of contexts and has had the most far-reaching repercussions. And it has recurred with growing frequency ever since Independence—indeed even before that, since the idea of Independence itself, and the actions that flowed from it, were conceived and planned, for the most part, in exile.

From exile, internal and external, out of ostracism and banishment came the poets, writers, intellectuals, ideologues and military men, people from all social classes imbued with a consciousness of and a passion for liberty which moved them to fight for the independence of their native land. Many were to return into exile, cast out again by those laws of chance (for we must give it a name both vague and prestigious enough to embrace all the reverses and intensities of political struggle) that governed the emergence of those countries, those nebulae in the Latin American sky that are still in process of formation.

The experience of exile also stimulated and enriched Latin American social and cultural life, opening up new currents and directions. This seems to prove, at least, that however much the creative energies of social life are undermined—that progressive deterioration and collapse that has been called historical entropy—there is resistance to the toughest tests, to the alienation and fragmentation of creative, progressive thinking which reaction imposes.

Repression is by its very nature centrifugal and disintegrative. The creative power of social energies is, by its nature unifying, organic, analogous to the accumulation of biological energy. Despite constant impediments, interruptions, external interference and internal upheavals, despite all the apparently insuperable difficulties produced by the balkanisation of the continent, Latin America's historical destiny has continued to evolve between these two poles.

It thus remains historically possible that a system of autonomy and unity can be established; almost two centuries of emancipation struggles are the proof. It is true that the first independence struggle did not produce tangible results in a new objective historical reality—that was the issue posed at the political and cultural level. The neo-colonial pact with the new dominant powers (the British Empire, and later the United States) overwhelmed the real interests of the national societies in formation, as a declining liberalism surrendered to domination and dependence.

Despite everything, the collective aspiration to independence and autonomy continued to find expression in an unending series of risings, rebellions and revolutions. This underlines the fact that the process of liberation does not consist solely of the revolutionary wars whose outbreak marks its final phase; on the contrary, it arises slowly and painfully at the very heart of the dominated, dependent societies. The coordinates of this process have defined the space where socio-political struggles together with cultural advances in the fields of art, literature and science have taken place. And they constitute the very essence of historical progress, despite occasional setbacks and downturns.

Exile is just one aspect of these struggles, just one component of the totality of Latin American liberation. In fact, it is the necessary consequences of the process, a symptom whose gravity stems from the sheer quantitative and qualitative proportions of that vast drain of human capital that the repressive regimes have imposed on Latin America, sapping its actual and potential capacities through this, the greatest exodus in its history. The 'open veins of Latin America', to use Galeano's powerful and now classic image, is not just a metaphor but a reality which has in turn become a metaphor for itself. These 'open veins' with their connotation of amputation, mutilation, tearing apart, of irreparable loss to the living organism of those societies, point also to the unstinted flow of exiles, whose loss is one more punitive cost demanded of the body politic by a repressive power. It affects the most sensitive tissues, the most active cells of the organism, the core of its political struggles and its intellectual and artistic creativity. It weighs down on political leaders and cadres, on writers and artists, on the priests who have converted their spiritual ministry into an incorruptible source of solidarity with the persecuted and a means of active participation in the struggle for liberation.

And there is more, a crucial aspect of exile which, in my view, is not given the importance it deserves. For if enforced exile as a form of punishment, reprisal or violence is one of the greatest aberrations of the repressive regimes, its effect is multiplied to the benefit of those who have seized power, because the victim himself or herself tends to experience exile as a punishment in itself. Consequently he or she exaggerates, in retrospect, his or her condition as a propitiatory victim.

The repressive powers try to turn the citizen who fights repression into a wandering shadow, a person without a country; the choice is physical elimination or civic death. If the exile acquiesces in this arbitrary condemnation, even if only psychologically, he plays into the hands of the oppressor and concedes victory to him, a victory that is even greater when it is won through oversight or because of a critical, deprecating attitude on the exile's part towards those who 'stayed behind' (I refer of course to those who stayed behind but neither compromised nor gave in). For it must be obvious that the situation of the internal exiles is the worst by far. It is they who require the greatest civic courage, the greatest capacity for physical resistance, the greatest resources of psychological and spiritual strength, not to speak of their readiness to accept the fact that it will be impossible for them to work in their respective creative field or keep open the channels of communication with their own collectivity. For the collective is enveloped in the same heavy cloud of silence and self-censorship which suffocates individuals, even when it is apparently diffuse.

It is in this dichotomy between internal and external exile, this marking out of two contrasting trajectories, that repression succeeds in creating a segregation, opening a yawning divide—and the totalitarian power reaps an extra triumph from this false opposition, this deep gaping incision. And it does so furthermore at the expense of the victims within and without, and at the cost of the global unity of the opposition. The external exiles find it hard to admit that some oppositionists might have survived in the concentration camps with their integrity and determination intact and still capable of underground cultural activity. This resentment confirms them in the belief that culture as such has been exiled with them, so that the only authentic cultural manifestations possible—in literature, art, or intellectual production generally—are those that arise in the realm of 'freedom' in exile. This superstition creates a kind of faith, a sort of Manichaeian oppositional masonic order that exchanges secret winks of complicity and recognition while publicly intoning its sad arias or triumphal anthems at international meetings and seminars.

The internal exiles, on the other hand, forced to act against their own better judgement, cannot but greet these arrogant assertions with an equal but inverse resentment and suspicion. And their response cannot simply be put down to excessively delicate sensibilities. Indeed there are those among the internal exiles—the completely marginalised layers of the peasants and the urban poor, and the indigenous groups and cultures subject to an implacable process of extinction—who no longer own the land that once was theirs and who have neither a voice nor a future. Theirs is the oldest exile of all.

It is these irrational dichotomies, imposed without rhyme or reason, which have produced the greatest number of misunderstandings and the most persistent confusion in the cultural field, holding back as a result the convergence and unification of the different groups of exiles.

There is a further exile, one carefully removed from the statistics of the concentration camps—the ghostly legions of men, women and children kidnapped by the para-police brigades, taken from one place to another, whose file bears that euphemism born of the dirty war—the disappeared.

Despite the common graves in the cemeteries, the rubbish dumps and the barracks turned prisons and concentration camps uncovered in the obsessive searches of the relatives, despite the cargoes of human bodies tossed from warplanes over the sea, the jungles and the rivers, this legion of internal exiles continues to exist. We can see them given flesh in the tenacious Mothers of the Plaza de Mayo in Buenos Aires and their like in many other Latin American cities. There are thousands of these 'living dead', and their continuing absence cannot simply be wiped from the face of the earth, as they tried to obliterate Rodolfo Walsh's house using tanks. Their names cannot be erased by the fear of the torturers, kidnappers or military chiefs who were responsible.

Those disappeared internal exiles, locked in a death long postponed and perhaps already beyond rescue apart from small groups of survivors scattered in places that do not exist, will nevertheless have a part in the task ahead; thus the dead too can produce a living force.

It is hard for the imagination of a few generations to predict the outcome of this meeting and confluence of these dwellers in the underground—the internal exiles—with those who are waging war in the cities, the countryside and the jungles, and those who are already preparing transitional solutions to the problem of material reconstruction, of political pluralism, of intellectual and artistic creativity, added to the contribution that will be made by those bringing from distant countries the lessons and experiences of different fields of human activity.

This meeting of exiles, and their conversion into a full civic force involved in the tasks of tomorrow should give us hope as we confront the uncertain promises of the short and long term future. It will be a convergence and fusion of many perspectives, of new ways of seeing the world and life from a distance and with objectivity, a new way of living together and acting in the space of historical time and in its as yet unrealised possibilities.

Writing in Paraguay: a metaphor for exile

Paraguay still lives under the oldest dictatorship on the Latin American continent; the havoc it has wreaked at the social, political and cultural level—indeed in every field of creative activity—is dramatically manifest. This is a backward society, dragging behind it like a punishment a history that has been described as a 'living nightmare', a century of intermittent and endemic dictatorships like tropical fiestas. And by this same historical perversion, exile has become part of its very nature and destiny.

It is, in the first instance, a physical exile from a landlocked country bounded by lost territories and marked by migrations, emigrations and mass exoduses like that of its indigenous population in the wake of the expulsion of the Jesuits in 1767—the first time that foreigners were exiled from colonial Paraguay. Yet none of this prevented it from becoming, on independence, the most advanced nation in the whole of Latin America in both material and cultural terms. Under the government of the famous Dr Francia, pioneer of the republic and builder of a Nation-State founded on the principles of the Enlightenment and the French Revolution, Paraguay experienced effective autonomy and independence before any other country on the continent. None of the Liberators were able to achieve anything similar as a result of the Emancipation struggles which they led.

The economic interests of the British Empire, which was penetrating the region and seeking dominion over it, could not allow the dangerous utopia of self-determination in this little landlocked country to continue to exist. Thus, at British instigation and with British support, the financial powers of the Brazilian Empire and the oligarchies of the River Plate (themselves dependent on England) planned the so-called War of the Triple Alliance. Over a five-year period, between 1865 and 1870, Paraguay was razed to the ground, two-thirds of its population was exterminated and more than half its territory stolen. The country was reduced to rubble, leaving this unfortunate nation with only 'memories of a great catastrophe' and a reality that raved and ranted and spat shafts of history into the face of the survivors, as the Spaniard Rafael Barret described it at the turn of the century.

Bereft of its past, isolated, cut off and besieged by neo-colonial interests, nothing got through to this island surrounded by land, turned inwards and absorbed in its own national disaster—not even the echo of the cultural currents that were transforming the ideas, art and literature of Latin America. And to all this must be added a second imprisonment within a bilingual culture. Paraguay is the only completely bilingual country in Latin America—for its true national popular language is Guaraní, the autochthonous oral language. It was the space where a mestizo culture evolved over four centuries, where orality made of writing an absent text—the root metaphor of exile.

This cultural and linguistic exile has thus aggravated from within the other forms of alienation that internal exile brings, for it has implied the annihilation of the ultimate freedom, a freedom devoured by fear transformed into the public consciousness of a country crushed by a system of totalitarian repression which makes a mockery of liberty.

The fragmentation of Paraguayan culture, the uneven growth of the productive forces, the great fear that has taken on the role of a consciousness at once public and secret, individual and collective, have deeply affected the creative potential of a society that lives, in a kind of banishment, on the banks of one of the most beautiful rivers on earth, which provides it with its mythic name—Paragua'y (crowned water or the river of crowns).

Brutality and terror have closed off the sources of inspiration that nourish writers and artists and which give expression to the originality of a people. Such creativity can only grow where it arises out of the social energy of the collective and is focused on its life—its essence, its reality, its history, its cultural, social and national myths fertilising the creative subjectivity of poets, novelists and artists. Their greatest estrangement is to live torn between the reality that ought to be and the reality that is, between the fullness of the life that has been taken from them and the monstrosity of a vegetable existence imposed upon that reality by forces alien to its social and historical nature.

The writer cannot pretend to be an ethnologist; neutrality or objectivity are not his forte. The writers, narrators and poets of Paraguay belong to a culture whose internal structure continues to derive from the oral, resisting the signs of 'cultured' writing, the sign of artificiality and domination. Thus imagination became the prisoner of a double alienation: from language, where the reality stretched far beyond those signs; and from the polyphonic reality that is revealed only in the oral culture, in the inflections and modulations of verbal expression. Further, we know that the value of a work of literature derives not from its good intentions but from the significations of its internal structure, of the instinctive force that flows from it, through the mediation of an art 'that is certainly consciousness, yet in search of a form not conscious of itself', that is not ideology yet which cannot escape from ideology.

Of all the forms of exile that the Paraguayan writer must suffer—external or internal exile, the taking of a life not yet lived, the alienation from works not yet written, segregation from reality, isolation from a national public for those sent into exile and from other internal exiles for those banished to the remotest regions—linguistic exile is the paradigm, the truest metaphor of a reality transformed into unreality.

The problem of bilingual Spanish/Guaraní polarity may be the sign of this kind of linguistic schizophrenia. Which of the two should the Paraguayan writer use? If literature is fundamentally a linguistic fact, and thus an act of communication, the choice seems inescapable—Spanish. But when he writes in Spanish, the writer—and particularly the writer of fiction—feels himself to be suffering the most personal of alienations: linguistic exile. How far can he move from that part of reality and collective life that is expressed in Guaraní, from a Paraguayan culture marked indelibly with the sign of orality, of original mythic thought? As soon as the writer uses Spanish he feels he is translating part of the divided linguistic context; and in doing so, he is splitting himself in half. Something will always remain unexpressed. It is this that forces the Paraguayan writer to make a literature that goes beyond literature, to speak against the word and write against writing, to invent histories that directly transgress against the official history, to subvert through writing, demystifying the language that is shot through with the ideology of domination. In this sense, the new generations of novelists and poets are dedicated to the task of carrying forward this 'literature without a past' born of a past without literature, and to express it in their own language.

The Guaraní cosmogony conceived human language as the foundation of the cosmos and the pristine nature of man. The nucleus of this myth of origin is the esoteric and untranslatable ayvu rapyta or ne'eng mbyte ra, core of the soul-word; the ayvu of the beginning of time. A sound or noise imbued with the wisdom of nature and the cosmos reproducing itself through the austere and melodious Father of the beginning and the end, creator of the foundation word. A secret word, never used before strangers and which with tataendy ('flame-of-the-sacred-fire') and tatachina ('mist-of-the-creator's-power') comprise the three primordial elements of the cosmogony of the ancient Guaraní. Their primogenic deities did not invoke the laws of punishment against those who aspired to wisdom, but forged instead the unity of knowing and doing, of oneness and plurality, of life and death. Every man was God on the road to purification, and God—or the many gods of that theogony—was the first man and the last. They did not impose exile but only the pilgrimage of the mass-person towards that Land-without-evil which each person carried within and which was shared by all.

In Paraguayan society today, unbalanced by oppression, the ancestral voice, that language in which a threatened and persecuted people has found final refuge, has also been misappropriated. It is a language without writing which in another time held within it the soul-word—the seed of the human and the sacred—which is now seeking a space for the word, the unfolding of reality through the unreality of the sign.

Today's Paraguayan writers are well aware that they have reached the limits of a historical process. It makes them abnormally aware of the problems of their society, and also of their artistic work. For the writers subject to internal exile, and those who have been forced to be part of the diaspora, literary activity once again carries within it the imperative to become the bearers of a destiny, to be reintegrated into the living reality of the collective—their own collectivity—to be nourished by its essence and its deepest aspirations and to embrace from there the universality of man.

The writers understand that these achievements, by their very nature, can only be realised on the aesthetic plane, at the level of literature and the word, in the very conception of the narrative art, ~~which is not~~ just (as is sometimes believed) the art of describing reality in words but the art of making the word reality.

This enterprise probes deep beneath the surface of human destiny in search of an image of individual and society that is at once the most complete and the most committed to the vital spiritual experience of the people of our time. It is here, in the alliance of subjectivity and socio-historical consciousness, of creative imagination and moral passion, that Paraguayan writers can overcome their dramatic alienation and isolation to take their full place in the body of literature in the Spanish language.

The section of the 'victors' who belonged to one of the old traditional parties was used as the political arm of a personal autocracy imposed by way of a coup d'état and now methodically seizing control of all the instruments of power. A second (palace) coup took place shortly afterwards, enabling the dictator to eliminate the moderate wing of the government party, which was opposed to this double usurpation of power and the party, to the prostitution of this one hundred-year-old political grouping and to the obviously repressive intent implied in the Presidential slogan of 'victors and victims'.

The other half—the 'victims' (a term applied generically to all opponents of the dictatorship)—now expanded to include members of the governing party too. They became the crushed and silent legions of 'enemies' who for generations were to suffer persecution, prison, torture, exile and death.

The 'victors', on the other hand, are now constituted into that body of electors who from time to time re-enact the electoral farce on behalf of this curious dictator who has discovered a subtle method of ensuring the survival and pseudo-legitimation of his rule by recourse to the democratic procedure of the vote; it has enabled him both to represent himself as a constitutional president and to maintain the perpetual state of siege lifted only for twenty-four hours to permit the symbolic accession to power. All this has taken place under the aegis of a Magna Carta only two or three of whose articles function—namely those which consecrate the supreme and unquestionable authority of the chief executive. There are a number of additional laws with more or less idyllic titles like the 'Law for the Defence of Public Order and Individual Liberty' or the 'Law for the Defence of Democracy' which, together with legislation for the 'State of Siege' form the juridical triad on which the institutional structures of the system have rested.

This pollution of language by the dictator, imbuing it with elements of irony and parody in a kind of unconscious and equivocal black humour is perhaps the clearest indication of the totalitarian ideology of the regime and the climate of general degradation and impoverishment it has created within the country.

Politics and culture

A conceptual clarification is necessary at this point. If we consider the problem of repression and culture from an exclusively 'political' angle (we must use the word again, however inappropriate), the concept of politics as the art or science of good government becomes laughable. The passage of time and the terrible violence that dominates our world have combined to trivialise or indeed to wipe from the very face of the earth the insular enclave of Paraguay. It has become, suddenly, an archaic realm, a kind of vanishing arcadia.

On the other hand, the so-called 'political' perspective could lead on to an insidious Manichaean proposition—namely the suggestion that these abuses should be laid exclusively at the door of the dictator as a kind of perverse, multi-faceted anti-hero. That misses the point, however; like all authoritarian regimes, his case leads on to wider questions of social and historical pathology. Its roots are anthropological—that is, cultural—the product of a degraded anti-culture which reflects on the whole of the society in which such phenomena occur, and which are defects in its very nature, part of that 'recurring nightmare that is its history'.

These facts incriminate their perpetrators—but they also bring into question the responsibility of the whole of the society in which they occur with increasing savagery. The question of why these phenomena occur and recur indefinitely is probably not often asked; they are accepted and tolerated where they occur. Of course it is easy to say that, and a great deal harder to have to live with the reality.

The question of historical responsibility (or its absence) and, let it be said, of guilt, is one that has to be faced honestly and self-critically. It is not a question of guilt in a penal nor a theological sense, but in its most concrete, anthropological expression. It must be confronted if we are to ensure that the experience of authoritarianism will yield lessons, warnings and perspectives that can help both to bring about its end and prevent its recurrence. Such an analysis should not be delivered in the tone of Job's laments. It is one thing to live with something, it is quite another to connive in it. Our memory should be trained to forget by remembering. 150,000 citizens have passed through the prisons of the dictatorship in the course of the last thirty years. In the same period more than one and a half million—half the population—have suffered expulsion and exile. Add to that the incalculable numbers who have died or disappeared after torture, who have been kidnapped or murdered, or the punitive and intimidatory attacks on peasant organisations struggling for their legitimate rights like the Agrarian Leagues of the 1960s and 1970s. Artists and intellectuals, workers and peasant leaders, human rights lawyers, even businessmen, are frequently imprisoned. Outstanding writers, intellectuals and artists have been sent to die in exile. The mortal remains of Agustín Barros, Paraguay's greatest musician, for example, have not yet been allowed back into his native country, though his music is played there every day.

It seems that what the regime fears are not the works themselves, but the physical presence of their author—a presence which remains dangerous even after death. The body of Elvio Romero, Paraguay's greatest contemporary poet and the remains of Gabriel Caccia, the founder of the Paraguayan novel, have been repatriated virtually in secret. And the writer of these words was expelled for the second time during a first visit home after thirty-seven years of exile, deprived of his identity documents and explicitly forbidden from returning to his country.

This degradation of the person, this removal of identity in something more than a simply formal or police sense, this severing of the individual from his existential and ontological roots, is precisely what the regime has set out to inflict at the collective level. And it can pride itself on having achieved its objective to some degree, just as it prides itself on those monumental public works financed, without exception, by the surrender of the actual and potential resources of the nation. The cost in terms of national sovereignty, territorial integrity, and the identity and autonomy of the nation are, of course, enormous.

Repression and culture, therefore, are two antagonistic but not equivalent universes. The most solid cultural tradition has proved incapable of preventing the transitory or permanent emergence of totalitarianism as anti-culture. On the other hand, that power has proved capable of destroying whole epochs of culture and preventing their slow evolution towards maturity and completion or their renaissance. The principal examples are Nazism and Fascism, which unleashed the Second World War and were defeated militarily but not ideologically. Their lethal effect derives precisely from their power to contaminate and even fascinate. For if it is true that time is not on the side of the oppressors but of their victims, it is the complicity of the victims, through their initial indifference or their failure to see, which allows their oppressors to exist and to maintain themselves in power by abolishing the fundamental rights and freedoms of other human beings. The opposition groups, or those who are critical of the society, are enclosed in a vacuum of total defencelessness, hostages to their own fear and prisoners of their own existence, made solely responsible for all transgressions. It is a situation at once real and unreal, a nightmare from which there is no awakening.

Authoritarianism in action

This power, usurping and oppressing the general will, has made it impossible until now to carry through—even by stages—any project for a democratic pluralist society capable of guaranteeing social peace and achieving the coexistence of all social, political and cultural sectors on the basis of a respect for liberty and the rights of citizens in universal equality.

In many ways it is cultural activity that has been most directly affected—literature, audio-visual arts, music, theatre, collective theatre workshops, scientific research, cultural organisations, student groups etc—for all of them require an atmosphere of creative freedom in which these most delicate and fragile concentrations of individual energy can flourish. By nature and inclination they have a critical function—that is, they are subversive; they start from an unjust and anomalous reality and declare themselves in opposition to it. That artistic, literary and scientific groups not only still exist, but indeed are proliferating, or that individuals of great talent and prestige continue to refuse to sell out or compromise with the dictatorship, is testimony not to the tolerance of the oppressor but to the resolute vitality of a culture which, despite dislocation and abuse, has remained alive and fought to find creative space amid isolation and fragmentation, flying in the face of a brutal and menacing repression.

The observation is true of both hemispheres of this bilingual culture, from the popular to the highest levels of aesthetic refinement attuned to the universal avant-garde. The richness of the oral traditions and the ancient folk crafts which formed in the original clay of Latin America the dark suns sculpted on their pots, figures and textiles was born out of the darkest night and will survive into the dawn of rebirth. Aleijandinho modelled his temples with hands eaten up by leprosy, and raised imperishable monuments to the power of spirit over matter, of art over fatality. Their physical presence renders futile and empty the unreality of the lords of power.

The two exiles

This brief picture throws into sharp relief the difficulties faced by cultural workers in Paraguay, as writers, as intellectuals and as citizens.

As a cultural worker in external exile, I shall restrict myself to the situation of the writer—that does not imply that I see it as a priority, but only that it provides a concrete point of reference in personal experience. In fact it is the plastic artists, musicians and the audiovisual arts (including both cultured and popular theatre) which are today in the vanguard of artistic production. The arts of the word are the most easily discovered by the agents of censorship and repression; thus the possibilities of reproduction or imitation, of 'smuggling in' the printed or written text, are far fewer.

Between the two groups of exiled cultural workers there has appeared a split akin to the divisions in national society maintained by dictatorial authoritarianism as I have described them; it is a dichotomy fomented by repression and to which the external exiles, whether knowingly or not, make concessions. This artificial segregation is one more turn of the screw, neither the worst nor the last twist of the garrotte around the throat of a humanity suffering socially and culturally. It was this same segregation which thirty years ago set in motion in Paraguay the Latin American diaspora, the greatest in its history, which has continued to the present.

The fragmentation of Paraguayan culture under the impact of the uneven development of the productive forces, of backwardness and the consequent repression at all levels have affected the creative potential of the whole society—yet it is that potential from which writers and artists draw nourishment and which express the originality of a nation. Obviously they can only do so when their works are focused on the social energy of the collectivity, a collectivity which by and large has not yet been exposed to the benefits or the dangers of culture. Paraguay is an agrarian, peasant country with a high percentage of real and functional illiteracy; its population and its cultural expression are immersed in an unreality which is the coagulation of its history. The artists and intellectuals who live in internal isolation feel dispirited and demoralised by the oppressive atmosphere of frustration and silence in which they must exist. And the most profound alienation of all is to live torn between the reality that ought to be and the reality that is, between the fullness of a life taken from them and obliterated and the abnormality of a vegetable life imposed by a repressive power that is everywhere.

The writer who must produce his work in enforced or voluntary exile pays the price of rootlessness which, for a Paraguayan in particular, because he is deeply rooted in his own medium, is traumatic. Separated from his reality and the nourishment it affords, the exiled writer becomes a stranger, belonging nowhere, refusing to accept the punishment of exile imposed by a corrupt power yet unable to return to a country where he would be even more of an outsider. Sometimes, it is true, he chooses to take the risk and return, taking upon himself the ravaging form of self-immolation which Jose Bergamin described on his return to a country stifled by the authoritarianism of Franco: 'I prefer to be buried alive than to die and be left unburied'.

The writers, poets, artists and intellectuals of Paraguay, whether in internal or external exile, are well aware that they exist at the extremes of the historical process. This makes them abnormally conscious of the problems of their society and of their own responsibility to carry this fragmented, unbalanced and crushed culture forward, bring it up to date and put it on the same level as the other cultures on the continent, sharing their dynamic and the growth and chance that is the sign of the times. Their work, as Jose Marti described all cultural activity in an oppressed country, is the art of the cave and the anvil.

For the writers condemned to internal banishment and for those cast into the diaspora, artistic work once again signifies the imperative need to realise a destiny, to become again a part of their own collective experience, to rediscover the fraternal warmth of unity with their comrades in arms. This unity is not uniformity but the unfolding of a diversity of mental, ideological, experimental and spiritual horizons that mark the flowering of cultural life. As far as cultural workers are concerned, therefore, any hypothetical law of amnesty must mean an end to the state of siege and to repression at all levels.

Culture and democracy

Culture has a central orienting role in the process of recuperating democracy and in the transition from authoritarian regimes to pluralist systems, with all the juridical and constitutional reorganisation that such change must involve. It must be clearly said that the process of liberation does not swing between the two extremes of acceleration at all costs or slow, step-by-step change. These processes are not subject to some theoretical, abstract fatality which leads them inevitably towards the outbreak of armed struggle or to the blind terrorism of a violence from below arising as a counterthrust to the institutional terrorism of authoritarian or totalitarian powers. In Paraguay today the challenge is to avoid both outcomes in the concrete objective conditions of one particular society, above all in one dominated by and dependent on the imperial power. In these times the only possible or desirable response to oppressive regimes is one that is global and systematic, peaceful yet active.

Democratic citizens are demonstrating an increasing resolution to work in this direction towards the transition. Their will is strengthened by the knowledge that it is only with clear objectives and under the aegis of solidarity between all democratic sectors that a truly effective strategy can be developed to roll back dictatorship and bring about the dissolution of its power. This aberrant autocratic and personalist form of government must be ended; but at this conjuncture political, economic and cultural liberation can and must be achieved by peaceful and democratic means. Cultural workers in every field must contribute to the creation of original models and proposals to ensure that this transition will be more than just a sterile crossing of the desert. The concrete and particular conditions of the transition in Paraguay make it a priority that the democratic forces forge an opening towards a peaceful and non-violent process of transition.

The silent dialogue

These possibilities are not yet on the agenda, despite the effort, the courage and the political maturity of the opposition—both leaders and masses. Cut off from their base, immobilised by the repression, the party organisations are nevertheless making efforts both within and outside the country to carry forward the difficult and arduous process of reunifying and drawing together their people. They do not avoid dialogue, but they are not prepared to enter it unconditionally, as if negotiating the transition were like resolving some crooked business deal.

What is required basically is a progressive conquest of the streets as a forum for political debate in the villages and towns, in the urban sprawl and the peasant communities. That much has been made clear in the paths towards the restoration of democracy taken today by the movements in our brother nations of the Southern Cone—Uruguay, Chile, Brazil. The culmination was the restoration of democracy in Argentina, a stimulating example and a pointer for all those peoples of Latin America who are living in a similar situation.

The dictatorship, for its part, does not admit the possibility of a confrontation of ideas (does it have any of its own?), nor is it disposed to dialogue, except in the sense of a delaying tactic in a desperate attempt to hold back the definitive crisis that provides the context of the debate. Even less is it prepared to entertain any possibility of changes or alternatives—even internal changes—which in any way presuppose a change in the leadership of the regime.

Under these conditions, the issue in the first place is how to force the dictatorship to acknowledge its true, totalitarian character, presently camouflaged behind an 'institutional' facade. Then, in the second place, it can be forced to accept confrontation in debate in conditions of equality under the mounting pressure of public opinion, national and international, and of its own structural deterioration.

The future relations between culture, politics and economics—non-existent in a past where each was segregated into separate compartments—will play a key role in the establishment of this difficult but necessary equilibrium.

It is only this equilibrium of its political, economic and cultural forces, animated by a general social humanism, that will allow Paraguay to achieve the political objective which it can no longer postpone—its entry into modernity. Social humanism as the essence of a pluralist democracy implies the interplay of freedom and responsibility not as opposing concepts but as the full assumption by the individual of his civic rights and also of his obligations to society—a society based on a liberty understood and practised as an ethics of responsibility, in constant struggle against whatever threatens to degrade or destroy it.

Such a society is unthinkable under a state terrorism at the service of internal or external hegemonic ambitions. To overcome it in a spirit of collective cohesion, with the full force of a conviction in peaceful coexistence, is the only possibility for harmonious living, progress and perfection that is left to countries like Paraguay. There are no intermediate options—it is this one alone that can provide hope for the future.

Thresholds of identity: literature and exile in Latin America

Exile, internal and external, enforced and involuntary, has been a constant condition of Latin American experience. From the time of independence from Spain and Portugal to current struggles to break dependency on cultural imperialism, exile has intersected all phases of the construction of national cultures in the continent. A sign of the violence which has permeated cultural debate, exile has also been a place of transformations. This article will focus on the past thirteen years, i.e. those which followed the fall of Allende and have been marked by the establishment of dictatorships in the Southern Cone countries and the massive exodus of citizens provoked by these regimes.

Throughout Latin America the word 'exile' has lost its historical meaning. In Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet Romeo kills a young man in a duel and is banished for his crime. The Prince, the arbiter of order in Verona, leaves no doubt as to the subject and object of the act of exile:

And for that offence
Immediately we do exile him hence.

Part of the fear associated with exile in Latin America is due to the fact that it has lost this clarity of status. Terms such as 'banishment' have no place in the discourse of witch-hunts and 'dirty wars' that have forced many thousands of Latin Americans to leave their countries in the last thirteen years. In place of the authoritative command of Shakespeare's Prince—a command which punishes a recognisable offence according to the laws of the land—there has been the darkness of secrecy and suspicion, of anonymous threats and the disappearances of friends and acquaintances. The act of exile itself has become something that was not legally imposed but rather undertaken 'voluntarily' to avoid persecution, imprisonment or death in the imminent but unknown future.

No recent event in Latin America had more immediate or more extreme consequences than the military coup that on 11 September 1973 overthrew Salvador Allende, Chile's elected Marxist President. Allende died in this burning palace and a period of relentlessly violent repression in which tens of thousands of Chileans were tortured and killed, imprisoned and forced abroad, began. In the ensuing witch-hunt the new regime, under General Pinochet, set out to erase the cultural activities that it associated with the recently overthrown government. By 1978 over 100,000 people had been forced to live outside the country. In February 1985 a list of 4,575 names of those not to be allowed back into Chile was published; but as those not on the list trickle back to join the swelling ranks of the opposition, the notorious Article 24 of the 1980 Constitution, allowing for the imprisonment and exile of the regime's enemies without charge or court appearance, still stands. Among Chilean writers in exile are Antonio Skármeta and Ariel Dorfman.

In Uruguay the Tupamaro guerrilla movement had come to dominate political life by the late 1960s. In 1972, as the armed forces broke the back of the guerrilla opposition, many innocent citizens suffered from the brutally violent security operation that led to the military take-over in 1973 and eclipsed a stable democratic system. Once known as 'the Switzerland of Latin America' Uruguay had become, in the words of Eduardo Galeano, 'a vast torture chamber'.¹ In the following years 300,000 people (20 per cent of Uruguay's population) left the country, driven out by the combined pressure of economic decline and a level of repression that made it necessary to have a political permit to celebrate a birthday. Uruguayan intellectuals forced into exile include Christina Peri Rossi, Juan Carlos Onetti and Eduardo Galeano (who has since returned).

The death of Juan Perón in 1974 led to the disintegration of Argentinian politics into factional warfare. Escalating instability and unbridled political violence culminated in the military coup of 24 March 1976. The horrific facts of the ensuing 'dirty war' waged against those whom the state considered to be spreading 'ideas that are contrary to Western and Christian civilisation' and in which between 9,000 and 30,000 so-called 'subversives' were illegally abducted and 'disappeared' have been chronicled in Nunca Más,² the report of the National Commission on Disappeared People. After 1976 many thousands of Argentinians—together with many others who had previously sought refuge in Buenos Aires—were forced out of the country to avoid the terror of the anonymous telephone call, the Ford Falcon without identifying number plates, the faceless torturer and the nameless end. Among Argentinian writers who were exiled are Manuel Puig, Marta Traba and Juan Gelman.

¹ South (London) July 1986.

² London: Faber/Index on Censorship, 1986.

Exile in Paraguay takes more extreme forms than in any other Latin American country, although it is by no means a phenomenon of recent years alone. (The peculiarities of the Paraguayan situation will be further elaborated below in relation to Roa Bastos). An 'island surrounded by land', Paraguay's post-independence history has been one of cyclical exoduses, each of which has only served to highlight the isolation and exile of Paraguay itself. The most recent—and massive—exodus began after the bloody civil war of 1947, a civil war that was to culminate in the dictatorship of General Stroessner, who is still in power in 1986. Paraguay's tiny population of two million people is today complemented by the estimated one million more who have chosen, or have been forced, to live outside their country.

While the dramatic events in the countries of the Southern Cone and the sheer volume of exiles and emigrants that they inevitably gave rise to focus a consideration of recent Latin American exile on that area, it would be a callous misunderstanding of the phenomenon to ignore other countries where exile has been all too prevalent. The turbulent and coup-ridden history of Bolivia, for example, has been one in which exile has been one of the few constants of political and intellectual life. Many politicians found themselves forced not once, but many times to live abroad—which provided not only a refuge from political defeat, but also a platform for political come-back. The longest-serving presidency of recent times, the dictatorship of General Banzer (1971–78), was a period in which stability was maintained at the price of repression—and the numbers of people seeking refuge outside Bolivia rose accordingly.

Exile has long been the enforced condition of many of those who live in the struggling republics of Central America. While those whom the Somoza regime forced out of Nicaragua returned in triumph with the victory of the Sandinistas in 1979, countries such as El Salvador and Guatemala find their most prominent cultural activity outside national frontiers. In 1972 the Salvadorean writer Manlio Argueta was driven into exile in Costa Rica by the warning of a gun-waving policeman: 'This is what you'll get next time . . . we're sick and tired of poets in this country'.³ The threat was not empty: three years later the poet Roque

³ Amanda Hopkinson, 'Manlio Argueta', Index on Censorship 14(2) 1985, p. 49.

Dalton returned to El Salvador after many years of exile, only to be murdered there. The situation in Guatemala is no better and a whole generation of young writers has been forced abroad by the civil war conditions. The stream of exiles was swelled in 1980 when many intellectuals, writers and journalists became the targets of a purge.

While exile from Cuba was largely a phenomenon of the 1960s, the 1970s and 1980s have seen a rise in the number of writers (the poet Jorge Valls, for example) who have sought refuge outside Cuba after their release from lengthy terms as political prisoners. It has been asserted by Reynaldo Arenas among others that a state of 'intellectual repression' has caused the exile of a number of Cuban writers. The best-known Cuban authors living outside the country are probably Guillermo Cabrera Infante and Severo Sarduy. By the end of the 1970s it was estimated that one million Cubans, 10 per cent of the population, were living outside the island, mainly in the US, where the presence of such a large community of exiles has made a strong cultural and particularly musical impact.

Although international attention has not been focused on Haiti until recently, this diminutive island has seen a larger proportion of its population finding refuge elsewhere than any other Latin American country; the 300,000 Haitians in New York make it Haiti's 'second city'. The Duvalier dynasty, in power from 1957 until early 1986, effectively institutionalised the suppression of ideas; high levels of illiteracy, a complete lack of publishing possibilities and almost no public libraries ensured the exile, virtually in its entirety, of Haiti's literate culture.

The recurrent and widespread condition of exile forces a consideration of why nation-states in the continent have failed to foster a plural national culture, with room for all sectors of the population. A brief consideration of historical factors is relevant here. As against stereotyped views of the continent, it is important to stress the extreme heterogeneity of Latin American cultures. At the moment of the Conquest there was no unity, simply an enormous variety of cultures as yet unclassified by any universalising European discourse. There have been three main moments of unification: conquest, liberation from direct colonialism, and incorporation into international capitalist culture. Even in the second case, which includes the establishment of nation-states, the tendency has been for the terms of unification to be external: European or, more recently, North American. The possibility of other forms of autonomy and synthesis has been a main theme of Latin American literature in recent years. The experience of exile, whether enforced or voluntary, has heightened consciousness of division, as well as demonstrating new possibilities of breaking down boundaries.

That exile can lead to the discovery of new identities is perhaps one of its constants throughout history. For Latin American literature, this process is charged with a sense of social necessity: the need to transform societies marked by oppression, scarcity and the absence of an autonomous national culture. The connections between exile, utopia and writing are traced by Augusto Roa Bastos in the revised edition of his novel Hijo de hombre. The protagonist, in prison, writes in his diary: An old vice, this one of writing. . . . A way of escaping from non-place to the stable space of signs: a way of searching for the place that took our place to another place. Isn't this perhaps the real meaning of utopia? The utopia of the Prodigal Son returning to the home which no longer exists; that of the banished, the exiled, the imprisoned who strive to return to the place they were uprooted from and know that even if they return it won't be theirs.⁴

Internal exile, in the sense of isolation, alienation, deprivation of means of production and communication, exclusion from public life, happens both to intellectuals and to whole communities. It can be no less dire than external exile. Roa Bastos has pointed out how writers in this situation have become trapped in protest literature:

The wilfully 'prophetic' word (with which the writer—a bourgeois or petit bourgeois by definition as well as by class consciousness—believes he can resolve and absolve his ideological contradictions) is the most ominous of all alienations and inner exiles . . . We all know that a genuine literary work has merit not for its good intentions . . . but rather for the truth or force of truth that emanates from the collective social energy unconsciously projected through the sensitive filter of subjectivity: that of the particular author.⁵

The exile of whole communities occurs when these are violently excluded from the terms of national identity, terms which can be genocidal (as has been the case of Indians in Peru, for instance). A main focus of exclusion is linguistic. Illiteracy enforces non-participation in the dominant forms of national culture, something of which writers in exile, cut off from their 'own' readers, have become particularly conscious. Secondly, in areas where the majority language is not Spanish (eg Paraguay or southern Andean Peru), writing in Spanish risks being isolated from the main communicative energies. Internal and external marginalisation are often closely connected, as in Paraguay and Haiti, both with approximately 90 per cent illiteracy and their large population living in external exile.

⁴ Hijo de hombre, Madrid: Alfaguara, 1985, p 257.

⁵ Review (30) September – December 1981, p 19.

The last thirteen years have been the worst in Latin American history in terms of external exile, whether enforced or voluntary. In both cases exile reflects similar conditions: an environment which inhibits professional and artistic development is part of the same pattern of factors which spawn dictatorships and which dictatorships perpetuate. Thus the first cultural acts of post-revolutionary Cuba and Nicaragua were to carry out massive literacy campaigns.

A discussion of the effects of exile on literature must include the connected issues of internationalisation and dependency. The need to appropriate what is useful and liberating in European and North American culture involves the dangers of alienation from national cultures and a merely epigonal relationship with the appropriated culture. At the other extreme, popular oral cultures, while offering resources for opposition and resistance, cannot of themselves supply a language for literature. These two polar processes are not necessarily mutually exclusive, as Roa Bastos's writing shows. The most acute form of cultural dependency is on imperialist mass culture, something to which the exiled Chilean writer Ariel Dorfman has given special attention, in books on Donald Duck, the Reader's Digest, and the Lone Ranger and other comic strip heroes. Dorfman's manuals to the hidden messages in such works are a continuation of large-scale cultural programmes in Allende's Chile, one of the most important recent experiences in the struggle to undo cultural dependency. The Argentinian writer, Julio Cortázar, who lived in Paris for the last thirty years of his life, exemplifies one of the most fruitful appropriations of European cultural resources. On the other hand, as Roa Bastos has pointed out, there exists a type of 'exile industry', run by an internationalised elite, cut off from national cultures, and whose success in such circles is no indication of the quality of their work.

García Márquez, in his introduction to a book of short stories on exile, writes of 'the common and communal language of exile' which is capable of breaking down the barriers between separate national identities.⁶ This can be simultaneous with a discovery of differences, previously unrecognised. As Angel Rama has said, 'Argentine exiles who have recently settled in regions with which they have had no previous contact—the America of mestizos and mulattos—are discovering exotic realities similar to those encountered in the Orient by Europeans during the last century.⁷ The difference between exile in Europe and in Mexico or Brazil (places of Argentinian and Uruguayan diaspora) produces a change in the lines of communication. There is also the instance of the USA, which has welcomed Cuban exiles, but not others. To give one illustration, Angel Rama, exiled from Uruguay, was expelled from the US under McCarthyite legislation. One of the most important literary and social critics of twentieth-century Latin America, Rama held a Guggenheim Fellowship and was working at the University of Maryland. The US Immigration Authorities refused to renew his permit because he was classified as a 'communist subversive' under the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, known as the McCarran-Walters Act. But in all cases of displacement from his home country, the writer faces the constraining condition of having to negotiate between three possible readerships: the readers of his original country, those of the Latin American diaspora and those of his guest country. As Manuel Puig has pointed out, the loss of an original readership through censorship or exile (which often amount to the same thing) can pose serious problems.⁸

⁶ Exilio, Mexico, 1981.

An exemplary instance of exile as the dismantling of frontier is the nomadism of a Henry Miller. But as well as an instigation to freeing, migratory movement powerfully demonstrated in the work, say, of Cortázar, exile also includes traps of staticity—such as that of nostalgia, which, as Cortázar points out, is precisely what the dictatorships want exiles to feel. The exile becomes caught up in the ahistorical thrust of nostalgia while the dictatorship makes history. Examples of the fixity whereby the exile's country becomes a place which does not change are documented in the fiction of exile. It can lead to the feeling that it is impossible ever to really go back or to bizarre insistences among groups of exiles about how Argentinians (etc) are supposed to speak or behave. Exile is a university (Roa Bastos), a freeing of boundaries, a place of cross-fertilisations previously impeded by political frontiers which do not correspond to cultural necessities. But it also includes the dangers of alienation, of separation from some of the main energies needed by the writer.

Literary explorations of the experience of exile embrace both its positive and its negative aspects, the most interesting writing coming from an awareness of the tensions between the two. As the Argentinian poet, Juan Gelman, has put it, 'exile is a cow which sometimes gives poisoned milk'⁹—as a purveyor of physical and cultural nourishment, it cannot be relied upon. The host country may provide freedom for its temporary guests, but, for a person displaced from their own country, that freedom is circumscribed. From a flat in Birmingham, England, the Chilean poet Alberto Santibañez wrote: 'Liberty cannot be understood merely as the freedom to walk down a street without someone checking your movements; it's also a question of your friends, your streets, your pavements, your family, and the possibility of doing something creative, making things, being a part of something.'¹⁰

⁷ Review (30) p 11.

⁸ Index on Censorship 14(5) 1985.

Experiences of return provide a startling jolt to that part of the sensibility of an exile that can become bound up in memory. The novelist Osvaldo Soriano returned, in 1983, to the Argentina of his past with the human testimony of his distance from that past—a French wife whom he had married in exile. He found 'an Argentina I do not know, plundered, starving, humiliated', while she, for whom the journey was forwards rather than backwards, exclaimed that 'It's beautiful, there is still a feeling of douceur de vivre'.¹¹

For many writers the short story provides a genre where fiction can meet autobiography in an examination of the alienations that exile brings with it. In these semi-autobiographical pieces the experiences of displacement are confronted in a more directly thematic manner than would be sustainable in the richer dimensions of a novel. Thus Ana Vásquez, a Chilean novelist and, as a psychologist, student of the problems of exile, found, when she was asked to write an article on the exile's cultural displacement by the magazine Index on Censorship, that the form in which she felt herself most able to respond was that of the short story. In her story ('The doubts of a bigamist') the protagonist seeks out a bigamous relationship as a metaphor for her biculturalism.¹² The solution is one that both Gelman and Roa Bastos would find difficult to accept. For Gelman, writing from Rome where he continued to act as press secretary for the Montoneros (a banned political organisation), 'one man divided in two is not two men'.¹³ Roa Bastos

⁹ Juan Gelman and Osvaldo Bayer, Exilio, Buenos Aires, Legasa, 1984, p 13.

¹⁰ Alberto Santibañez, 'To return as a Chilean citizen', Index on Censorship 14(4) 1985, p 45.

¹¹ Index on Censorship 12(2) 1983.

¹² Ana Vásquez, 'The doubts of a bigamist', Index on Censorship 15(6) 1986, pp 31–3.

¹³ op cit, p 23.

expresses the conviction even more strongly: 'he who believes he has two countries has none'.¹⁴ In a story entitled 'The same corner of the world', Poli Délano, a Chilean writer, examines the extent to which the loss of one's country renders all exiles people of the same hazy territory of the diaspora. From a chance encounter on a street corner in Mexico City a Chilean strikes up a relationship with a Uruguayan woman—because they both 'smell of the South'.¹⁵ Gradually the girls and women he has known in the past, in Santiago, become subsumed into her, his compatriot in exile.

The traumas of exile are at their most acute, if perhaps not at their most deeply felt, at the time of arrival. This has a lot to do with what has been left behind—the sorrowful state of a native country whose mounting repression and persecution have been the impetus to fight. For Andrew Graham-Yooll, an Anglo-Argentine journalist and writer forced into exile by the military coup of 1976, 'arrival in exile is a passage from hysteria to angst'.¹⁶ The Uruguayan writer Cristina Peri Rossi exposes the multiplicity of the forms of a recently-arrived exile's angst in a vividly detailed story ('The influence of Edgar A Poe on the poetry of Raimundo Arias') in which the trials of an exiled father and his daughter take on proportions that are both terrible and darkly absurdist. Having left a past life where revolution was just one of the items on the daily routine, somewhat between queuing at the shops and cooking, the pair are afforded a very cool welcome by their new country (presumably Spain). All that is alienating about exile is presented through the relentlessly literal eyes of the precocious daughter who cannot be reconciled to the four days 'robbed' from them by their boat journey, 'What have they done with my five thousand, seven hundred and sixty minutes?'.¹⁷ In this new country where 'they' demand a mountain of paperwork and a blood test before entry is allowed, and where father and daughter have decided to come 'because they spoke the same language', even the Spanish is unfamiliar, a foreign language. Where a peach is not a peach and a strawberry not a strawberry, simple nouns can be as alienating as an unknown city.

Rather than assuming that there is a pre-defined 'Latin American Literature of Exile', taking as its limits the territory of experience as outlined in these short stories, we have preferred to take exile as a ¹⁴ Review (3) p 18.

¹⁵ Poli Délano, 'The same corner of the world', Index on Censorship 15(7) 1986, pp 17–19.

¹⁶ A State of Fear, London: Eland, 1986.

¹⁷ La tarde del dinosaurio, Barcelona: Plaza y Janés, 1980, p 52.

condition which cuts across the variety of Latin American literary production and introduce a set of crucial tensions. In this way it becomes feasible to discuss exile as a key condition of writing rather than simply as a theme. To give a range of exemplary instances, we propose to concentrate on three writers: Cortázar, Onetti and Roa Bastos. In all three of them there is a sense of a utopian reconquest of spaces occupied by oppression, where the pressures of displacement range from alienation and exclusion within everyday life to the marginalisation of mass populations. For instance, Cortázar, who has written of the need to move beyond national cultures to a notion of Latin American culture as a 'mosaic of heterogeneities', has produced a series of short stories and novels which are paradigms of breaking down frontiers. Onetti creates an imaginary city which is emblematic of a state of inner exile within a culture which can only offer failure to his urban characters. In Roa Bastos's work, the mass marginalisation of the native population inside Paraguay and the individual exile (internal and external) of the writer are the poles of necessary transformation. Their work as a whole traces a set of significant connections between enforced, external exile and its other forms (internal and voluntary), to the extent that the common idea of a 'literature of exile' written solely by those writers living in enforced banishment is a distortion of the much wider relevance of exile and its various connotations.

In the first sentence of Cortázar's story 'The Other Sky', the protagonist thinks 'Sometimes it used to happen to me that everything let itself be traversed, everything became soft and yielding, offering no resistance to shifts from one thing to another.'¹⁸ The dissolving of boundaries into porousness recurs throughout Cortázar's work; more than just a theme, it is conveyed through the verbal texture of his stories and novels. The dissolving process receives into itself the energies which were blocked by the imposition of frontiers between dream and reality, youth and age, past and present, male and female. The unblocking includes, very importantly, the divisions between one culture and another, an issue which had a direct biographical relevance for Cortázar, who was born in Brussels in 1914 (of Argentinian parents), lived in Argentina from 1918 until 1951, and remained in exile in Paris until his death in 1984. From 1976 until the fall of the Argentinian military dictatorship his exile became enforced rather than voluntary, a change which gave new meanings to cultural displacement in his life and writing.

¹⁸ Todos los fuegos el fuego, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1966, p 167.

A crucial strategy of the early stories (End of the Game and Other Stories) is to present normally separate realities as an unbroken continuity; disallowing the suppressions, exclusions and marginalisations through which tabooed areas are created and maintained. A metaphor of such exclusion is supplied in the title 'The false door', a door between two hotel rooms behind which a travelling businessman can hear the sound of a child crying, a sound which resists being placed either in the category of external reality or of a repressed part of the businessman himself. We are challenged to recognise there is an unbroken surface separate from the net of conventional cultural meanings which seeks to break it up and impose an immobilising grid upon it. Immobility and paralysis are the experience of the boy narrator of 'After lunch', who, caught between family loyalty and an urge to run away, is unable to find words for the unacceptable Other (possibly a monstrously deformed brother). Here, as elsewhere in Cortázar's writing, the frontier of exclusion leaks. In 'The other sky', mentioned above, the narrator drifts between a strait-laced bourgeois family existence in Buenos Aires and hanging out with prostitutes in Paris. Buenos Aires in 1945 and Paris in 1914 are woven together into a seamless web, an unbroken continuity whose smooth surface is dominated by the shopping arcades typical not just of Parisian architecture but of Buenos Aires too.

Migratory movement is expanded into greater complexity in Hopscotch, Cortázar's major novel. Dualisms of place (again, Buenos Aires and Paris) are extended through dualisms of characters, the main ones among them having their counterparts or doubles 'on the other side'. A major element in the polarities is rationalism versus the irrational, but it is in Paris and not in Argentina that Oliveira, the main character, discovers his need to yield to the irrational. Such inversions disallow the imperialist 'barbarisation' of Argentina and the reciprocal idealisation of Paris by Argentinian intellectuals. Living in Paris, Oliveira recognises the need to 'look at the world through the eye in your arse, and you'll see patterns pretty as can be'.¹⁹ Back in Buenos Aires, he finds himself further away from his country than he has been in Europe, no longer even a citizen. He becomes actively paranoid, but on the far side of his 'madness' there is the possibility of reconciliation, of undoing the various dualisms which have pressed upon his life.

¹⁹ Rayuela, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1968, p 253 (ch 36).

At one point in Celine's A Long Day's Journey into Night the hero remarks pessimistically that when you move between countries there's a dangerous moment when you have left one culture behind but have not yet entered into another—the danger being that you might stop believing in culture altogether. For Cortázar's Oliveira however—or at least for the reader—the dizzying possibility of loss of all codes is in the end a positive, since it keeps open a utopian possibility—'the kibbutz of desire'. Cortázar's work opposes any relationship of dependency upon European culture. Unlike some writers of previous generations, he does not construct an imitative and epigonal version of Western culture. His position is active, critical and inventive, fuelled by the desire to oppose oppressive cultural grids of any kind. Which makes the word 'cosmopolitan', so often used of Cortázar, inappropriate; its connotations of packaged cultural elitism simply do not fit.

Throughout his career, Cortázar remained intensely committed to the Argentinian language and the Argentinian reader. All of his texts retained this vital connection. Thus when a book of his short stories was banned in Argentina because he refused to remove two of the stories which were found offensive by the military junta, it was a great shock. The two stories are 'Apocalypse in Solentiname' and 'Second time round', and refer to the repressive violence of Somoza in Nicaragua and the method of 'disappearing' people in Argentina. In both cases, Cortázar continues his strategy of showing a single, seamless reality, disallowing in this case the convenient separation of state violence and everyday life. The experience of enforced exile led him in the final years of his life into a deep involvement with the struggle to combat exile and other forms of political and cultural oppression emanating from the dictatorships of the 1970s in Latin America. As well as giving support to Cuba, he spoke unstintingly on behalf of revolutionary Nicaragua; his book of essays and stories, Nicaragua tan violentamente dulce,—was published in Managua in 1983. Commitments to writing and speaking on these issues did not in the end allow him to take the sabbatical he had wanted in order to write a final novel, knowing by then that he was ill with leukaemia and did not have long to live.

Among the reasons for Cortázar's original departure for France had been the rise of Perónism, which at the time he had felt to be a culturally destructive force. Later he commented that only by leaving Argentina did he come to understand Perónism—its reflection of other, more popular levels of Argentinian culture than those he had been brought up to accept in a middle-class suburb. The expanding sense of Latin American culture is one of the most urgent themes of the essays he wrote after his stories were banned from publication in Argentina. He questions the very principle of single and separate national cultures: given the massive extent of illiteracy, and thus that the producers and consumers of literature are only a small and unrepresentative part of the whole, 'Is there any sense in going on talking about national identity and culture in the face of a mosaic of heterogeneities like that which Latin America presents?'²⁰ His sense of the importance of his readers becomes intensified. They are what matters most to him, his reason for going on writing. What distinguishes Latin American readers, he stresses, is that for them 'literature is part of life and not of leisure, part of politics and history'.²¹ The pleasure these readers experience in literature does not stop with itself but leads to vital issues of political necessity. This places a responsibility on the writer: 'He cannot speak only of books but of what is happening before, during and after the books in any one of our countries.'²²

The great Uruguayan novelist, Juan Carlos Onetti (born 1909), was expelled from his country in 1974 in circumstances which were grotesque and ridiculous. He had never been active in any left-wing organisation, he had not engaged in making political statements and his novels include no reference to Uruguayan politics. Nevertheless, in 1974, he was imprisoned for being one of the judges for a literary prize which was awarded to a story which the military decided they did not like. Subsequently, he went to live in Madrid. His fiction is set in the imaginary city of Santa María: an early work, A Brief Life (1950), traces the foundation of the city as a place which compensates for the existential frustration of failed desire—the hero embarks on creating the imaginary place after his wife has her breast removed because of cancer. In subsequent works such as The Corpse-Gatherer and The Shipyard (1961), Santa María acquires meanings beyond the existential: it becomes a site of failed utopian social projects and the location of the imitative rituals of a dependent culture, in the shape of a run-down shipyard which belongs to a failed entrepreneur ironically named Petrus, the last thing he inspires being faith. The shipyard is a grotesque and decrepit replica of what a capitalist enterprise should be. Onetti's technical innovations and his testing and questioning the relationships between fiction and reality make him a key pioneer of the new Latin American novel.

²⁰ Argentina: años de alambradas culturales, Buenos Aires: Muchnik, 1984, pp 72–3.

²¹ ibid., p 88.

²² ibid., p 109.

In Madrid, Onetti wrote a story entitled 'Presencia',²³ which responds to the experience of exile by proposing a new reading of his previous work. It is a very moving story: a young man hires a seedy mendacious detective to follow his girl-friend, who is in prison in another country. The fantasy of having the girl tailed—the detective, greedy for money, invents the expected sightings—keeps her alive for him. The pathos of pretending Maria is in Madrid—an exile's desire to keep hold of what has been lost—encloses a larger necessity: to prevent the eradication of a whole country. In 'Presencia', Santa María has been burnt down by the military. Instead of the drive to dissolve social reality because of its resistance to desire, here the direction changes: the imaginary must be kept alive in order to rebuild the real. If Santa María before was an extended metaphor of inward and internal exile, where the drabness of a dependent culture could be faced, the necessity now is for the whole country to be reconstructed, and so the imaginary city becomes a resource, a utopia. Onetti's experience of enforced external exile confirms the extent to which his work is a record of internal exile.

It is difficult to approach the work of Augusto Roa Bastos, Paraguay's foremost writer and best-known exile, without a brief consideration of the events in Paraguayan history which have heightened its landlocked isolation and split its population in two in a diversity of exiles, internal and external. After independence Paraguay was quick to break away from the domination of the Río de la Plata and become, in 1811, the First Republic of the South. From the ruling junta there emerged a leader, Dr José Gaspar Rodríguez de Francia, who as 'Perpetual Dictator', was to impose his iron will upon Paraguay until his death, aged 74, in 1840. Francia, also known as El Supremo, made a nationalistic virtue of the necessity of Paraguay's isolation and effectively severed the country from the outside world by forbidding both foreign trade and foreign travel. Behind the walls he had thus erected, Francia ruled with a despotic populism in which the ideals he had drawn from the philosophers of the French Enlightenment were tempered by his aristocratic insistence on absolute rule.

What strengths there were in the independent republic forged by Francia were destroyed by the War of the Triple Alliance (1865–79). The Brazilian Empire joined with the oligarchies of Argentina and ²³ 'Presence', Index on Censorship 8(2) 1979.

IN THE THIRD WORLD

ORDER FORM YES I WANT TO SEE WHAT'S REALLY HAPPENING

PLEASE SEND ME COPIES OF THIRD WORLD AFFAIRS 1987
PRICES: UK £20 / EUROPE 35 US$ / REST OF THE WORLD 39 US$

Name _____

Organisation _____

Address _____

☐ I enclose cheque for £/US$ (made payable to Third World Foundation)

☐ I would like to pay by credit card

Name of Card _____

Name of Cardholder _____

Card Account No. _____

Signature _____ Date _____

When completed please return this card with your payment to the Circulation Department, Third World Foundation, 13th floor, New Zealand House, 80 Haymarket London SW1Y 4TS, England

TAO1

I WANT TO GET ON TOP OF THE THIRD WORLD

ORDER FORM YES I WANT TO GET ON TOP OF THE THIRD WORLD

PLEASE SEND ME COPIES OF THIRD WORLD QUARTERLY

PRICES:	US & EUROPE		REST OF WORLD US$
	UK £	US$
1 Year (4 issues)	25	43	49
2 Years (8 issues)	44	76	86
3 Years (12 issues)	59	99	115

Name _____

Organisation _____

Address _____

☐ I enclose cheque for £/US$ (made payable to Third World Foundation)

☐ I would like to pay by credit card

Name of Card _____

Name of Cardholder _____

Card Account No _____

Signature _____

Date _____

When completed please return this card with your payment to the Circulation Department, Third World Foundation, 13th floor, New Zealand House, 80 Haymarket London SW1Y 4TS, England.

Affix
Stamp
Here

THIRD WORLD FOUNDATION
13th FLOOR
NEW ZEALAND HOUSE
80 HAYMARKET
LONDON SW1Y 4TS
ENGLAND

Affix
Stamp
Here

THIRD WORLD FOUNDATION
13th FLOOR
NEW ZEALAND HOUSE
80 HAYMARKET
LONDON SW1Y 4TS
ENGLAND

Uruguay to wreak havoc and destruction on a Paraguay that, though small, presented a threat through its autonomy. After five years of fighting, Paraguay's population had fallen by half and its insular exile was completed. In the words of Roa Bastos, Paraguay had become 'the land without men of the men without land'.

After the Chaco War in the 1930s Paraguay enjoyed a few years under a moderate, nationalist government. Civil war in 1947, however, was to destroy all parties of the centre and left and drive more than a third of Paraguay's population into exile as, in 1954, General Alfredo Stroessner came to power. He has been there ever since. Stroessner inherited Francia's despotism, but none of his populism; known as 'Tyrannosaurus', he rules over a country where human and civil rights are honoured only in their breach. The writers who have been forced into exile can find the 'provisional liberty' that Roa Bastos sees in the life of a writer such as himself, a writer 'who has written nearly all his work in the alienating and obsessive atmosphere of exile, in the unreal reality of his lost land, and the sorrowful knowledge that it has all been an "absentee's biography"'.²⁴ But for those left behind, exile by the constraints of self-censorship and the fragmentation of their national culture, liberty of any kind is an alien phenomenon.

A further dimension to the exiles of the Paraguayan writer, and one fundamental to the work of Roa Bastos, is that created by the linguistic context. Paraguay is the most deeply bilingual country in Latin America; the 1962 census showed that 43 per cent of the population spoke only Guaraní, 52 per cent were bilingual and a mere 5 per cent spoke only Spanish. That a writer must choose between the two languages of his people is problem enough; that the 'unavoidable choice' would appear to be the literate, international (and colonising) language of Spanish rather than the popular Guaraní, which is essentially a language of oral culture, leads a writer such as Roa Bastos to feel 'that he is performing a partial translation of the split linguistic context, in which he himself is split by the fact of his choice'. He concludes, 'this inevitably leads the Paraguayan writer to the necessity of creating a literature that goes beyond literature, of speaking against the word, or writing against writing: a literature that in the richness of a language drawn at its two sources, Spanish and Guaraní, expresses and signifies the world of the personal identity of its authors in connection with the real context in which they write.'²⁵

²⁴ Review (30) p 20.

²⁵ ibid., p 20.

In his novel Hijo de hombre (Son of Man, 1960), the first of a trilogy on the life and history of Paraguayan society, to which Yo, el Supremo (I, The Supreme, 1974) has been added, but not yet El Fiscal (the Prosecutor), Roa Bastos addresses Paraguayan bilingualism directly. In his prologue to the revised edition of the novel he tells of how he has attempted to fuse the two cultural modes by means of a synthesis of the 'symbolic and semantic experiences' of the Paraguayan people. Such a synthesis reflects Roa Bastos's repeated insistence on the unimportance of individual writers, notwithstanding their all-importance as the creators of texts: 'it is superfluous and even shocking to privilege personal opinions, especially of writers who work in the field of fiction'.²⁶

The narrator/protagonist of Hijo de hombre is a writer whose life reflects the autobiographical details of Roa Bastos's own rural, but middle-class, background. His good intentions lead not to revolutionary action, but to wallowing self-analysis, despair and self-destruction. An almost incidental part of his story is that he betrays the redemptive figure of the book's title, Cristobal Jara, a man who has no time or inclination to do anything other than what must be done. Of few words, Jara will only use them to dismiss them: 'I don't understand what is said with words. I only understand what I am capable of doing. I have a task. I shall fulfil it. That is what I understand.'²⁷ As a secular and humanistic Christ-figure, Jara reveals that the way forward is in collective social action, that man will be saved by man alone. He is the utopia of 'man himself' which the writer can, in his 'old vice' of writing, prefigure, but never achieve.

In Roa Bastos's most recent, and most extraordinary novel, Yo, el Supremo, the nature of the relationship of the writer to his society is examined once more. Here, however, the issue, now seen in the context of the dictatorial power of Francia, has none of the clarity found in the idealised figure of Cristóbal Jara. From and beyond the end of his life the old dictator conducts a dialogue with Paraguayan history—and with himself, his secretary, his secretary Patiño and, at times, his dog Sultan—yet ultimately it is the text itself which conducts the dialogue, and this extends beyond the limits of Paraguay to debate with Fidel Castro, discuss French philosophy and challenge the latest developments of literary theory. Francia, El Supremo, is an obsessive producer of texts; the bulk of the book consists of transcripts of what he has dictated to his secretary, though these are supplemented by his 'perpetual circular' of instructions and comments issued to his aides, what he writes in his private notebook, and a series of notes, quotations and commentaries on sources which have been added to 'his' texts. The whole purports to be assembled not by Roa Bastos the author but by a fictitious compiler, whose presentation of the collected texts denies the autonomy of any sole author, so that the book is made up of the collective voices of Paraguayan history.

²⁶ Hijo de hombre, Madrid: Alfaguara, 1984, p. 16.

²⁷ Ibid., p. 352.

Of El Supremo Roa Bastos has said: 'He came to represent the image of absolute power made real, an image that is, of course, always unreal.' In his hubris Francia forces a belief in his own omnipotence, an omnipotence which places him above all men: 'I don't write history. I make it. I can remake it as I please, adjusting, emphasising, enriching its meaning and truth'.²⁸ He claimed 'I am the director of the Revolution', yet as, in the course of the book, he battles with words in the crisis of his dictatorial voice, the pertinence of a note written in the margin becomes clear: 'You believed that Revolution is the work of one man—in himself, one man is always wrong, the truth begins with two or more'.²⁹ The writings assembled in the novel are presented as just such a beginning of a genuine history. In their collectivity they deny the illusion of absolute power whether the power be that of Francia the dictator or Roa Bastos the writer. The fluidity of Roa Bastos's own position within the book thus stands in direct opposition to any idea of exile lending a writer a privileged and absolute perspective on the country he has left behind.

The writing of Roa Bastos, with its direct engagement with Paraguayan history, is one that crosses the boundaries of exile, not only because of its relevance to the whole of Latin America and to the various publics that an exiled writer addresses, but, more importantly, because of his rigorous insistence that 'creativity must feed on the social energy of a people'. His 'absentee's biography' is a sad one—banished from Paraguay in 1947 and forced into a second exile from his host country Argentina by the atrocities of the mid-1970s. On a rare visit in 1982 to Paraguay from France (where he teaches Guaraní at Toulouse University), he was unjustly denounced as a 'Marxist subversive' and became 'one of three citizens forbidden to return'—yet he has remained, in a phrase he uses to describe one of the characters of Hijo de hombre, the 'living memory' of his people.

²⁸ Yo, el Supremo, Madrid: Cátedra, 1983, p. 325.

²⁹ ibid., p. 209

The wild oats they sowed: Latin American exiles in Europe

The personal tragedy and historic irony of Ibero-American expatriation is that it has been a flowing and ebbing tide. The personal tragedy lies in the removal, the separation, the uncertainty. The historical irony is that each generation could have almost taken out a return ticket from one shore and used the outbound half in the confidence that the next generation would use the return half. The pattern can be traced, sometimes only tenuous it is true, through more than a century-and-a-half since the end of direct colonial domination. In more recent times it can be seen in the exodus of Europeans to Latin America—from Spain during and after the Civil War, from Germany during the 1930s, from Italy during the 1940s and 1950s—and the return to Spain, Germany, Italy, etc. of that generation's children, persecuted by the military tyrants of the 1970s in Latin America.

The coming and going has affected cultural evolution in some countries. Argentina, for example, is a country which lacks a cultural heritage; Venezuela, with a strong German community could be said to have only found the need for a cultural conscience with the advent of substantial income from oil. I have tried before to offer fundament for such a sweeping and negative view of what might be called Latin American rootlessness,¹ and it is only tangentially relevant here. What is relevant is the remark that the coming and going has affected the cultural evolution. While it can be said that some groups have benefited from the exchange and in cross-cultural experiences, it must also be seen that such proximity perpetuated does assure the sustenance of cultural colonialism.

The most recent experience of a Latin American diaspora took place in the 1970s. Military regimes in Chile, Uruguay, and Argentina provoked the largest exodus of their citizens to Europe. Of course, there had been forced departures from other countries before that: from Paraguay in the 1950s and 1960s, from Brazil in 1964, from Peru in 1968, etc. But at that time there were still doors open in Latin America. These were steadily closed as military mania spread. Hence, as the military takeovers became more vicious, Europe became a natural option. It was further away, but family links could be found. Although there are many stories of hardship and there is a continuing debate as to whether the exile is, within all the bitterness of expatriation, a more fortunate survivor than he or she who stayed behind in silence, Europe did come up to expectations.² It would require considerable study of Europe to say exactly why it did, but there are some pointers which can be offered in a superficial manner. The brutality of the Chilean military in September 1973 caused unprecedented revulsion in Europe, the pictures of people hounded into sports stadiums converted into concentration camps captured the imagination of people who had been brought up in the previous thirty years to believe that governments had to change by constitutional succession rather than by uniformed cut-throats. Also, unemployment was not as severe a decade ago as it is now, and a few thousand Latin Americans could be accommodated either in employment or on social security. Britain had then only one million unemployed, which even so caused the Labour government considerable embarrassment. Britain, for only the second time since 1945 (the previous occasion being in 1956, when Hungarians fled their country after the failure of Imre Nagy's revolution) opened its immigration barriers to the refugees from Chile. Most of Europe did the same for the Chileans, and later were asked to do the same yet again for the Uruguayans, and finally for Argentina's fugitives.

¹ Andrew Graham-Yooll, 'Argentina: the state of transition 1983-85', Third World Quarterly 7(3) July 1985.

In spite of the often near-destitute nature of the Latin American arrivals, many of them were members of their countries' middle classes. Education, training, private resources, were all factors pertaining to their class which gave them a start in life in exile. However, this is not the same as evolving into integration. A majority did not integrate, as must be accepted. Those who have not returned as their countries take the road back to democracy, will see their children integrate and suffer the bitterness of a cultural chasm between them and their offspring, in addition to the distance from their countries of origin. After all, the children too are middle class and inherit the adaptability of their class.

As stated, the United Kingdom opened its doors to many Latin Americans. So did the Federal Republic of Germany—especially to the many who could claim a German family connection—and so did the German Democratic Republic—especially to those with whom it could find an ideological kinship. And true to their adherence to the declaration of human rights, so did the Scandinavian countries, and the Netherlands.

² Eduardo Goligorsky, Carta abierta de un expatriado a sus compatriotas. Buenos Aires: Editorial Sudamericana, 1983.

But exiles found that Paris, Rome, Madrid and Barcelona were the most obvious choices, if they could be admitted for reasons of language and historical cultural links. All four cities became centres of reunion, political meeting-places for activists and launching-pads for their campaigns against the regimes in power in their countries. And in those cities, the servants of the military tyrants organised their sometimes deadly counter-intelligence operations.

Within the exile groups, factions sought to express their views. Their most immediate meeting points were the solidarity committees set up with the help of sympathetic Europeans. Within the committees political lines were soon drawn. The public expression of such factionalism was often by way of mimeographed or cyclostyled newsletters, some no more than a sheet, of erratic frequency, and of not very long existence. But that cascade of partisan paper did produce a substantial number of publications, books as well as periodicals, which must be seen as essential as much to the study of exile as to the more demanding study of national and international circumstances that led to the forcible exile of many.

Although the main intention of this brief article is to look at some of the publications of exiles in Europe, it would be as well to record some of the leading publications produced outside Europe because of the fluid exchange between expatriates in the Americas and Europe. There is, of course, an element of personal preference, as well as of availability in notes such as these. But with that caution it can be said that among the best of the batch was Controversia, a tabloid size magazine, at times monthly, at times quarterly, founded in 1979 in Mexico and which lasted a little over three years.³ Denuncia, published by what might be called a Latin American exile 'consortium' in New York, was a more 'popular' paper, also in tabloid size, which ran for several years, according to the availability of funds. Unlike Controversia, which had a very high ideological and analytical standard, Denuncia went for the heart-strings. It carried poetry, stories, articles, exposés and interviews in line with a hard-hitting presentation. Funds decided the frequency and survival of these publications. In Mexico, the Argentine politician, Héctor Sandler, published Democracia para la nueva Argentina during 1982 and 1983 on a shoe-string budget. In contrast, the Argentine Solidarity Committee (CAS) in Mexico City formed in October 1975, produced a catalogue of publications of high quality and vehement politics. Their language can be compared with the Brechtians writing about Nazi Germany.⁴ In 1977 a rather poorly translated version of the CAS's Spanish-language bulletin was published in English for a time.⁵

³ Most of the magazines mentioned in this article and at one time collected by the author have been deposited in the Department of Printed Books (Hispanic Section), British Library, London.

Argentines in Mexico also formed a Union of Argentine Journalists for Liberation (UPAL) in 1976 which produced its newsletter as from January 1977, but which lasted no more than half a dozen issues.⁶ Mexico saw the rise of groups such as Writers in Exile, Poets in Exile, Scientists in Exile, etc. But the one 'great' publication the exiles produced there, which had a history and a continuity was the Uruguayan Cuadernos de Marcha. This was produced by the publishers and editors of the magazine Marcha of Montevideo. They had been imprisoned, murdered, banished and disbanded by the dictatorship that seized government in Uruguay in 1973.⁷ Marcha was produced as a weekly in Montevideo and during its decade or so in print in Uruguay was a left-wing, intellectual, popular standard-bearer for the whole continent.

What exile did encourage and which has a clear continuity—unlike the erratic and passing periodicals, many of which are lost—are the writers who developed their talents and careers while out of their countries. New writers and established authors found that in exile they enjoyed a certain peace because their politics were no longer on a collision course with those of the host country. So they were left to work. It was a case of 'distance makes the hand work harder'. Thus Oscar 'Mempo' Giardinelli, a little-known poet and journalist in Argentina, became a successful prize-winning writer in Mexico. Pedro Orgambide, an established writer in Argentina, found new horizons in Mexico. Humberto Costantini, a poet, writer and active member of the

⁴ Argentina 1979, contra el terror, por la democracia, Mexico City: CAS

⁵ CAS Report No 1, Bulletin of the Comisión Argentina de Solidaridad, Mexico, 1977.

⁶ UPAL, No 1, January 1977, Mexico.

⁷ The custodians of Marcha and Cuadernos de Marcha are the present editors and publishers of Brecha, a weekly tabloid newspaper, which started publication in Montevideo after the return of constitutional rule to Uruguay in 1985.

Argentine Writers Society (SADE), found translation into English and minor success. The Chilean Ariel Dorfman, living in Europe, also found publishers outside the Spanish language and thus a certain international renown; and the same goes for the Chilean writer, José Cayuela, the Chilean novelist and film script writer, Antonio Skarmeta, the Argentine novelist, Daniel Moyano, the Uruguayan journalist and author, Eduardo Galeano, and so on. It would be offensive to even hint that exile was a cause of success. This is not the case at all, but exile brought new outlooks and new pressures which forced the search for new outlets.

It would be remiss to close this section without briefly discussing the funding of exile publications. If the military criminals who hijacked government in Latin America were to be consulted, they would point to guerrilla organisations or to an 'international conspiracy'. No doubt they found a right-wing audience who believed this: bank holdups, holding wealthy businessmen to ransom and forcible fund-raising can raise substantial sums and can pay for many magazines. But a little analysis and the reality of political expediency in guerrilla organisations would support the argument that only a small fraction of funds could have come from guerrillas. It is in the nature of such groups, which constantly face political uncertainty in a strange country, to prefer the spontaneous one-off booklet rather than the journal of periodical appearance, whose operation is open to scrutiny by security agents.

For those authors who came from a continent not known for its generous advances to writers, it is safe to say they lived on their wits, on some teaching and on any other job they could find. For the magazines, including the solidarity committee publications, support came from subscriptions, fund-raising parties, raffles, concerts, etc, and the very rare wealthy sponsor.

The Argentine exiles arrived in Spain in 1976, with substantially more money and in many cases far better connections than other exile communities. After all, the late President Juan Domingo Perón had made the Puerta de Hierro district in Madrid his place of residence in exile from 1960 to 1974. Humour sometimes is best used to illustrate a situation, and in this case it illustrates the number of Argentines who went to Spain. It was said at the time that many psychoanalysts—persecuted in Argentina on suspicion of having had guerrillas among their patients—moved their practices to Spain complete with patients and all.

How many Latin Americans there were in Spain is not easy to estimate. The Latin American PEN Centre in Madrid reported in 1979 that there were 120,000 Latin Americans resident in Spain.⁸ About 55,000 were Argentines, 25,000 were Chileans, and the remainder was taken up by Cubans, Venezuelans, and Uruguayans. Officially there were 11,118 Latin Americans who in 1977 held Spanish work permits (compared with 53,618 Europeans, including North Americans). Many in this group of 120,000 people were avid readers, and subscribers to the exile literature. As soon as one publication went under, another would be launched, with new-found injections of cash; or two would be started, as the publishers of the one closed down split along political lines and went different ways. One anecdote that shows the continuity of exile publications in spite of their short existence in print is given by the correspondence between Rodolfo Terragno, a lawyer and journalist, a founder of the daily newspaper El Diario de Caracas in Venezuela, and the well-known Argentine journalist and novelist, Osvaldo Bayer. The correspondence started early in 1980. It was the result of an article, 'The Privilege of exile' by Terragno in the newspaper El Diario de Caracas, reproduced by the exile paper Sin Censura, then published in Paris by an exile group among whom was the former Argentine Senator, Hipolito Solari Yrigoyen, before he relaunched the magazine La República. The article said that exiles should stop moaning about their lot and look back on those who stayed behind as the real heroes of the Latin American tragedy. Osvaldo Bayer, strongly refuted the idea that the exiles were privileged and called on those resident in Europe to make a mass return to Argentina. This was published in La República, and replied to by Rodolfo Terragno—who rejected the idea of a mass return as a useless self-immolation—in a letter published in Controversia (Mexico), where another letter from Bayer found space later. The Malvinas Islands conflict in April–June 1982, prompted Osvaldo Bayer to return to the subject of a mass return in an article in Testimonio Latinoamericano.⁹

There were numerous publications by the Latin American exiles in Europe, but again, concentrated in France and Spain. And again, the choice of the best will be, inevitably, made on personal observation. For the present purpose one of the best was the already mentioned La República, which represented the exiled members of the Civil Radical Union (UCR), whose candidate, Dr Raúl Alfonsín, is now President of

⁸ Informe sobre Latinoamericanos en España; por el PEN Club Latinoamericano en España, Barcelona, 1979.

⁹ Testimonio Latinoamericano 3(15/16) October 1982. Barcelona, Spain.

Argentina. The magazine ran for twenty-four issues and was published and edited by the aforementioned Dr Solari Yrigoyen, first in Mexico and then in Paris. The advantage of this publication for later researchers, is a) its continuity, as the twenty-fifth issue was published in Buenos Aires in October 1985, and b) that the editor was an avid collector of the ephemera of exile, carefully recording every book, pamphlet, or magazine that was published by Latin American exiles in general.¹⁰

The other favourite—chosen by personal preference, it must be emphasised—was Testimonio Latinoamericano, registered in Amsterdam, published in Barcelona and founded in 1980 by two men who served several years in Argentina's prisons. This publication, of fairly regular appearance printed in a slightly smaller size than that of the standard magazine, must be placed, ideologically and in presentation, in a class similar to Controversia in Mexico. It reflected a tendency that was nationalist left-wing, vehemently anti-military and strongly critical of Washington's policies in the Southern hemisphere. The standard of its book reviews, short essays, occasional short stories and poems was without doubt among the highest. In its pages the reader would find several writers of renown in Latin American politics debating the historical cause and outcome of the Malvinas conflict, or Chile's military monetarism, or the message contained in a popular cartoon strip. La República, and Testimonio Latinoamericano are not just material attractive to librarians or hoarders of ephemera. They must be seen as very useful research sources for study of Latin American politics. This high-sounding statement is supported by the fact that writing in exile recovered a certain liveliness, became controversial, and shed inhibitions which had been imposed on writing in Latin America under military dictatorship. Censorship, and, more important, self-censorship, reduced the press in much of Latin America to the reproduction of military decrees. The exiles, liberated from fear, regained a freedom to write which made entertaining debate.¹¹ One reason why some exile publications were lively and realistic, while others were bitter laments is that the good ones were written as short-term ventures, not as long-term whines. The liveliest were the exiles who were going home as soon as they could. The forgettable essays on exile are the catalogue of regrets by those with no intention of returning and for whom their countries froze at the time of departure.

¹⁰ La República, vocero de la democracia 8(25). Calle Rivadavia 1194, Buenos Aires, Argentina.

¹¹ Andrew Graham-Yooll, The Press in Argentina 1973-8 (with additional material for 1979-81). London: Writers and Scholars Educational Trust, 1984.

Active publishers of exile material in Spain were the Madrid-based Committee for Human Rights in Argentina, an organisation sometimes suspected of having strong guerrilla connections. However, their first expatriate broadside against the military government in Buenos Aires was Argentina: inquiry into genocide, a full-length book which reported the early cases of repression, torture and a catalogue of excesses by the military.¹² The committee went on to publish numerous books, apart from frequent pamphlets.¹³ With the approach of the World Cup football championships in June 1978 in Argentina, the exile propaganda machine went into top gear—as did the efforts to counter it. At the time, the military junta sought to overcome the image of torturers and criminals which they had acquired. The Montoneros guerrillas published a 40-page bilingual (English and Spanish) brochure entitled Argentina '78 which under a football-shaped flap on the cover—the symbol of the World Cup—invited the reader to look into an Argentina of repression, terror and torture. The brochure was a professional job of high quality print on glossy paper. It did not record any printing address as some publications did.¹⁴ The Argentine government hit back, from its propaganda office in Madrid, with a semi-anonymous 100-page booklet, illustrated with the pictures of victims of attacks by the Baader-Meinhof gang in Germany, the Red Brigades in Italy, and the ERP in Argentina, as all being part of a coordinated international campaign.¹⁵ There were other government or intelligence agency publications printed in Buenos Aires in Spanish, English and French, and distributed to the governments and the editors of Europe.

These publications provided the livelier, and more aggressive, aspect of exile literature and government propaganda.

This article can only offer a superficial view of the rich variety of the Latin American exile literature in Europe. But it is hoped that this sampling will be enough to launch others in search of what is an area with a wealth of information and opportunities for academic discovery.

¹² Comisión Argentina por los Derechos Humanos, Argentina: Proceso al Genocidio, Madrid: Elias Querejeta Ediciones, 1977.

¹³ See, for example, the exposé of an Argentine torturer formerly employed by the military government, who turned against the authorities: Ex-ayudante del General Harguindeguy acusa, Madrid: CADHU, 1983.

¹⁴ For example, the Partido Revolucionario de los Trabajadores, the political leadership of the Ejército Revolucionario del Pueblo (ERP), published a 94-page booklet explaining in 1977 why its losses had forced withdrawal from battle.

¹⁵ Grupo Tamayo, Argentina-Europa, ¿un mismo terrorismo? Agosto 1978, Madrid.

Exile and dictatorship in Latin America since 1945: an annotated bibliography

Exile

The phenomenon of exile in Latin America is a complex one that cannot be defined as a single condition, the inevitable consequence of a particular form of government, or a specific response to certain socio-economic influences. The terms gathered around the notion of exile—'émigré', 'emigrant', 'refugee' and so on—tend to be vague and generalised. Exiles may be seen as alienated and dispossessed, or as voluntary or 'self-imposed' exiles because they have made a free and conscious choice to leave their homeland for political or economic motives. Intellectuals who remain in their country and yet have to work under the constraints of ideological coercion and censorship are often termed 'internal' exiles because they are culturally and ethically alienated.

The field, then, is a broad one. Augusto Roa Bastos's exile from Paraguay is not the same as was Julio Cortázar's self-imposed exile to Paris from his native Argentina. Such cases of disaffected intellectuals are, of course, very different issues from the tragic mass flight of refugees from General Pinochet's Chile to all parts of the world; or the case of the thousands of Argentines forced into exile from 1976 onwards by the repressive policies of the military's 'Process of National Reorganisation'. A very different phenomenon again is the mass exodus of disaffected Cubans to the United States in the wake of Fidel Castro's socialist revolution.

Yet if the causes of exile are almost immeasurably diverse, there is perhaps more common ground in the consequences. From the committed intellectual to the exploited slave labourer, the experience of being ousted from one's homeland produces feelings of bewilderment, betrayal and impotence. The exile has to countenance the anxieties of having to start again in an often alien culture as well as the uncertainty of ever being able to recover a lost identity by returning home. It would be mistaken, however, always to equate the exile's plight with defeat: the expatriate is often what he is because he chooses to defy an unacceptable political reality rather than submit to it.

A significant corpus of material exists on the subject in Latin American studies and journalism, but much of it takes the form of brief articles and notes, and there appear to be few full-length socio-political or historical studies of exile in the continent. This is perhaps an indication of the disparate nature of the causes of exile and of its problematical manifestations, as well as the difficulty of assessing such a disturbing phenomenon dispassionately. The following is a selective list of items concerning exile. A few full-length studies dealing with political and economic issues relating to exile are included, but the majority of articles are concerned with creative literature on the subject, personal testimonies of the experience of living in exile, and discussions on the nature of political commitment for the exiled intellectual. The condition of the exile is only one manifestation of political intolerance and repression in Latin America, and cannot be wholly divorced from other horrors of authoritarian and dictatorial rule. A marginal number of articles are therefore concerned with political persecution, torture, censorship and 'disappearances'. This section is followed by one of critical articles on four major modern novels of dictatorship in Latin America, and a brief supplementary list of historical references.

Poetry and fiction on exile and political persecution

This is a rich but vague area, because the theme is marginally present in such a large number of works. The following list should be of specific interest:

Benedetti, Mario La casa y el ladrillo, Mexico: Siglo veintiuno editores, 1976. Collection of poems by the prominent Uruguayan writer.

— Con y sin nostalgia; Mexico: Siglo veintiuno editores, 1977. Stories.

Casaccia, Gabriel Los exiliados, Buenos Aires: Editorial Sudamericana, 1966. Novel by the noted Paraguayan writer.

Chávez, Lisandro et al. ¡Exilios!, Mexico: Tinta Libre, 1977. Twelve short stories by six writers. With a prologue by Gabriel García Márquez and an epilogue by Adolfo Sánchez Vázquez.

Cortázar, Julio 'Second time', Index on Censorship, 8(2) 1979, pp 32–5. Short story about the Argentine 'desaparecidos'.

- Délano, Poli 'The same corner of the world', Index on Censorship 15(7) 1986, pp 17-19. Short story by a Chilean exile.
- Dorfman, Ariel 'Missing . . .', Index on Censorship 8(3) 1979, pp 12-16. Eight poems by the exiled Chilean writer on the subject of political disappearances, imprisonment and torture.
- Gelman, Juan and Osvaldo Bayer Exilios, Buenos Aires: Legasa, 1984. Selection of texts by two Argentines, exiled in Rome and Berlin after the 1976 military take-over in Argentina.
- Tizón, Hector La casa y el viento, Buenos Aires: Legasa, 1984. Novel by an Argentine, once exiled in Spain.
- Traba, Marta Conversación al sur, Mexico: Siglo veintiuno editores, 1981. English translation (by Jo Labanyi) Mothers and Shadows, London: Readers International, 1986. Story of the sufferings of the mothers of the desaparecidos and their resistance to the tyrannical regimes in Uruguay, Argentina and Chile in the 1970s.

GENERAL

- Avellaneda, Andrés 'Exilio y literatura latinoamericana', Point of Contact 2 (3-4) 1981, pp 81-92. Attempt to define some key structures and narrative devices in fiction about exile, largely using the collection ¡Exilios! as its subject. Relates this to personal testimonies of exiled Latin American writers.
- Cortázar, Julio 'The fellowship of exile', Review (30) 1981, pp 14-16. The Argentine writer emphasises the need for resistance by the intellectual in exile to authoritarian regimes. Proposes that exile can be turned into a positive force against dictatorships through humour, solidarity and revolutionary literature.
- 'Realidad y literatura', Texto Crítico 7 (22-23) 1981, pp 5-13. Contains the essence of Cortázar's oft-expressed views on the nature of the artist's political commitment and the inseparability of literature and contemporary politics. Relates these to the situation of the Latin American in exile.
- Martz, John D 'Latin America's exile politics', Latin American Research Review 10 (1) 1975, pp 193-201. Judicious review of the books by Ameringer, Fagen, Lewis and Rogg (see below).
- Rama, Angel 'Founding the Latin American literary community', Review (30) 1981, pp 17-20. Concise analysis of political exile in Latin America. Evaluates and revises the various terms applied to exiles, the role played by economic and cultural factors in mass migration, and considers the problems of 'transculturation' both for the intellectual and the people of the diaspora.

Rodríguez Monegal, Emir 'Literatura y exilio', Vuelta 6 (63) 1982, pp 45-7. General discussion of the problems and responsibilities of the exiled writer. Primarily concerned with those of the Latin American 'boom' of the 1960s.

Said, Edward 'Recuerdo del invierno', Punto de Vista, 7 (22) 1984, pp 3-7. Not specifically on Latin America, but raises useful questions on the causes and nature of exile.

ARGENTINA

Coad, Malcolm 'The "disappeared" in Argentina, 1976-1980', Index on Censorship 9 (3) 1980, pp 41-3.

Cox, Robert 'At least 10,000', Index on Censorship 9 (3) 1980, pp 43-52. The exiled ex-editor of the Buenos Aires Herald describes the effects of the abductions on the families of desaparecidos. There follows a list of writers and journalists who have disappeared in Argentina since March 1974.

Giardinelli, Mempo 'Dictaduras y el artista en el exilio', Discurso Literario 3 (1) 1985, pp 41-50. The author returns to Argentina after nine years of exile in Mexico. Describes some of the travails of exile. Originally a lecture to a North American audience, it calls for a more severe attitude from the US government to Latin American dictatorships.

Gilio, María Esther 'Los desterrados. Informe sobre la inmigración en la Argentina. I: bolivianos y chilenos', Crisis (18) 1974, pp 15-27.

— 'Los desterrados. Informe sobre la inmigración en la Argentina. II: uruguayos, paraguayos y brasileños', Crisis (19) 1974, pp 3-12. Collection of interviews with exiles and refugees, of varying ages and occupations, who have settled in Argentina. Each article is split into a discussion of the economic and political motives for immigration.

Graham-Yool, Andrew Portrait of an Exile, London: Junction Books, 1981. Personal and highly readable account by the Argentine author and journalist of the terror following the 1976 seizure of power in Argentina by the military junta; the author's personal experience of exile in London; and a return to Buenos Aires in 1980.

— A State of Fear, London: Eland Books, 1986. Expanded version of Portrait of an Exile. A 'Postscript to chapter three' describes the author's return to Buenos Aires in November 1984 to give evidence at the trial of Mario Eduardo Firmanich, commander of Argentina's Montoneros guerrillas.

King, John Argentine Cinema, Plymouth Arts Centre, 1986. Brief study, with a section on exiles and the problems of return, and how these are portrayed in contemporary Argentine film.

Sarlo, Beatriz 'Una alucinación dispersa en agonía', Punto de Vista 7 (21) 1984. On the problems of recovery for Argentina after the years of military rule. Also examines Exilios (Gelman and Bayer) and La casa y el viento (Tizón).

Soriano, Osvaldo 'Return from sleeplessness', Index on Censorship 13 (1) 1984. After seven years in exile, an Argentine writer returns and describes his feelings as he re-discovers Buenos Aires.

BRAZIL

For a selection of introductory material, see Index on Censorship, 8 (4) 1979. Includes Leslie Bethell, 'Brazil-the last 15 years' (pp 3-7); Clovis Moura, 'Climate of terror' (pp 8-10); Alex Polari, 'Prison poems' (pp 11-12); Joan R Dassin, 'Press censorship—how and why' (pp 13-19); and Marcos Gomes, 'Movimento and the censors' (pp 20-6).

THE CARIBBEAN

Ameringer, Charles D The Democratic Left in Exile: The Anti-dictatorial Struggle in the Caribbean, 1945-1959, Coral Gables: University of Miami Press, 1974. Ambitious study of exiled opposition movements to dictatorial regimes, concerned mainly with Venezuela, Cuba, Guatemala, Costa Rica and the Dominican Republic. Discusses Venezuela's 'Acción Democrática'; the significance of the Cuban Revolution for the Caribbean; and the myth and reality of the anti-dictatorial 'Caribbean Legion'.

Bender, Lynn Darrell 'The Cuban exiles: an analytical sketch', Journal of Latin American Studies 5 (2) 1973, pp 271-78. Informative introduction to the mass migration of Cubans to the United States after the 1959 Revolution. Examines the circumstances of the US airlift operations, and discusses the motives of North American assistance in receiving refugees.

Cabrera Infante, Guillermo 'Bites from the bearded crocodile', London Review of Books 3 (10) 1981, pp 3-8. Entertaining account, by the Cuban author living in exile in London, of the cultural scene in Cuba around the time of the Revolution and after. Talks of his editorship of Lunes de Revolución; his disaffection with the Revolution and departure from Cuba; the notorious 'Padilla Affair'; and discusses several Cuban writers. Is characteristically scathing about Castro and his Revolution.

Fagen, Richard, Richard A Brody and Thomas J O'Leary Cubans in Exile: Disaffection and the Revolution, Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1968. Analysis of the reasons for the exodus of refugees from Castro's Cuba. Uses interviews and questionnaires to investigate individual motives for flight.

Franqui, Carlos Retrato de familia con Fidel, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1980. English translation (by A MacAdam) My Family Portrait with Fidel, London: Jonathan Cape, 1983. Very readable memoirs of the disaffected revolutionary's days of intimacy with the leader of the Revolution. Is shrewdly critical of Castro and his government.

Rogg, Eleanor Meyer The Assimilation of Cuban Exiles: The Role of Community and Class, New York: Aberdeen Press, 1974. The USA provided asylum for hundreds of thousands of refugees following the 1959 revolution in Cuba. Concentrating on the area of West New York, New Jersey, the study analyses the processes of assimilation and acculturation of the refugees into the new community. Examines the significance of Cuban class status in terms of this adjustment, and considers the effectiveness of various programmes created to facilitate integration.

CENTRAL AMERICA

For a basic introduction, see Out of the Ashes: the Lives and Hopes of Refugees from El Salvador and Guatemala, London: War on Want, 1985, a collation of photographs, poems, testimonies, brief geographical and historical background, and statistics on the plight of refugees in the difficult political climate of the 1980s.

Argueta, Manlio 'War and the writer in El Salvador', Index on Censorship, 11 (2) 1982. On art and politics by a leading Salvadorean novelist in exile in Costa Rica.

Coad, Malcolm 'Murder on the campus', Index on Censorship 10 (1) 1981, pp 48-54. On the terror at San Carlos University in Guatemala, the scene in recent years of political assassinations and kidnappings.

Forché, Carolyn 'Interview with Claribel Alegría', Index on Censorship 13 (2) 1984, pp 11-14. The Salvadorean poet talks about her work, political commitment and the dangers of return to El Salvador. Followed by poems.

Gunson, Phil 'Teachers in El Salvador', Index on Censorship 10 (2) 1981. On the political background to the violence on university campuses by repressive government forces.

CHILE

Alegría, Fernando 'One true sentence', Review (30) 1981, pp 21-3. Personal testimony of the Chilean novelist and critic who went into exile after the fall of Salvador Allende's government and the military take-over in September 1973. Emphasises the exile's desire to recover his heritage, the need for international solidarity in opposing the Chilean regime, and discusses some of the recent Chilean literature of testimony and resistance.

Dorfman, Ariel 'Los intelectuales en el exilio', Cuadernos del Tercer Mundo (19) 1978.

Droguett, Carlos 'Literatura del exilio', Texto Crítico 7 (22-3) 1981, pp 59-67. Essay by the Chilean novelist on the horrors of Pinochet's Chile and contemporary literature of protest.

Epple, Juan Armando 'La literatura chilena del exilio', Texto Crítico, 7 (22-3) 1981, pp 209-37. Interview with three noted Chilean writers in exile (Fernando Alegría, Poli Délano, Ariel Dorfman) about their experience of exile and its effect on their work. Another Chilean author, Antonio Skármeta, adds a note dealing with the same questions.

Henfrey, Colin, and Bernardo Sorj Chilean Voices: Activists Describe their Experiences of the 'Popular Unity' Period, London: Harvester Press, 1977. Seven interviews with individuals who were active in the coalition that had supported Allende. Divided into sections on industry, the countryside, the shanty-towns and the universities.

Sanders, Michael 'Book burning and brutality', Index on Censorship 3 (1) 1974, pp 7-13. On the early effects of the military dictatorship in Chile after the coup of 1973, and on the severe censorship of the press and intellectuals.

Skármeta, Antonio 'La nueva condición del escritor en el exilio', Araucaria de Chile (19) 1982, pp 133-41. Author in exile from Pinochet's regime. Points out some positive aspects of exile, and affirms the importance of the intellectual's role in the struggle against dictatorship through the public denunciation of state violence and active representation of oppressed groups.

PARAGUAY

Bareiro Saguier, Rubén 'El tema del exilio en la narrativa paraguaya contemporánea', Caravelle (14) 1970, pp 79-96. Briefly outlines the political background of civil war in 1947 and subsequent state violence in Paraguay. Examines the plight of the exiled artist, and discusses the work of some of the country's writers in exile, notably Gabriel Casaccia and Augusto Roa Bastos.

— 'Paraguay—culture of fear', Index on Censorship 8 (1) 1979. On the censorship of literature, theatre, the press, and the suppression of the indigenous Guaraní culture, under General Stroessner's long-standing regime.

Lewis, Paul H The Politics of Exile: Paraguay's Febrerista Party, Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1968. Detailed study of the febreristas who, after their formation in 1936 and three years in power, were forced abroad until they were granted political amnesty by the Stroessner regime in 1964. It is therefore concerned with exiles operating as a collective, ideological force, and with the problems of maintaining a coherent group of party political opposition in exile.

Roa Bastos, Augusto 'The exiles of the Paraguayan writer', Review (30) 1981, pp 17-20. Denunciation of the regime which, over the past thirty years, has forced into exile nearly half the population of Paraguay. Considers the historical background of the country's political problems, the tragedy of modern Paraguay as an 'anti-nation', a culture without leaders, and the consequences of 'ethical alienation' of the writer in a totalitarian state.

PERU

Pásara, Luis 'Por qué no vivo en el Perú: I', Hueso Húmero (8) 1981, pp 108-21. Personal testimonies of various Peruvian writers, artists and scholars who have left their country. Replies from Juan Acna, Alfredo Bryce, Sara Castro-Klarén, Jorge Eduardo Eilson, Castón Fernández, Rodolfo Hinostroza, Carlos Menesco, Hugo Neira, Carlos Revilla, Joaquín Roca Rey.

— 'Por qué no vivo en el Perú: II', Hueso Húmero (9) 1981, pp 95-107. Replies on the same subject from Hernán Braun, José Durand, Alberto Guzmán, Julio Ortega, Jose Miguel Oviedo, Julio Ramón Ribeyro, Manuel Scorza.

- 'Por qué no vivo en el Perú; comentarios a una encuesta', Hueso Húmero (11) 1981, pp 95–100. Summarises and analyses the responses of the above testimonies.

URUGUAY

Benedetti, Mario El escritor latinoamericano y la revolución posible, Buenos Aires: Editorial Alfar Argentina, 1974. See in particular the title essay and 'El testimonio y sus límites'.

- El desexilio y otras conjeturas, Madrid: Ediciones El País, 1985. The author's collected articles from El País, with several items on Latin American dictatorship and exile.

Galeano, Eduardo 'In defence of the word', Index on Censorship 6 (4) 1977, pp 15–20. On the problems of writing in an atmosphere of repression and persecution, by the exiled Uruguayan writer and founder of the important cultural magazine Crisis.

- 'Cemetery of words', Index on Censorship 7 (2) 1978, pp 3–5. On political persecution in Uruguay, Chile and Argentina.

— Días y noches de amor y guerra, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1978. English translation (by Judith Brister) Days and Nights of Love and War, London: Pluto Press, 1983. Moving personal account of the writer's own exile, largely in Buenos Aires.

Goytisolo, Juan 'Uruguay's withering Culture', Index on Censorship 8 (2) 1979, pp 36–7. On the effects of military repression in Uruguay on national culture, and the demise of Uruguay's prestigious literary paper, Marcha.

López, Braulio 'Singing in exile', Index on Censorship 7 (4) 1978, pp 44–9. Account of his life and work in exile after the 1973 military coup by one of Uruguay's most popular singers.

Ruffinelli, Jorge 'Uruguay: literatura y militarismo', Casa de las Américas 20 (119) 1980, pp 128–33. Cultural persecution under Uruguay's 1973 dictatorship.

Torrents, Nissa 'Uruguay—getting rid of critics', Index on Censorship 6 (3) 1977, pp 9–11. Brief survey of the cultural impoverishment in Uruguay as a result of large-scale exile of artists, and fierce repression and censorship by the government.

Dictatorship in the modern Latin American novel

The novel of dictatorship has long been an established genre in Latin American writing, and the large number of novels this century which are set against the background of regimes of terror and individual tyrants constitutes a corpus of works too great to be covered in a brief survey. Moreover, many of these works are protest novels of a largely denunciatory and propagandist nature, and have temporary and pragmatic aims which often detract from their artistic quality and their interest today. The following, then, is a description of the four 'Dictator' novels generally considered to be the most important of the genre in the last century, followed by a selected critical bibliography.

El señor presidente (Buenos Aires: Losada, 1948. English translation El Señor Presidente by Frances Partridge, New York: Athenaeum, 1964) by the Guatemalan, Miguel Angel Asturias, winner of the 1967 Nobel Prize for Literature). The novel was written in the 1920s and early 1930s, but was not published until 1946, and serves as a suitable point of departure for a survey of the modern dictator novel. Its setting is the Guatemalan dictatorship of Estrada Cabrera in the early years of this century, but it attains universal significance in its horrific portrayal of the violence and humiliation suffered by a society under the rule of a vicious dictator. Unlike the other novels under consideration here, the tyrant's individual psychology is left unexplored, and he is characterised as a faceless, dehumanised force whose appearances in the novel are few, but whose all-seeing malignant presence is constantly felt.

El recurso del método (Mexico: Siglo veintiuno editores, 1974. English translation Reasons of State by Frances Partridge, New York: Knopf, 1976) by Alejo Carpentier of Cuba, is lighter in tone. Its title is an ironic reference to Descartes' Discourse on Method, epigrams from which introduce the chapters. Part of the significance of this is to present an opposition between the dictator's brutal recourses and the more clearly defined rationale of French and European institutions and culture. The 'First Magistrate', as he is called, is the dictator of an unnamed Caribbean country, and is a fictional synthesis of several real tyrants, the most clearly identifiable of which is Cuba's Machado, who ruled in the 1920s and 1930s. The novel sets up a polarity between the Latin American country and Paris (the dictatorship is a francophile of some culture), and this serves to portray his dual nature as the learned, refined European influence contrasts with his ruthless tyranny at home.

Like the Mexican dictator Porfirio Díaz, he ends his days in exile in Paris, alone, decrepit and forgotten.

El otoño patriarca (Barcelona: Plaza y Janés, 1975. English translation The Autumn of the Patriarch by Gregory Rabassa, New York: Harper and Row, 1976), is a linguistic tour de force of dense poetic prose by the Colombian Gabriel García Márquez, winner of the 1982 Nobel Prize for Literature. Through a series of narrative techniques using hyperbole, the Patriarch is presented as a larger-than-life figure of mythic proportions. Again the tyrant is a composite representation of several historical figures, and the setting, though not specified, is recognisably Caribbean. Márquez has described the work as 'a poem on the solitude of power': the great tyrant leads an existence of loneliness, suspicion and self-deception in the twilight of his life (because of the non-chronological organization of the narrative, the Patriarch is always presented in his decrepitude and decline). Through its hyperbolic rhetoric the novel expresses, to a more intense degree than Reasons of State, the paradox of the dictator's supreme dominion coupled with his lack of individual authenticity.

Yo el Supremo (Buenos Aires: Siglo veintiuno editores, 1974. English translation I The Supreme by Helen Lane due to be published in 1986 by Alfred Knopf) is by the Paraguayan novelist in exile, Augusto Roa Bastos. An extremely dense and complex narrative, its protagonist is a specific historical personage, the great Paraguayan dictator Dr Francia, who ruled the country from 1814 to his death in 1840. The text gives the illusion of a scholarly, documentary testimony comprising various narrative levels: the dictator's own voice, his written memoirs, and the scholarly apparatus of the editor-author. Roa's novel has been seen as a vindication of the regime of the formidable Francia, a severe and brutal dictator who was yet a man of great culture, and much influenced by the values of the French Enlightenment. Yet, as much as the other works, it is a study of the nature of power, and subtly explores the relation between myth and history within the general framework of an introspective fictional autobiography.

Selected critical works on novels of dictatorship

Amate Blanco, Juan José 'La novela del dictador en Hispanoamerica', Cuadernos hispanoamericanos (370) 1981, pp 85-102. General examination of the novel of dictatorship, from the mid-nineteenth century to Otoño.

- Apuleyo Mendoza, Plinio The Fragrance of Guava, London: Verso 1983. Series of conversations with García Márquez. Often rambling, but the section on Otoño contains some interesting background material.
- Benedetti, Mario El recurso del supremo patriarca, Mexico: Editorial Nueva Imagen, 1979. The title essay of this collection is a sensible study of the three dictator novels of the 1970s. Examines briefly their antecedents, analyses each novel in turn, and is least convinced by Otoño, which loses much by its hyperbole and lack of verisimilitude.
- Berger, J. 'Márquez's tolerance', New Society (London) 28 April 1977. Enthusiastic review of the English translation of El otoño del patriarca.
- Callan, Richard Miguel Angel Asturias Boston: Twayne, 1970. Biographical information on Asturias, critical survey of his work, with an analysis of El señor presidente, and a further chapter examining the use in the novel of the Babylonian fertility myth of Tammuz and Ishtar.
- Castellanos, Jorge, and Miguel Martinez 'El dictador hispano-americano como personaje literario', Latin American Research Review, 16 (2) 1981, pp 79-105. Informative article tracing the history of the novel of dictatorship, which in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries was often mere rhetorical propaganda; to El señor presidente, seen as a turning-point, to the novels of the 1970s. The tyrant is no longer an anonymous force, but a rounded character with his own psychology and motivations.
- Dellepiane, Angela B. 'Tres novelas de la dictadura: El recurso del método, El otoño del patriarca, Yo el Supremo', Caravelle (29) 1977, pp 65-87. Lengthy analysis of themes and narrative technique in the novels.
- Foster, David William 'Augusto Roa Bastos' I the supreme: the image of a dictator', Latin American Literary Review 4(7) 1975, pp 31-5. Presents the basic problems of reading the text, indicating its various narrative layers. Sees the book not as a defence of Francia's regime, but as a recreation of the dictator's voice.
- Augusto Roa Bastos, Boston: Twayne, 1978. General survey, structuralist-orientated, of Roa's works, with a chapter on Yo el Supremo.
- González Echevarría, Roberto Alejo Carpentier: The Pilgrim at Home, Ithaca and London: Cornell University Press, 1977. A leading study on the writer, with a brief section on El recurso del método.

- 'The dictatorship of rhetoric/The rhetoric of dictatorship: Carpentier, García Márquez and Roa Bastos', Latin American Research Review 15 (3) 1980, pp 205–28. Post-structuralist study. Sees the 'erosion of authority' prevailing in post-modernist Western literature being played out in the Latin American dictator novel. The new novel demonstrates through its very structures that the dictator is no longer seen as a powerful telluric force, but 'phantoms cast by the true powers in today's world.'
- Himelblau, Jack 'El señor presidente: Antecedents, Sources and Reality', Hispanic Review 41 (1) 1973, pp 43–78. Concludes that the novel is particularly Guatemalan; that through his use of real personages and locations, Asturias endowed his novel with added force for those of his own generation who lived under the Estrada Cabrera regime between 1898 and 1920.
- Luna, Norman 'The Barbaric Dictator and the Enlightened Tyrant in El otoño del patriarca and El recurso del método', Latin American Literary Review 8 (15) 1979, 25–32. Carpentier's 'historico-ideological' vision of Latin American dictatorship has its 'mythico-legendary' parallel in García Márquez's novel. The latter is preferred for its depth of style and breadth of conception, whilst Carpentier's fails in its attempted polarisation of Cartesian discourse and pragmatic politics.
- Mallett, Brian J 'Dictadura e identidad en la novela latinoamericana', Arbor 101 (393–4) 1978, pp 59–73. Good study of the three novels of the 1970s, showing how, in spite of their differences, they all go beyond the presentation of the mythical archetype (as in, say, El señor presidente) through their closer psychological analyses of an individual tyrant.
- Martin, Gerald 'El señor presidente and How to Read It', Bulletin of Hispanic Studies 47 (2) 1970, pp 223–43. Thorough study of the main themes and patterns of imagery in the novel, which is seen in part as a poetic work in which the plot and characters become motifs in a complex study of the forces of good and evil.
- 'Yo el Supremo: The Dictator and his Script', Forum for Modern Language Studies 15 (2) 1979, pp 169–83. Praises Roa's work above the dictator novels of Márquez and Carpentier. Sees the novel as a 'meditation on the meaning of writing'.
- 'On dictatorship and rhetoric in Latin American writing: a counter-proposal', Latin American Research Review 17 (3) 1982, pp 208–27. Vigorous reply to the article by González Echevarría.

- Miliant, Domingo 'El dictador: objeto narrativo en el recurso del método', Revista Iberoamericana 47 (114-15) 1981, pp 189-95. Systematic attempt to examine the historical and etymological formation of the various types of tyrant, dictator, caudillo, etc. Interesting, though the technical jargon is hard work.
- Muller-Bergh, Klaus 'Vida y hechos de un tirano ilustrado', Revista canadiense de estudios hispánicos 3 (2) 1979, pp 189-95. Examines the historical background of El recurso del método, and largely identifies the dictator with Gerardo Machado of Cuba (1925-33).
- Ortega, Julio 'El otoño del patriarca: texto y cultura', Hispanic Review 46 (4) 1978, pp 421-46. Structuralist analysis of cultural and mythical elements in the novel.
- Peavler, Terry J 'A new novel by Alejo Carpentier', Latin American Literary Review 3 (6) 1975, pp 31-6. Review of El recurso del método, discussing historical background and various episodes in the novel.
- Pritchett, V S 'All the President's men', New Statesman (London), 22 April 1977. Review of The Autumn of the Patriarch (Gabriel García Márquez).
- Rama, Angel Los dictadores latinoamericanos, Mexico: Fondo de Cultura Económico, 1976. Examines Otoño, Recurso and Supremo in the context of the new Latin American novel. The dictator himself has become the object of artistic treatment instead of an explicitly condemned figure.
- Shaw, D L Alejo Carpentier, Boston: Twayne, 1985. Survey of the author's life and work, with a useful chapter on El recurso del método.
- Usabiaga, Mario 'Alejo Carpentier y su Primer Magistrado', Texto Crítico 2 (3) 1976, pp 128-40. Brief historical background to the dictator theme in Latin American literature and the emergence of the three important dictator novels of the 1970s. Is critical of Carpentier's characterisation of the First Magistrate: a comic version of the archetypal dictator is viewed as frivolous given the reality of brutal dictatorships in Latin America.
- Williams, Raymond L Gabriel García Márquez, Boston: Twayne, 1984. General introduction to the author and his work, with a chapter on Otoño providing a plot summary and a detailed analysis of the novel's themes and structure.
- Woods, M 'Unhappy dictators', New York Review of Books, 9 December 1976. Review of the English translations of El recurso del método and El otoño del patriarca.
- Zuluaga, Conrado Novelas del dictador/Dictadores de novela, Bogotá: Carlos Valencia Editores, 1977. Thought-provoking essay examining the Latin American dictator in history and literature. Refers to a wide range of novels, though Otoño, Recurso and Supremo are the main subjects of discussion, is doubtful of the effectiveness of these three novels in reflecting the true nature of tyranny in Latin American history, and concludes that the truth of the continent is stranger and more horrifying than the fiction; that these writers have tried to evade reality rather than explore it.

Dictatorship in Latin America since 1945: an introductory bibliography

General

- Collier, Simon, Harold Blakemore and Thomas E Skidmore (eds) The Cambridge Encyclopedia of Latin America and the Caribbean, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1985.
- Davis, Harold Eugene Revolutionaries, Traditionalists and Dictators in Latin America, New York: Coöper Square Publishers, 1973.
- Gómez, R A Government and Politics in Latin America, New York: Random House, 1964.
- Lieuwen, E Arms and Politics in Latin America, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1961.
- Generals and Presidents: Neo-militarism in Latin America, London: Pall Mall, 1965.
- Mendes, Candido Beyond Populism, Albany: State University of New York Press, 1977.
- Skidmore, Thomas, and Peter H Smith Modern Latin America, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1984.
- Tomasek, Robert D (ed) Latin American Politics: Studies of the Contemporary Scene, New York: Anchor Books, 1970.

Central America and the Caribbean

- Aguilar, Luis E 'Fidel Castro: apuntes sobre un caudillo socialista', Revista/Review Interamericana 7 (3) 1977, pp 372-99.
- Cid, Luis Eduardo del '¿Por qué cayó la dinastía somocista?' Estudios Centroamericanos 34 (369-70) 1979, pp 699-708.
- Crawley, Eduardo Dictators Never Die: A Portrait of Nicaragua and the Somoza Dynasty, London: C Hurst, 1977.

Dunkerley, James The Long War: Dictatorship and Revolution in El Salvador, London: Verso, 1982.

Malek, R Michael 'Rafael Leónidas Trujillo: a revisionist critique of his rise to power', Revista/Review Interamericana 7 (3) 1977, pp 436-45.

Martin, John Bartlow 'Caribbean dictators and strong men', Revista/Review Interamericana 7 (3) 1977, pp 358-60.

Millett, Richard Guardians of the Dynasty: A History of the US Created Guardia Nacional de Nicaragua and the Somoza Family, Maryknoll: Orbis Books, 1977.

— 'Anastasio Somoza García: A Brief History of Nicaragua's 'Enduring' Dictator', Revista/Review Interamericana 7 (3) 1977, pp 486-508.

Remy, Anselme 'El fenómeno Duvalier', Revista/Review Interamericana 7 (3) 1977, pp 446-67.

Talavera, Jose Leon 'Nicaragua: crisis de la dictadura militar 1967-68', Estudios sociales centroamericanos (Costa Rica) 8 (23) 1979, pp 213-44.

Thomas, Hugh Cuba: The Pursuit of Freedom, New York: Harper and Row, 1971.

Argentina

Fraser, Nicholas, and Marysa Navarro Eva Perón, New York: Norton, 1980.

McLynn, Francis 'The Political Thought of Juan Domingo Perón', Boletín de estudios latinoamericanos y del Caribe, (32) 1982, pp 15-23.

Page, J A Perón: A Biography, New York: Random House, 1983.

Potash, Robert A The Army and Politics in Argentina, 1945-1962, Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1980.

Brazil

Quartim, Joao Dictatorship and Armed Struggle in Brazil, London: New Left Books, 1971.

Skidmore, Thomas E Politics in Brazil, 1930-1964: An Experiment in Democracy, New York: Oxford University Press, 1967.

Stepan, A The Military in Politics: Changing Patterns in Brazil, Princeton, NJ: 1971.

Chile

O'Brien Philip, and Jackie Roddick Chile: The Pinochet Decade, London: Latin American Bureau, 1983.

Sigmund, P E The Overthrow of Allende and the Politics of Chile, 1964-1976, Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1977.

Paraguay

Alexander, Robert J 'The tyranny of General Stroessner', Freedom at Issue (41) 1977, pp 16-18.

Lewis, P H Paraguay Under Stroessner, Chapel Hill, NC: 1980.

Uruguay

Kaufman, E Uruguay in Transition: From Civilian to Military Rule,
New Brunswick, NJ: 1979.

Exile, dictatorship and the creative writer in Africa: a selective annotated bibliography

Relative to its population, Africa has produced more exiles than any other continent. The centuries of the Atlantic, Saharan, Red Sea and East African slave trades witnessed the involuntary and, in the vast majority of cases, irreversible exile of millions, and the indigenous use of slave labour inside Africa generated major long-distance population movements.¹ In the colonial period tens of thousands found their particular foreign oppressors wanting in basic humanity and choose the lesser evil by permanently crossing the nearest international boundary;² comparable numbers became (and still become) more-or-less voluntary migrant labourers, those who survived harsh working conditions being effectively exiled from their homes, farms and families for months, years or even decades.³ In Africa today—in addition to workers resident outside their own countries, the status of many of whom could be aptly

¹ The experience of being a slave inspired what must be the first African account of exile written in a European language in the work of Olaudah Equiano (c 1745–?1797), an Igbo from what is now Nigeria. The Interesting Narrative of the Life of Olaudah Equiano or Gustavus Vassa the African, Written by Himself (London: 1789) describes Equiano's boyhood in Nigeria, his kidnap and his life as a slave (and ultimately freedman) in the American South, the West Indies and England. For an abridged critical modern edition, see Paul Edwards (ed) Equiano's Travels, London: Heinemann, 1967.

For a convenient summary of the debate on the dimensions of the Atlantic slave trade, see Paul E Lovejoy, 'The volume of the Atlantic slave trade: a synthesis', Journal of African History 23 (4) 1982, pp 473–501. The literature on the other slave trades and on internal slave use is conveniently summarised in Paul E Lovejoy, Transformations in Slavery. A History of Slavery in Africa, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1983.

² For West African examples of a widespread phenomenon in colonial Africa, see A I Asiwaju, 'Migrations as revolt: the example of the Ivory Coast and the Upper Volta before 1945', Journal of African History, 17 (4) 1976, pp 577–94.

³ For a timely recent synthesis of the substantial literature on the origins and contemporary character of African migrant labour, see Sharon Stichter, Migrant Laborers, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, African Society Today series, 1985.

covered by the term 'exile'⁴—there are some five million refugees, using the word in its strictest official sense.⁵ On this count, one African in a hundred is a refugee and one-third of all the world's refugees are Africans.⁶

Used in the senses outlined above, 'exile' is a broad and imprecise term. This article concentrates on a narrow part of the spectrum of meaning, concerned as it is with the published articulation, particularly in 'creative' writing, of both the causes of exile and the actual experience of exile. At first sight, this level of analysis seems to fit well with a particularly common popular usage of the term 'exile'; exiles are often portrayed as individuals in voluntary or involuntary flight from perceived political, racial or economic oppression which itself may have an individual focus. Often, again, they are characterised as educated and creative, likely to be overtly political, sometimes politicians in the strict sense of the term. As such they may have the financial means, or social, business or intellectual contacts abroad that ease the impact of exile if not exactly making it enjoyable. The implied contrast is with the ⁴ Over and above the by now well-ensconced 'traditional' (ie up to a century old) migration of unskilled and semi-skilled labour, especially in Southern African mining, I am thinking here of the relatively recent—in any significant numbers—situation of individuals, often professional, skilled or semi-skilled, being forced by economic collapse in their own countries to seek work as 'economic refugees' in a neighbouring state or even Europe, the USA or the Middle East. Hence, for example, the exodus in the last decade of university lecturers, doctors, nurses, teachers etc as well as the unskilled, from Ghana to Nigeria, Liberia, Libya and East and Central Africa. This has as yet been little analysed in academic writing, but see, for example, Lynne Brydon, 'Ghanaian responses to the Nigerian expulsions of 1983', African Affairs, 84 (337) 1985, pp 561–85. Black African workers in Libya are referred to en passant in Chris Dunton, 'Africans in Libya', West Africa (London) 1 September 1986, pp 1820–2. For an evocative literary account of the economic exile's plight (a Ghanaian in Nigeria) see Anon, 99 Days in Agege: Yaw Brenya's Experience, Accra: Gapo Publications, nd (1985?).

The situation of the African economic exile outside Africa is even less well explored, not least, perhaps, because of the illegal status of many of those concerned. Typically, though, such exiles work long hours, sometimes in two or three menial jobs at once, for low pay, often in the 'black' or semi-'black' economy.

⁵ For a useful discussion of changing terminology in the African context, see Richard Greenfield, 'The OAU and Africa's refugees', in Yassin El-Ayouty and I William Zartman (eds), The OAU After Twenty Years. New York: Praeger, Johns Hopkins International Studies Series, 1984, pp 209–47.

⁶ Refugee numbers in Africa are a matter of debate, partly because of definitional problems and censal inadequacies, partly because of the suspicion that some recipient countries have inflated refugee numbers with the aim of boosting inputs from the UNHCR. As with the slave trade, however, the numbers are so irrefutably mind-boggling that for our present purposes precision is an 'academic' question. For recent discussions, see Greenfield, 'OAU and Africa's refugees', esp Table 11.1; Gaim Kibread, Reflections on the African Refugee Problem: A Critical Analysis of the Basic Assumptions, Uppsala, Scandinavian Institute of African Studies, Research Report no 67, 1983, pp 9–10, 23–36; Aderanti Adepoju, 'The dimensions of the refugee problem in Africa', African Affairs 81 (322) 1982, pp 21–35; CIMADE, INODEP, and MINK, Africa's Refugee Crisis, London: Zed Books, 1986; Gaim Kibread, African Refugees: Reflections on the African Refugee Problem, Trenton, NJ: Africa World Press, 1985.

'refugee' proper, still too often caricatured as a passive, faceless, inarticulate, skill-less individual, a member of a mass movement in almost lemming-like, barely comprehensible flight from disaster, oppression or 'instability', the causes of which are crudely defined, if at all.⁷

The dichotomy between 'exiles' as individuals and major 'refugee flows' is not, however, as clear-cut as this conventional wisdom implies. This is perhaps most obvious in the case of Southern Africa where the links between the systematic oppression of individuals and mass flight are too painfully plain. The causes of the numerically much more substantial dislocations of population elsewhere in Africa are diverse and have not received as much scholarly attention as they deserve, but they are also far from mysterious. Nor are they discrete, indeed they are often mutually reinforcing: political repression, lack of popular participation in decision-making, the ravages of undisciplined military and police forces, ethnic and regional conflict, secessionist movements, gross economic inequality, neo-colonial economic dependency, poorly planned economic transformation and sheer economic collapse, natural disasters such as drought and famine; all these interact to produce refugee situations.

Recently much more emphasis has begun to be placed—particularly by radical academics—on analysing these causes (as is unavoidable in the case of Southern Africa) in terms of the identifiable policies and responses of governments, rather than dumping them 'into one residual category that refers only, for example, to ambiguous "strains" faced by African states as they pass through the nation-building, modernizing stage of development.'⁸ Political scientists have, in other words, moved on from conceptualising African politics in terms of modernisation and institutional analysis, and there is also disillusionment with dependency theories that are mechanistic and take too little account of the options—however limited—that are open within Africa. They have, in a word, discovered (or rediscovered) the personal element in African politics. Yet their professional proclivity to seek out regularities and isolate structural features still tends to leave them ill-equipped to put across the sheer bloody-mindedness of unshackled rulers.⁹ African creative writers—despite the clear limitations of range of experience that they have drawn upon—do offer an otherwise inaccessible dimension of understanding.

⁷ The caricature is not, sadly, solely the product of the mass media. Those responsible for 'aid' and 'resettlement' of refugees have often unquestioningly accepted or actively propagated the view of refugees as faceless groups for whom and to whom things are done, rather than collections of individuals with the broad range of usable skills and experience that are to be found in any community. This is, of course, but one aspect of the wider 'Western expert'-'untutored native' syndrome. For a critique of aid to refugees that develops these points, see Barbara E Harrell-Bond, Imposing Aid. Emergency Aid to Refugees, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1986.

⁸ Greenfield, 'OAU and Africa's refugees', p 216.

The bibliography

To categorise a writer as an exile is a somewhat arbitrary procedure and a word, however inadequate, should be said about the criteria used here. Many African writers—like African intellectuals and professionals in general—have spent extended periods abroad seeking education, particularly in their youth. Consequently, a large number of writers have produced at least one work with the theme 'African student abroad—encounters with racism—involvement with (white) women—loneliness—return home—disillusionment with political system/clash with traditional values . . .'. Such works have generally not found a place in this bibliography, which concentrates on the sort of exile that is caused by blatant oppression or persecution, the fear of this, or the fear that return will bring it down on the exile's head. This leaves us with a residual category of writers who also do not appear in this bibliography: those who have decided to remain outside their homes for extended periods for reasons—leaving aside education—other than real or perceived persecution.¹⁰

Exiles do not necessarily write overtly about the exile experience; it is for the literary critic or even the psychiatrist to decide the extent to which they may do so at a deeper, less overt level. For many, though, the exile experience is an unambiguous theme. Even more write about the sort of social and political phenomena that may cause exile, as do many non-exiles. Hence the additional concern of this bibliography with exploring creative writers' responses to what, for want of a better term, we have labelled 'dictatorship'.

⁹ For a recent general study that clearly analyses the character of personal rule in Africa and yet falls into the trap of over-rigid categorisation in the allocation of the ideal types listed in its sub-title, see Robert H Jackson and Carl G Rosberg, Personal Rule in Black Africa: Prince, Autocrat, Prophet, Tyrant, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1982. For a contrasting approach, see Samuel Decalo, 'African personal dictatorships', Journal of Modern African Studies, 23 (2) pp 209–38.

¹⁰ It should be emphasised that the boundaries between these categories are extremely porous, and demarcating them is ultimately a more than usually subjective process. In the 'residual category' I would include, for example, two prolific novelists who have chosen to live for extended periods outside their home countries: the Nigerian, Buchi Emecheta and the Ghanaian, Ayi Kwei Armah. Armah, according to Robert Fraser (The Novels of Ayi Kwei Armah, London: Heinemann, 1981, p 10), 'strongly denies that [his sojourn abroad] represents any form of exile'.

Finally, it should be noted that the term 'exile' has not been used rigidly here. It is contended that imprisonment for the writer—as for the 'ordinary' individual—represents a form of exile as do such practices as the banning of individual work, censorship or overall bans on publication by a specified individual.

The bibliography that follows is in three parts. The first is a check-list—with brief biographical and bibliographical details relevant to our themes—of major African writers who have experienced exile, have been otherwise affected by significant censorship or repression, or who have written works with the themes of 'dictatorship' and political repression. The second part is an additional bibliography concerned with these themes; it contains works by lesser-known authors or those about whom more detailed information is difficult to obtain. The third part consists of secondary material on the effects of exile and dictatorship on literary work in Africa.

Check-list of major authors

ABRAHAMS, Peter, b. 1919, Vrededorp, nr Johannesburg, South Africa

Classified as 'Coloured' in South Africa, Abrahams voluntarily left South Africa in 1939 feeling the 'need to write, to tell freedom and for this I needed to be personally free' (Tell Freedom, 1954, p 370). He worked first as a seaman and then, after settling in London, as a journalist while continuing to write books. He returned to South Africa briefly on a journalistic assignment in 1952; his horrified account of how apartheid had become entrenched in the years he had been away is Return to Goli (London: Faber, 1953). In the mid-1950s he spent some time in Ghana; his novel, A Wreath for Udomo (London: Faber, 1956) is a pioneer examination of the political changes wrought by independence that reflects this experience, as well as portraying exile African politics in London. Many of Abrahams's novels—Dark Testament (short stories) (London: Allen and Unwin, 1942); Song of the City (London: Crisp, 1945); Mine Boy (London: Crisp, 1946, Heinemann, 1963); The Path of Thunder (New York: Harper, 1948); Tell Freedom (autobiographical novel) (London: Faber, 1954); A Night of Their Own (London: Faber, 1965)—deal with aspects of the oppression of non-whites in South Africa, and their response. Wild Conquest (New York: Harper, 1950) is a novel about the Afrikaners' Great Trek in the 1830s. In 1957 Abrahams moved from London to Jamaica, where he now lives. His writings are banned in South Africa.

BADIAN, Seydou, b. 1928, Bamako, Mali

After studying medicine in France, where he wrote his first novel (published 1956), Badian returned to Mali in 1955. In 1962 he became a minister in the Modibo Keita government and published his play La mort de Chaka (Paris: Présence Africaine). He left politics to return to medicine in 1965 but was arrested in 1968 when Keita was overthrown. He was imprisoned in a remote part of Mali, where he wrote his novel Le sang des masques (Paris: Laffont, 1975) and was not released until 1975. He now lives in Dakar, Senegal. Apart from his fictional work, Badian has published a book on African socialism, Les dirigeants africains face à leur peuple (Paris: Cahiers libres, 1965).

BETI, Mongo (pseudonym of Alexandre Biyidi), b. 1930, nr Yaoundé, Cameroon

After secondary education in Cameroon, Mongo Beti went to France to study at the University of Aix-en-Provence and the Sorbonne and now teaches in a lycée. He last visited Cameroon in 1959, shortly before independence. An avowed Marxist, he is a supporter of the radical Union des Populations du Cameroun (UPC) which was banned by the French but continued to wage guerrilla warfare against the first independence government of Amadou Ahidjo into the 1960s. His first novel (written under the pseudonym, Eza Boto), Ville cruelle was published in 1954 (Paris: Les Editions Africaines; reissued Paris: Présence Africaine, 1972) and deals with the experience of rural Africans in the European-owned logging industry. His first three novels written under the pseudonym Mongo Beti were all written before Cameroon's independence and are satirical studies of the idiocies and cruelties of colonial rule: Le pauvre Christ de Bomba (Paris: Laffont, 1956; Eng. edn, The Poor Christ of Bomba, London: Heinemann 1971)—banned in Cameroon on publication; Mission terminée (Paris: Corrêa, 1957; English editions, Mission Accomplished, London: Muller, 1958, Mission to Kala, London: Heinemann, 1964); Le roi miraculé: chronique des Essazam (Paris: Corrêa, 1958; English edition, King Lazarus, London: Muller, 1960; Heinemann, 1970). On 25 June 1972 the Paris house, Maspero published Main basse sur le Cameroun.

Autopsie d'une décolonisation, Beti's study of neo-colonialism and political repression in Ahidjo's Cameroon. On 30 June the book's sale was banned by the French government and all copies were seized under a nineteenth-century law (revised in 1939) that allowed the suppression of works 'de provenance étrangère'. After lengthy litigation that centred on Beti's nationality—he had held a French passport since the 1950s but its validity was contested—rather than questions of freedom of speech, the ban on Main basse was lifted in 1977 and the book was reissued by Maspero with a new introduction by Beti. Meanwhile the ban had encouraged him to write two novels that he has described as laying bare the truth about decolonisation in Cameroon, Remember Ruben (original French title, Paris: Union Générale d'Éditions, 1974; English edition, Heinemann, 1980) and Perpetue et l'habitude du malheur (Paris: Buchet-Chastel, 1974; English edition, Perpetua and the Habit of Unhappiness, London: Heinemann, 1978). These novels, dealing respectively with the UPC struggle just before independence and the impact on individuals of authoritarian rule have been followed by La ruine presque cocasse d'un polichinelle (Paris: Editions des Peuples Noirs, 1979—Beti's own publishing house) which takes the opposition theme of Remember Ruben into independence. Beti—whose novels are banned in Cameroon—is explicit about the political role he prescribes for the African novelist: 'In Europe writing has been the pretext of sophisticated uselessness, of gratuitous vulgarity, whereas in our land it can ruin tyrants, save children from massacres, tear a whole people away from ageless slavery, in a word, serve.'

BREYTENBACH, Breyten, b. 1939, South Africa

An Afrikaner poet, painter and prose writer, Breytenbach's marriage in Paris to a Vietnamese woman in 1961 turned a sojourn in Europe since 1959 into permanent exile because of South Africa's laws against mixed-race marriages. In 1964 he was refused a visa for his wife to accompany him to Johannesburg to receive a major literary prize awarded for his poetry but in 1972 he was allowed to visit South Africa for three months with her, a stay chronicled in A Season in Paradise (English editions, London: Cape, 1980; Faber, 1985). Increasingly involved in Paris in opposition to apartheid, Breytenbach returned to South Africa in 1975 with a false identity in a quixotic attempt to organise white opposition. After being followed by security police for nineteen days, he was arrested, charged with 'terrorism' and sentenced to nine years' imprisonment. Further bizarre charges were brought while he was imprisoned on Robben Island; he had allegedly contravened the Riotous Assemblies Act by talking to his warder; he had planned a Soviet submarine attack on Robben Island. Only a charge of smuggling out letters and poems stuck. Released after French government pressure in December 1982, Breytenbach returned to Paris. His lengthy account of the 1975 visit and his prison experiences appears in The True Confessions of an Albino Terrorist (London: Faber, 1984). His book Mouir. Mirrornotes of a Novel (first published in French, Paris: Stock, 1983; English edition, London: Faber, 1984) was written in prison. The miscellaneous writings collected in his End Papers: Essays, Letters, Articles of Faith, Workbook Notes (London: Faber, 1986) are concerned with exile, imprisonment, dissidence, the responsibility of the writer and the South African situation. 'Nearly all South African writing,' Breytenbach remarks in this work, 'reflects varying stages of exile and alienation' for in such a fundamentally divided society there can be no real cultural creativity.

BRUTUS, Dennis. b. 1924, Salisbury (Harare), Southern Rhodesia (Zimbabwe)

Brought up near Port Elizabeth, South Africa, the poet Dennis Brutus is classified as a 'Coloured' in South Africa. A graduate of Fort Hare University, he taught for ten years in Port Elizabeth but was dismissed in 1962 because of his political activities. He was arrested in early 1963 but released on bail and then 'banned'. When the 'No Trial' Act (allowing repeated 90-day detentions) was passed, Brutus moved to Swaziland but was refused a residence permit. Detained in Mozambique en route to an Olympic meeting in Munich which he was to address on apartheid, he was handed over to the South African police. Subsequently sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment on Robben Island, he was freed in 1965. He was immediately issued with a banning order forbidding him to write anything—including poetry—intended for publication but in 1966 obtained a Rhodesian passport and was granted a one-way exit permit. He lived for a number of years in England and subsequently taught at universities in the USA. In 1981 his continued residence in the USA came under threat from the immigration authorities but after litigation and pressure from supporters he was given leave to stay in 1983.

Brutus's first collection of poems, Sirens, Knuckles and Boots (Ibadan: Mbari, 1963) was published while he was in prison. His second, Letters to Martha and Other Poems from a South African Prison (London: Heinemann, 1969) contains many poems about his prison experiences. Other collections include Thoughts Abroad, written under the pseudonym, John Bruin (Austin, Texas: Troubadour Press, 1970); A Simple Lust (London: Heinemann, 1973); Strains (Austin, Texas: Troubadour Press, 1975) and Stubborn Hope (London: Heinemann, 1978) and contain poems that deal, among other things, with the themes of revolution and liberation and with the experience of exile. In South Africa he is listed as a 'prohibited immigrant' and his work is therefore banned there.

CARDOSO, António, b. 1933, Luanda, Angola

Active in opposition to Portuguese colonialism, Cardoso was arrested in 1961 and sentenced to fourteen years' imprisonment in Cape Verde. His published collections of poems include 21 Poemas de Cadeia (Luanda: Uniao do Escritores Angolanas, 1979) which were written in prison between 1970 and 1973.

CRAVEIRINHA, José, b. 1922, Lourenço Marques, Mozambique

A poet and journalist, Craveirinha's collection Cela I includes poems written while in prison.

FARAH, Nuruddin, b. 1945, Baidoa, Somalia

Farah studied in India in the 1960s before teaching in Mogadishu for four years. He left Somalia in 1974 and has not returned. Between 1974 and 1976 he studied in England and then moved to Rome where he wrote his third novel, Sweet and Sour Milk (London: Allison and Busby, 1979; Heinemann, 1980). This and two other novels, Sardines (London: Allison and Busby, 1981; Heinemann 1982) and Close Sesame (London: Allison and Busby, 1983) form a trilogy which Farah calls Variations on the Theme of an African Dictatorship. Explorations of personal relationships against the background of a critical portrayal of an African dictatorship that is undisguisedly Siad Barre's Somalia, Farah's trilogy is not available in Somalia. His most recent novel, Maps (London: Pan, 1986) is set in the context of the Western Somali Liberation Front's struggle for the Ogaden.

HEAD, Bessie, 1937-86, b. Pietermaritzburg, South Africa

The child of a white mother and a black father, South Africa's racial psychosis meant that Bessie Head was brought up in an orphanage. She left South Africa on a one-way exit permit in 1964 and spent most of the rest of her life in the village of Serowe in Botswana. She was granted Botswanan citizenship in 1979. The themes of exile and alienation are central to her novels. When Rainclouds Gather (New York: Simon and Schuster, 1968; London: Gollancz, 1971, Heinemann, 1972) is the story of a black South African nationalist who, after two years' imprisonment, flees to Botswana where he works with an English agriculturalist on village development; Maru (London: Gollancz, 1971, Heinemann, 1972) explores the experience of an 'untouchable' Masarwa (Bushman) woman educated to hold her head high in the Bantu society that despises her; A Question of Power (London: Davis-Poynter, 1974, Heinemann, 1974) is a harrowing, essentially autobiographical exploration of the life of an exile on the edge of sanity. In her non-fiction work, Serowe: The Village of the Rainwind (London: Heinemann, 1983) she chronicles the past and present of her adopted home.

HUTCHINSON, Alfred, 1924-72, b. Hectorspruit, South Africa
A Swazi with one English grandfather, Hutchinson was one of the defendants in the 1956 treason trials. Temporarily freed when the first indictment failed, he fled without a passport through Africa to Ghana, an escape to exile chronicled in Road to Ghana (London: Gollancz, 1960). He lived in England where he taught and wrote plays. In 1971 he moved to Nigeria to teach, and died there in 1972. His friend the poet Dennis Brutus wrote of him that 'the pressures of ghetto existence in South Africa, and the agonies and anxieties of exile prevented his talent from coming to full fruition. He is one of the long list of talented black writers driven into exile by the inhumanities of apartheid, and doomed to die there.'

KAYIRA, Legson, b. 1940, Malawi
Kayira's autobiography, I Will Try (London: Longmans, 1965) recounts his walk across Africa en route to America in search of education. He lives in England, and his fifth novel, The Detainee (London: Heinemann, 1974) portrays the way in which the lives of ordinary non-political individuals can be entrapped in the tentacles of an authoritarian state that is recognisably Kamuzu Banda's Malawi.

KGOSITSILE, Keorapetse, b. 1938, South Africa
A poet, Kgositile left South Africa in about 1960 to work for Spearhead magazine in Tanzania and then moved to the United States in 1962.

where he studied at several universities. He returned to Tanzania in 1975 to teach at the University of Dar es Salaam. His collections include Spirits Unchained (Detroit: Broadside Press, 1969); For Melba (Chicago: Third World Press, 1970); My Name is Afrika (New York: Doubleday, 1971); The Present is a Dangerous Place to Live In (Chicago: Third World Press, 1974); Herzpuren (Kirchberg: Federal Republic of Germany: Schwiftinger, 1981).

KUNENE, Mazisi (Raymond) b. 1930, Durban, South Africa

A poet and a student of Zulu literature who studied at Natal University, Kunene left South Africa in the early 1960s, studied at the School of Oriental and African Studies in London and was an official of the African National Congress there. He is a professor of African literature at the University of California, Los Angeles. His published work includes two epic poems, Emperor Shaka the Great (London: Heinemann, 1979) and Anthem of the Decades (London: Heinemann, 1981).

LA GUMA, Alex, 1925–85, b. District Six, Cape Town, South Africa
Classified as a 'Coloured' in South Africa, La Guma was a member of the South African Communist Party in the 1950s and a defendant in the 1956 Treason Trial. While working as a journalist, he was detained for five months in 1960 for being an executive member of the Coloured People's Congress. In 1962 he was sentenced to five years' house arrest and before it elapsed was arrested under the 'No Trial' Act. On release on bail La Guma was charged with possessing banned literature and again put under house arrest. In 1966 he was allowed to go into exile, lived for a number of years in London and then became the African National Congress representative in Cuba, where he died in 1985. His novella, A Walk in the Night (Ibadan: Mbari, 1962; republished with other stories by Heinemann, 1967) deals with life in a Coloured ghetto of Cape Town as does And a Threefold Cord (Berlin [GDR]: Seven Seas Books, 1964) which was written while he was under house arrest. The Stone Country (Berlin [GDR]: Seven Seas Books, 1967; Heinemann, 1974) is 'Dedicated to the daily average of 70,351 prisoners in South African gaols in 1964' and draws graphically on La Guma's experience of imprisonment. In the Fog of the Season's End (London: Heinemann, 1972) is a novel about the activist struggle in South Africa, and Time of the Butcherbird (London: Heinemann, 1979) takes up the theme of 'removals' of black Africans to the Bantustans.

LAYE, Camara, 1928–80, b. Kouroussa, Guinea

Camara Laye trained as an engineer in Paris where, at a time of extreme loneliness and penury, he wrote as a relief from the misery of exile, an autobiographical novel, L'enfant noir (Paris: Plon, 1953; English edition, The African Child, Glasgow: Collins, 1955). His second novel, Le regard du roi was published in 1954 (Paris: Plon; English edition, The Radiance of the King, Glasgow: Collins, 1956). In 1956 Laye returned to Guinea and in 1958 when the country became independent he was appointed to a post in the Ministry of Information. Disillusioned with Sekou Touré's government, in 1964 he fled to Ivory Coast and then to Dakar, Senegal where he died in 1980. His novel Dramouss (Paris: Plon, 1966; English edition, A Dream of Africa, London: Collins, 1970) is about an African dictatorship, transparently Guinea, and satirises Sekou Touré as 'Big Brute'. In an interview published in 1980, Laye accused Touré of having destroyed 'a society which is 1000 years old . . . replacing it with the worst aspects of Russia and Hitler's Germany. Before him, we did not have concentration camps, dictatorships and torture . . . I do not say that I want colonialism back. But I don't want black people in its place who destroy our liberty.'

MAIMANE, Arthur, b. 1932, South Africa

Maimane worked a journalist on Drum magazine in the 1950s. In 1958 he left South Africa, worked as a Reuter's correspondent in East Africa, lived briefly in Ghana and then moved to London. He has published short stories and a play, and his novel, Victims (London: Allison and Busby, 1976) deals with the impact of apartheid on personal relations between blacks and whites.

MAKOUTA-MBOUKOU, Jean-Pierre, b. 1929, Kindomba, Congo (Brazzaville)

A novelist, poet and literary critic, Makouta-Mboukou was educated at the University of Grenoble, taught in Cameroon and was a Congolese member of parliament between 1963 and 1968. His 1970 novel, En quête de la liberté (Yaoundé: CLE), deals with the return home after fifteen years in France of a Congolese whose outspoken criticisms of the political system ruin his political career and force him into exile. The novel was banned in Congo and Makouta-Mboukou voluntarily exiled himself to France to resume his teaching career. His fourth novel, Les exiles de la forêt vierge ou le grand complôt (Paris: Oswald, 1974, L'Harmattan, 1981) tells of a condemned poet in an imaginary African republic who flees to the forest to escape death. Years later the forest becomes the scene of a reconciliation between him and the president—now deposed and himself forced into exile—who had ordered his death.

MARECHERA, Dambudzo, b. 1955, Southern Rhodesia (Zimbabwe) Expelled from the University of Rhodesia, where he was involved in student protest against the Smith regime, Marechera came to England to take up a scholarship at the University of Oxford. Sent down after refusing to undergo psychiatric treatment, he lived a virtually vagrant life while writing his first book—a collection of stories—The House of Hunger (London: Heinemann, 1978). Its initial impulse was the feeling that he had lost everything: 'There I was in exile, seemingly no future, no nothing. I started asking myself what had happened to most of my generation, like those at the University of Rhodesia, who had been expelled with me, or jailed and detained, and those who gone to join the guerrillas. We had all been so scattered.' Marechera's second book, Black Sunlight (London: Heinemann) was published in 1981; Marechera returned to Zimbabwe in 1982 to find that it had been banned, a measure later lifted. His third book, Mindblast was published in Zimbabwe in 1984.

MATSHIKIZA, Todd, 1922–68, b. South Africa

Educated at the Lovedale Institute, Matshikiza wrote a column in Drum magazine in the 1950s and was a talented musician, writing the music for the black musical King Kong, which took London by storm in 1960. He told Anthony Sampson, who had been his editor on Drum, that there were many things about the South African system that he could have written a book about, but they made him so angry that he preferred to forget them and concentrate on his music. His spirits were lifted sufficiently by his visit to London in 1960 to encourage him to write a scintillatingly humorous account of it in Chocolates for My Wife: Slices of My Life (London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1961). In 1965 he collaborated with Alan Paton on another musical, Mkhumbane, which was staged in South Africa. He then exiled himself to work for Radio Malawi, later moving to Radio Zambia in Lusaka, where he died in 1968.

MPHAHLELE, Es'kia (Ezekiel), b. 1919, Pretoria, South Africa

Mphahlele trained as a teacher but was banned from the occupation because of his outspoken opposition to the Bantu Education Act. He worked on Drum magazine in the early 1950s while studying for external degrees. In 1957 he left South Africa for Nigeria, where he taught at the University of Ibadan. In the 1960s he worked in France, Kenya and Zambia and in 1970 went to the United States where he taught in various universities until 1977. Feeling disillusioned with his contribution to American culture and education he then decided to return to South Africa, a decision that has brought severe criticism from some of his fellow exiles. His first appointment at the black University of the North was vetoed and he became a schools inspector until his appointment to a post at the African Studies Institute at Witwatersrand University. Mphahlele's publications include an autobiography, Down Second Avenue (London: Faber, 1959) which gives the background to his decision to exile himself from South Africa; essays in literary criticism, Voices in the Whirlwind and Other Essays (London: Macmillan, 1973) and The African Image (London: Faber, 1962, new and revised edition, 1974); and two novels. Both novels explore the theme of exile: The Wanderers (New York: Macmillan, 1971; London: Macmillan, 1972) draws extensively on his own exile experience in West and East Africa, and Chirundu (Johannesburg: Ravan, 1979; London: Nelson, 1979), set in Zambia, is in part concerned with the fate of two black South African exiles whom political intrigue has consigned to jail; one of them concludes that a return to police custody and torture in South Africa are preferable to remaining abroad.

Since his return to South Africa the ban on Mphahlele's earlier writings has been lifted, and he has published a new autobiography, Afrika My Music (Johannesburg: Ravan Press, 1984) dealing mainly with the twenty years he was in exile. A biography, Exiles and Homecomings: A Biography of Es'kia Mphahlele (Johannesburg: Ravan Press, 1983) has been published by N Chabani Mangani and Mangani has also edited a collection of Mphahlele's letters, Bury Me at the Marketplace: Selected Letters of Es'kia Mphahlele 1943-1980 (Johannesburg: Skotaville, 1984).

NGUGI wa Thiong'o, b. 1938, nr Limuru, Kenya

Educated at Makerere University College, Uganda and the University of Leeds, Ngugi published his first novel in 1964. He taught at University College, Nairobi, at Makerere and in the US, and in December 1977 when he was detained by the Kenya government he was head of the Department of Literature at the University of Nairobi. A committed critic of what he sees as neo-colonialism and the exploitation of workers and peasants by a comprador bourgeoisie in Kenya, Ngugi moved on in his novels from settings in the colonial period to a penetrating critique of independent Kenya in Petals of Blood (London: Heinemann, 1977). This novel may in itself have upset members of Kenyatta's government but it appears to have been Ngugi's role in community activism and self-help in the village of Kamiriithu that led directly to his detention. In October 1977 the villagers gave a public performance of a play Ngugi had written with Ngugi wa Mirii, Ngaahika Ndeenda ('I Will Marry When I Want') which examined the history and contemporary conditions of the peasantry and openly anatomised class exploitation; in December further performances were banned and soon after Ngugi was arrested. Detained for almost a year, he was not charged or offered any explanation for his incarceration. Detained: A Writer's Prison Diary (London: Heinemann, 1981) integrates an account of his imprisonment with reflections on Kenya's continued cultural and political dependency. While in prison Ngugi wrote—on secreted toilet paper—a novel in Gikuyu, Caitani Mutharaba-ini which when published in 1980 (Nairobi: Heinemann) went through three printings. It was translated by Ngugi himself as Devil on the Cross (London: Heinemann, 1981). Ngugi was not allowed to resume his post at the University of Nairobi when he was released, and went into exile. His recent publications include Barrel of a Pen: Resistance to Repression in Neo-colonial Kenya (London and Port of Spain: New Beacon, 1983) which deals in part with intensified manifestations of political repression in Kenya, including the physical destruction by armed police of the open-air theatre that Ngugi had helped build at Kamiriithu.

NKOSI, Lewis, b. 1936, South Africa

In 1955 Nkosi became a journalist, working on Ilanga lase Natal (Natal Sun) and then on Drum magazine. In 1961 he was granted a one-way exit permit and went to the USA to study journalism. He has lived in London, working as a journalist and writer and is currently a Professor in the Department of Literature, University of Zambia. His two collections of essays, Home and Exile (London: Longmans, Green, 1965) and Tasks and Masks (Harlow: Longman, 1981) contain evocative studies of life in South Africa in the 1950s, experiences in New York, and penetrating examinations of state censorship in South Africa and of the work of Nkosi's fellow South African writers. His first novel, Mating Birds, which explores a disastrous black-white sexual encounter in South Africa through the thoughts of the black participant, was published in 1986 (London: Constable).

NORTJE, Arthur, 1924-70, b. Oudtshoorn, South Africa

Described by Dennis Brutus as 'perhaps the best South African poet of our time', Nortje, a 'Coloured' was educated at Belleville College and then at the University of Oxford where he graduated in 1967. He taught in Canada and then returned to Oxford where he committed suicide in 1970. His poetry is collected in Dead Roots (London: Heinemann, 1973). Nadine Gordimer has written of him, quoting three of his lines, 'In the end he who has to make do with the crumbs from the white man's table at home may find no stomach left for Europe's bounty. "I drag my shunken corpulence/among the tables of rich libraries/Famous viands tasted like ash . . ." These are the terrors of exile for a writer; and the extinction of literature.'

OUSMANE, Sembene, b. 1923, Senegal

A film-maker and novelist, Ousmane is no stranger to censorship. His film, Emitai (1971) which depicted resistance to French military recruiting in the 1940s was almost banned in Senegal, apparently in part because of French pressure; Xala (1974) was shown in Senegal in a heavily cut version; and Ceddo (1977) on the controversial theme of animist resistance to Islamic proselytism, was banned in Senegal, ostensibly because of President Senghor's objection to the orthography of its title. Ousmane's 1981 novel, Le dernier de l'empire (Paris: L'Harmattan; Eng. edn, The Last of the Empire, London: Heinemann, 1983) is about political manoeuvrings in a guided democracy, clearly Senegal, whose octogenarian president has disappeared.

PHILOMBE, René (pseudonym of Philippe-Louis Ombede), b. 1930, Cameroon

A prolific Cameroonian poet, short-story writer and novelist, Philombe has been repeatedly arrested, released and re-arrested since 1960 because of his support for the Union des Populations du Cameroun. His poems, Choc-anti-choc (Yaoundé: Ed. Semences Africaines, 1978) were written while in prison in 1960. His play, Africapolis (Yaoundé: Editions Semences Africaines, 1978) is concerned with dictatorship, symbolised by the despotic King Ekamtid.

SEPAMLA, Siphon, b. 1932, Krugersdorp, South Africa

A trained teacher, Sepamla published three volumes of poetry in the 1970s, one of which, The Soweto I Love (Cape Town: Philip, 1977; London Rex Collings, 1978) was banned on publication. He has also written two novels, one of which, A Ride on the Whirlwind (Johannesburg: Donker, 1981; London: Heinemann, 1984), deals with the June 1976 Soweto riots, is also banned in South Africa. After having three applications for a passport turned down, Sepamla was eventually allowed to travel to the Frankfurt Book Fair in 1980 after pressure from the West German government. He held a writer's fellowship at Iowa University in 1981-2, then returning to South Africa where he is director of Johannesburg's Federated Union of Black Arts Centres.

SEROTE, Mongana, b. 1944, Sophiatown, South Africa

A poet and novelist, Serote was detained in solitary confinement for nine months in 1969, then released without charge. His second volume of poems, Tsetlo (Johannesburg: Donker, 1974) was banned in South Africa. His first novel, To Every Birth its Blood was published in 1981 (Johannesburg: Ravan, London: Heinemann, 1983). A Fulbright Scholar at Columbia University, he graduated in 1979 and since then has lived in exile in Gaborone, Botswana.

SOYINKA, Wole, b. 1934, Abeokuta, Nigeria

A prolific playwright, poet and novelist, Soyinka remarked in February 1967 that 'in new societies which begin the seductive experiment in authoritarianism, it has become a familiar experience to watch society crush the writer under a load of guilt for his daring to express a sensibility and an outlook apart from, and independent of, the mass direction.' In August, with the Nigerian Civil War in full spate, Soyinka was arrested for alleged pro-Biafra activities: what was apparently in fact an attempt to instigate peace talks. Detained in Kaduna until October 1969, Soyinka described his prison experiences in The Man Died (London: Rex Collings, 1972, Penguin, 1975). Two of his poems were smuggled out of prison and were published as a pamphlet (Poems from Prison, London: Rex Collings, 1969). They were later included in a larger collection of poems written in prison (A Shuttle in the Crypt, London: Rex Collings, 1971). In 1972 opposition to the military government led him to resign his post at the University of Ibadan and go into voluntary exile. He returned in 1976 after General

Gowon was ousted and is now head of the Department of Comparative Literature at the University of Ife. Soyinka's concern with the political and social responsibility of the 'intellectual' is implicit in much of his writing, as is the theme of political repression, corruption and injustice. His 1973 novel, A Season of Anomy (London: Rex Collings), for example, appears to be an allegory of Nigeria's experiences under authoritarian civilian and military governments. Two of his plays explicitly consider personal rule in Africa. Kongi's Harvest (London: Oxford University Press, 1965) is a portrayal of an African dictator and the excesses and personality cult that surround him; A Play of Giants (London: Methuen, 1984) concerns four African dictators, explicitly modelled on Idi Amin Dada, Jean-Bédél Bokassa, Mobutu Sese Seko and Francisco Macías Nguema, who have sought refuge together.

TCHICAYA U Tamsi, b. 1931, Mpili, Congo

One of Africa's most prolific poets, Tchicaya has spent most of his life in Paris; he settled there after accompanying his father, a Deputy to the National Assembly, in 1946. He has, however, frequently returned to Congo and travelled widely elsewhere in Africa. For the English reader Tchicaya's poems are most accessible in Selected Poems (tr. Gerald Moore, London: Heinemann, 1970). Moore writes that the 'tension between childhood memories of Africa and everyday mundane experience in an alien capital, between his passionate presence in the suffering Congo and his physical absence from it, is one of the dominating themes of his poetry.' Tchicaya's novel, Le destin glorieux du Maréchal Nnikon Nniku, Prince qu'on sort: comédie—farce-sinistre en trois plans (Paris: Présence Africaine, 1979) deals with the decline and fall of a dictator, Nnikon Nniku, the mentor of the 'Philosophy of Regression'.

THEMBA, Can, 1924–69, b. Pretoria, South Africa

A graduate of the University of Fort Hare (1947), Themba was a teacher and then wrote for Drum magazine and the Golden City Post. In 1963 he went into voluntary exile in Swaziland where he resumed teaching. He died there in 1969. A selection of his stories and press pieces—all of which are banned in South Africa—is to be found in The Will to Die (London: Heinemann, 1972).

VIEIRA, Luandino, b. 1935, Portugal

Vieira was taken to Angola at an early age. An active MPLA member, at the age of twenty-six he was arrested for divulging information about Portuguese deserters in Angola to a BBC interviewer. He was sentenced to fourteen years' imprisonment and served eleven, mainly in Cape Verde. Released in 1972, on condition that he lived in Lisbon for five years, the 1974 Portuguese coup allowed him to return to Angola. His stories, Luuanda (Luanda: ABC, 1963; English edition, London: Heinemann 1980) written in prison were awarded a prize by the Sociedade Portuguesa de Escritores, a decision that led the Portuguese government to close down the society. His novel, The Real Life of Domingos Xavier (first edition in French, Paris: Présence Africaine, 1971; English edition, London: Heinemann, 1978) written in 1961, is the story of a truck-driver, an MPLA activist, who is arrested by the Portuguese, tortured and dies in prison.

Lesser-known authors

Awoonor, Kofi A Ghanaian poet, novelist and critic, his collection The House by the Sea (New York: Greenfield Review Press, 1978) contains poems written during the year in which he was imprisoned by the Ghanaian military government (1975-76), an experience that is also the subject of an as yet unpublished manuscript.

Bangui, Antoine Prisonnier de Tombalbaye, Paris: Hatier, 1980. Account by a former minister in Tombalbaye's Chad of his three years' imprisonment.

Bernstein, Hilda A South African activist exiled in Britain since 1964, she has written a number of non-fiction works on the South African freedom struggle and two novels, one of which, Death Is Part of the Process (London: Sinclair Browne, 1983) is concerned with the ANC sabotage campaign of the early 1960s.

Dogbé, Yves-Emmanuel L'Incarcéré, Paris: Akpagnon, 1980. A Togolese educationalist, now living in exile in Paris, Dogbé was imprisoned for six months in 1977 for preparing a paper for the 1977 FESTAC critical of President Eyadama's authenticité policy. For an extract from L'Incarcéré, a novel based on this experience, see 'The prisoner', Index on Censorship, 9 (3) 1980, pp 28-32.

Donkouré, Abdoul Donkouré is a Cameroonian writer whose novel Le déboussolé (Sherbrooke, Canada: Naaman, 1978) concerns an African student forced to flee his home country after being accused of organising strikes at the university. He ends up in Paris and becomes involved in the 'counter-culture' practised by a young Frenchman he befriends.

Fantouré, Alioum The pseudonym of a Guinean author in exile in France. His novel, Le Cercle des tropiques, (Paris: Présence Africaine, 1972; Eng. edn, Tropical Circle, Harlow: Longman, 1981) which won the Grand Prix Littéraire d'Afrique Noire in 1973 describes the struggle for independence in an African state, after which a reign of terror begins as the personality cult of 'Messiahkoism', named after the 'divine leader', sweeps the land. His 1976 novel, Le récit du cirque (Paris: Buchet/Chastel) is a play within a novel. 'A captive audience locked literally into a theatre becomes gradually involved in the devastating spectacle being acted out on stage, a "circus" of horror and suffering in an African dictatorship complete with political trials and concentration camps. There is no final curtain, only newsreel shots being projected on to a screen as the actors turn to watch the panic-stricken spectators seek an exit which is not there.' (Hans M Zell, Carol Bundy and Virginia Coulon (eds), A New Reader's Guide to African Literature, London: Heinemann, 1983, p 244.)

Kapuscinski, Ryszard The Emperor, London: Quartet, 1983. An evocative account of the last days of Emperor Haile Sellassie, apparently based on interviews with some of his retainers.

Karone, Yodi The pseudonym of a Cameroonian author. His novel, Le bal des caïmans (Paris: Karthala, 1980) deals with detentions, torture, public execution and false charges in an independent African country.

Kunene, Daniel P A South African poet and critic in exile in the USA. His collected poems are Pirates Have Become Our Kings (Nairobi: East African Publishing House, 1978); A Seed Must Seem to Die (Johannesburg: Ravan, 1981).

Madingoane, Ingoapele A South African poet, the first edition of his poems Africa My Beginning (Johannesburg: Ravan, 1979; London: Rex Collings, 1980) sold out immediately in Soweto and was subsequently banned in South Africa.

Ndao, Cheik Aliou Ndao is a Senegalese writer. His play, L'Île de Bahila (Paris: Présence Africaine, 1975) is about an island-state ruled by a dictator.

N'dumbe III, Alexandre Kuma A Cameroonian writer. His play Le soleil de l'aurore (Paris: Oswald, 1976) portrays an un-named African country to which independence has come under the leadership of a puppet regime tied to the former colonial power which seeks to put down the authentic nationalist forces.

Nguza Karl I Bond Mobutu ou l'incarnation du mal Zairois, London: Rex Collings, 1982. Account of Mobutu's dictatorship and the author's escape from it. A former minister, the author has since returned to Zaire and to politics under Mobutu.

Osinya, Alumidi (pseudonym) The Amazing Saga of Field Marshal Abdulla Salim Fisi (or How the Hyena Got His!), Nairobi: Joe Magazine/Transafrica Publications, 1976.

Pheto, Molefe And Night Fell, London: Allison and Busby, 1983, Heinemann, 1985. An account of Pheto's 281 days' detention, all but ten in solitary confinement, in South Africa in 1975. Apparently arrested for challenging apartheid in the arts, no charge was ever upheld against him.

Tansi, Sony Labou Born in 1947, the author works for the Ministry of Information in Brazzaville, Congo. Two of his novels deal with fantastic events in fictional African dictatorships: La vie et demie (Paris: Editions du Seuil, 1979) and L'état honteux (Paris: Editions du Seuil, 1981). His most recent novel, Les sept solitudes de Lorsa Lopez (Paris: Editions du Seuil, 1985) concerns the citizens of 'Valancia', a city recently 'decapitalised' by the dictatorial central government.

Zwelonke, D M (pseudonym of Daniel Mdluli) A South African now living in exile who was formerly imprisoned on Robben Island. His novel, Robben Island (London: Heinemann, 1973), described by Lewis Nkosi as 'as factual as its name' draws on his horrifying experience. It is banned in South Africa.

Secondary works

Abdul-Hai, Muhammad Conflict and Identity: The Cultural Poetics of Contemporary Sudanese Poetry, Khartoum: Khartoum University Press, 1977. Includes a section entitled 'The emigré poets'.

Alata, Jean-Paul 'African prison', Index on Censorship 6 (2) 1977, pp 13-18. A former adviser of Sekou Touré in Guinea, Alata spent four-and-a-half years as a political prisoner there. In July 1975 he was released and went to France where in 1976. Editions du Seuil published his book Prison d'Afrique, 5 ans dans les geôles de Guinée. The French Interior Minister ordered its seizure under the same legislation that had banned Mongo Beti's Main basse (see above)— born in France, Alata had taken Guinean citizenship. Republication of Alata's book was not allowed until 1983 (see also A Blancard, below).

Alvarez-Pereyre, Jacques The Poetry of Commitment in South Africa, London: Heinemann, 1984.

Anderson, Susan 'Something in me died: autobiographies of South African writers in exile', Books Abroad 44 (3) 1970, pp 398-404.

Araujo, Norman 'Flight and fidelity in Cape Verdean poetry before independence: the revolutionary phase', Research in African Literatures 13 (3) 1982, pp 308-14. Explores the tension in Cape Verdean literature between flight from poverty and drought and fidelity to people, place and the struggle for independence from Portuguese colonial rule.

Austin, Dennis 'The darkling plain: literature and politics', in Dennis Austin, Politics in Africa, Hanover, New Hampshire: University of New England Press, 1978, pp 123-48.

Awoonor, Kofi 'The writer and politics in Africa', in Robert W July and Peter Benson (eds), African Cultural and Intellectual Leaders and the Development of the New African Nations, New York: Rockefeller Foundation/Ibadan University Press, 1982, pp 184-95.

Beti, Mongo 'René Philombe', Index on Censorship 13 (1) 1984, pp 31-3. Discusses the persecution of his compatriot, a Cameroonian writer.

— 'Human rights hypocrisy', Index on Censorship 10 (6) 1981, pp 77-9. Attacks what he regards as the double standards of the French state and French people, contrasting their attitudes to human rights violations in their former colonies in Africa and in other parts of the world.

Binder, Ellen (compiler) Censorship and Apartheid in Africa, New York: PEN American Center, 1975.

Bisikisi, Tandundu E A 'My theatre is my freedom', Index on Censorship 14 (1) 1985, pp 20-2. A Zairian dramatist, now in exile, describes his arrest after writing a play criticising the national university.

Blancard, A 'Entretien avec Jean-Paul Alata', Politique Africaine 2 (7) 1982, pp 17-39.

Booth, James Writers and Politics in Nigeria, London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1981.

Breytenbach, Breyten 'I am not an Afrikaner any more', Index on Censorship 12 (3) 1983, pp 3-6.

- Brutus, Dennis 'Shall I be deported from the USA?' Index on Censorship, 12 (3) 1983, pp 13–16.
- Dameron, Charles 'Arthur Nortje: craftsman for his muse', in Christopher Heywood (ed), Aspects of South African Literature, London: Heinemann, 1970, pp 155–62.
- Demafouth, Jean-Jacques 'Landlocked and uninformed', Index on Censorship 14 (5) 1985, pp 22–3. Discusses media censorship in Central African Republic.
- Egudu, R N 'Pictures of pain: the poetry of Dennis Brutus' in Christopher Heywood (ed), Aspects of South African Literature, London: Heinemann, 1970.
- Elansari, Nour al-Din 'A tale of two brothers', Index on Censorship 14 (3) 1985. Experiences as a poet in exile from Morocco: 'There are many kinds of death for a writer, poet, or artist, but all of them are achieved by isolating him or her from their source of inspiration.'
- Gordimer, Nadine 'English-language literature and politics in South Africa', in Christopher Heywood (ed), Aspects of South African Literature, London: Heinemann, 1970, pp 99–120.
- The Black Interpreters, Johannesburg: Spro-Cas/Ravan, 1973.
- The Grey Ones: Essays on Censorship, Johannesburg, Ravan, 1974. See especially the essay entitled 'Apartheid and censorship'.
- Grant, Jane 'Silenced generation', Index on Censorship 6 (3) 1977, pp 38–43. On censorship and exiled writers in South Africa. Her views on the impact of their having been a 'silenced generation' should be compared with those of Daniel P Kunene (see below).
- Gurr, Andrew Writers in Exile. The Identity of Home in Modern Literature, Brighton: Harvester Press, 1981. Includes general critical considerations, and a brief section on the work of Ngugi wa Thiong'o.
- Henderson, George 'Free to agree with Colonel Qaddafi', Index on Censorship 9 (3) 1980, pp 18–22. Murders of Libyan exiles by agents of Qaddafi.
- 'How Morocco treats its dissidents', Index on Censorship 13 (6) 1984, pp 30–1. Focuses on Abdellatif Laabi, a poet and Abdellatif Derkaoui, a professor of Arabic imprisoned by the Moroccan government. For Laabi, see also 'Poems from under the gag', Index on Censorship 11 (1) 1982, pp 22–5.
- Horn, Andrew 'Uganda's theatre—the exiled and the dead', Index on Censorship 8 (5) 1979, pp 12–15. The fate of writers in Uganda under Idi Amin.

- Kabeba, Don 'Uganda: no censors needed', Index on Censorship 8 (2), pp 18-21. Repression of the press and writers under Idi Amin.
- Kunene, Daniel P 'Ideas under arrest: censorship in South Africa', Research in African Literatures 12 (4) 1981, pp 421-39. Censorship and exile; includes a consideration of the impact of the silencing of the older generation of South African writers, and the return home of Es'kia Mphahlele.
- dos Santos Lima, Manuel 'Les exils de l'écrivain Africain', Research in African Literatures, 13 (3) 1982, pp 308-14.
- Lindfors, Bernth 'The African politician's changing image in African literature in English', Journal of Developing Areas (4) 1969, pp 13-28.
- Mattera, Don 'Out of the Twilight', Index on Censorship, 12 (3) 1983, pp 7-10. Mattera (b. 1935) is a South African writer who was banned between 1973 and 1982 and therefore forbidden to publish. For an extract from his unpublished autobiography, Gone with the Twilight, see 'Scenes from a banned life', Index on Censorship 7 (5) 1978, pp 3-8.
- Mezgebe, Alem 'Ethiopia—the deadly game', Index on Censorship, 7 (4) 1978, pp 16-20. An account by an Ethiopian writer, now in exile in England, of his experiences of censorship in Ethiopia both under the Emperor and after the revolution. Mezgebe's unpublished play, Pulse, about an African dictator, was a prizewinner when performed at the 1980 Edinburgh Festival.
- Modisane, Bloke 'Why I ran away', in Langston Hughes (ed), An African Treasury, New York, Pyramid, 1961, pp 26-9. Modisane's account of why he left South Africa, originally published in the New Statesman (London). See also his vivid autobiography, Blame Me on History, London: Thames and Hudson, 1963.
- Moyana, T T 'Problems of a creative writer in South Africa', in Christopher Heywood, Aspects of South African Literature, London: Heinemann, 1970, pp 85-98.
- Mphahlele, Ezekiel 'Censorship in South Africa', in Ezekiel Mphahlele, Voices in the Whirlwind, London: Macmillan, 1973.
- Ndovi, Victor 'Censorship in Malawi', Index on Censorship, 8 (1) 1979, pp 22-5. A journalist in Malawi who was detained for '49 months and 20 days' between 1973 and 1977, Ndovi is in exile in London.
- Ngugi wa Thiong'o 'The culture of silence and fear', South (London), May 1984, p 38. Discusses cultural and political oppression in Kenya.

- Niven, Alastair (ed) The Commonwealth Writer Overseas: Themes of Exile and Expatriation, Brussels: Didier, 1976.
- Nkosi, Lewis 'Fiction by Black South Africans', in G D Killam (ed), African Writers on African Writing, London: Heinemann, 1973.
- 'Southern Africa; protest and commitment', in Lewis Nkosi, Tasks and Masks, Harlow: Longman, 1981, pp 76–106.
- Ntuli, Pikita 'Sculptor in prison', Index on Censorship 9 (3) 1980, pp 33–7. A South African sculptor and poet, Ntuli had been living in exile in Swaziland since 1963 when he was arrested in 1978, apparently as a result of a split in the Pan-Africanist Congress, of which he was a member. Held as a prohibited immigrant pending asylum in a third country, he is now living in exile in England. For more on Ntuli and others imprisoned under these circumstances including D M Zwelonke (pseudonym for Daniel Mdluli), author of Robben Island, see Index on Censorship 8 (1) 1979, p 52.
- Ogunbesan, Kolawole The Writings of Peter Abrahams, London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1979.
- Okonkwo, Juliet I 'Nuruddin Farah and the politics of Somalia', Présence Africaine (132) 1984, pp 44–53.
- Owomoyela, Oyekan 'Dissidence and the African writer: commitment or dependency', African Studies Review 24 (1) 1981, pp 83–98.
- Panther-Brick, Keith 'Fiction and politics in Africa', Journal of Commonwealth and Comparative Politics (13) 1975, pp 79–86.
- Povey, John 'The political theme in South and West African novels', African Quarterly, 9 (1) 1969, pp 33–9.
- Rive, Richard Writing Black: An Author's Notebook, Cape Town: D Philip, 1981.
- Sepamla, Sipho 'Spirit which refuses to die', Index on Censorship 7 (1) 1978, pp 3–8. Interview with Sepamla discussing the situation of black writers in South Africa.
- Sharif, Mahgoub 'Profile Mahgoub Sharif', Index on Censorship 9 (3) 1980, pp 23–4. Profile of a popular vernacular poet who was repeatedly arrested and held without charge in the 1970s by the government of Sudan.
- Third World Book Review* (London) 2 (1–2) 1986. A special issue entitled 'Writers and Artists Against Apartheid' that includes a number of important articles touching on exile and resistance to apartheid in South Africa.
- Waidhura, Livingstone Njomo 'Clampdown on drama', Index on Censorship 14 (1) 1985, pp 23–4. Discusses government censorship of the arts in Kenya.

Per Wästberg (ed) The Writer in Modern Africa, Uppsala: Scandinavian Institute of African Studies, 1968. Especially the section entitled 'The Writer in a Modern African State' by Wole Soyinka, with discussions by twelve other writers.

'Writers workshop: poems', Index on Censorship 14 (3) 1985, pp 34–6. Discusses censorship in Malawi, in the context of poetry.

Zerrika, Abdullah 'Profile Abdullah Zerrika', Index on Censorship 9 (3) 1980, pp 38–40. Profile of a Moroccan poet arrested in September 1978.

North-South Monitor

THE UN SYSTEM

▲ World Food Council (wfc)

Twelfth Ministerial Session

Rome, 16-19 June 1986

■ Representatives of the Council's thirty-six member-countries, including sixteen ministers, welcomed the adoption by the UN General Assembly in May 1986 of the UN Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1989-90.¹ According to the wfc's Executive Director, Maurice Williams, it was now for the Council to assist African governments to implement their mutually agreed priorities through specific measures. While the meeting noted improvements in Africa's situation in the last year, with the ending of the drought, it recognised that African countries would continue to need massive external aid and debt relief until economic recovery could be achieved through improved trade earnings. The Council declared its intention to promote political support for agricultural priorities as a means of translating the UN Programme into action.

The Council also discussed the potential for increased South-South cooperation in pursuit of food and agricultural goals, particularly in the light of recent Council-sponsored workshops in China and India. These had allowed African food policy experts to learn from Asia's successes in raising food production, through its 'green revolution'.²

▲ Food and Agriculture Organisation (FAO)

Fourteenth Regional Conference for Africa

Yamoussoukro, Ivory Coast, 2-11 September 1986

■ Representatives from forty-nine African countries, including some thirty agriculture ministers, adopted a Programme of Action for African Agriculture, proposed by FAO Director-General, Edouard Saouma. The Programme was the first attempt to translate into practical measures the policy guidelines provided by the UN General Assembly Special Session on Africa in May 1986.³

The conference considered a FAO report, 'African agriculture: the next twenty-five years.' The two-year study forecast a future of recurrent famine for the continent, with food imports bankrupting even relatively prosperous African countries and leaving only four states able to feed themselves in twenty-five years time, unless certain steps were taken. These steps, outlined in Edouard Saouma's strategy, could reverse the long-term decline in food output, making Africa self-sufficient in food by the year 2010.

The Programme of Action, adopted unanimously, had four points:

- internal policy reforms by African governments, to give agriculture absolute priority;

The North-South Monitor was written and researched for Third World Quarterly by Maya Jaggi.

North-South Monitor

- improved incentives, inputs, institutions and infrastructure, 'the four Is'. These improvements entailed better use of land, improved processing, marketing, and distribution, and increased use of irrigation, fertilisers and pesticides;
- conservation of natural resources, with measures against poor water management which results in desertification;
- a more favourable international economic environment, particularly in international trade, finance and aid.

The conference also called for increased international aid to combat the current plague of locusts and grasshoppers which has been threatening the continent since the end of the 1982-5 drought.⁴

● 'It makes no sense to offer aid with one hand and to restrict African exports with the other.' Edouard Saouma, FAO Director-General, speaking of the imperative need for improving the international economic and trading environment for developing countries, particularly in Africa. Financial Times (London) 3 September 1986.

▲ International Conference for the Immediate Independence of Namibia Vienna, 7-11 July 1986

■ The UN-sponsored conference adopted by acclamation a Programme of Action which called on the UN Security Council (SC) 'to immediately adopt and impose comprehensive mandatory sanctions' against South Africa. These sanctions, it said, should extend beyond economic measures, to curtail political and diplomatic relations with Pretoria.

The conference, called to increase public awareness of the plight of Namibia, while suggesting specific ways of furthering its independence, was opened by the UN Secretary-General, Javier Pérez de Cuéllar. Twenty years after the UN General Assembly resolution of 1966 terminating the League of Nations mandate placing 'South West Africa' under the administration of South Africa, Pérez de Cuéllar called on South Africa to implement UNSC Resolution 435 (1978). This resolution called for a UN-monitored ceasefire in Namibia, where the South West Africa People's Organisation (SWAPO) and its military wing, PLAN, were fighting occupying South African troops, followed by elections and independence for the territory.

In calling for mandatory sanctions, the conference urged the USA and Britain, 'permanent members of the Security Council which have thus far prevented the Council from acting effectively, to reconsider their position' and cease their vetoes. It explicitly condemned the US policy of 'constructive engagement' with South Africa, and dismissed attempts to link Namibian independence with the withdrawal of Cuban troops from Angola as 'irrelevant and extraneous'. Pretoria had made the withdrawal a condition for the implementation of UNSC Resolution 435 since 1982, and had reiterated it in March 1986 in proposing 1 August 1986 as the provisional date for commencing the Security Council's plan. The conference went on to reaffirm the legitimacy of the struggle of the Namibian people by every means at their disposal, urging governments to support SWAPO with moral and political as well as financial, military and other material resources.

The Namibian 'Contact Group', Britain, Canada, France, West Germany and the

North-South Monitor

US, the five Western countries with the greatest economic interests in Namibia, did not send representatives to the meeting, though some had observers present. Some participants, which were not named, were reported to have expressed reservations about the final text, though these were not publicly specified.

The recommendations of the conference were to be conveyed to the UN General Assembly.⁵

▲ UN General Assembly (UNGA)
Special Session on the Question of Namibia
New York, 17-20 September 1986

■ The fourteenth UNGA Special Session was the fourth to have been devoted to Namibia, the others having been in 1967, 1978 and 1981. The UNGA heard from the UN Secretary-General, Javier Pérez de Cuéllar, that despite the resolution of all outstanding issues relating to Namibian independence, UN Security Council Resolution 435 (1978) had not yet been implemented (see above). In a letter of 28 July 1986, President P W Botha of South Africa had reaffirmed his insistence that the withdrawal of Cuban troops from Angola remained a precondition for Namibian independence.

The special session passed a resolution demanding that South Africa 'immediately and unconditionally withdraw' its illegal administration, occupation army and police force from Namibia. It condemned South Africa for defying the UN's termination of its mandate to rule the territory, rejecting the 'interim government' installed in June 1985 as 'null and void', and dismissing calls for 'linkage' with Cuban withdrawal. Reaffirming that Resolution 435 remained the only acceptable basis for a peaceful settlement of the Namibian question, the Assembly called on the Security Council to take immediate action towards its unconditional implementation. The resolution also reaffirmed the legitimacy of the struggle of the South West Africa People's Organisation (SWAPO), calling for international assistance for the organisation, and it urged that comprehensive mandatory sanctions be applied against South Africa as the most peaceful means of making it comply with international law.

The resolution was carried by a vote of 126 to none, with 24 abstentions. In the course of the debate, two paragraphs in the draft, explicitly naming the US in connection with 'constructive engagement' and 'linkage' were deleted.⁶

● 'The central issue in Namibia has always been clear and unambiguous, namely: securing the right to self-determination and independence for the people of Namibia. This right has been denied them far too long in an age when self-determination of peoples has become a universally accepted principle . . . The people of Namibia are suffering under colonial rule at a time when colonialism has become an anachronism.' Javier Pérez de Cuéllar, UN Secretary-General, in his opening speech to the UNGA. UN Press Release GA/7320, 17 September 1986.

North-South Monitor

COMMODITIES

▲International Coffee Organisation (ICO)

Executive Board Meeting

London, 1-4 July 1986

■Representatives of coffee producer and consumer countries decided that a further emergency session of the Board should be convened as soon as it became apparent that coffee prices were about to reach the level at which export quotas are automatically introduced.

The coffee export quotas, in force since 1980, but suspended in February 1986 when prices rose at the prospect of a poor Brazilian crop, were due to expire at the end of September 1986. Previous meetings of the ICO had, however, failed to resolve the question of new percentage allocations of the global coffee market among producer countries.⁷ Further discussions on the distribution of quotas at the July 1986 meeting were equally inconclusive. Prices were, however, falling and seemed likely to reach the level of $1.35 per pound, at which export quotas are automatically triggered. With differing assessments as to the likelihood of prices reaching the critical point, a decision on quotas was deferred until the ICO's main annual meeting, at the end of September 1986.⁸

▲UN Cocoa Conference 1984

Fifth Part

Geneva, 7-25 July 1986

■After two years of negotiations, representatives from some sixty cocoa producer and consumer countries adopted the International Cocoa Agreement (ICCA) 1986. It replaces the 1980 agreement which was due to expire on 30 September 1986, and was precluded by its terms from renewal.

Negotiations for a new cocoa pact began in May 1984, under the auspices of the UN Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD). The fourth round of talks, in February-March 1986, had collapsed when the Ivory Coast, the world's largest cocoa producer, declared its intention to withdraw from the negotiations, in protest against consumer countries' proposals for a semi-automatic price adjustment mechanism.⁹ The EEC, collectively the largest consumer in the absence of the US, in turn refused to enter a new pact in which the Ivory Coast, absent from the 1980 pact, did not participate. By the time of the fifth round, however, the Ivory Coast had expressed a renewed willingness to negotiate an agreement with effective economic provisions, apparently after consultations with representatives of the EEC, and of France in particular.

The subsequent talks resulted by 16 July 1986 in agreement on the key issues of price structure, price levels and price adjustment mechanisms, though a further ten days were needed to resolve the remaining details. The resulting pact was due to enter into force on 1 October 1986 for a period of three years, with the possibility of extension for a further three years. The terms of the pact were such that:

North-South Monitor

- Buffer stock operations were to remain the chief mechanism for price stabilisation. The size of the buffer stock was unchanged at 250,000 tons, possibly increased by 100,000 tons if the pact were extended beyond one year. The stock was still to be financed by a levy on trade of US2¢ per pound.

The buffer stock mechanism was to be supplemented to support prices not by export quotas, as producers had proposed, but by a scheme for withholding cocoa in national stocks, if the Council failed to agree on other supplementary measures once the buffer stock had reached a certain level. Producers would withhold cocoa from the market if the indicator price fell below the lower intervention level for five consecutive days, if the buffer stock were at 80 per cent of its capacity, or had cash enough only to buy 30,000 tons more cocoa. The scheme was limited to a maximum of 120,000 tons, with cocoa being held in 30,000 ton tranches at a time.

- The price range was centred on a free zone in which no intervention was to occur, of US30¢, around a median or reference price of 103¢ per pound. This price was a little higher than the consumers' ideal price of 100¢, but considerably lower than the producers' desired reference of 115¢. The new pact introduced the flexibility of 'may buy' and 'may sell' zones of 3¢ on either side of the free zone, where intervention by the Buffer Stock Manager was discretionary. Beyond this range, of 85¢ and 121¢, the buffer stock was obliged to buy or sell. The Cocoa Agreement became the first commodity pact in which prices were to be expressed in International Monetary Fund (IMF) Special Drawing Rights (SDRs), based on a basket of currencies, in order to minimise the distortions of currency fluctuations. The reference price of 103¢ per pound was equivalent to SDR 1.935 per ton.

- There were two price adjustment mechanisms, designed to keep the reference price adjusted to underlying market realities. First, the annual price review and possible revision of the International Cocoa Council. If no decision were reached, prices would automatically be adjusted by up to 6¢ per pound. Second, price review in the event of the buffer stock having bought or sold 75,000 tons of cocoa in six consecutive months after the pact's entry into force or since the last price review. If no decision were reached, the adjustment by 6¢ would be automatic.

In order for it to take effect, the agreement required ratification of five producer countries, accounting for 80 per cent of total exports, and consumer countries accounting for 65 per cent of total imports or 60 per cent for provisional entry into force. There was some concern that the requisite ratifications would not have been made by the deadline of 30 September 1986, though it was hoped that the ratifications of the Ivory Coast, Nigeria, Ghana, Brazil and Cameroon would at least fulfil the requirements for the producers. There was also concern about the decision by Malaysia, the world's fastest expanding cocoa producer, to remain outside the pact, along with the US, the largest consumer.¹⁰

- The new Cocoa Agreement is a 'dynamic compromise'. Denis Bra Kanon, agriculture minister of the Ivory Coast, whose withdrawal from the last negotiations had effectively curtailed them. UNCTAD Bulletin (Geneva) July/August 1986.

North-South Monitor

▲ International Tropical Timber Organisation (ITTO) Council Meeting Geneva, 28 July–1 August 1986

■ The International Tropical Timber Agreement (ITTA), which took eight years to negotiate, was finally set to become operational after the resolution of a protracted deadlock among its forty-one member countries.

The ITTA was adopted in 1983 and came into force on 1 April 1985. Its operation was prevented, however, by a year-long dispute over the site of headquarters and the choice of Executive Director for the ITTO. Three cities were initially proposed at the July 1986 Council session, but the choice was narrowed when the EEC withdrew the candidacy of Amsterdam, leaving only Jakarta and Yokohama. The decision was made on 29 July 1986 to establish the ITTO headquarters in Yokohama; Japan being the largest importer of tropical timber. Meanwhile, the choice of Executive Director fell on Freezailah bin Che Yeom of Malaysia, his country being the world's largest tropical timber exporter.

The ITTA is considered to be an innovation in terms of commodity agreements. Negotiated under UNCTAD's auspices, it has no price-stabilising function, nor a mechanism such as a buffer stock or export quotas. It aims rather to conserve the world's fast diminishing tropical forests, promoting research and development, collecting market information and attempting to involve producers in timber processing, particularly as a means of making the best use of a natural resource for developing countries. Its forty-one member countries account for more than 95 per cent of world trade in tropical timber.

The financing of the pact remains uncertain, but the Council decided that its finances were to be provided by voluntary contributions from member countries and international organisations, as well as through the 'second window' of the Common Fund for Commodities, once it becomes operational.¹¹

▲ Wheat Producers' Meeting Cairns, Australia, 25 August 1986

■ Trade ministers from Argentina, Australia and Canada, accounting for 44 per cent of world wheat exports, met in the margins of the 'Fair Traders in Agriculture' conference in Cairns (see below). The meeting had been proposed in June 1986 by the Australian Foreign Minister, Bill Hayden, to discuss what was seen as a global trade crisis caused by subsidised wheat exports from the EEC and the USA. Observers from the EEC, Japan and the USA attended the meeting.

Australia's Trade Minister, John Dawkins, said that US attempts to regain by means of export subsidies wheat markets lost to the EEC through the operation of the Common Agricultural Policy (CAP) were encroaching on Australia's traditional markets. The USA had originally applied subsidies under the Bonus Incentive Commodity Export Programme (BICEP), subsequently renamed the Export Enhancement Programme (EEP) in order to win back markets (mainly in North Africa and the Middle East), lost through EEC subsidies. Through this programme, grain bonuses were supplied from government stocks to subsidise exports, in effect cutting the price by offering increased amounts of wheat at the same cost.¹² On 1

North-South Monitor

August 1986, however, President Reagan had agreed in the face of domestic pressure from 'farm states' Congressmen, to extend the EEP to other markets, notably the Soviet Union, the world's largest grain purchaser, thus bringing the USA into direct competition with other major grain exporters. He had decided to offer the Soviet Union 3.85m tons of wheat, subsidised to a price of $92 per ton (as opposed to the approximate market price of $130), by the end of September 1986. In this move, he was opposed by US Secretary of State, George Shultz, who warned of the political strain risked with US allies who were also grain exporters. Shultz lodged this objection despite an apparent agreement between the USA and Australia to the effect that their joint defence facilities in Australia would not be used as a bargaining chip in any possible trade war.

The three countries represented at the meeting argued that they were effectively caught in the middle of EEC and US attempts to undercut each other in the world wheat market. Price-takers, which did not themselves offer subsidised rates, their economies were prey to the combined effects of the fall in wheat prices, the fall in the value of the US dollar, the currency of the world wheat market, and shrinking sales volume, as markets were lost to the subsidising trade blocs. John Dawkins said that the USA and EEC combined stockpile of wheat had grown from 100m metric tons in 1981-2 to 150m metric tons in 1985-6, while the market price had fallen from $170 to $130 per ton. He further accused the EEC of releasing 950,000 tons of stockpiled wheat on to the market in response to the US decision to subsidise sales to the Soviet Union, an accusation denied by the EEC representative.

The ministers agreed that in the short term the production and release of surplus stocks on to export market by the USA and the EEC needed to be restrained. According to John Dawkins, they also agreed in their rejection of EEC proposals for long-term market sharing, on the basis that the obligation to remedy the situation rested solely with those countries responsible for bringing it about. Notwithstanding efforts by Argentina and Australia to press Canada to adopt a harder line towards both the subsidising blocs, the Canadian Minister, Charles Mayer, said that the EEC was primarily to blame. The USA, he said, was at least prepared to discuss restraining production, while the EEC, by contrast, considered CAP to be sacrosanct.¹³

● 'The obligation rests with those who have engaged in market subsidies and created the problem.' John Dawkins, Australia's Trade Minister, rejecting the EEC proposal for market sharing. Financial Times (London) 26 August 1986.

The release of 950,000 tons of stockpiled EEC wheat on to the market was 'purely an internal operation to offset a significant reduction in this years EC crop'. Ove Juul Jorgensen, the EEC representative at the talks. International Herald Tribune (Paris) 27 August 1986.

DISARMAMENT

▲ Five Continent Peace Initiative Summit

Ixtapa, Mexico, 6-7 August 1986

■ The six leaders of the Five Continent Peace Initiative issued a call to the two

North-South Monitor

superpowers for a mutual ban on nuclear testing, offering their own plan for verifying such a ban. The Initiative, formed in May 1984, had had its first summit in New Delhi in January 1985.¹⁴ The leaders (President Raúl Alfonsín of Argentina, Prime Minister (PM) Andreas Papandreu of Greece, PM Rajiv Gandhi of India, President Miguel de la Madrid of Mexico, PM Ingvar Carlsson of Sweden and former President Julius Nyerere of Tanzania) had apparently decided to call their second summit to coincide with the anniversary of Hiroshima and the expiry of the Soviet Union's unilateral moratorium on nuclear tests.¹⁵

In a final document,¹⁶ the leaders outlined specific proposals for verifying explosions of over one kiloton, over a period of one year. Though temporary, it was hoped that the verification scheme would build sufficient confidence between the superpowers to encourage them to enshrine a permanent nuclear test ban in treaty form. The main proposal was to install between five and eight seismographs at each of the three sites recently used by the superpowers: Nevada in the USA, Novayazemlya and Semipalatinsk in the Soviet Union. The composition of the scientific monitoring teams was left unspecified, but it was understood that the six countries were willing to augment US and Soviet teams with scientists of their own, if requested to do so. The six also planned to strengthen their own cooperation, for instance in the exchange of data on presumed explosions. The scheme was estimated to cost around $10m, but it was suggested by the leaders at a subsequent press conference that they would not be financing the system themselves.¹⁷

NORTH-SOUTH

▲ General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT)

Textiles Committee Meeting

Geneva, 21–31 July 1986

■ Representatives from forty-two countries and the EEC's twelve member-states concluded a year of negotiations by reviewing the Multi-Fibre Arrangement (MFA) governing world trade in textiles, for a further five years. In a protocol setting out the new terms of the agreement, developing countries conceded to most US and EEC demands, despite their persistent efforts to renegotiate an MFA which would better serve the interests of low-cost producers.

The MFA, which came into force in 1974 and was twice extended in 1978 and 1982, was due to expire on 31 August 1986. Its state-parties had begun reviewing the arrangement a year earlier.¹⁸ Low-cost producers, led by India, Brazil and Pakistan, had initially favoured the termination of the MFA altogether, on the basis that it was a protectionist derogation from GATT free trade rules, and that developing countries should be afforded free access to Western markets. They particularly objected to attempts by the US and the EEC to differentiate between low-cost producers, and to insist on a reciprocity of liberalisation. In the face of firm opposition from the USA and the EEC, however, the low-cost producers had gradually conceded the issue of the MFA's renewal, but were hoping to prolong the negotiations until the time of the arrangement's expiry, in order to secure substantive liberalisation of its terms, and a guarantee that it would be phased out on a fixed time-table. Their hand seemed strengthened by a general awareness that failure to agree to the terms of world trade in textiles might imperil the launching of the entire GATT round. This launch was scheduled to take place in Punta del Este in September 1986, and was understood to be a prime objective of the US Administration. (See below.)

North-South Monitor

US negotiators, on the other hand, invoked the spectre of a protectionist backlash within the US Congress, warning against liberalising the MFA and exposing the US markets to an influx of cheap Third World textiles. Though the 'Jenkins Bill' restricting US textile imports had been vetoed by President Reagan, having passed through both Houses of Congress, it was due to be reviewed by the House of Representatives on 6 August 1986, where a two-thirds majority in its favour would override the presidential veto.¹⁹ Both the US Administration and the EEC were also rapidly concluding bilateral market sharing arrangements with low-cost producers, on terms less favourable to the developing countries.²⁰ In the face of increasing Western protectionism, many Third World suppliers preferred even a restrictive agreement such as the MFA, as a guarantee for their exports, to the risks of the free market.

In the final negotiations, a group was established to draft the protocol for the extension of the MFA, led by M G Mathur, Deputy Secretary-General of GATT. The group included the US and the EEC with several leading low-cost producers, such as Hong Kong and South Korea. While the USA was pressing for a five-year extension, the EEC favouring four years and some developing countries willing to concede three, an extension of five years was eventually agreed in principle. However, the clock had to be 'stopped' by agreement at midnight on 31 July 1986, in order to settle the remaining contentious issues before the expiry of the current MFA. These issues were the question of procedures to combat sudden 'import surges' of Third World textiles to Western markets, and the scope of the new agreement. The USA insisted upon including the 'new' vegetable fibres such as ramie and silk blends in the MFA, even threatening to withdraw from the pact if they were not covered. Meanwhile, countries such as China, a chief supplier of ramie, opposed such an extension.

The MFA finally agreed that 'MFA 4' was to run for five years from 1 August 1986, until mid-1991. The terms of the new protocol included:

- the replacement of the original procedures for market disruption, or the risk of it, by terms permitting importing countries to apply restrictions selectively, following consultations with suppliers. Such restrictions could not be based solely on the level of growth of import surges, but had to give due consideration to the supplier's export performance, its market share and the general state of its industry.

- special consideration for the least developed countries such as Haiti, the Maldives and Bangladesh, and for small or new suppliers in the industry.

- the inclusion of natural fibres such as ramie, other vegetable fibres and silk blends, provided that their weight or value exceeded half that of the garment and that its export caused or risked major market disruption. Restrictions were not, however, applicable to textiles which were 'internationally traded in commercially significant quantities' before 1982. This provision was taken to cover such items as bags, sacks, matting, carpets, etc.

- special consideration for cotton-producing countries and developing countries highly dependent on wool exports.

North-South Monitor

- more liberal terms for Third World exporters opening their markets to industrialised countries' exports and textiles and clothing.
- the promise of action against circumvention of the MFA, including international collaboration on false customs declarations on product origins.
- an injunction against counterfeiting of designs and trademarks.
- the observation that the MFA should ultimately be phased out, though no time-scale was suggested.

China expressed its reservations on the increased scope of the agreement, and India on its failure to set out a time-table for abolition. Elements within the US textile industry were reported to be incensed with the new agreement, though uncertainty prevailed over the exact scope of the protocol, as fibres covered were not explicitly named. The EEC, meanwhile, seemed concerned that the new restrictions covering ramie would divert them into European markets, by limiting their flow into the US.²¹

▲ Commonwealth Heads of Government Review Meeting London, 3-5 August 1986

■ A summit of seven Commonwealth member countries met to consider the crisis in Southern Africa in accordance with an agreement reached at the full Commonwealth Heads of Government Meeting (CHOGM) in Nassau, in October 1985. There, a twin-track approach to South Africa had been evolved, entailing a diplomatic initiative to encourage political dialogue between Pretoria and representatives of the majority black population, through a Commonwealth Eminent Persons Group (CEPG), and a parallel programme of selective, progressive economic sanctions.²² The CEPG was chosen by the leaders of seven countries, Australia, Bahamas, Britain, Canada, India, Zambia and Zimbabwe, and these same leaders were mandated to determine whether the requisite diplomatic progress had been achieved after a period of six months.²³

According to its final communiqué,²⁴ the summit heard a report of the CEPG's mission to South Africa, in which it concluded that 'at present there is no genuine intention on the part of the South African government to dismantle apartheid and no present prospect of a process of dialogue leading to the establishment of a non-racial and representative government'. The leaders expressed profound disappointment that Pretoria had taken none of the five steps recommended at Nassau as conditions for the eradication of apartheid and the establishment of representative government. They deplored the government's actions, including its raids on the neighbouring states of Botswana, Zambia and Zimbabwe on 19 May 1986, which had effectively curtailed the efforts of the CEPG. The Group's conclusions as to the inadequacy of progress achieved by diplomacy were corroborated by a report from the British Foreign Secretary, Sir Geoffrey Howe, who had conducted his own mission to Southern Africa in his capacity as current President of the EEC Council of Ministers.²⁵

The leaders were unable to agree, however, on the measures to be recommended to the rest of the Commonwealth as a result of the CEPG's failure. The six leaders, other than Mrs Margaret Thatcher, were committed to a minimum position of adopting the eight-point programme formulated at Nassau. It had there been suggested that this programme should be considered in addition to the nine measures already advocated at Nassau, in the event of CERG's failure. The British Prime Minister, however, was isolated in her refusal to countenance the package of measures, despite a warning from Zambia that it would consider leaving the Commonwealth if the summit proved unsuccessful, and threats of economic reprisals against Britain from countries such as India and Nigeria, who hinted at relegating Britain to 'least favoured nation' status with them, instituting in effect a policy of 'Buy British Last'. Unlike the Nassau summit, where a compromise had been reached on sanctions through the device of the CERG, regarded by some as a mere delaying tactic, the London summit resulted in something of an agreement to differ.

North-South Monitor

The six countries other than Britain agreed that the adoption of further economic measures against South Africa was a moral and political imperative. Accordingly, they decided to adopt and commend to the rest of the Commonwealth and the wider international community, the eight-point programme:

- a ban on air links with South Africa;
- a ban on new investments or re-investment of profits earned there;
- a ban on the import of South African agricultural products;
- an end to double taxation agreements with South Africa;
- an end to all government assistance to, investment in, and trade with South Africa;
- a ban on all government procurement in South Africa;
- a ban on government contracts with majority-owned South African companies;
- a ban on the promotion of tourism to South Africa.

Going beyond the measures suggested at Nassau, they also agreed on:

- a ban on all new bank loans to South Africa, whether to public or private sectors;
- the withdrawal of all consular facilities in South Africa, except for their own nationals, or nationals of third countries to which they render consular services.

The British government, however, 'while taking a different view of the likely impact of economic sanctions', agreed to three measures:

- a voluntary ban on new investment in South Africa;
- a voluntary ban on the promotion of tourism to South Africa;
- acceptance of any EEC decision to ban the import of coal, iron, steel and Krugerrands from South Africa.

It was unclear, though, as to what precisely the 'voluntary' bans entailed, and how long it would take for guidelines to be formulated to govern them. The undertaking to be bound by any EEC decision on specific sanctions, though a greater concession, seemed to demonstrate the greater importance attached by Britain to the EEC than to the Commonwealth.

A proposal by President Kaunda of Zambia for a committee composed of the leaders of Australia, Canada and India, to coordinate measures against Pretoria with the EEC, the USA and Japan, was not directly taken up. The communiqué, did, however, point to future consultations with other countries, particularly those with significant economic relations with South Africa, presumably by means of bilateral contracts. The leaders specified their readiness to revoke the measures imposed if South Africa was observed to make progress, and they threatened further sanctions after a reasonable period, if none were achieved. In this connection, they warned South Africa against retaliation through economic or other acts of aggression against the neighbouring states.²⁶

North-South Monitor

● 'We would prefer an outcome which can be unanimous. But I don't think that the six are going to accept the lowest common denominator position, which is not consistent with a position of integrity . . . We seek unity and credibility, but if it comes to a choice between the two, we must opt for credibility.' Remarks made during the summit by Prime Minister Bob Hawke of Australia, in which he argued against making a compromise with the British view. Financial Times (London) 5 August 1986 and The Guardian (London) 5 August 1986.

'If the Commonwealth stands for anything it must stand for strong moral principles which rise above balance sheets and commercial trading matters.' Prime Minister Brian Mulroney of Canada, indirectly criticising Britain's refusal to impose sanctions on South Africa. The Observer (London) 3 August 1986.

'Britain is not the leader any more, not in the Commonwealth. It is losing its position because it is compromising its position on moral principles over economic needs.' Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi of India, surmising that Britain's refusal to apply sanctions had caused it to forfeit its leadership within the Commonwealth. The Times (London) 6 August 1986.

'I wish to register my utter dismay and bitter disappointment with the position taken by Britain at this summit. This position will not bring comfort and consolation to the hearts of many in South Africa. They see in Mrs Thatcher's stand support for apartheid. So do we, the Front Line States.' Prime Minister Robert Mugabe of Zimbabwe, after the summit. Financial Times (London) 6 August 1986.

▲ South Pacific Forum Seventeenth Annual Summit Suva, Fiji, 8-11 August 1986

■ The summit was attended by leaders from the thirteen member-states of the South Pacific Forum, which comprises Australia,²⁷ New Zealand, and the eleven independent Pacific states (Cook Islands, Fiji, Kiribati, Nauru, Niue, Papua New Guinea, Solomon Islands, Tonga, Tuvalu, Vanuatu and Western Samoa).

The leaders considered the status of the South Pacific Nuclear Free Zone Treaty, adopted at their previous year's summit at Rarotonga, Cook Islands.²⁸ The Treaty of Rarotonga had been signed by eight of the Forum's member-states, and had since received ten signatures and four ratifications. While the majority of leaders at the summit decided in favour of ratifying the treaty, three states (Papua New Guinea, Solomon Islands and Vanuatu) maintained their opposition to it. They felt that it was not sufficiently comprehensive. Father Walter Lini, Prime Minister of Vanuatu, specifying that it should ban port calls by nuclear-powered and armed ships, and uranium mining in the South Pacific. The leaders finalised the wording of the treaty's protocols, which had already been tentatively presented by teams of the Forum's negotiators to the five nuclear weapon states: Britain, China, France, the Soviet Union and the USA. All five were being asked to recognise two protocols, while Britain, France and the US, which have territories in the region, were requested to endorse a third protocol. Their provisions would commit the nuclear powers not to locate, use, threaten to use or test nuclear weapons in the zone. In an effort to induce Britain and the US to sign the protocols, a withdrawal clause was inserted, allowing signatories to opt out of the treaty after a period of notice, if they decided that 'extraordinary events' jeopardised their supreme interests. David Lange, Prime Minister of New Zealand, apparently hoped that the concession to British and US requirements would persuade them to join China and the Soviet Union, which had already expressed support in principle for the treaty. Thus, the Forum would succeed in isolating France, which persisted in underground nuclear weapons testing at Mururoa Atoll, in French Polynesia.

North-South Monitor

In an important development, the leaders agreed unanimously to urge the UN Committee on Decolonisation to restore New Caledonia to the UN List of Colonised Territories, from which it had been removed by France in 1947, on the basis that the territory was in fact an integral part of France. The Forum's recommendation was to be drafted urgently and proposed for the agenda of the meeting of the UN Committee on 15 August 1986 in New York. In their joint communiqué, the leaders criticised as a 'significant backward step' the policy of the French Prime Minister, Jacques Chirac, in delaying the territory's progress towards independence. Originating as an election promise in March 1986, the policy reversed the moves of the French socialist government of President François Mitterrand towards regional autonomy for the Kanaks, and jeopardised a referendum on self-determination which had been scheduled for mid-1987. The Forum's decision reflected a victory for the views of the more radical Melanesian states of the Forum, led by Walter Lini, as opposed to the more conservative tendencies of some of the Polynesian states.

Walter Lini also defended his plan to enter into a fishing agreement with the Soviet Union, which for the first time would provide Soviet on-shore facilities in the South Pacific. Kiribati had already concluded a fishing agreement with the Soviet Union in August 1985, and Fiji was also expressing a willingness to consider such an offer. According to some countries, Soviet efforts to enter into commercial arrangements and diplomatic relations with Pacific Island countries constituted a threat to Western interests, particularly in the wake of the collapse of the ANZUS Treaty between Australia, New Zealand and the USA. Suspended since 1985 when New Zealand banned port calls by US nuclear-powered and armed ships, the treaty was effectively terminated in June 1986 when US Secretary of State, George Shultz, officially confirmed US withdrawal. Walter Lini, however, argued that the Soviet Union's presence in the region had already been assured by its diplomatic and trade relations with Australia and New Zealand. Along with other Pacific island states, Vanuatu argued that Soviet competition in the fishing sector was a legitimate and inevitable outcome of the failure of the USA to proffer adequate financial rewards. The Forum agreed, however, to press for the conclusion of a multilateral fisheries treaty with the US.

The future direction of the Forum became an issue towards the close of the summit, when Walter Lini suggested that its scope be broadened to allow it to deal directly with other international agencies and institutions, and to fight as a political bloc in the UN. He advocated its recognition of the Palestine Liberation Organisation (PLO) and the South West Africa People's Organisation (SWAPO) as well as its application for membership of the Non-Aligned Movement (NAM). (Vanuatu is at present the only Forum country with membership of NAM.) Prime Minister Lini's efforts to bring about a more political role for the Forum were scorned by David Lange. He suggested that the Forum's primary relevance was social and economic, and that as a 'mini-United Nations' it would lose its value, together with the attention of New Zealand. The final communiqué did, however, enter the international debate on sanctions against South Africa. It implicitly supported the call of a majority of countries at the Commonwealth 'mini-summit' in London in August 1986 (see above) for economic measures against Pretoria, urging all countries and in particular, South Africa's trading partners, to follow the recommendations of the Commonwealth.²⁹

North-South Monitor

● 'It is the Pacific way to be able to talk and settle our differences. It is not pretending you are a whole row of Pérez de Cuéllars.' David Lange, Prime Minister of New Zealand, referring to the UN Secretary-General, in opposing Walter Lini's call for an increasingly political South Pacific Forum. The Times (London) 12 August 1986.

▲ 'Fair Traders in Agriculture'
Ministerial Meeting
Cairns, Australia, 25-27 August 1986

■ A new alliance was formed on the issue of agricultural trade when trade ministers from fourteen industrialised and developing countries met in Queensland. The countries were Argentina, Australia, Brazil, Canada, Chile, Colombia, Fiji, Hungary, Indonesia, Malaysia, New Zealand, Philippines, Thailand and Uruguay.

The ministers met at the invitation of the Australian government, to express their collective demand that trade in agriculture be accorded priority in the forthcoming round of General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) talks. These were due to be launched at Punta del Este in September 1986 (see below). As countries providing 22 per cent of world agricultural exports, and for whom agriculture accounted for an average of 50 per cent of their total exports, they were united in their condemnation of agricultural over-production and export subsidies, entailed in particular by the policies of the EEC and the USA. The EEC, Japan and the USA were not invited to participate in the meeting, but attended as observers.

In his opening address, the Australian Prime Minister, Bob Hawke, said that the EEC's direct subsidies and consumer transfers under the Common Agricultural Policy (CAP) had amounted to $100bn that year. The USA, he said, had retaliated with $35bn of competing export subsidies under the Export Enhancement Programme (EEP). The efforts of these warring trade blocs to dump their surplus produce distorted global trade and artificially depressed prices, he said, unfairly forcing efficient yet less powerful agricultural exporters from their traditional markets, and severely damaging their agriculturally-dependent economies. Argentina's Agricultural Minister, Lucio Reca, furthermore called attention to the social and political consequences of such trade policies. Agricultural export subsidies undermined the capacity of many developing countries for economic growth, making it increasingly difficult for them to service their external debts, and even threatening stability and democracy.

The fourteen countries unanimously approved the 'Cairns Declaration' which committed its signatories to 'seek the removal of market access barriers, substantial reduction in agricultural subsidies and the elimination, within an agreed period, of subsidies affecting agricultural trade'. They agreed that agricultural trade should be made a priority in the forthcoming GATT talks, and went beyond existing provisions in the 'café au lait' draft agenda (see below) by calling specifically for the new round to combat subsidies and advocate agricultural adjustments in production. No formal organisation of the participants was formed, but they agreed to meet regularly and to monitor progress towards their goals.

North-South Monitor

The USA professed to welcome the Cairns Declaration, while a cautious note was sounded by the EEC representative, Ove Juul Jorgensen. He warned against placing unrealistically high expectations on the forthcoming talks in Punta del Este.³⁰

● 'Efficient agricultural exporting countries are the innocent victims of this trans-Atlantic trade war.' Bob Hawke, Australia's Prime Minister, in his opening speech to the meeting. International Herald Tribune (Paris) 26 August 1986.

'Our creditor-countries, which are symbols of democracy, do not understand that in order to strengthen democracy in developing countries, economic growth is essential and that agricultural growth is the key to it.' Lucio Reca, Argentina's Agriculture Minister. International Herald Tribune (Paris) 27 August 1986.

▲ GATT

Ministerial Session of the Contracting Parties

Punta del Este, Uruguay, 15-20 September 1986

■ Ministers and officials from seventy-four of GATT's ninety-two contracting parties participated in the session to agree terms for the launching of a new round of multilateral trade negotiations (MTNS). While the prospects of securing agreement had seemed slight before the meeting, it became apparent that most parties were more willing to compromise than to suffer the opprobrium of blocking the new round, crucial to halt the growing tendency towards protectionism in world trade. In a final ministerial declaration,³¹ they agreed to begin, before the end of 1986, the 'Uruguay Round' of MTNS, which was set to last until 1990.

The ministers were initially faced with three competing texts, the GATT Preparatory Committee in Geneva in July 1986 having failed to agree on a draft agenda for the new round. Alignments differed according to issues, but the two major subjects of contention were developed countries' efforts to enlarge the scope of GATT talks, and the insistence by an alliance of some developed and Third World countries that agricultural policies be subject to discussion during the round. At a preliminary meeting of Canada, the EEC, Japan and the USA in Sintra, Portugal in early September 1986, the US Trade representative, Clayton K Yeutter, had explicitly threatened to withdraw from any GATT round which failed to free trade in the US's priority areas, agriculture and services.³² The US also wished to extend GATT's purview to encompass the protection of intellectual property, trade-related foreign investment and trade in high technology goods. Such an extension was meanwhile opposed by a group of ten developing countries, led by Brazil and India.³³ They argued on legal grounds that GATT had no jurisdiction in trade other than that in goods. They apparently feared that, if discussed in the same negotiations, acceptance of developing countries' goods into Western markets would be made conditional on Third World concessions on services.

North-South Monitor

One draft, known as the 'café au lait' proposal on account of its backers, Colombia and Switzerland, had secured the most acceptance in the GATT Preparatory Committee, and the support of the USA, Canada, Australia and many developing countries.³⁴ It was prevented from gaining majority support, however, by objections from the EEC, primarily lodged by France, to its reference to agricultural export subsidies. The group of ten developing countries opposing the inclusion of services had proffered an alternative draft, and Argentina a third, which was even more radical in its drive to liberalise agricultural trade. It was the 'café au lait' draft, however, which provided the working basis for the Punta del Este Ministerial Declaration. This fact was partly due to a compromise on the part of Brazil and India, which agreed to negotiate on the basis of the Colombian-Swiss proposal, provided that a number of amendments were considered.

The Punta del Este Ministerial Declaration required the creation of a Trade Negotiations Committee (TNC) which would hold its first meeting before the end of October 1986, in preparation for the launching of the Uruguay Round before 19 December 1986, to be completed in four years. Its provisions included:

- Agriculture: For the first time, agricultural trade was to be included in the GATT talks. Discipline was to be increased on the use of 'all direct and indirect subsidies and other measures affecting directly or indirectly agricultural trade, including the phased reduction of their negative effects and dealing with their causes'. This wording, stronger than that in the café au lait draft, was understood to cover both the EEC export subsidies, and US production aids, though the EEC resisted attempts to single out its Common Agricultural Policy (CAP) for particular criticism, as well as the fixing of a timetable for dealing with subsidies. The EEC had been weakened by internal dissension, with France, Greece, Denmark, Iceland and Belgium reaffirming the inviolability of CAP, while Britain and West Germany were known to favour reform of the policy. The chief critics of agricultural subsidies were the fourteen countries of the 'Cairns Group' the self-styled 'fair traders' amongst developed and developing countries (see above). Ironically, they found support from the USA, despite the fact that they were an alliance of countries suffering from the effects of the agricultural trade war between the EEC and its retaliating antagonist, the USA.

John Dawkins, the Australian Trade Minister and spokesman for the Cairns Group, understood the reference to 'causes' in the declaration to entail the progressive reduction of the export subsidies that cause surpluses that distort trade. The EEC Commissioner, Willy de Clercq, however, objected that tackling the negative effects of policies was not equivalent to tackling those policies themselves. The official EEC line remained that 'the fundamental objectives and mechanism' of CAP were non-negotiable.

- Services: A compromise was reached between the US demand for the inclusion of trade in services in 'single-track' GATT negotiations, and the desire of Brazil and India to keep services outside GATT. The ministers as representatives of their countries, rather than as GATT contracting parties, launched a round of trade in services outside the auspices of GATT, but parallel to the talks on goods. The TNC would coordinate both sets of negotiations, but only at their conclusion would a decision be taken on whether or not to incorporate the results into GATT rules. The compromise closely followed a provisional deal between the EEC Commissioner, Tran Van Tinh, and representatives of Brazil and India in Geneva, which had posited such a 'twin-track' approach. It had, however, subsequently been condemned by the USA and rejected by the EEC at their meeting in Sintra. The compromise allowed both the US on the one hand and the developing countries on the other to feel that their requirements had been met, the USA insisting that the outcome was merely a procedural convenience.

North-South Monitor

- Intellectual property: the USA secured agreement to negotiate a new framework of rules to curb piracy of patents and copyrights, and to restrain counterfeiting.

- Foreign Investment: the USA conceded on the third of the non-traditional issues which it had hoped to see included. It had wanted discipline exercised over trade-distorting investment policies such as export performance requirements and local content requirements. In the face of developing countries' trepidation at the implications for their sovereignty of such controls, it was decided that negotiations could not begin on the issue until after all parties had agreed that existing GATT rules were inadequate.

- Standstill and Rollback: the declaration committed parties to a standstill on new protectionist measures which were 'inconsistent' with GATT rules, and a rollback of existing measures over the period of the negotiations. This constituted a weaker obligation than developing countries had hoped for, in that the onus of proving 'inconsistency' appeared to be on the party lodging the complaint. Developing countries took the wording to cover the so-called 'grey measures' such as Voluntary Export Restraints (VERS) and Market Sharing Arrangements (MSAs), but the US response undermined this interpretation. Clayton Yeutter denied the relevance of the provision to most existing US measures, implying therefore that it did not cover 'grey' areas.

- Dispute settlement: despite the ministerial commitment to strengthen procedure for settling disputes, Yeutter said that the USA would continue to take unilateral action in retaliation for unfair trading practices, without recourse to protracted GATT procedures.

- Safeguards: Agreement was secured to renegotiate the terms of temporary import restrictions designed to protect threatened domestic industries from influxes of foreign goods.

- tariffs and non-tariff barriers were to be renegotiable, as were

- textiles and clothing;

- subsidies;

- tropical and natural resource based products—a particular demand of developing countries.

Developing countries also managed, with EEC support, to secure a statement making the improved functioning of the international monetary system and the flow of investment to the Third World, one of the objectives of the new round. Little, however, was said about the problems posed by the massive trade imbalances between the trading 'superpowers'. The USA backed Japan in excluding a reference to the need to achieve a 'balance of benefits', implicitly criticising Japan's trade surplus, on the grounds that the reference was discriminatory. The compromise was a mention of the need to tackle 'growing disequilibria' in world trade, in the closing speech of the meeting's Chairman, Uruguay's Foreign Minister, Enrique Iglesias.

The issue of participation failed to detract attention from the main task of the meeting, the setting of the new round's agenda. A bid by Nigeria, supported by Cameroon, Egypt, Gabon, Jamaica, Tanzania and Zimbabwe to exclude South Africa from GATT failed. Their case had been that no country against which international sanctions were to be applied should be eligible to participate in the new GATT round. A Czech motion to support the Soviet Union's application to join the round was similarly quashed by the US and the EEC. Objections raised to the proposal included the country's centralised economy and the spectre of increasing 'politicisation' of issues.³⁵

North-South Monitor

● 'We know exactly what we wanted. Our opponents only knew what they didn't want.' US Secretary of Commerce, Malcolm Baldrige, suggesting reasons after the meeting as to why many US views prevailed. International Herald Tribune (Paris) 22 September 1986.

'Brazil and India played chicken with the USA over the service issue.' Tony Hill of Jamaica, suggesting that the developing countries had in fact negotiated with the USA from a position of considerable strength, forcing the USA to concede on the question of services. Financial Times (London) 23 September 1986.

'We have opened the way for the most difficult, the most complex round in GATT history.' Enrique Iglesias, Uruguay's Foreign Minister and Chairman of the meeting. Financial Times (London) 22 September 1986.

SOUTH-SOUTH

▲ Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC)
Reconvened Seventy-Eighth Ministerial Conference
Geneva, 28 July-5 August 1986

■ Oil ministers from OPEC's thirteen member countries reached an unexpected agreement to curb their production levels temporarily, in an effort to support oil prices. At the time of the meeting, prices had fallen below $10 per barrel, and OPEC's total output was estimated at over 20m barrels per day (b/d), 2-3m b/d above estimated demand. The increase from the June 1986 level of 19m b/d was attributed almost entirely to a surge in Saudi Arabia's production.

The meeting followed a first session in Brioni, Yugoslavia, in June 1986, where a majority of nine OPEC members had decided on a target price range of $17-$19 per barrel, with a corresponding OPEC production ceiling of 17.6m b/d for 1986.³⁶ Agreement on how to distribute this output among individual members was, however, deferred until the Geneva meeting, where it remained elusive. The dissenting states at Brioni still favoured a larger cut in production to 15-16m b/d, in an attempt to defend still higher prices. Iran persisted in its demand for a quota of two extra barrels for every one accorded to Iraq, while, in a new development, Iraq insisted on parity in its quota with Iran. Despite the speculation that the United Arab Emirates (UAE) might prove more amenable than the warring Gulf states, it too maintained its official refusal to accept a quota of less than 1.5m b/d.³⁷

Faced with these obstacles, the ministers considered several proposals before arriving at their final decision. The original plan, formulated by Indonesia's Minister for Mines and Energy, Dr Subroto, for distributing an overall output of 17.6m b/d was summarily rejected by Iraq, Iran, Qatar and the UAE.³⁸ A subsequent proposal from Algeria's Oil Minister, Belkacem Nabi, to distribute production of 15–16m b/d was considered by a committee composed of the oil ministers of Nigeria, Indonesia, Algeria, Kuwait and Ecuador.³⁹ It was apparently blocked by the UAE, Kuwait and Qatar, and was unlikely to have found favour with Saudi Arabia and the other Gulf states.

North-South Monitor

Meanwhile, an interim compromise was being sought by a group consisting of Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Venezuela, Nigeria and Indonesia, whereby oil prices would be supported by 'voluntary' production cuts by OPEC members until unanimous agreement could be secured on lowered quotas. This plan was based on acknowledgement of the fact that the differences between Iran and Iraq were such that any settlement would probably have to be confined to the remaining eleven OPEC members. On 31 July 1986, OPEC's President, Nigeria's Oil Minister, Rilwanu Lukman, announced that nine or ten members had together pledged voluntary curbs on their output amounting to 1.925m b/d for August 1986.

On 5 August 1986, however, it was announced that unanimous agreement had been reached on a proposal by the Iranian Oil Minister, Gholamreza Aghadeh. The proposal:

- allowed Iraq to continue producing at optimum levels;
- imposed on the other twelve members a return to their production levels when they were last determined by OPEC in October 1984, when the overall production ceiling was 16m b/d. In effect, the twelve countries other than Iraq were to share an output of 14.8m b/d;
- established a monitoring committee of marketing officials at OPEC headquarters in Vienna, to ensure compliance with the agreement;
- allowed the agreement to lapse in the face of any confirmed violation by a member country, though in those circumstances an extraordinary OPEC conference would have to be called;
- stated that the agreement was for a temporary period of two months, from 1 September 1986

While scepticism was expressed as to OPEC's ability to maintain discipline in line with the agreement, the compromise was seen as a considerable achievement. Iran's substantial concession, in allowing Iraq to continue producing without restraint in an effort to break the deadlock on quotas, was taken as indicative of the extreme pressure of the oil price collapse on Iran's financial resources. Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, however, made clear that the agreement was an interim one, which would not be extended beyond October 1986. An OPEC meeting, planned for 6 October 1986, would therefore have to result either in definitive quota arrangements to bring about a price of $17–$19, or a return to unrestrained production. Saudi Arabia and the Gulf states also overruled opposition from Algeria, Libya and Iran to a reference in the final OPEC communiqué⁴⁰ which restated OPEC's goal of securing a 'fair market share' for its member countries. This strategy had been decided by a majority at OPEC's meeting in December 1985,⁴¹ and had evidently not been abandoned by its advocates, despite their willingness to concede temporary constraints, avowedly to remove surplus oil from the market. The communiqué also reaffirmed the continuing need for cooperation from non-OPEC oil producing countries in restraining production to help to stabilise the market. On 6 August 1986, Mexico agreed to cut its output by 150,000 b/d and Malaysia by 50,000 b/d. While, however, Oman, Egypt and Norway also declared that they welcomed the OPEC agreement, they failed to commit themselves to specific reductions.⁴²

North-South Monitor

● 'A good proposal is a good proposal, no matter who makes it,' Qasim Taki, Iraq's Oil Minister, explaining his country's acceptance of Iran's proposal. International Herald Tribune (Paris) 6 August 1986.

The Iranians 'have the facilities to control Iraq's production by ourselves'. Gholamreza Aghazadeh, Iran's Minister of Petroleum, explaining that Iran's proposal did not constitute acceptance of a larger market share for Iraq, and implying that Iraq's oil facilities remained vulnerable to Iranian attack. Financial Times (London) 5 August 1986.

▲ Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC)
Twentieth Ministerial Council Meeting
Abha, Saudi Arabia, 26-7 August 1986

■ Foreign and oil ministers from the GCC's six member states (Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates) issued a joint communiqué regretting the 'escalating Iranian threats' to GCC members, and expressing 'deep concern at the escalating Iranian interference with navigation to and from the ports of the member-states in the Gulf'.⁴³ Without mentioning Iraq's part in initiating and escalating the 'tanker war' which had already resulted in fifty-seven confirmed strikes against Gulf shipping in 1986, the communiqué called on Iran to cease its 'illegal activities'. The ministers were apparently concerned by Iran's threats to disrupt the oil exports of Gulf member-countries, following its accusations against them of complicity in the Iraqi raid on Iran's Sirri offshore terminal on 12 August 1986. They were also concerned that Iran might retaliate against some of the GCC's weaker member states, and therefore reaffirmed in their communiqué that the GCC was indivisible, and that a threat to one member-state would be regarded as a threat to them all. The ministers were also understood to be considering the establishment of a radar network, as well as a new system of naval escorts, to protect Gulf shipping. These proposals were reportedly referred to the GCC ministers of defence for further study.

The GCC also welcomed the recent interim agreement on production restraint, reached by OPEC in August 1986 (see above). Reaffirming their commitment to the target price for oil of $17-$19 per barrel, agreed by a majority of OPEC members, they emphasised that the OPEC agreement was of temporary duration only, and that OPEC was therefore obliged to reach a firm decision of a lasting nature on the issue of production quotas. The ministers expressed the hope in their communiqué that the resulting agreement would stabilise prices at the target level, and contribute towards market stability in general.

Finally, the Council discussed the state of contacts with the EEC, and was reported to have been concerned about the European customs duties being levied on Gulf petrochemical exports to the Community.⁴⁴

North-South Monitor

▲ South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation (SAARC)

First Ministerial Council Meeting

Dhaka, 12–13 August 1986

■ Foreign ministers from SAARC's seven member countries (Bangladesh, Bhutan, India, Maldives, Nepal, Pakistan and Sri Lanka) met for their first Council meeting since the association was launched at its first summit in Dhaka in December 1985.⁴⁵ SAARC's chairman, President Ershad of Bangladesh, set the tone of the meeting in calling for increased cooperation amongst member states, and for the subduing of traditional tensions between them. Serious differences were, however, reported to have emerged during the Council's consideration of a possible common strategy against regional terrorism. India and Sri Lanka apparently differed sharply on whether or not the activities of Tamil separatists in the north of Sri Lanka could be termed 'acts of terrorism'. The Council simply approved the early convening of a group of experts to report on measures to control terrorism. A study group on drug trafficking and abuse was also proposed, and was to begin on 16 September 1986 in Dhaka.

In a joint communiqué, the ministers approved the creation of a regional agricultural information centre in Bangladesh and a regional meteorological research centre in Dhaka. They also approved their Standing Committee's recommendations on the establishment of a SAARC secretariat, deciding on Kathmandu, Nepal, as the site for the headquarters. The Standing Committee was specifically directed to ensure emphasis on the increasing participation of women in its plans for the various sectors of the integrated programme of action. The Council considered that areas such as education, trade, management of disaster relief, the establishment of investment companies and improvements in postal, telecommunications and air links between SAARC capitals, including special tariff rates, should gradually be introduced into the region's integrated programme. The Council also endorsed a proposal to convene a SAARC conference on South Asian children in New Delhi in November 1986, in collaboration with the UN Children's Fund (UNICEF). Other proposals for collaboration between SAARC and external agencies were to be initiated by SAARC itself, the Council stressed, and based on the association's own determination of its priorities.⁴⁶

▲ Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN)

Nineteenth Annual Ministerial Meeting

Manila, 23–4 June 1986

ASEAN—Australia, Canada, EEC, Japan, New Zealand, USA

Meeting of Foreign Ministers

Manila, 26–8 June 1986

■ The regular meeting of foreign ministers from ASEAN's six member-countries (Brunei, Indonesia, Malaysia, Philippines, Singapore and Thailand) was marked by calls for increased regional economic cooperation and less dependence on the Western industrialised powers.

In her opening speech, President Corazon Aquino of the Philippines criticised ASEAN for its failure to progress towards increased economic cooperation, nineteen years after its inception. Describing how growing protectionism in the industrialised countries and the collapse of oil and other commodity prices had stunted economic growth in ASEAN countries, she urged the organisation to look after the region's interests. Foreign ministers present echoed the demands for a reassessment of ASEAN's purpose and potential, expressing the hope that the organisation's forthcoming summit in Manila in June 1987 would stimulate renewed efforts at expanding trade, tourism, investment and other forms of economic cooperation, reinvigorating what many seemed to see as a torpid institution, which was in danger of losing its relevance amidst the region's economic crisis.

North-South Monitor

A final joint ministerial communiqué singled out Japan, the region's largest trading partner, for criticism on three particular counts: declining Japanese investment trends in ASEAN countries; poor access for ASEAN goods to Japanese markets; and the continuing structural imbalance of ASEAN-Japanese trade. Subsidised agricultural exports from the USA and the EEC, together with protectionist legislation pending in the US Congress, were described in the communiqué as potential problems for ASEAN-US relations. These themes were raised later between foreign ministers of ASEAN and of its six chief trading partners, or 'dialogue' partners. Japan was directly criticised by Malaysia's Foreign Minister, Tengku Ahmad Rithaudin, on behalf of ASEAN. He described how the sharp rise in the value of the yen against South-East Asian currencies had made Japanese loans 'a source of hardship', and also cited the tendency of Japanese companies to invest in the US and the EEC in order to evade their market tariffs and quotas, rather than in the Third World, where lower wages made a more obvious choice for a manufacturing base. Japan's Foreign Minister, Shintaro Abe, replied by promising to consider the broadening of official overseas development assistance to South-East Asia, to make it encompass local currency costs of aid projects, rather than simply covering foreign currency costs, which usually meant Japanese goods and services. He made no mention, however, of reducing restrictions on ASEAN or other Third World imports.

In the forum of ASEAN and its dialogue partners, ASEAN member countries were joined by Australia, Canada and New Zealand in attacking US and EEC export subsidies for causing severe damage to world commodity prices. The USA and the EEC countered by referring to ASEAN's own protectionist barriers. US Secretary of State, George Shultz, suggested that ASEAN's unwillingness to open its own markets to US goods was in fact undermining President Reagan's efforts to defuse protectionist pressures in the US Congress.

The ASEAN ministerial meeting also instructed its officials to draft a South-East Asian Nuclear Weapon-Free Zone Treaty 'as soon as possible', the Indonesian Foreign Minister, Mochtar Kusumaatmadja, remarking that the adoption of the equivalent Treaty of Rarotonga covering the South Pacific zone⁴⁷ had lent fresh impetus to ASEAN's long-standing efforts in this direction. While Indonesia and Malaysia were known to favour the project, Thailand and the Philippines apparently were more wary, fearing the creation of a strategic imbalance in the region between the two superpowers, and concerned about possible conflicts between the requirements of such a treaty and their existing obligations to the US under mutual defence pacts. George Shultz did his utmost to reinforce these doubts in the minds of the ministers present. It seemed, however, that the most immediate obstacle to the establishment of the region as a zone of peace was the issue of Kampuchea. Once again in their communiqué, the ministers condemned Vietnam for its occupation of the country, urging outside powers to exert pressure on Vietnam to withdraw its troops, and reaffirming their support for the eight-point proposal of the Coalition Government of Democratic Kampuchea (CGDK) directed to the settlement of the question.

North-South Monitor

The ASEAN ministers also signed two agreements: one on energy cooperation, and the other a petroleum securities agreement to share crude oil and petroleum products in times of shortages and gluts.⁴⁸

● 'After nineteen years of existence ASEAN should already be evaluating the impact of regional economic cooperation; instead it is endlessly discussing how to get it off the ground . . . [ASEAN has] problems which threaten to render meaningless our continued association.' President Corazon Aquino of the Philippines, in her opening speech to the ASEAN ministerial conference. Far Eastern Economic Review (Hong Kong) 10 July 1986.

There is 'no doubt that ASEAN has lost some sense of direction as well as its momentum'. Tengku Ahmad Rithauddin, Foreign Minister of Malaysia. International Herald Tribune (Paris) 24 June 1986.

▲ Kampuchea-Laos-Vietnam

Thirteenth Regular Ministerial Meeting

Hanoi, 17-18 August 1986

■ Foreign ministers of the three Indochinese states reaffirmed their position with regard to the issue of Kampuchea, as set out at previous ministerial conferences.⁴⁹ They repeated their long-standing demand for the elimination of the 'genocidal Pol Pot clique' as a precondition for a political settlement in the region, and reaffirmed the intention of Vietnamese troops to withdraw from Kampuchea by 1990. In a final joint ministerial communiqué, however, the ministers said that 'if the troop withdrawal is capitalised upon, running counter to the peace and stability of Cambodia, the Socialist Republic of Vietnam and the People's Republic of Kampuchea will exchange views and take appropriate steps'. If, the communiqué continued, there were agreement on these two key issues concerning the 'Pol Pot clique' and troop withdrawal, then the negotiation of a political settlement would immediately become possible. The communiqué also reaffirmed Vietnam's willingness to talk to China 'at any level and anywhere', and endorsed Kampuchea's proposal for the establishment of a 'zone of peace' along the Thai-Kampuchean border, which neither side would allow foreign forces to use as a basis for hostilities against the other side. A statement by the Thai Foreign Minister on 13 August 1986, saying that Thailand would not authorise its territory to be used for the purposes of destabilisation was noted.

In a second part of the joint communiqué, the ministers expressed support for the initiatives on the Asia-Pacific region advanced by the Soviet leader, Mikhail Gorbachev, in a speech in Vladivostok on 28 July 1986. The ministers regarded the proposals as 'an initial comprehensive peace plan' for the whole region. They also proposed, in order to avoid divisiveness over the issue of Kampuchea at the forthcoming Non-Aligned Summit in Harare in September 1986, that Kampuchea's seat should be left vacant at the UN. It is currently occupied by the UN-recognised Coalition Government of Democratic Kampuchea (CGDK), which is opposed to the Vietnamese-backed Heng Samrin regime in Phnom Penh.⁵⁰

North-South Monitor

▲ Argentina-Brazil

Summit

Buenos Aires, 28-30 July 1986

Brazil-Uruguay

Summit

Brasilia, 14 August 1986

■ During a state visit by President José Sarney of Brazil to President Raúl Alfonsín of Argentina, the leaders signed a series of agreements designed to integrate the two largest economies in South America, and possibly form the nucleus of a future Latin American common market.

The General Agreement on Integration and Development, signed on 29 July 1986, contained twelve protocols specifying areas of future cooperation, and was to take effect from 1 January 1987. Its aim was to expand and balance trade between Argentina and Brazil, which had been declining for the past five years, and was in deficit for Argentina, through granting preferential treatment to each others' exports over goods from third countries. The area chosen to spearhead this move towards integration in production and trade was the capital goods sector, involving a range of industries. Also the subject of increased cooperation were trade in primary products (notably involving an exchange of Argentinian wheat and Brazilian iron ore) and other sectors such as energy and aeronautics. The twelve protocols provided for:

- 1) a customs union in bilateral trade in capital goods, with the removal of all trade barriers, and the levying of a common duty on products from third countries. A list of products to be covered was to be compiled with private sector help by the end of 1986. The protocol included a mechanism for ensuring balanced trade in listed products. The stated target was the increase of bilateral trade to $400m in 1987 and eventually to $750m in 1990.
- 2) Brazilian purchases of Argentinian wheat to increase to 1.4m tons in 1987, rising to 2m tons in 1991.
- 3) Promotion of food security by increased bilateral trade in food products, in an effort to overcome seasonal shortages.
- 4) The general promotion of bilateral trade, including the elimination of trade imbalances.
- 5) Legislation to aid the formation of binational companies.
- 6) Support from both countries' central banks in securing balanced trade.
- 7) An investment fund of $200m with equal contributions by both countries, to help expand production.
- 8) Cooperation in energy development to expand oil and gas production in Argentina, and possibly natural gas exports to Brazil, and in the generation of hydroelectricity.
- 9) Promotion of biotechnology.

North-South Monitor

- 10) Economic research centres for monitoring the integration project.
- 11) Cooperation in the event of nuclear accidents.
- 12) Cooperation in aircraft manufacture.⁵¹

Some opposition was expressed from Argentinian industrialists, who feared that Argentina's traditionally protected markets were not ready to grant access to Brazil's rapidly expanding exports. Argentinian labour organisations were also wary of possible pressure to compete with Brazil's considerably lower wages. The impetus for this renewed effort at Latin American integration, in the wake of a series of failed attempts,⁵² seemed, however, to stem from the two countries' common problems, amongst which their joint external debt of $150bn and increasing Western protectionism featured prominently. It was hoped that these cautious moves by two new democracies and traditional rivals for regional leadership, would, in the manner of French and West German integration in Europe, bring about the eventual creation of a common market, which could then fight the region's common problems on a status equivalent to that of the economic power blocs of the USA and the EEC.

The arrangement was declared open to all democratic states, with overtures being considered to Colombia, Mexico and Venezuela, to the exclusion of the military regimes of Chile and Paraguay. President Julio Sanguinetti of Uruguay, present at the summit in Buenos Aires, indicated his willingness to join the programme within ninety days. He subsequently signed six accords with President Sarney while on a visit to Brazil in August 1986. Covering cooperation in science, technology and agriculture, the agreements formed a continuing part of the effort towards regional integration.⁵³

● 'One of the indispensable conditions for Latin American integration is the existence of democratic regimes.' President Raúl Alfonsín of Argentina.

'The modern world is made up of economies operating in conjunction—Latin America is the only exception.' President José Sarney of Brazil. South (London) October 1986.

'What we are creating this week is the embryo of a common market in South America. . . . The plan is audacious in its conception and will be cautious in its implementation. But the formation of a common market in South America is now not only a need. It is a necessity to give our nations a greater capacity to negotiate on equal terms with the economic power blocs which have developed in North America and Europe.' Jorge Romero, Argentina's Vice-Minister of International Economic Relations, and one of the principal negotiators of the agreements. Financial Times (London) 29 July 1986.

'We have moved from words to action. Latin America is walking along a path towards integration that has superseded mere rhetoric.' President Julio Sanguinetti of Uruguay. The Times (London) 15 August 1986.

▲ Organisation of African Unity (OAU)

Liberation Committee: Forty-Sixth Ministerial Session
Arusha, Tanzania, 14–16 July 1986

■ In a final communiqué, the OAU's Liberation Committee called on Commonwealth members to boycott the thirteenth Commonwealth Games in

North-South Monitor

Edinburgh in September 1986, in protest against Britain's refusal to impose economic sanctions against South Africa. The communiqué condemned Britain for ignoring the proposals of the Commonwealth Eminent Persons Group (CEPG) (see above) and, along with the US, France, West Germany and Israel, for continuing to cooperate with South Africa in the fields of economic affairs and nuclear weapons.

The committee also passed a resolution creating a special commission of military advisers to consider the needs of the Southern African liberation movements. It agreed on the need to encourage OAU member states to provide moral and material support to these movements.⁵⁴

▲ Organisation of African Unity (OAU)

Forty-Fourth Ministerial Council Meeting and Twenty-Second Annual Summit
Addis Ababa, 21-5 July and 28-30 July 1986

■ High-level representatives including twenty-two heads of state or government from the OAU's fifty member countries met for their annual summit. Zaire was prevailed upon by the outgoing OAU Chairman, President Abdou Diouf of Senegal, to resume its seat after an absence of two years. It had been boycotting the organisation, along with Morocco, in protest against the admission to the OAU of the Saharawi Arab Democratic Republic (SADR). It was insisted, however, that Zaire's renewed participation in the organisation did not signal a change in its policy regarding SADR.⁵⁵ The leaders considered a number of resolutions proposed by the preceding Council of Ministers, though the dominant issues of the summit were Southern Africa and the continent's $180bn external debt.

An unusual note was sounded at the meeting by President Yoweri Museveni, whose National Resistance Army had defeated Uganda's military government on 25 January 1986. In his first speech to the OAU, Africa's newest leader attacked the organisation's member countries for remaining silent over a period of twenty years while the successive governments of Idi Amin and Milton Obote killed vast numbers of Uganda's citizens. Insisting that 'tyranny is colour blind' and 'should be no less reprehensible when perpetrated by one of our kind', he said that Africa's failure to condemn such violations of human rights undermined its moral authority to criticise other abuses, particularly those of the South African government. Rejecting the habitual defence of dictators that the OAU and UN Charters forbid interference in the internal affairs of member states, he denied that such an argument could be used 'as a cloak to shield genocide from just censure'. President Museveni went on to reaffirm that it was the OAU's sacred duty to assist the people of South Africa, advocating armed struggle against Pretoria if it failed to dismantle apartheid. It was manifest that Museveni was issuing a plea for legitimate self-criticism within the OAU, to break the customary conspiracy of silence on violations of human rights, rather than offering a pretext for the apologists of the Pretoria regime to disregard the criticisms of Africa's leaders.

In his opening speech to the summit, Colonel Mengistu Haile Mariam of Ethiopia attacked the US and some Western European states which he said had entered into an unholy alliance with Pretoria by failing to impose sanctions. Among the resolutions on South Africa passed by the summit was that proposed by President Abdou Diouf, creating a committee of heads of state to follow events in South Africa. The committee, headed by the new OAU Chairman, President Denis Sassou Nguesso of Congo, was composed of the leaders of the six Frontline States (FLS) plus Nigeria, Senegal, Algeria, Ethiopia, Cape Verde and the Southern African liberation movements. The leaders adopted the resolutions formulated by their foreign ministers, condemning the five Western states, Britain, France, Israel, West Germany and the USA for their continued connections with South Africa. They singled out for criticism Britain's 'relentless campaign against the imposition of comprehensive and mandatory sanctions' against Pretoria, and the US policy of constructive engagement. A resolution proposed by Nigeria, spearheading the more militant OAU advocates of sanctions, condemned the recent speech by US President Reagan in which he reiterated his opposition to sanctions.

North-South Monitor

The leaders went on to advocate voluntary reprisals against Britain as a means of persuading the government to impose sanctions. The specific measures suggested included a sports boycott, economic measures and the severing of diplomatic relations. African countries were urged to increase their support for Southern African liberation movements and to withdraw from South Africa the use of their facilities for ships and aircraft. A proposal made by Zimbabwe's Prime Minister, Robert Mugabe, following the South African raids on neighbouring Botswana, Zambia and Zimbabwe in May 1986 was not taken up. Robert Mugabe had suggested the creation of a pan-African rapid deployment force to oppose South Africa and to help to defend the FLS. On Angola, the OAU approved a resolution saying that USA support for South African-backed rebels in Angola constituted an 'act of undeclared war'. In particular, the provision of Stinger missiles to UNITA was considered a hostile act, and an affront to the OAU. Such assistance was said to constitute a serious violation of the UN Charter and the regime on international aggression.

Following a speech on the economic situation in Africa by President Diouf, the leaders adopted a resolution calling for an international conference on debt. The OAU Secretary-General and the Executive Secretary of the UN Economic Commission for Africa (ECA) were mandated to compile reports on the debt crisis in preparation for such a conference. This call had however, previously met with the habitual opposition of Africa's creditor countries, which, as President Diouf observed, insisted on dealing with debtor countries on a case-by-case basis. The UN General Assembly Special Session on Africa in May 1986⁵⁶ was discussed, President Diouf recommending that contacts with Western governments be continued, in order to overcome their evident reticence in making specific commitments.

In his speech, the newly-elected OAU Chairman, President Sassou Nguesso, focused attention on solving regional conflicts within Africa, such as those in Chad and Western Sahara, as well as the guerrilla wars in Angola and Mozambique. He urged the creation of a 'Council of Wise Men', composed of former African heads of state, whose national and international reputations were untarnished. The OAU mediation, conciliation and arbitration commission would aid the council in reconciling Africa's conflicting parties.

The OAU Secretary-General was also mandated to study the possibility of holding a third Afro-Arab summit, the last one having been held in 1977 in Kampala. Other resolutions condemned the US raids on Libya in April 1986, with reservations by the Ivory Coast, Cameroon, Central African Republic, Egypt and Zaïre; appealed to France to return the island of Mayotte to the Comoros; called for the renewal of the mandate of Ahmadu Mahtar M'Bow as Director-General of UNESCO; and adopted an African anthem to be played at all future OAU summits.⁵⁷

North-South Monitor

● 'Over a period of twenty years nearly three quarters of a million Ugandans perished at the hands of governments that should have protected them. Ugandans feel a deep sense of betrayal that most of Africa kept silent while tyrants killed them.' President Yoweri Museveni of Uganda, in his maiden speech to the summit. The Times (London) 30 July 1986.

The alignment of the US and some Western European countries with Pretoria 'clearly demonstrates that their sole interest lies in promoting their economic interests at the expense of human rights'. Colonel Mengistu Haile Mariam of Ethiopia, in his opening speech. The Guardian (London) 29 July 1986.

Though Africa was always ready to honour its international commitments, 'the fact remained that our fragile economies are on the point of collapse under the heavy weight of foreign debt, so much so that all the efforts and sacrifices agreed will not achieve anything if the debt is not rescheduled'. President Abdou Diouf of Senegal, outgoing Chairman of the OAU. West Africa (London) 4 August 1986.

▲ Southern African Frontline States (FLS)

Summit

Harare, 18 July 1986

■ Leaders from the six FLS met to decide whether or not to join the boycott, led by Nigeria, of the thirteenth Commonwealth Games in Edinburgh, in protest at Britain's opposition to the application of Commonwealth sanctions against South Africa. Of the six states, Botswana, Tanzania, Zambia and Zimbabwe are Commonwealth members, while Angola and Mozambique, as former Portuguese colonies, are not.

No unanimous decision was taken, but according to a final communiqué, Zambia and Zimbabwe joined Tanzania (which had already decided in favour of a boycott) in withdrawing from the Games. They did, however, express their willingness to reconsider the decision, provided that the British Prime Minister, Margaret Thatcher, made 'a categorical statement before the start of the Games to the effect that the British Government would impose economic sanctions against South Africa'. The British government's refusal to do so, it said, constituted support for the racist Pretoria regime. Mandatory comprehensive economic sanctions, the communiqué continued, remained the only peaceful means left available of exerting pressure on Pretoria to dismantle apartheid. Botswana, meanwhile, remained undecided on the boycott. Subsequent to the meeting, it announced its intention to remain in the Games, while reaffirming its solidarity with the FLS.

The communiqué also expressed disappointment with the position of the EEC on South Africa, though without explicitly condemning the mission of the British Foreign Minister, Sir Geoffrey Howe, to South Africa, in the wake of the failed Commonwealth Eminent Persons Group (CEPG).⁵⁸

● 'The ball is in her court. We have not decided to boycott the Games. All of us are ready and willing to move.' President Kenneth Kaunda of Zambia, declining to answer specific questions as to the conditions of the FLS for participating in the Games, but suggesting instead that they would wait to hear the response of the British Prime Minister. Financial Times (London) 19 July 1986.

North-South Monitor

▲ FLS Summit

Luanda, 21 August 1986

Southern African Development Coordination Conference (SADCC)

Sixth Annual Summit

Luanda, 22 August 1986

■ Leaders of the six FLS (Angola, Botswana, Mozambique, Tanzania, Zambia and Zimbabwe) attended an impromptu meeting which coincided with SADCC's annual summit. The FLA leaders were invited by their Chairman, President Kenneth Kaunda of Zambia, to coordinate their positions on the implementation of sanctions against South Africa, following the Commonwealth 'mini-summit' in London at which six of the seven leaders present had agreed on a joint course of economic measures. (See above.)

While President Kaunda had apparently hoped to secure a joint decision on cutting air links with South Africa, the FLS were unable to agree on specific measures. A final communiqué merely hailed Zambia and Zimbabwe for their part in the London summit, commending the measures adopted there to all countries. It was understood that the reticence on sanctions of Botswana and to some extent Mozambique, both heavily dependent economically on South Africa, had necessitated this compromise communiqué, despite the relatively forthcoming approach of Zambia and Zimbabwe.

Differences in the economic vulnerability of South Africa's neighbours were even more apparent at the SADCC summit, where the six FLS were joined by the remaining three SADCC member countries, Lesotho and Swaziland, whose geographical dependence on South Africa is self-evident, and Malawi, which maintains formal diplomatic ties with Pretoria and whose President Banda declined to attend the summit. The Kenyan President, Daniel arap Moi was also absent from the meeting, despite his having been offered an invitation, in the hope of discussing Kenya's substantial air links with South Africa.

Despite the reservations of several SADCC countries on the application of sanctions against South Africa, the SADCC communiqué said that 'vulnerability to South Africa's economy should not be used as an excuse . . . for not imposing sanctions'. The leaders also agreed that SADCC countries 'will do nothing to undermine the effectiveness of sanctions imposed on South Africa by the international community'. This assurance constituted a significant commitment not to assist Pretoria in possible 'sanctions-busting' efforts. The communiqué called on the international community to aid SADCC's attempts to further its economic independence from South Africa, and emphasised the need to increase agricultural production, encourage regional trade and improve transport. The leaders also condemned Pretoria for continued acts of aggression and destabilisation against SADCC members, in particular the attacks on Gaborone, Lusaka, Harare and Namibia in 1986 and the retaliatory economic measures against Zambia and Zimbabwe which immediately followed the London Commonwealth meeting.

North-South Monitor

It was decided that SADCC's forthcoming annual consultative conference in Gaborone in February 1987 would focus on investments for the production sector, within the Lusaka Programme of Action. SADCC's next annual summit was scheduled for August 1987, in Lusaka.

Soon after the meetings President Kaunda announced, during a visit to Lusaka by the Revd Jesse Jackson, the US civil rights activist, that the FLS had reached a further decision during their summit. They were preparing to invite US President Reagan to a summit in Southern Africa, or alternatively to visit Washington themselves.⁵⁹ The invitation was apparently being drafted for approval at the summit of the Non-Aligned Movement (NAM) in Harare in September 1986.⁶⁰

● 'If we fail, South Africa will make us bleed. If we succeed, our freedom and pride will be assured.' President Kenneth Kaunda of Zambia, speaking of SADCC's imperative need for economic independence from South Africa. The Guardian (London) 23 August 1986.

'The Pretoria government is casting about its eyes and aiming its guns around the region, looking for scapegoats for its internal problems and taking measures which will involve the rest of the region in conflict.' President Quett Masire of Botswana, Chairman of SADCC, warning of the prospect of further South African destabilisation. The Guardian (London) 23 August 1986.

▲ Malawi-Mozambique-Zambia-Zimbabwe Summit

Blantyre, Malawi, 11 September 1986

■ In an unprecedented summit, President Kamuzu Banda of Malawi held talks with three representatives of the six Southern African Frontline States (FLS). President Samora Machel of Mozambique, President Kenneth Kaunda of Zambia and Prime Minister Robert Mugabe of Zimbabwe. The meeting followed the decision at an FLS summit in Luanda in August 1986 (see above) to take measures to strengthen regional cooperation in preparation for increasing pressure on the South African government.

The FLS leaders apparently criticised President Banda for maintaining links with Pretoria, failing to bring Malawi's trade to Mozambique's ports and railways, assisting Mozambique's South African-backed rebel movement (the MNR) and generally contributing to the destabilisation of the region. Malawi is the only member country of the Organisation of African Unity (OAU) to maintain full diplomatic relations with Pretoria, and though a member of the Southern African Development Coordination Conference (SADCC), persists in using South Africa's ports in preference to Mozambique's, which are clearly closer. President Banda in turn denied aiding the MNR, despite evidence that South Africa's logistical support was being provided to the rebels through bases in Malawi. He also explained, ironically in the view of his accusers, that Malawi no longer used the rail links to Mozambique's ports of Beira and Nacala on account of their constant disruption by MNR activity.

President Machel, who was accompanied to the meeting by his defence and security ministers, replied by threatening to close the Mozambique-Malawi border and station missiles along it, unless Malawi ceased its destabilisation of the FLS. Such a move would severely disrupt Malawi's economy, in that much of the country's trade travels through Mozambique in transit to Zimbabwe and South Africa. The FLS leaders suggested that Malawi's other neighbours, Zambia and Tanzania, would also be prepared to close their borders if the need arose.

North-South Monitor

It was agreed that Malawi and Mozambique would hold a further ministerial meeting to discuss the problem of the MNR.⁶¹

● When ports belonged to the whites, Malawi liked it. When the ports of Beira, Maputo and Nacala belonged to the Portuguese colonialists, Malawi did its best so that the whole world would send the goods through those ports . . . This is an inferiority complex toward the Europeans . . . When we proclaimed the People's Republic of Mozambique, the ports of Beira and Nacala, which were totally geared to serve Malawi were no longer to Malawi's taste because they were in black hands.' President Samora Machel of Mozambique, at a press conference following his return to Maputo. BBC Summary of World Broadcasts ME/8364/B/1-2, 15 September 1986.

▲ Non-Aligned Movement (NAM)

Foreign Ministers' Meeting and Eighth Summit
Harare, 28-9 August and 1-7 September 1986

■ The NAM's triennial summit in Harare marked the movement's twenty-fifth anniversary since its inception in 1961. It was attended by representatives from 94 of NAM's 101 members (99 states together with the PLO and SWAPO), and of these representatives, fifty were heads of state or government. The summit, held in one of the six Southern African Frontline States (FLS) in order to focus the world's attention on the crisis in the region, produced the nine-page Harare Special Declaration on South Africa. In addition, it issued an appeal on disarmament to the superpower leaders, as well as separate economic and political declarations.⁶²

Prime Minister Robert Mugabe of Zimbabwe, assuming the NAM chairmanship for the next three years from Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi of India, gave the summit's opening speech. In it, he struck an unexpected note in calling for the application by NAM members of voluntary, selective economic measures against South Africa as a pragmatic interim step towards mandatory international sanctions. The Harare meeting followed earlier summits of the FLS and the Southern African Development Coordination Conference (SADCC) in Luanda, where the evident vulnerability of South Africa's neighbouring states to retaliation by Pretoria had precluded agreement on the adoption of specific sanctions. (See above.) Both Robert Mugabe and President Kenneth Kaunda of Zambia had firmly advocated the full application of sanctions against South Africa at the recent Commonwealth 'mini-summit' in London (see above), but in Harare, President Kaunda acknowledged the relative futility of sanctions in the absence of support from South Africa's major trading partners.

The NAM summit's resolutions on South Africa:

North-South Monitor

- advocated that the UN Security Council (SC) prescribe comprehensive sanctions under the UN Charter's chapter VII, which would be mandatory on all members;
- urged NAM members to apply voluntary selective measures from a list of thirteen points contained in the Harare special declaration. The list embraced the sanctions advocated at the Commonwealth mini-summit and in the US Congress, as well as the cutting of shipping links with South Africa.
- proposed to send a group of eight foreign ministers (from Algeria, Argentina, Congo, India, Nigeria, Peru, Yugoslavia and Zimbabwe) to Britain, Japan, West Germany and the USA, South Africa's major trading partners, in an effort to persuade them to back comprehensive sanctions, and suspend the habitual vetoes of Britain and the USA in the UNSC.
- created a Solidarity Fund to provide assistance to the FLS. Fund-raising was to be on a regional basis, with Saudi Arabia and Iran concentrating on the Middle East effort, Cuba and Argentina on Latin America, Bhutan on Asia and Yugoslavia on Europe. A committee led by Rajiv Gandhi and President Kaunda produced a document detailing the future activities of the fund, chiefly concerned with strengthening the region's infrastructure and making it fully independent of South Africa. These activities were to be supervised by the same group of countries which was leading the diplomatic initiative to the Western states.
- urged an increase in international aid to Southern African liberation movements, including the groups banned in South Africa itself.

While Southern Africa was a key issue in President Mugabe's speech, he gave precedence to the general issues of disarmament and development.⁶³ In a special Harare Appeal to US President Reagan and the Soviet leader, Mikhail Gorbachev, the summit leaders urged a reduction in international tension, with a moratorium on the testing, production and deployment of nuclear weapons. In their economic declaration, they went on to suggest means of easing the crippling debt burden of developing countries, including limiting service repayments to a given percentage of export earnings, as Peru had done. The problems of Africa were given special mention in the context of external debt, and traditional Third World concerns were repeated, over falling commodity prices, increasing protectionism, and generally deteriorating terms of trade.

A specific outcome of the summit's deliberations on economic matters was the decision to create an Independent Commission of the South on Development Issues. The 'South Commission', it was announced by Prime Minister Mahathir Mohamad of Malaysia, was to be headed by Dr Julius Nyerere. While President of Tanzania, Dr Nyerere had first suggested the establishment of such a commission to promote cooperation among developing countries at a conference in 1978 sponsored by the Third World Foundation.⁶⁴ It was hoped that the efforts of the independent commission, whose members would serve in their personal capacities, would be complementary to the work both of NAM and the Group of 77 (G77).

In their political declaration, the leaders urged the two antagonists in the Gulf War, Iran and Iraq, both NAM members, to 'summon the political will' to end the conflict. During the summit, however, President Ali Khamenei of Iran had called for the expulsion of Iraq from NAM, and for the execution of the country's leaders. Colonel Gadhafi of Libya spoke out during the summit against NAM members which had recognised Israel or were aligned with the USA. He called for the abolition of

North-South Monitor

NAM in the sense that he advocated a positive alignment with 'liberation' against the opposing camp of 'imperialism'. It was observed that the Harare declaration contained a total of fifty-four separate attacks on aspects of US foreign policy, particularly in Southern Africa, Central America, the Middle East and the Mediterranean, where its raids on Libya in April 1986 were condemned as 'acts of state terrorism', and Britain was criticised along with the US. Conversely, it was observed, references were made to withdrawing foreign troops from Afghanistan and Kampuchea without explicit mention of the occupying powers, the Soviet Union and Vietnam. Despite consequent accusations that the movement was more aligned with the East against the West, than genuinely non-aligned, a bid by Nicaragua to host the next NAM summit in 1989 and hence assume the Chairmanship after Zimbabwe, failed. Apparent support for the chairmanship of President Daniel Saavedra Ortega by Angola, Mozambique, Cuba and North Korea failed to outweigh opposition from members including Kenya, Cameroon and many countries of Latin America. It was merely agreed that the NAM ministerial meeting which customarily precedes the summit would be held in Cyprus in 1988, while the issue of the chairmanship was left undecided.⁶⁵

● Without the major trading partners of South Africa participating, there are no sanctions at all . . . If Zimbabwe tomorrow applied sanctions on their own . . . it would be suicide on our part, it would be meaningless.' President Kenneth Kaunda of Zambia, speaking at a press conference on the need for Western support for sanctions. Financial Times (London) 6 September 1986.

'The debt crisis, in particular the debt service burden it imposes on economies of the debtor countries concerned, has reached grotesque proportions . . . To allow the monster to deal with us on a case-by-case basis is a recipe for disaster.' Prime Minister Robert Mugabe of Zimbabwe, incoming chairman of NAM, in his opening speech. Financial Times (London) 2 September 1986.

'Non-alignment has become a word that should not be used. We are all aligned against the imperialist camp. There is no meaning to the word neutrality. We are all against the United States, Zionism and racism . . . The movement has reached a different stage from the great tradition of Tito and Nasser—the dream of neutrality is over.' Colonel Muammar Gadhafi of Libya, in his speech to the meeting. The Guardian (London) 5 September 1986.

'There has been an invasion of Grenada, Libya, support for the Contras in Nicaragua and El Salvador. The Soviet Union is in Afghanistan, yes, but how do you balance that?' Robert Mugabe, denying that the summit had been unbalanced in its criticism of the US rather than the Soviet Union. The Times (London) 8 September 1986.

North-South Monitor

NOTES

In these notes the following abbreviations are used for newspapers and periodicals: Econ = The Economist (London); FT = Financial Times (London); FEER = Far Eastern Economic Review (Hong Kong); Gma = Granma (Havana); G = The Guardian (London); IHT = International Herald Tribune (Paris); MEED = Middle East Economic Digest (London); MEER = Middle East Economic Review (Washington, DC); MEES = Middle East Economic Survey (Nicosia); Obs = The Observer (London); S = South (London); SN = Soviet News (London); SW = Soviet Weekly (London); ST = Sunday Times (London); SWB = Summary of World Broadcasts (London); T = The Times (London); TWQ = Third World Quarterly (London); UNPR = UN Press Release; USIS = US Information Service; WA = West Africa (London); XNA = Xinhua News Agency.

- ¹ For the UN General Assembly Special Session on Africa, see TWQ 8(4) October 1986 pp 1372-4.
- ² UNPR FC/192 17 June 1986, FC/193 19 June 1986.
- ³ On the UN General Assembly Special Session on Africa, see TWQ 8(4) October 1986, pp 1372-4.
- ⁴ FT 3, 9 September 1986; IHT 3 September 1986; T 12 September 1986; Obs 31 August 1986, WA 8 August 1986, p 1889; S October 1986, p 16; UNPR FAO/3398 29 August 1986, FAO/3399 2 September 1986, FAO/3400 16 September 1986. On the current plague of locusts and grasshoppers, see IHT 8 August 1986; T 28 August 1986; ST 24 August 1986; Obs 24 August 1986.
- ⁵ G 7, 10, 12 July 1986; IHT 8 July 1986; T 27 August 1986; UNPR WS/86/21 17 July 1986.
- ⁶ UNPR GA/7320 17 September 1986, GA/7318 17 September 1986, GA/7324 19 September 1986, GA/7327 20 September 1986.
- ⁷ For the ico's last attempt to settle the issue of quotas, see TWQ 8(4) October 1986, pp 1376-7.
- ⁸ G 30 June 1986 and 14 July 1986; IHT 7 July 1986; T 7 July 1986.
- ⁹ On the UN Cocoa Conference, Part 4, see TWQ, 8(3) July 1986, pp 1037-8.
- ¹⁰ FT 5, 8, 9, 10, 11, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 28 July 1986; G 7, 21 July 1986, 1, 9, 22 September 1986; T 8 July 1986; IHT 28 July 1986; WA 21 July 1986, p 1533; S August 1986, p 13; UNCTAD Bulletin (Geneva) July/August 1986; UNPR TAD/INF/1804 7 July 1986, TAD/INF/1805 11 July 1986, TAD/INF/1807 16 July 1986, TAD/1430 29 July 1986.
- ¹¹ FT 10, 30 July 1986; UNCTAD Bulletin (Geneva) July/August 1986; UNPR TAD/1431 29 July 1986; WA 4 August 1986, p 1640.
- ¹² On the mechanics of the world wheat market, see feature in FT 8 August 1986.
- ¹³ FT 23, 26, 29 July 1986, 8, 26 August 1986; G 6 July 1986; IHT 25 August 1986.
- ¹⁴ For the first summit of the Five Continent Peace Initiative, see TWQ 7(3) July 1985, pp 699-70.
- ¹⁵ The Soviet unilateral moratorium on nuclear tests was subsequently extended on 18 August 1986 until 1 January 1987. G 19 August 1986; FT 19 August 1986; T 19 August 1986; IHT 19 August 1986.
- ¹⁶ The final document is in Armament and Disarmament Information Unit (ADIU) Report (Sussex) September-October 1986 and SWB ME/8335/D/1-2, 12 August 1986.
- ¹⁷ FT 6, 8 August 1986; G 8 August 1986; T 8 August 1986; SWB ME/8329/iii 5 August 1986, ME/8332/iii 8 August 1986; ME/8335/D/3 12 August 1986.
- ¹⁸ For previous rounds of MFA negotiations, see TWQ 8(1) January 1986, pp 299-300, 8(2) April 1986, pp 717-8, 8(4) October 1986, pp 1396-7.
- ¹⁹ The presidential veto of the Jenkins Bill was in fact sustained by the lack of eight votes in the House of Representatives on 6 August 1986. FT 8 August 1986; IHT 8 August 1986.
- ²⁰ For example the US had concluded bilateral agreements with Hong Kong and Taiwan (a non-MFA party) and subsequently did so with South Korea on 4 August 1986. See FT 1 July 1986, IHT 6 August 1986.
- ²¹ GATT Focus (Geneva) July-August-September 1986; FT 10, 23, 29, 30, 31 July 1986, 1, 2, 4, 5, 6 August 1986; G 19, 21 July 1986, 1, 2 August 1986; IHT 21 July 1986, 2-3 August 1986; T 28 July 1986, 1, 2 August 1986; Econ 26 July 1986; WA 11 August 1986, pp 1691-2.

North-South Monitor

- ²² For the Nassau CHOOM see TWQ 8(2) April 1986, pp 711–15. The EFG members are listed at footnote 96, p 741.
- ²³ The leaders present at the London summit were Prime Minister (PM) Bob Hawke of Australia, PM Lynden Pindling of the Bahamas, PM Margaret Thatcher of Britain, PM Brian Mulroney of Canada, PM Rajiv Gandhi of India, President Kenneth Kaunda of Zambia and PM Robert Mugabe of Zimbabwe.
- ²⁴ The summit communiqué is in T 6 August 1986. Excerpts are in G 5 August 1986 and WA 11 August 1986.
- ²⁵ Sir Geoffrey Howe's mission, similar to that of the CEPG, was determined at the EEC summit at The Hague in June 1986. He was due to report back to the EEC foreign ministers on 15–16 September 1986.
- ²⁶ Commonwealth Currents (London) August 1986; FT 2, 4, 5, 6 August 1986; G 2, 4, 5, 6 August 1986; T 2, 4, 5, 6 August; ST 3 August 1986; Obs 3 August 1986; IHT 6 August 1986; S September 1986; WA 4 August 1986, pp 1612–13 and 11 August 1986, pp 1600–2.
- ²⁷ Prime Minister Bob Hawke of Australia cancelled his attendance at the summit at the end of July 1986, because of the climate of economic crisis in Australia. T 29 July 1986; FT 30 July 1986.
- ²⁸ For the South Pacific Forum Summit at Rarotonga in August 1985, see TWQ 8(1) January 1986, pp 292–3.
- ²⁹ T 7, 9, 12, 13 August 1986; FT 9, 12 August 1986; IHT 9–10, 13 August 1986; G 12 August 1986; SWB FE/8333/A3/1–2 9 August 1986, FE/8334/A3/6 11 August 1986, FE/8335/A3/6–7 12 August 1986.
- ³⁰ FT 10 July 1986, 28 August 1986; IHT 26, 27, 28 August 1986; G 28 August 1986; T 28 August 1986; Le Monde (Paris) 27, 29 August 1986.
- ³¹ Excerpts of the Punta del Este Ministerial Declaration are in FT 22 September 1986.
- ³² At the Sintra 'quadrilateral talks', the parties reached agreement in principle to the inclusion of agriculture and services in the new GATT round, but failed to reach a consensus on how to approach them.
- ³³ The ten developing countries opposing services and other of the US demands were Argentina, Brazil, Cuba, Egypt, India, Nicaragua, Nigeria, Peru, Tanzania and Yugoslavia.
- ³⁴ These countries included Bangladesh, Sri Lanka, Pakistan, Hong Kong, South Korea, Jamaica, Uruguay, Chile, Mexico, Turkey, the Ivory Coast, Zaire and the South-East Asian countries as well as Colombia.
- ³⁵ FT 6, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 22, 23 September 1986; IHT 8, 9, 15, 16, 19, 20–21, 22 September 1986; G 9, 10, 11, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 22 September 1986; T 11, 15, 17, 18, 20, 22 September 1986; Econ 13, 27 September 1986; ST 14 September 1986; FEER 2 October 1986, pp 100–1.
- ³⁶ For OPEC's Brioni meeting in June 1986, see TWQ 8(4) October 1986, pp 1403–5.
- ³⁷ The oil ministers of Saudi Arabia and Kuwait had met the UAE leader, Sheikh Zaid, in Abu Dhabi on 20 July 1986, apparently in an attempt to soften the UAE's hard line on its quota demands. FT 21 July 1986.
- ³⁸ On Dr Subroto's proposals, see MEES 4 August 1986, p A2.
- ³⁹ On the Algerian proposal, see MEES 4 August 1986, p A4.
- ⁴⁰ The OPEC communiqué is reproduced in MEES 11 August 1986, p A7.
- ⁴¹ On OPEC's December 1985 meeting, see TWQ 8(2) April 1986, pp 730–1.
- ⁴² MEES 28 July 1986, pp A1–4, 4 August 1986, pp A1–4 and 11 August 1986, pp A1–7; FT 28, 29, 30, 31 July 1986, 1, 2, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8 August 1986; G 28, 29, 30, 31 July 1986, 1, 2, 4, 5, 6 August 1986; IHT 28, 29, 30, 31 July 1986, 1, 2–3, 4, 5, 7 August 1986; T 28 July 1986, 4, 5, 6 August 1986; Obs 3 August 1986; WA 11 August 1986 p 1667; Econ 9 August 1986.
- ⁴³ The gcc communiqué is in MEES 1 September 1986, p A3.
- ⁴⁴ G 27, 29 August 1986; T 27, 28 August 1986; MEES 1 September 1986, pp A2–3; MEED 30 August 1986 p 4; SWB ME/8350/A8–9 29 August 1986.
- ⁴⁵ On SAARC's first summit in December 1985, see TWQ 8(2) April 1986, pp 724–7.
- ⁴⁶ T 13 August 1986; SWB FE/8337/A3/2–3 14 August 1986 and FE/8338/A3/4 15 August 1986.
- ⁴⁷ On the South Pacific Forum's Treaty of Rarotonga, see TWQ 8(1) January 1986, pp 292–3.
- ⁴⁸ FT 25, 27 June 1986; T 24, 27 June 1986; IHT 24, 25, 26, 30 June 1986; FEER 10 July 1986, p 15; SWB FE/8294/A3/1–2 25 June 1986, FE/8295/A3/2–3 26 June 1986.

North-South Monitor

- ⁴⁹ On the eleventh and twelfth Indochinese foreign ministers' conferences in Phnom Penh and Vientiane, see TWQ 8(1) January 1986, pp 322-3 and 8(3) July 1986, pp 1600-1.
- ⁵⁰ SWB FE/8341/1 19 August 1986, FE/8342/i and FE/8342/A3/1-5 20 August 1986.
- ⁵¹ For the details of the protocols, see SWB ME/8325/D/1-3 31 July 1986.
- ⁵² For a catalogue of Latin America's endeavours in the realm of regional integration, see S October 1986, pp 97-8.
- ⁵³ FT 23, 29, 31 July 1986, 1 August 1986; T 14, 28, 31 July 1986, 15 August 1986; G 29, 31 July 1986; IHT 30, 31 July 1986; Econ 2 August 1986; S October 1986.
- ⁵⁴ SWB ME/8312/ii 16 July 1986, ME/8313/ii 17 July 1986, ME/8314/ii and ME/8314/B/6-7 18 July 1986, ME/8315/ii 19 July 1986; WA 21 July 1986, p 1547.
- ⁵⁵ See remarks made by Zaire's head of diplomacy, Mandungu Bula Nyati, reported in WA 4 August 1986, pp 1651-2.
- ⁵⁶ See TWQ 8(4) October 1986, pp 1372-4.
- ⁵⁷ FT 28, 31 July 1986; G 24, 29, 30, 31 July 1986; IHT 29, 30, 31 July 1986; IHT 20, 30, 31 July 1986; T 28, 29, 30 July 1986; ST 20 July 1986; WA 4 August 1986, pp 1616-18 and 18 August 1986, pp 1721-2; SWB ME/8320/B/1, 25 July 1986, ME/8322/B1, 21 July 1986, ME/8323/B/7-8, 29 July 1986, ME/8324/B/1-4 30 July 1986, ME/8325/B/1-9 31 July 1986, ME/8326/B/1-6 1 August 1986.
- ⁵⁸ FT 18, 19 July 1986; T 18 July 1986; G 19 July 1986; SWB ME/8316/ii and ME/8316/B/1 21 July 1986, ME/8320/ii 25 July 1986.
- ⁵⁹ IHT 25 August 1986; T 25 August 1986.
- ⁶⁰ FT 21, 22, 23 August 1986; G 22, 23 August 1986; T 22, 25 August 1986; IHT 23-24 August 1986; ST 24 August 1986; Econ 30 August 1986; WA 1 September 1986, p 1849; SWB ME/8345/ii 23 August 1986, ME/8346/B/1-6 25 August, ME/8347/B/4-6 26 August 1986.
- ⁶¹ FT 12 September 1986, T 12 September 1986; G 12 September 1986; SWB ME/8363/ii and ME/8363/4-5 13 September 1986, ME/8364/ii and ME/8364/B/1-2 15 September 1986; WA 22 September 1986, pp 2000-1.
- ⁶² For details of these documents, see SWB ME/8362/E/1-12, 12 September 1986.
- ⁶³ Robert Mugabe's keynote address is in SWB ME/8354/E/1-6, 3 September 1986.
- ⁶⁴ On the genesis of the idea of a South Commission, see S October 1986, p 38 and S (Press Release) September 1986.
- ⁶⁵ T 25, 26, 27, 29, 30 August 1986, 1, 2, 3, 6, 8 September 1986; G 29, 30 August 1986, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 8, 11 September 1986; FT 30 August 1986, 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 8 September 1986; IHT 1, 2, 3, 4, 8 September 1986; Obs 7 September 1986; WA 8 September 1986, p 1866 and 22 September 1986, p 1969; Econ 6, 13 September 1986; S August 1986 and October 1986; SWB ME/8351/E/1-9, 30 August 1986, ME/8353/E/1-6, 2 September 1986, ME/8354/E/1-6, 2 September 1986, ME/8354/E/1-5, 3 September 1986, ME/8355/E/1-9, 4 September 1986, ME/8356/1-20, 5 September 1986, ME/8357/E/1-21, 6 September 1986, ME/8358/E/1-10, 8 September 1986, ME/8360/E/1, 10 September 1986.

Third World Foundation News

Independent Commission of the South on Development Issues Launched

Aspirations for a South Commission designed to promote cooperation between developing nations finally became a reality at the Eighth Summit of the Non-Aligned Movement (NAM), held in Harare, Zimbabwe, in September 1986. After several years of preparation and deliberation, there is now an Independent Commission of the South on Development Issues to be headed by Dr Julius Nyerere, the former President of Tanzania.

The Commission was unveiled by Datuk Seri Dr Mahathir Mohamad, Prime Minister of Malaysia and Chairman of the Steering Group which carried out the groundwork for the establishment of the new body. The Steering Group was formed last May at 'South-South II: charting the way forward', a conference of scholars and statesmen in Kuala Lumpur organised by the Third World Foundation and Malaysia's Institute of Strategic and International Studies (see 'Third World Foundation News', Third World Quarterly, October 1986).

'The main purpose (of the Commission) is to try and work out solutions to major economic problems faced by the South', said Dr Mohamad. The Commission is expected to take two years to complete its work, and its members will consist of some twenty eminent persons of the Third World who will serve in their personal capacities rather than representing governments and organisations.

Dr Mohamad is keen to prevent the Commission's report from being just another academic exercise to remain on bookshelves to gather dust. According to Dr Mohamad, it would need a Chairman who would not 'write a report and go to sleep', he said. 'Dr Nyerere was not, repeat not, that type of man.'

The choice of Dr Nyerere is particularly appropriate because it was he who first suggested setting up the Commission in December 1978 at a South-South conference sponsored by the Third World Foundation in Arusha, Tanzania. 'The Commission would examine the many different ideas which have been discussed over the years, the current and probable future organisational needs, and the priorities of intra-Third World action which are appropriate to dealing with the problem of world poverty', he commented at that time. The Third World Foundation helped develop the idea at the two South-South summits in Beijing (1983) and Kuala Lumpur (1986), and at regional conferences in Cartagena (1984) and Harare (1985).

Dr Nyerere, who was President of Tanzania from 1964 to 1985 and is founder-chairman of the country's ruling party, Chama Cha Mapinduzi, intends keeping Third World governments informed of the Commission's progress from the start. Recommendations will be made to governments in the South, and Dr Nyerere will campaign vigorously for implementation of his group's proposals. The members of the Commission were expected to be announced by the end of 1986, together with the formation of a small secretariat. An initial task is to find private organisations and international institutions in the South and North with which to coordinate a joint effort. The Commission will support the work of the NAM and Group of Seventy-Seven, but it will not be accountable to either body.

Given the probable difficulty of convincing governments to implement the Commission's recommendations, Dr Nyerere's diplomatic skills and powers of persuasion will be crucial. He was Chairman of the Organisation of African Unity in 1984 and is a widely respected politician in the South. Shridath Ramphal, the Commonwealth Secretary-General, presented the 1981 Third World Prize to Dr Nyerere and said of him: 'His people have honoured him with the simple soubriquet Mwalimu—the Swahili for teacher. A teacher he has been in the highest sense, a source of enlightenment, a fount of wisdom, an exemplar, not only to his fellow citizens but to all in the Third World of the poor and the dispossessed.' If Dr Nyerere displays such qualities in his role with the South Commission, real progress could be made towards greater cooperation between developing countries.

Book Reviews

The titles reviewed are listed below with names of authors and editors

Jenkins, David: Suharto and his Generals: Indonesian Military Politics 1975-1983

Crouch, Harold: The Army and Politics in Indonesia

Sundhaussen, Ulf: The Road to Power: Indonesian Military Politics 1945-1967

Department of State: Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1985

Department of State: Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1985: Israel

Humana, Charles: The Economist Human Rights Guide

McFarlane, S Neil: Superpower Rivalry and Third World Radicalism: The Idea of National Liberation

Osmanczyk, Edmund Jan: Encyclopedia of the United Nations and International Agreements

Fransman, Martin and King, Kenneth (eds): Technological Capability in the Third World

Walrond, Grantley W and Kumar, Raj: Options for Developing Countries in Mining Development

Taylor, Debbie (ed): Women: A World Report

Thomson, Marilyn: Women of El Salvador: The Price of Freedom

Bernstein, Hilda: For Their Triumphs and For Their Tears: Women in Apartheid South Africa

Allison, Caroline: 'It's Like Holding the Key to Your Own Jail': Women in Namibia

Organisation of Angolan Women: Angolan Women: Building the Future: From National Liberation to Women's Emancipation

Ahmadu Bello University: Women in Nigeria Today

Verrier, Anthony: The Road to Zimbabwe, 1890-1980

Sesay, Amadu, Ojo, Olusola and Fasehun, Orobola: The OAU After Twenty Years

Rugh, Andrea B: The Family in Contemporary Egypt

Kapur, Rajiv A: Sikh Separatism: The Politics of Faith

Momen, Moojan: An Introduction to Shi'i Islam: The History and Doctrines of Twelver Shi'ism

Cole, Juan R I and Keddie, Nikki R (eds): Shi'ism and Social Protest

Tarbusch, Mohammad A: The Role of the Military in Politics: A Case Study of Iraq to 1941

Scoble, Harry M and Wiseman, Laurie S (eds): Access to Justice: The Struggle for Human Rights in South East Asia

Asian Coalition of Human Rights Organisations: Human Rights Activism in Asia: Some Perspectives, Problems and Approaches

Nathan, Andrew J: Chinese Democracy: The Individual and the State in Twentieth-Century China

Weeks, John: The Economics of Central America

Turton, Peter: Jose Marti: Architect of Cuba's Freedom

Alberts, Tom: Agrarian Reform and Rural Poverty: A Case Study of Peru

Long, Norman and Roberts, Bryan: Miners, Peasants and Entrepreneurs: Regional Developments in the Central Highlands of Peru

Stein, William (ed): Peruvian Contexts of Change

Roa Bastos, Augusto: I The Supreme

Uneasy lies the head that wears the crown: The armed forces and politics in Indonesia

William Boddy

Suharto and His Generals: Indonesian Military Politics 1975–1983

David Jenkins

New York and London: Cornell University Press. 1984. 280pp. $12.50

The Army and Politics in Indonesia

Harold Crouch

New York and London: Cornell University Press. 1978. 377pp. $37.50

The Road to Power. Indonesian Military Politics 1945–1967

Ulf Sundhaussen

Kuala Lumpur: Oxford University Press. 1982. 304pp. £28.00

With the general elections to be held in April 1987 looming large on the horizon, the political climate in Indonesia has begun to warm up. Officials within the armed forces concerned with internal security are becoming nervous—unnecessarily, since the elections are predetermined, and will pass off with only minor incidents with victory again going to the government-sponsored Golkar. One sign of pre-election nerves has been the reaction to a newspaper article¹ by David Jenkins, the writer of one of the books reviewed here. In the article Jenkins had presented a réchauffé version of an old story about the wealth of President Suharto and his close family. There was hardly anything new in his piece; much of the information, going into greater detail, had been published elsewhere by others, such as Harold Crouch whose book is also under review here.

The aggressive reaction to the Jenkins article and the temporary freeze in Australian–Indonesian relations were a surprise both to the diplomatic community in Jakarta and the academic world at large. Why risk drawing attention to oneself by giving so much attention to a minor piece of journalism? One interpretation might be that the howl of outrage which went up in Indonesia was deliberately orchestrated by those influential critics within military circles who shared Jenkin's perceptions and wanted to use the occasion to cause maximum embarrassment to President Suharto. If this sounds too implausible, another explanation might be that Suharto, who is known to be touchy where his family is concerned, simply exploded with anger and started shooting from the hip diplomatically. His anger in this instance was probably fuelled by the fact that the article was by Jenkins whose book had already led to a lot of red faces in Suharto's inner circle.

¹ 'After Marcos, now for the Suharto billions', Sydney Morning Herald, 10 April 1986.

Whatever the correct explanation it is clear that neither a critical discussion of the role of the President and his family, nor an analysis of military power in Indonesia are subjects which are easily tolerated by the present regime. For anyone who wants to know why this should be so, a close reading of the three books here reviewed will provide the answer. There is some degree of overlap among them. Sundhaussen's book deals with the growth of the army and its increasing role in politics between its establishment in 1945 and the assumption of the Presidency by General Suharto in 1967. Crouch deals with the army's origins in a brief introductory chapter but his principal focus is the decade between 1964 and 1974. Jenkins is more concerned with recent history, and although he too describes the first few years after the 1965 coup, the main issues that concern him relate to rivalry and factionalism within the armed forces between 1975 and 1983.

Despite the slight overlap, however, and the apparent complementarity of the chronological frameworks of their narratives, there are marked differences in the way in which the three authors present their material. Hence the recommendation that their books should be read together should not be mistaken for a suggestion that information given in each simply adds to what one learns from the others in terms of an accumulation of facts. Rather, the complementarity of one to another is better perceived in terms of different perspectives, each of which yields a distinctive and intriguing insight not only into the complexity of the relationship between army and politics in Indonesia, but also into the way in which Western scholarship maps out an academic terrain and constructs an intellectual discourse. Before this begins to sound too pretentious, let me explain directly how the approaches of the three writers differ.

Crouch and Sundhaussen were postgraduate students together at Monash and both acknowledge a debt to their mentor, one of the most knowledgeable of all Western scholars of contemporary Indonesian politics, Herb Feith. Despite this intellectual heritage, however, and despite a close acquaintance with Indonesia and Indonesian personalities which they have in common, in their books (which derive from their doctoral theses) they appear to share little in their interpretation of the phenomena, the empirical details of which they both record assiduously. For one thing, Sundhaussen is anxious to situate his description and analysis within the context of comparative political theory relating to the role of the military in Third World countries. Hence the questions which he addresses are 'why did the Indonesian military intervene in politics; secondly, why did the supplanting of a civilian-led government come so late . . . and finally, to what extent must civilian leaders share responsibility for military intervention in Indonesian politics' (p 255). The phrasing of these questions in this manner already intimates his view concerning what occurred, and it comes as no surprise that his conclusion is that the military were reluctant to take over political power, and that they only did so after a longer period of forbearance towards civilian leaders, when they saw that the latter were bringing the country to political ruin. The bulk of his book is designed to prove this thesis, and in his concluding chapter he makes his views clear while dismissing alternative explanations in a cavalier fashion. For example, in rejecting the suggestion that personal interests played a major role in the army's assumption of power, he writes: 'Even if Soeharto is judged to be guided at least partly by individual interests—and one could support such a view by his persistence in office in the years to come—personal ambition cannot serve as the major explanatory tool for the ejection of Sukarno. Soeharto's position within the officer corps was not strong enough for him to use the army as the vehicle for personal aggrandisement: to replace Sukarno required concrete political issues and the failure of the President to come to grips with them' (p 259). To which weak line of reasoning one need only reply that the manufacturing of political issues and the cornering of one's opponents is, of course, the stock-in-trade of the ambitious politician with his eye on the main chance.

BOOK REVIEWS

Crouch, on the other hand, avoids comparative political theory like the plague. Consequently, his book reads more like a documentary account of what happened with an occasional foray into interpretation and discussion. This lack of theoretical perspective sometimes leads him to digress into detail which clearly fascinates him, but which is sometimes irksome for a reader trying to follow or even identify some argument in the writing. For example, like Sundhaussen, Crouch rehearses in some detail interpretations over who was responsible for the coup. (This endeavour, incidentally, has led to some trouble with the Indonesian authorities recently. His book in translation was on the bookstalls in Jakarta last April and then immediately banned, since Crouch referred, albeit critically, to a theory of W F Wertheim's that Suharto was behind the coup, a suggestion that the authorities felt the Indonesian public was not yet ready for.) Fascinating as the subject is for Indonesian cognoscenti, one feels that the 120 pages which Crouch devotes to the coup, its immediate aftermath and the downfall of Sukarno could have been condensed to allow more discussion of substantive issues. Similarly, the chapter which he devotes to 'The Army's Economic Interests', although well researched and presented, is not sufficiently well integrated into a sustained analysis of power and politics, and the apparent lack of control over detail impedes his argument.

In so far as one can elicit an argument from his book it is that: 'The expansion of the army's political role had not been a planned process in which its leaders took deliberate steps to fulfil their political ambitions. Rather it took the form of a series of responses to particular crises arising, in the main, from the actions of dissident officers. Although the circumstances that were favorable for the expression of their power were not essentially of their own making, the army leaders had always been ready to exploit unexpected opportunities to the full' (p 35). For Crouch, then, personal and corporate self-interest did play a major role and the professed altruistic concern for the preservation of the nation to a minor one. To substantiate his case Crouch is prepared to go into greater detail than Sundhaussen on the general political and economic background to the army's initiatives. Sundhaussen's forte is his knowledge of the internal dynamics of developments within the military, and hence, for the general reader with little knowledge of Indonesia, it is easier to perceive things in some sort of context from Crouch's account. He deliberately avoids burdening his text with the names of too many personalities, and indeed his careless misspelling of some names, surprising in so meticulous a scholar (the most glaring example of which is the name of Benny Murdani given by Crouch as Murnadi) indicates that for him it is not so much individuals as attitudes which concern him.

For Jenkins, on the other hand, it is very much the actors of the drama who command his attention, as the photographs in his text make clear. This emphasis on personalities is dictated by the two issues on which Jenkins pegs his narrative: 'the "challenge" posed to President Suharto within the Armed Forces of the Republic of Indonesia (ABRI) during the period 1975-82 and the debate that developed over ABRI's role in society' (p ix). In essence, what Jenkins demonstrates is that there was a series of challenges to Suharto's role on the part of those who were dissatisfied both by the policies which the latter adopted, and by the corruption within military circles which he appeared to condone, if not actively participate in, and that by skilful manoeuvring on the part of Suharto and his close advisers these challenges were successfully met. In addition to the issue of corruption, the matter which most exercised those who participated in the intra-elite struggles was the question of how far (not whether) ABRI should intervene in the democratic process to manipulate politics in favour of Suharto's strategies of government. In the unravelling of the complexity of the factionalism that arose, Jenkins has relied on published records and documents and also on a series of remarkably frank interviews with leading political figures—particularly those of the dissident groups—whose forthright comments have made the book a source of major irritation to the government.

Jenkins, then, is strong on personalities and for the sake of convenience he divides these into two groups, the 'pragmatists' around Suharto who are prepared to countenance a bending of the rules in order to ensure internal political stability and economic development, and the 'principled', sometimes called 'puritans', who were inspired both by professionalism and a sense of nationalistic idealism. Crouch, although he too uses labels—'political' and 'financial' generals as opposed to 'professionals'—allows himself to be a bit more sceptical about motives. Sundhaussen, however, seemingly unconcerned over non-military issues, stresses not so much divisions within the armed forces, but the conflict between the military and civilian politicians.

BOOK REVIEWS

Since the elections of 1983 much has happened, some of the events clearly buttressing the government's position, but some of sufficient weight to shake its self-confidence. The major triumph as far as the government is concerned has been the final emasculation of the political parties and quasi-political organisations by making them endorse as the fundamental principle of their constitution, the state ideology of Pancasila. To outsiders not familiar with Indonesian politics this might appear of little significance, but with Indonesia it is regarded as the culmination of a long struggle between the government and the political parties in which the latter have been routed. The cost of this victory may, however, ultimately prove to have been too great; for example the intense pressure exerted by the government has served to unite the dissident opposition as never before. An indication of this has been the publication of a pamphlet in 1984 entitled Selamatkan Demokrasi ('Save Democracy'), the authors of which were Nasution, Moh Natsir—a former Prime Minister of the Masyumi ('modernist') Islamic party—and Sanusi Bratadinata, a former Minister and a leading figure of the PNI (Nationalist Party).

The government's response to this opposition has been to try to discredit their opponents in two ways, first by trying to associate them with terrorist activities and bombings, and second by labelling them as sakit hati ('aggrieved') because they are no longer in positions of power. Furthermore, much more use has been made of the stick than the carrot. A former minister has been put on trial (twice, on different charges) and sentenced for complicity in acts of terrorism and attempted assassination of Suharto. Even more significant was the trial and conviction of General Dharsono, a former Secretary-General of ASEAN. Bringing Dharsono to trial surprised many observers since he was a figure who commanded considerable respect in Indonesia both within military circles and in the country at large.

The reason for these tough measures and the attempt to discredit the opposition seems to have been to alienate public sympathy from them, but in this respect the government appears to have miscalculated. Within the armed forces, it is true, the government's interpretations appear to have won wide acceptance among senior officers, many of whom have been now so thoroughly indoctrinated that they sincerely believe that there is no place for democracy in Indonesia at the present time. On the other hand, it is clear that the public at large is highly sceptical of the government's tactics, and there is a great deal of sympathy for men like Ali Sadikin who spoke out openly at Dharsono's trial attacking the government's record.

The gulf between the armed forces and the people is therefore widening, and the government is aware of this. Again steps have been taken to try to remedy the situation. A thorough reorganisation of ABRI has been well publicised, and stress has been placed on professionalism and service to the nation. In a recent reshuffle, General Try Sutrisno, a devout Muslim, was appointed Army Head of Staff, an appointment which seems designed to appease those critics who have pointed out that senior positions in the armed forces are held disproportionately by non-Muslims.

Suharto's own position, however, is beginning to look more vulnerable. Two of his closest advisers, Ali Murtopo and Sudjono Humardhani, have died recently. A sign of his unease is perhaps the need that he felt to justify himself against the accusations in the Jenkins article. In an unprecedented step he summoned all the senior ABRI officers to a special meeting specifically to deny there was any truth in the allegations concerning his immediate family. However, despite these few indications that the government is not having things all its own way, it needs to be stressed that there is still no likelihood of any significant change. Although the Presidential Election is not until 1988, the electoral body within the Upper House has already made it clear that Suharto will be the only candidate for the position.

Undoubtedly, one of the reasons why the New Order government dominated by Suharto and his generals has been able to stay in power for so long, despite the criticisms that have been levelled at it by both civilian intellectuals and politicians and critics within the armed forces, has been the economic stability of the country and the tangible benefits of development to the country over the last twenty years. Criticism of the government's complicity in corruption, dissatisfaction at the financial manipulations of the enormously wealthy Jakarta elite and unhappiness with the government's human rights record may stir intellectuals to protest, but for the majority these issues are not of critical importance, provided that their own economic opportunities continue to expand. It is clear, however, that those opportunities are going to be dramatically curtailed in the near future. The fall in the price of oil has already had an impact, and the recent 45 per cent devaluation is going to hit salaried middle-class officials very hard. It is not hard to foresee that a deterioration of the economic status will affect the way in which the country will react both to future criticisms of the government and the government's attempts at self-justification. On the other hand, it would be foolish to predict anyone's downfall. As the books under review have shown the New Order government has remarkable powers of resilience, and the armed forces are still sufficiently united in outlook to take concerted action against any serious opposition.

Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1985

Department of State

Washington DC: Department of State, 1986. 1440pp. n/p

However the Administration of Ronald Reagan may have striven to reduce the weight of human rights in US foreign policy, it has greatly increased the weight of the State Department's yearly report on 'human rights practices'. With entries on 164 countries, an introduction, and four appendices, this is now the single most comprehensive regular report on human rights produced anywhere in the world.¹

The publication of these reports has resulted from the increased influence of Congress in American foreign policy since the Vietnam War. As a result of both the War and the Watergate scandals, pressure to reassert the role of ethics in politics became stronger. In order to strengthen Congressional oversight of American foreign aid, Congress required the State Department to submit annual reports on 'practices regarding the observance of and respect for internationally recognized human rights in each country proposed as a recipient of security assistance'. Subsequently, an amendment required reports on all members of the United Nations, leading to today's comprehensive coverage.

The first of such reports, reluctantly submitted by Henry Kissinger's State Department on 31 January 1976, were widely considered to be 'shoddy', in the words of one human rights lobbyist. As noted below, political bias persists. Nevertheless, the reports have improved to the point where human rights organisations who regularly monitor that bias state that most of the entries 'convey a fair impression of the human rights situation' and credit the State Department with 'increasing professionalisation of human rights monitoring'.²

To implement this Congressional mandate, the State Department has both made human rights monitoring into a new specialisation for embassy political officers and established the Bureau of Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs in Washington. The human rights officers in the diplomatic mission prepare the first draft of the report in September. The Human Rights Bureau and the desk officers in Washington then finish the country entry for submission to Congress each 31 January, covering the preceding calendar year.

The reports follow a standard format (see Table 1). An introduction describes the country's political institutions, significant events of the previous year, and economic and social conditions. Then follows the section on 'Respect for Human Rights', divided into four sections. Finally, there is a section on the economic, social and cultural 'situation', indicating that the Reagan Administration rejects the concept of economic, social and cultural rights.

The reports fall short in two ways: the conception of human rights underlying them omits some important rights, and the reporting on those rights that are included is sometimes marred by political bias.

¹ Amnesty International's Annual Report for 1985, for instance, dealing with a more limited set of human rights, discusses 123 countries in a mere 359 pages. The major omission in the State Department reports, of course, is the USA.

² Americas Watch, Helsinki Watch, Lawyers Committee for International Human Rights, Critique: Review of the Department of State's Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1984, New York: May 1985, p 1.

Table 1: Standard format of State Department Country Reports on Human Rights Practices

Summary of Country Situation

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

- a. Political Killing
- b. Disappearance
- c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment
- d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile
- e. Denial of Fair Public Trial
- f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

- a. Freedom of Speech and Press
- b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association
- c. Freedom of Religion
- d. Freedom of Movement within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: the Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The major rights omitted are economic, social and cultural rights, and the right to self-determination. Omission of the former is a break with the Carter Administration, which had included 'government policies relating to the fulfilment of such vital needs as food, shelter, health care and education' as part of human rights practices. The current edition of the reports, however, opines (pp 2-3):

We have found that the concept of economic, social, and cultural rights is often confused, sometimes willfully, by repressive governments claiming that in order to promote these 'rights' they may deny their citizens the right to integrity of the person as well as political and civil rights.

Nowhere does the report explicitly mention the right of self-determination. The separate reports on Israel and the Occupied Territories describe violations of the rights of individual Arabs and some examples of discrimination, including the lack of political rights in the Territories, but do not mention collective self-determination. Despite the extensive documentation of violent repression and pervasive discrimination under apartheid, the report on South Africa similarly reduces the issue to one of individuals against the state. This omission is ideologically consistent, however; the entries on Romania and Bulgaria do not contain systematic descriptions of the violations of the collective rights of, respectively, Hungarians or Turks either.

As in previous years, sheer factual distortion is most egregious in the reports on Central America. The Department of State has spared no effort to depict Nicaragua as a Tiny Satan; at twenty-four pages, its entry is the longest in the volume. El Salvador, however, benefits from considerable indulgence. Although reports from independent human rights groups (and even, in part, the Country Reports, carefully read) make clear, for instance, that there were far more political killings in El Salvador than in Nicaragua (and that most of such killings were perpetrated by, respectively, the US-backed military and the US-created 'contras'), the text strives mightily to convey the opposite impression.³

Nevertheless, many reports, even on governments friendly to (or dependent on) the USA, contain detailed information not easily available elsewhere on killings, disappearances, arrests, claims made by local human rights groups, trade union activity, and freedom of cultural life. In general, the report is least reliable when the country in question figures in a US domestic policy dispute related to human rights, such as that over aid to the Nicaraguan 'contras'. The reports on small, obscure countries are particularly useful; most human rights organisations deal little with many such countries, and the USA has relatively little reason to distort their records.

Many find these reports offensive, even (or in some cases, especially) when they are accurate. Since they judge all the nations except the most powerful one, which issues them, they inevitably emit a certain odour of self-righteousness, like a preacher peering into bedrooms all over town. Nevertheless, American power cannot help but affect human rights in much of the world, and the reports were imposed on an initially unwilling Executive by Americans who wished their country to use its power to promote human rights. While American hegemony has many harmful effects on the rest of humanity, the attempt to legitimate it in terms of human rights creates contradictions that make challenges possible. Rather than protest at the publication of these reports, those who contest that hegemony would do better to take their challenge by issuing alternative reports, thus promoting an international debate on the universal basic requirements of a decent public life.

BARNETT R RUBIN
Yale University

³ The range of techniques of distortion used in the Central American reports would require an essay in itself. For details see the Critique of the 1985 reports published by the same organisations whose review of the previous year's reports was cited in note 2.

Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1985: Israel

Department of State

Washington DC: Department of State. 1986. 25pp. n/p

'Israel is a parliamentary democracy which guarantees by law and reflects in practice the civil, political, and religious rights of its citizens.'¹ Thus declared the US Department of State in its report on human rights of 13 February 1986.

Yet the contents of the report refute this declaration which is intended to justify the economic and military assistance appropriated by the US Congress for Israel in 1985, totalling, according to the report, $3.35 billion. This is because, from the outset, the report recognises that emergency regulations have been in effect since 1948. It acknowledges that the possession and distribution of literature considered hostile to the state and issued by Israeli Arab organisations are punishable offences. Flying the Palestinian flag or displaying its colours or displaying Palestinian Nationalist slogans are strictly forbidden.

¹ Country reports on human rights practices for 1985: Submitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations, US Senate by the Department of State. In Accordance with Sections 116(d) and 502B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as Amended (February 1986) (Hereinafter referred to as 'The Report'), p 1257.

The report states that in June 1985, four Israeli Arabs received prison terms of three to six months for displaying Palestinian flags during a rally in September of 1982 which protested the massacre of Palestinians in the Sabra and Shatilla refugee camps in Beirut. The report also acknowledges that the Law of Return of 1950, which abolished all restrictions on Jewish immigration, and the Citizenship Law of 1952, which granted every Jew the right to citizenship upon arrival in Israel, confers an advantage on Israeli Jews denied to the Israeli Arabs. It further states that while Israeli Jews enjoy freedom of movement, the movements of Israeli Arabs are strictly limited. It cites the restrictions on the travel of an Arab Anglican priest to the Occupied Territories. These restrictions were imposed in 1984 and were extended by the military commander to January of 1986. The report also laments Israel's refusal to permit Palestinian refugees who left their homes in the 1947-48 fighting to return or to be compensated for their losses in accordance with the UN General Assembly Resolution 194 of 11 December 1948. It stresses that the Israeli Arabs are proportionally under-represented in the Knesset (Parliament). Lack of budget parity between Israeli Arab and Jewish municipalities of equal size, with favour shown to the Jewish ones, has been documented according to the report. The parallel educational systems in Israel for Jews and Arabs, conducted in Hebrew and Arabic respectively, show disparity in quality, with greater resources per student going into the Jewish system.

The most flagrant violation of human rights reported, however, is related to the use of land, where title to 93 per cent of the land is claimed by the state or by quasi-public organisations in trust, only 'for the Jewish people'.

Various other violations, such as the denial of equal access to education, housing, and other services are reported.

The Palestinians in the territories which Israel has been occupying since 1967 suffer from even more severe violations of human rights. The United States' view is that Israel's presence in the occupied territories is governed by the Hague regulations of 1907 and the 1949 Fourth Geneva Convention covering the protection of civilian populations under military occupation. The report thus rebukes Israel for the unilateral annexation of East Jerusalem and the Golan Heights, for the introduction of Jewish settlers into Occupied Territories, and the use of collective punishment. It stresses that the introduction of Jewish civilian settlers into the Occupied Territories is one of the main causes of friction.

Under occupation rules, military authorities can and do enter into private homes, places of worship, schools and other institutions without warrant or prior judicial approval. The report states that in 1985, at least seventeen houses of West Bank and Gaza residents suspected of involvement in security incidents were demolished and twenty were sealed before the suspects had been put on trial. Mail and telephone services are monitored in the Occupied Territories. Individuals can be and are questioned on their political views. All residents over 16 must carry identity documents with them at all times and must show them to military officials whenever requested. Vehicles owned by Arab residents of the Occupied Territories are frequently stopped and searched by military officials and by armed Jewish civilian settlers.

The most offensive of Israel's violations of human rights in the Occupied Territories, according to the report, is the taking of land by Israeli authorities for settlements, military use, and in connection with major road plans, and the reclassification of communal areas as state land. These measures significantly affect the daily lives and economic activities of the Palestinians. The report states that the Palestinians have been precluded from use of an area approaching 50 per cent of the West Bank land and 15 per cent of the Gaza strip. The scarcity of water in most parts of the West Bank constrains agricultural and urban development and thus adds to the hardship of the Palestinians because of the disproportionate amount of water allocated for the Jewish settlers' use. Other violations include the closing of newspapers and universities.

Thus, despite the declaration that Israel 'by law' and 'in practice' guarantees human rights to its citizens, the contents of the report show that the Israeli Arabs in fact suffer severe human rights violations. It also shows flagrant human rights violations in the Occupied Territories.

It is difficult to find a plausible explanation for the State Department's seemingly contradictory positions, because Israel's human rights violations, as cited in the report, are so flagrant that the US government would be justified in denying further aid until they are remedied. The government should neither countenance nor reward these violations. In fact, an unequivocal declaration by the State Department, in accordance with the contents of the report, that Israel is in violation of human rights, may constitute an indirect move towards a peaceful solution of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict.

US aid to Israel is, by law, predicated on Israel's observance of human rights. If Israeli Arabs are accorded equality with Israeli Jews and their human rights are restored, the Palestinians of the West Bank and Gaza strip may not object to becoming part of a state which would respect their full rights. Gradually, Israel should then repatriate the Palestinians still living in refugee camps.

With the implementation of this approach, Israel will admittedly cease to be an exclusively Jewish state. Yet it is hardly exclusively Jewish now, since more than 20 per cent of its citizens are non-Jews. This may be an alternative to the continuing outbreaks of hostility which have plagued the region and threatened world peace for decades. It would also remove the United States from the uncomfortable position of accomplice to Israel's human rights violations.

SHAW J DALLAL

New Hartford, NY

The Economist Human Rights Guide

Charles Humana

London: Hodder and Stoughton. 1986. 344pp. £19.95

Charles Humana will probably be known to readers of Third World Quarterly for his excellent 'Survey of Human Rights in the Third World' in the 1985 Third World Affairs.

The present volume is a greatly extended and updated edition of an earlier work of his, first published in 1983.

Essentially, it seeks to compare, rank, and measure the human rights performance of 120 of the world's sovereign states, as at 1 January 1986. For thirty of them, there are brief one-page summaries, and an overall rating of Bad, Poor, or (at best) Fair. For each of the other ninety, the author has asked forty standard questions and calculated a percentage rating from the answers. This yields results ranging from 98 per cent for Denmark, Finland, the Netherlands, and Sweden, down to 20 per cent for Romania and the USSR, 19 per cent for Iraq, 17 per cent for North Korea, and a wretched 13 per cent at the bottom of the league for Ethiopia. The average is 55 per cent.

The forty questions and answers, with brief comments, are displayed over three pages for each nation, together with a few leading statistics and a short paragraph headed 'Factors affecting human rights'. The results are shown again, in tabular form, across both of the volume's end-papers; there are some maps and charts and there are reprints of the operative parts of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, for some reason taken from the US State Department's Selected Documents, rather than the UN originals.

The preparation of any such work requires a great deal of industry and dedication, and the results here display both in full measure. As a broad guide for those unfamiliar with any particular country, the results are undoubtedly useful. But their value must depend critically on the accuracy and impartiality with which the primary facts are ascertained, the standards against which they are compared, and the method of comparison. So far as one can tell, there are no gross or obvious shortcomings in the first of these, but some reservations need to be expressed about the second and third.

Out of the twenty or more international instruments relating to human rights and fundamental freedoms, the author has chosen to select as his only standards the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, and the UN Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (which he abbreviates to 'Convention on equality for women'). He leaves entirely out of account, for example, the Genocide Convention, the Apartheid Convention, the Convention against Racial Discrimination, and the judicially enforceable European, American, and African regional treaties. Indeed, on p 2 of his Introduction, he only mentions that the American Convention has been 'adopted' by the Organisation of American States, when it has in fact been ratified by no fewer than eighteen of its members. Worse, he claims that the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights 'has now been ratified by 51 countries of that continent' which, if it were true, would be splendid, since that continent only has fifty-one countries, including South Africa. In fact, only twenty-two African states have so far ratified the Charter, and it will not come into force until that figure reaches twenty-six.

Strangely, only three of the author's forty questions (on child labour, trade unions, and scientific progress) relate to the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, a matter which is surely critical in judging the human rights performance of all developing countries, and of the developed ones no less. When the overriding objective of economic development is still so often cited as a pretext for trampling all over the individual human rights and fundamental freedoms of a nation's inhabitants, it is surely of the first importance to examine how the economic and social rights of those inhabitants have in fact fared under such a policy, and not to confine the answers to a mere statement of the percentages of GNP spent by the state on health and education. However, the author appears to attach so little importance to this aspect of human rights that he does not even reprint the operative provisions of this Covenant in the Appendix.

As for the attempt at quantification, it is of course notorious that such an exercise can only be subjective, however hard an author tries to make it otherwise. In the present case, the author's forty questions are selected, in accordance with his own scale of values, from some (but only some) of the substantive Articles of the instruments which he has selected as his standards. Having made that selection, he then further selects seven of those questions as being three times as important as the other thirty-three. These are headed, in the end-paper tables, 'slavery', 'extra-judicial killing', 'torture/coercion', 'compulsory work', 'capital punishment', 'corporal punishment' and 'unlawful detention'. Indeed, all these are great evils, but not everyone would necessarily agree that they are the seven greatest evils in the canon. Besides, some of them overlap: compulsory work is usually regarded as a form of slavery; corporal punishment only constitutes a violation of human rights if it is 'cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment', which is included in the prohibition of torture; and capital punishment only constitutes a violation if it falls outside the categories permitted by the treaties themselves, in which case it would become a form of extra-judicial killing.

There are some minor reservations also for which there is not room here. Defects of this kind are probably unavoidable in any work which tries to collate and summarise such a vast and protean set of data. However, the author makes plain in his Introduction what he is trying to achieve, and how he has gone about his work. So long as the reader heeds the obvious warnings, therefore, he should run little risk of misjudging the results.

PAUL SIEGHART

London

Superpower Rivalry and Third World Radicalism: The Idea of National Liberation

S Neil McFarlane

London: Croom Helm. 1985. 238pp. £19.95

East-West competition in the Third World, although basically geopolitical in nature, involves a struggle for the minds of the newly independent nations as well. Both Washington and Moscow claim that their particular models of socio-economic and political development provide the answer or are in tandem with the aspirations and needs of the developing countries. Given this intense rivalry, it is salutary to have a book that provides a sensible and impartial examination of the basic question in this situation: what is the ideological affinity between the national liberation aspirations of the Third World and the panaceas offered by East and West?

McFarlane's inquiry is based on a triangular analysis. He examines the roots and the development of the national idea in the liberal West, the socialist East and the radical South, noting what principles they have in common, as well as the fundamental differences that divide them. The bulk of the book consists of a discussion and dissection of the ideological assumptions about national liberation in the three political divisions of the world. It is based on an even-handed analysis of the basic theoretical writings that inform each grouping.

In each case McFarlane goes back to the historical roots. Thus he relates the current American conceptions of what political and social change in the Third World should be like to the thinking of Rousseau, Frederick List and Mazzini. He traces Soviet thinking to what Marx and Engels, and not just Lenin, had to say about the national question and the colonial revolution. And his presentation of Third World ideology touches on Kemalist Turkey and Kuomintang China.

The main burden and value of the study is an impartial discussion of the incompatibilities among the three doctrines. McFarlane wisely eschews the facile notion that there is a natural affinity between the South and either the West or the East. The American doctrine shares with the radical Third World writings only the commitment to national self-determination. It is indifferent or even opposed to the notions of economic independence and social revolution. Even though the USSR is committed to all three principles, the transnational universalism of its doctrine is incompatible with the national particularism of the African, Asian and Latin American theorists. Above all, the single-minded determination of the Third World political thinkers not to remain subordinate to outsiders, makes the attempts of Soviet and Western politicians, as well as political scientists, to assume or to impose affinities highly illusory.

This excellent short guide should prove valuable to Western students of East-West competition in the Third World, as well as to radical audiences in the developing countries. All should profit from the clear-headed, well-documented and impartial analysis of the highly emotional and often inflammatory ideological constructs that arise from and shape the issue of national liberation.

ELIZABETH KRIDL VALKENIER

Harriman Institute

Columbia University, New York

Encyclopedia of the United Nations and International Agreements

Edmund Jan Osmanczyk

Philadelphia and London: Taylor and Francis. 1986. 1059pp. $160

In recent years academic interest in the work of international organisations has declined significantly, particularly in the USA. In part this decline reflects a general diminution of faith in the benefits of multilateralism, a trend which is being greatly accelerated by the Reagan Administration's consistent spurning of international law and international organisations. In addition, it also reflects the growing complexity of the UN, the fairly rapid proliferation of agencies and the explosion of paper work that they have produced. As a result, it is difficult, if not impossible, for even the most ardent and conscientious student of international organisations to keep up with developments.

The UN itself seems congenitally incapable of responding to the many attacks which have been launched upon it in recent years and, perhaps more surprisingly, is equally unable to produce manageable, readable documentation detailing its various activities. Many of its publications are tedious, formalistic, and so densely bureaucratic as to be largely impenetrable.

BOOK REVIEWS

The Encyclopedia under review is thus a particularly welcome addition to the reference literature on the UN. It contains three categories of information: (1) data on the structure and mandate of the numerous UN bodies; (2) a description, and sometimes the entire text, of almost 3,000 agreements, conventions and treaties; and (3) explanations of widely used political, economic, military, geographical and sociological terms, as well as terms used in diplomacy and international law'.

It is probably in the second of these categories that it is of the most use. It reproduces the complete texts of, for example, the UN and OAS charters, the Law of the Sea Conventions of 1958 and 1982, the SALT II agreement, the Warsaw Pact and the SEATO treaty and the International Covenants on Human Rights. In dealing with the various parts of the UN system, the quality of the entries varies considerably. There are notable omissions such as the ACC (Administrative Committee on Coordination) and the powerful ACABQ (Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions) neither of which appears as an individual entry, although the latter is referred to briefly under the item on the 'Budget of the UN'. In most instances the bibliography is very useful and reasonably up-to-date. In others, such as the various entries dealing with the Secretariat, no reference is post-1959. For reasons which are not explained, no biographical notes whatsoever are included, so that one can only learn who Dag Hammarskjöld was from the entry dealing with the Library named in his honour.

Although the Encyclopedia has already been published in Polish and Spanish, the English edition is surprisingly current (often up to 1985) and the choice of entries is not politically skewed, the author having aimed at 'absolute objectivity', an interesting concept in the UN context. The small print enables an enormous amount of information to be included. It is regrettable that there is an astonishing number of misspellings of proper names (Janks, Turkin, Urgohart, Oppenheim, Brownloe, etc). Overall, however, while the price is certainly high enough to put the book out of the reach of most individual purchasers, it is nonetheless a very valuable compilation and should be considered an indispensable reference book for libraries.

PHILIP ALSTON

Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy, Medford, Massachusetts

Technological Capability in the Third World

Edited by Martin Fransman and Kenneth King

London: Macmillan. 1984. 404pp. £29.50. £8.95pb

The excellent book contains a number of contributions to the debates about the role and context of technology in economic development by a number of the leading workers in the field. As the editors argue, there has been a significant shift in the focus of debate in the 1980s, occasioned in part by the decline in influence of both of the competing broader paradigms of neo-classical economics and dependency theory.

Previously the prime concern was with the terms of transfer of technology and capital to Third World countries; now there are two new major concerns derived from a recognition of the existence of significant technological capability in Third World countries (and not just the newly industrialising countries (NICs)). These concerns are:

First, to identify what are the major sources of successful growth in the Third World, and second, to understand the relationship between the acquisition of scientific knowledge and skills on the one hand, and the ability to innovate and grow on the other.

The first concern is tackled by a number of theoretical papers, often drawing on the neo-Schumpeterian approaches of Nelson, Winter and Rosenberg, and case studies, primarily drawing on evidence from the NICs, including India and Brazil. A market-oriented, free trade approach is represented in papers by Ronald Dore and Gustav Ranis, whereas many other authors emphasise the need for some restrictions on trade, and the importance of both the role of government and of cultural factors. The latter are represented by Frances Stewart, Jorge Katz, Sanjaya Lall and others.

But it is clear that simple dichotomies are not appropriate, either when categorising theorists or country experiences: thus the 'protectionists' generally accept that there are gains to be made from the import of technology and from increased exports, and the 'free traders' admit that Japan and other East Asian countries were initially protectionist (of both infant industry and of independent technological learning capacity). Similarly, there is probably only one clear example of a country succeeding with anything approaching a pure neo-classical strategy (market orientation, free trade, an 'open door' to foreign capital, minimal state interference, etc) and that is Hong Kong. Other NICs, such as Singapore and Brazil, have welcomed foreign capital, but in the context of an interventionist state with some protection; South Korea largely excluded foreign capital, and the state intervened dramatically, both positively and through quantitative import restrictions. On the other hand, protectionist states such as India and China are increasingly recognising the price they have paid for independent technological capacity, in the efficiencies of certain regions.

The importance of the role of the state is demonstrated for Brazil by Carl Dahlman and for South Korea by Larry Westphal. In the former, although there was more reliance than average on foreign technology, in certain important areas (particularly capital goods) there were state restrictions on imports, coupled with vigorous attempts to encourage the growth of indigenous expertise. In the latter, state intervention influenced the forms in which foreign technology was imported, and in particular limited the use of foreign direct investment.

Another important area of debate relating to the sources of the NICs' growth, and therefore the replicability of their example, is the rate of advance of the world technological frontier. Applying the Schumpeterian analysis of Freeman and others of long waves of economic activity, Kaplinsky queries whether the conditions still exist for a new wave of NICs. He illustrates his case with a discussion of the significance of micro-electronics and robotics, arguing that the technological gap between developed and developing countries is widening too fast for most of the latter to do other than develop Third World technologies which will not be competitive in developed world markets.

By contrast to this emphasis on external factors, Colin Leys argues for the primacy of the social relations of production in a country, which determine both the type of technology imported and the nature of developing indigenous capability. A country in which social forces are tending in the direction of socialism needs to be very careful about imported technology: the creation of socialist production relations might be ruled out either by the technology itself, or by requirements of competitiveness in the world market. He argues that if a high priority is given to such factors as a cleaner environment or more rewarding working relationships, competitiveness may have to be abandoned in a strategy of protection and technological dualism.

BOOK REVIEWS

The book concludes with a number of case studies; in addition to those mentioned earlier, there are contributions from Thomas Eisenmon, Ashok Desai, Manfred Beinefeld and Martin Fransman. And, approaching the final question of what developing countries can learn, these include studies of Kenya (by Paul Bennell and Steven Langdon) and Tanzania (Jens Muller). There is a valuable bibliography compiled by Sheena Johnson.

COLIN STONEMAN

Centre for Southern African Studies, University of York

Options for Developing Countries in Mining Development

George W Walrond and Raj Kumar

London: Macmillan. 1986. 205pp. £27.50

According to its authors, this volume is designed to fill an important gap in the literature on mining in developing countries, by making available 'a comprehensive book to which a policy maker, student or negotiator of mining agreements could quickly refer to guide him or her on the practical issues facing mining development' (p xiii). It draws on case-study material from eight Commonwealth mineral producers: six less developed countries (Sierra Leone, Tanzania, Zambia, Botswana, Papua New Guinea and Malaysia) and the State of Western Australia and the Province of Québec.

The book contains four substantive chapters. Chapter 2 deals with mineral rights legislation and illustrates the various types of exploration licences and mineral leases issued by case-study governments during recent decades. Chapters 3 and 4 and the accompanying appendices form the core of the book; they deal with the fiscal regimes applied to mining projects, first by examining various types of mineral taxes in general terms, then by analysing the impact of specific tax regimes through use of a computer-based model. A long appendix of computer print-outs illustrates the method used and the way in which it has been applied. Chapter 5 deals with mineral development agreements, offering a brief discussion of their form and of some issues they cover.

The book is in fact more restricted in scope than its title suggests, and does not live up to its authors' claim to cover 'a full range of concerns relevant to today's world, covering both financial and non-financial issues at length' (p 3). Apart from the chapter on mining legislation, its primary focus is on the fiscal regime for mining. A range of other issues are either referred to very briefly (wage and employment policy in the minerals sector, mineral processing), or mentioned in passing but not discussed at all (establishment of input-supplying industries, provision of mine infrastructure, training and localisation, environmental protection). While it might not be possible to deal with all these issues 'at length' in a single volume, failure to at least discuss their implications and outline policy options can be criticised on two grounds. First, some of them are directly relevant to a host country's capacity to extract fiscal benefits from mining, a point very apparent from recent experience in the author's own case-study countries.

Zambia's wage and employment policies in the late 1960s and early 1970s increased production costs substantially, reducing profits and taxes; Botswana's provision of infrastructure for the Selebi-Pikwe mine significantly reduced its net fiscal returns from this project; Malaysia's establishment of a copper smelter has increased processing costs for its copper mines, reducing their capacity to generate revenues; Papua New Guinea has faced extremely difficult choices between insisting on environmental provisions and threatening the economic viability of the Ok Tedi project. Second, during the last decade many developing country mining projects (probably a majority) have failed to generate significant government revenues; in this situation, achievement of national economic benefits from mining will depend to an important extent on implementation of appropriate policies in areas such as training and localisation and development of efficient input-supplying industries.

It is to be regretted that the authors did not cast their net more widely, because their treatment of the issues they do deal with is clear, stimulating and to be of considerable value to students and policymakers in the Third World. In particular, they succeed in analysing taxation issues in a way which does not deny their complexity, but which should be easily understood by non-specialists. The presentation of a full computer-based analysis (rather than just the results of the authors' calculations) will be of particular value. In addition, the book provides considerable factual information on mining legislation, mineral agreements, and tax regimes in the case-study countries, using well-designed tables which permit quick comparisons between how each deals with a particular area. However, in this regard the authors' choice of case studies appears somewhat limiting; the exclusive focus on Commonwealth countries narrows the range of options which is outlined, and removes the possibility of referring to practices in many of the world's most important developing country mineral producers.

CIARAN O'FAIRCHEALLAIGH

North Australia Research Unit, Australian National University

Women: A World Report. A New Internationalist Book

Edited by Debbie Taylor

London: Methuen. 1985. 376pp. £4.95pb

Women of El Salvador: The Price of Freedom

Marilyn Thompson

London: Zed for Comision de Derechos Humanos de El Salvador and War on Want 1986. 165pp. £16.95. £5.95pb

For Their Triumphs and For Their Tears: Women in Apartheid South Africa

Hilda Bernstein

London: International Defence and Aid Fund for Southern Africa. 1985. 136pp.
£3.50pb

BOOK REVIEWS

'It's Like Holding the Key to Your Own Jail': Women in Namibia

Caroline Allison

Geneva: World Council of Churches. 1986. 71pp. £2.95pb

Angolan Women: Building the Future: From National Liberation to Women's Emancipation

Organisation of Angolan Women

London: Zed. 1984. 151pp. £14.95. £5.95pb

Women in Nigeria Today

Ahmadu Bello University, Zaria, Nigeria

London: Zed. 1985. 257pp. £18.95. £6.95pb

There are so many women in the world, around half of humanity, that even people who are not themselves women are all more or less intimately acquainted with some. This tends to convince us that we are all experts on the subject of what women are, how they should behave, and what they need, and that our opinions on these matters are self-evident truths, to be defended with great energy against all contrary views.

For those who favour a more balanced and realistic approach to the status and roles of women in society, growing numbers of detailed studies clearly demonstrate that the initial emotional and experiential reactions to these questions are not informed personal opinions and still less unassailable 'truths'. They are simply repetitions of the traditional clichés or dogma of whatever culture they form part. As cultures differ so do the formulations of women's status and roles in them, and so also do the practical opportunities open to women for the fulfilment of prescribed roles, or for developing new roles as they come into contact with the prescriptions of other cultural traditions through migration, education, and the increasing spread of news and entertainment media.

A third approach to women's studies, generally labelled 'feminist', is altogether more active. Rejecting all attempts at balanced analysis as a craven capitulation to the male-dominated status quo, it concentrates on exposing sexual inequalities as a universal phenomenon of discrimination against and exploitation of women by men. This must be resisted and overcome by women, who must be prepared for the fight by a process of 'consciousness raising', which is a new term for an old process of proselytism by a religious tradition or indoctrination by a political ideology. Measured in these terms, all the books in this group are feminist but tempered in varying degrees by academic balance or realism. None of them has any sympathy for traditional atavism.

Women: A World Report was compiled at the conclusion of the United Nations Decade for Women from the phenomenal accumulation of data relating to women gathered by the UN agencies and others, including questionnaires completed by 121 governments, for the final conference in 1985. By an unimaginable process of collective hard labour, given its final eloquent shape by Debbie Taylor, this mass of statistics and reports has been turned into a comprehensive, thoroughly documented report on women's lots throughout the world in relation to the family, agricultural and industrial work, health, sex, education, and politics, supplemented by a comprehensive tabulation of statistics in the final section. The written presentation combines meticulous accuracy of detail with a dramatic, arresting style which never loses sight of the human dilemmas, failures, determined efforts and achievements which they represent in the lives of real women, centred first on securing a reasonable future for themselves and their children and, for the more fortunate, looking outwards to see what feminine values might contribute towards the regeneration of an international political ethos which seems hell-bent on the destruction of the entire planet.

As if that were not enough, a much longer second section is given to ten women of remarkable energy, perception, and writing ability to investigate personally the experience of women in relation to the family, work, education, politics or sex in one country each, with the added cultural impact that five women from the Third World were sent to developed countries and five from the rich world visited developing nations. With the exception of Nigerian Buchi Emecheta's contribution on women and education in the USA (consisting of a rambling and very personal account of early American history and the relationship between black and white women which concludes 'the Western woman should go back and re-learn how to be a woman, because she has so undervalued herself that . . . she seems to be losing her way. Her black sister has not completely done so.') this entire section is crammed with vivid detail, striking insights, and the liveliest entertainment based on unmistakably real and often bitter experience, which together illustrate women's best strength and resilience in an amazing variety of settings and conditions.

Other books deal with women's daily experience in extreme situations of civil war, made very much more violent by foreign, mainly US interference. Marilyn Thomson's powerfully written study of women in El Salvador, supplemented by an account of the country since Duarte's election by Mandy Macdonald of the El Salvador Human Rights Committee, conveys the stark horror of the situation simply by reporting facts, interspersed by extracts from official documents and interviews with a range of women from peasants to activists, many in exile or subsequently murdered. The contrast between the repressive brutality of the ruling oligarchy, with its armed forces and death squads, and the programme which the Democratic Revolutionary Front (the FDR-FNLM, a coalition of dissident organisations) is trying to implement under constant attack in the areas under its control and border refugee camps makes a copybook example of the differences between fascism and popular democracy. Quotations from their respective women supporters give a clear picture of the type of person who supports each system and what leads them to do it.

While both types of women find themselves in alliance with men against common political opponents, the two opposed parties also pay attention to feminist issues. The chapter on the government's contribution to 'development for women' is short, citing laws which are never invoked and the creation in 1983, by the OAS Inter-American Commission for Women, of a 'Women's Office' with an impressive number of projects to be carried out single-handedly by its Director. FDR-FNLM proposals and agencies set up by and for women are described in some detail in the rest of the book.

Hilda Bernstein's account of South African women—For Their Triumphs and for Their Tears—has been re-written to include the momentous changes still taking place in South Africa and new research on its women. Sponsored by the International Defence and Aid Fund for Southern Africa as part of their comprehensive information service, it provides a thorough survey of the effects on women of the undeclared civil war currently raging in South Africa and of their response to it. Concisely and with devastating effect, the book documents the cynical process whereby the government, another ruling oligarchy, developed from 1948 a state apparatus to control the country's black majority population as if they were cattle, corralling them in barren 'homelands' from which the fittest males could be selected to labour on short-term contracts in white mines and towns deprived of even the emotional and domestic security permitted under slavery: a speech by Nationalist MP, G F van L Froneman in Parliament on 23 May 1965 quoted in the book notes that 'The African labour force must not be burdened with superfluous appendages such as wives, children, and dependents who could not provide services'.

BOOK REVIEWS

The failure of that policy stems from the refusal of the black victims to accept the bovine status and their will to assert their humanity and ambition by every means available to them. This is documented in accounts of women and the family, women and work, and women in the political struggle, including historical background and recent developments as well as aspects of male-female interrelation in all these areas. Above all, the book portrays the passionate determination of so many women to resist all attempts to crush their spirit and negate their humanity.

To read each of these three books is an education in itself, not least because they are all written in a clear, direct style whose impact relies on a simple but very vivid interweaving of fact, comment, and straight reporting of personal experience without pretence or sentimentality. That is to say they bear all the hallmarks of true feminine strength.

The interviews with Namibian women in 'It's Like Holding the Key to Your Own Jail' (the title is a quotation from an interview) supplement Hilda Bernstein's book with vividly recounted experiences of village life under the constant threat of army raids, arrest, and imprisonment, but it is not well written. The style, even of the transcribed interviews, is stilted and pompous and the introductory and link passages are so full of meaningless jargon that they could pass for the report of some inferior male committee.

Angolan Women: Building the Future was written by a committee for the first Congress of the Organisation of Angolan Women in which the preparatory debates defining women's problems which formed the basis of the documents were conducted along strictly orthodox socialist lines. Problems arising among the small population of a sadly underdeveloped new (1975) nation facing constant attack from South Africa and US-backed rebels are touched on obliquely in the drive to involve women in the national defence effort and in 'building a socialist society' in which they count as an oppressed category meriting radical social and legal reform. The introduction by Marga Holness gives a rather more sophisticated but still ideologically correct presentation of the background to the conference.

The papers included in Women in Nigeria Today, being further away from armed conflict, are less intense but still very much dominated by the categories of neo-Marxist sociological theory. This is a pity, because the papers contain a good deal of new research data on different aspects of the female experience in contemporary Nigeria, including a hair-raising account of traditional Hausa birth practices and a range of women's work and political activity. The preoccupation with ideological purity and terminological hair-splitting vitiates the analysis of original data by forcing it into categories which do not accurately reflect social realities and effectively prevents creative or even accurate understanding of their significance.

Taken together these books demonstrate that true understanding of social reality is most nearly attained when the feminine preoccupation with lived experience is married to the masculine insistence on a strict discipline of logical perspective.

JOAN EBEID
Oxford

The Road to Zimbabwe, 1890–1980

Anthony Verrier

London: Jonathan Cape. 1986. 364pp. £16.00

This is an odd book that has been even more oddly received. It sets out to be an account of the 'wider background—political, diplomatic, strategic and economic' to Zimbabwe's attainment of independence, and disavows any intention of describing black nationalism or the armed struggle. In practice it says very little about the involvement of South Africa or the USA and passes cursorily over long stretches of British activity, while having a great deal to say about African politics and about the war. As a result it falls between two stools. It will not replace existing accounts of the international manoeuvres around the Rhodesian issue nor existing accounts of the guerrilla war. Yet it has been very well received, especially in Zimbabwe itself, where it made the news pages of the Harare Herald and was later given a glowing review.

This Zimbabwean enthusiasm is something of a puzzle since what Verrier has to say about the African nationalist tradition in Zimbabwe, about the conduct of Zimbabwean leaders and about the pattern of the guerrilla war would seem likely to be at best controversial and at worst offensive to the Zimbabwean regime. Verrier is dismissive of the 'myth' of a continuous tradition of African resistance in Zimbabwe: 'the man with the sjambok usually dominates the helot', he writes characteristically. There was no real opposition to the creation of the Central African Federation, nor even to the unilateral declaration of independence. When at last—in the early 1970s—Zimbabwean Africans came reluctantly to emotions of nationalism, the exile political parties failed to make any effective connection with them. Guerrilla tactics outraged African rural opinion. ZANU / PF at last achieved its aim by superior ruthlessness:

ZANLA moved, in default of actively politicising the mass of [rural] Africans, into an onslaught on black subsistence and white administration. The resultant misery alienated many Africans from the PF. But the PF achieved its aim: the Smith [and Muzorewa] regimes were discredited because they could not protect the territories from guerrilla attack.

Verrier levels a series of astonishing charges against African leaders. He writes of 'the virtual recruitment' by the British Secret Service of Mboya, Nyerere, Banda, Kaunda and Nkomo. He asserts that at the end of 1974 Robert Mugabe 'became aware of Tongogara's plans for Chitepo's removal' and that his acquiescence in these plans 'was the first critical step taken by Mugabe in his rise to power.' Although he goes on to say that the truth of Herbert Chitepo's assassination is not known, there is the strongest possible implication that it was the work of Tongogara, endorsed by Mugabe. Tongogara and Mugabe were, says Verrier, the Trotsky and Lenin of the Zimbabwean revolution.

The nature of Zimbabwean reaction to all this matters less, of course, than whether or not it is true. Verrier produces no evidence for any of it. It is all a matter of assertion. The reader has to decide whether to accept Verrier as a man who knows; whether to trust his style of cynical certainty. I am prudish enough to suppose that charges of this sort require verification.

BOOK REVIEWS

It may be that what he has to say about British policies and politicians is more securely founded. Certainly it is this part of the book which accounts for its popularity in Zimbabwe. Verrier reveals consistent British duplicity and self-interested manipulation. He asserts that ever since the 'decision by Attlee and Bevin to build a nuclear deterrent, South Africa acquired a power to determine what Britain would or, more usually, would not do concerning Southern Africa in general and Southern Rhodesia in particular.' At a time when Zimbabwe and other African states confront Britain over the issue of sanctions, Verrier is praised for having revealed the true and shabby nature of Britain's Southern Africa policy. I am as ready as the next man to believe badly of what has been on the whole a record of British incompetence and bad faith. But even here Verrier achieves many of his effects through a studied cynicism rather than through the production of new evidence.

But all my reservations disappear when it comes to chapter 19 on the 1980 elections. Here for once Verrier leaves himself enough space to deploy detailed and original evidence and the result is a fascinating and important account. Here there are even 'good guys', the Commonwealth Monitoring Force and the Commonwealth Observer Group. This is excellent contemporary history which goes a long way to redeem the rest of the book.

TERENCE RANGER

University of Manchester

The OAU After Twenty Years

Amadu Sesay, Olusola Ojo and Orobola Fasehun

Boulder, Colorado: Westview (distributed in the UK by IPI). 1984. 133p. £24.00pb

The 'Ife School', that most dynamic and prolific group of young Nigerian scholars associated with the Department of International Relations at the University of Ife, Nigeria, has come out with yet another study on African international relations and organisations. It is indeed fitting that in order to mark the twentieth anniversary of the Organisation of African Unity (OAU), three of the most prominent members of that School decided to tackle a subject which is not really a favourite in the Africanist academic community. In The OAU After Twenty Years, Sesay, Ojo and Fasehun investigate the performance of the OAU since its inception, focusing on four areas of central concern to African states: decolonisation, conflict control, development and human rights. They examine the OAU's record against the challenge of apartheid and the OAU's lack of resources and effective sanctions. The authors make a number of suggestions for enhancing the OAU's future viability and its ability to address the continent's pressing economic and social needs. The 102 pages of text are usefully complemented by four appendices, including the complete text of the 'African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights'. The most glaring and unjustifiable omission is that of even a rudimentary bibliography.

Tackling the whole spectrum of the OAU's activities over a time-span of twenty years in about one hundred pages is quite a challenge in itself. The three authors valiantly rose to it in producing a fairly comprehensive, well documented and adequately argued account of the OAU's achievements in four crucial issue-areas. On the problem of decolonisation, they observe that 'soft options' such as moral persuasion and socio-political and economic sanctions failed to bring about any significant changes in the Southern African white minority regime's stubborn refusal to accept majority rule. Yet, while committed in principle to armed struggle as the only effective way of bringing about effective change in the region, the African states' support of this struggle, through the OAU's African Liberation Committee (ALC) was, according to the authors, 'feeble, inadequate, and intermittent' (p 19), essentially because of insufficient financing. Turning to the issue of inter-African conflicts, the authors find a similar lack of commitment and effectiveness. Looking at the OAU's attempts to find peaceful solutions to some of these conflicts—the Chad civil war, the Ethiopia–Somalia dispute, the Tanzania–Uganda conflict, and the conflict in Western Sahara—the authors conclude that all of these attempts have failed dismally, thus exposing the low resource base and powerlessness of the organisation. The OAU's record in the other two issue-areas tackled in the book—economic development and human rights—is equally poor. The global picture which emerges from this analysis is that of the OAU as a powerless and ineffectual organisation, due to a definite lack of political commitment on the part of the member-states resulting in vastly inadequate financial and human resources. It is interesting to note in this regard that in a recent study on his perceived role at the helm of the organisation (Et demain l'Afrique, Stock, 1985), the former Secretary-General of the OAU, Edem Kodjo, arrives at precisely the same conclusion.

In addition to providing us with an incisive and thought-provoking analysis of the OAU's activities and shortcomings, the authors should be credited with a most commendable effort at making their study policy-relevant by offering advice and suggestions as to how the OAU could be made more powerful and effective. In this regard, they suggest a number of constitutional and institutional changes, notably that the OAU Charter be revised in line with Africa's current and future political and economic needs, and that new organs, such as an African Security Council and a Court of Justice for Human Rights, be established. Whether these are acceptable and feasible options, given the political climate currently prevailing in Africa, remains to be seen. Yet in the end, there is no way that the African states can avoid confronting these issues which are crucial to the very survival of the OAU as a reasonably effective pan-African organisation.

It is only to be regretted that such recommendations are not based on an adequate analysis of the constitutional, institutional and financial deficiencies of the OAU, which is conspicuously lacking in this study, except for occasional references. Other shortcomings inherent in the book are: often superficial analysis leading to undocumented statements an obvious lack of precision and attention to detail, inadequate references and absence of bibliography. But in spite of these, Sesay, Ojo and Fasehun have provided us with a timely, informative and very readable account of this 'most important continental political organisation' (p 92).

GUY MARTIN

Diplomacy Training Programme, University of Nairobi

The Family in Contemporary Egypt

Andrea B Rugh

New York: Syracuse University Press. 1984. 305pp. $32.00. $14.95pb

This book provides the first in-depth and comprehensive analysis in English of the emotional relationship and social roles of family groups in Egypt. It is the view of an outsider who, however, has a thorough understanding of Egyptian society having lived and worked in the Middle East for fifteen years.

The main focus of this study is on lower- and middle-class urbanites and their adjustments to the contemporary conditions of cities as Egypt has become highly urbanised during the last decade. The great social cleavage in Egypt in terms of style of life, expectations and opportunities comes between the lower and middle urban classes.

Not only are family relationships discussed but also other influences on them. Marriage, divorce and family solidarity are thoroughly examined. While Christians invariably marry for life, Muslims can easily obtain a divorce. Vested interests of the family often dominate marriage decisions more than individual needs. While marriage to relatives is considered desirable to consolidate family solidarity, marriage to strangers can be more advantageous.

The family as a group has remained strong, reinforcing traditional values in the face of stresses caused by rapid economic changes and the ideological challenges of modernisation and Western influences. The traditional role of the women has changed from one of being a homemaker to one of the working mother supplementing the family income.

A few pages of the book are devoted to comparison with American society. It would have been a more interesting book if the comparative analysis with American society had been expanded. The Egyptian would see in American society a lack of social connection, a de-emphasis on family life, and minimal time spent by both males and females in demonstrating the affection they feel for one another, and regard this as a heavy and possibly even unacceptable social cost. The American can fall back on the informal 'we're all equal' stance when engaging a stranger, but for an Egyptian this never works. the person must respond correctly to status level in order to avoid unnecessary trouble. The stranger deliberately flaunts his status to avoid confusion by his dress, car, and mannerisms.

The book presents scholarly information in a fluent style. It achieves its objective of explaining Egyptian culture to Westerners.

MARGARET R BISWAS

Balliol College, Oxford

Sikh Separatism: The Politics of Faith

Rajiv A Kapur

London: Allen and Unwin. 1986. 272pp. £20.00

Terrorism is a world-wide phenomenon which dramatically captures headlines everywhere. Each occurrence, however, has its own historical, social and political context. The one common element is that innocent people are killed in the process. The Punjab State in India presents what on the surface seems like an unlikely environment for a terrorist movement which has been conducted by followers of the Sikh religion since 1981. Sikhs represent a 60 per cent majority in the state, they are among the most economically prosperous communities in India, and, since September 1985, they have wielded political power through the leading Sikh party in the state, the moderate Akali Dal.

Rajiv Kapur treats one core element of the situation in a meticulous examination of the development of a Sikh identity which separates it from the other religions in the region, particularly Hinduism. India's newest religion, beginning in the fifteenth century, underwent a revival beginning in the late nineteenth century in the context of Hindu, Islamic, and Christian competition. That revivalism continues with militant, extremist and terrorist dimensions. Separatism in terms of identity is a crucial dimension to what are considered to be the mainstream or keshdari Sikhs, who follow the notions or practices established by the tenth and last Guru, Gobind Singh, in 1699. These Tat Khalsa Sikhs clearly became dominant during the temple reform movement in the 1920s, which is the focus of this volume.

Separatism in regard to an independent state for the Sikhs is another matter. Nor is separatism in terms of religious identity necessarily a part of terrorism. These distinctive elements of religious and political separatism lie at the core of the contemporary Punjab problem. How to distinguish between them in terms of public policy has been a long-term problem in the Punjab.

Rajiv Kapur tends to skirt this crucial issue in his carefully researched book based on his D.Phil. dissertation from the University of Oxford. By 1920, he concludes, the 'evolution of Sikh communal consciousness had led to political organisation' which 'bred militancy and saw the emergence of a Khalsa nationalism' (p 92). The establishment of the Shiromani Gurdwara Prabandhak Committee (SGPC) to manage Sikh temples and its driving force, the Akali Dal, certainly provided political institutions for the Sikhs, both for religious and political purposes. The case study provided here of the 1920-25 period is revealing as to how the revitalised Sikh identity and its new institutions were employed. In spite of the label 'Akali fanaticism' (p 105), and the acknowledged militancy of the temple reform movement, the Akalis essentially followed a Gandhian strategy of non-cooperation, non-violence, and at times, interrelated with the Congress nationalist movement (p 123). Opponents of the temple reform movement employed violence, as at Nankana Sahib, where at least 130 members of an Akali non-violent group were killed in February 1921 (p 110). Government repression of Sikh political activities also proved important in prolonging the movement. Negotiations between the Sikh reformers and the government were suspended in 1922 at least partly because of 'official repression' (p 49). It took three more years of massive Akali Dal-led agitations before a compromise could be effected, which in its major features conceded the SGPC/Akali demands. They gained control of their temples, but the cost was high. During the five year period of the movement, 30,000 Sikhs were arrested, 400 died, and 2,000 were wounded (p xv).

The author is correct in stating that the Sikh Gurdwaras Act of 1925 'provided an institutional structure for Sikh communal separatism' (p 7). It is also notable that this did not translate into political separatism even during the trauma associated with the uprooting of Sikhs from western Punjab during the partition between India and Pakistan in 1947. 'Political leverage as a community' (p 209) remained an important concern which resulted in Akali Dal agitations for a Punjabi-speaking state with a Sikh majority. That movement succeeded in 1966. The author briefly deals with this period in Chapter 7 as a lead-in to the contemporary problem of the 1980s. The analytical care given to the temple movement of the 1920s is replaced in this chapter, and in the succeeding epilogue, by a careful summary of the major events leading up to 26 January 1986, at which point Sikh extremists once again occupied the Golden Temple.

BOOK REVIEWS

A concluding analytical chapter could have made a good scholarly book into an excellent one. What in terms of public policy can be learned from the 1920-25 movement that is relevant in the 1980s? Establishing the evolution of Sikh identity and its institutionalisation is important. But, existing scholarship has already accomplished that important task. Are the 1980s different to the 1920s with regard to Sikh separatism? Is Sikh terrorism in the 1980s a minor chord roughly equivalent to the Ghaddar revolutionary movement of the 1920s, or are there qualitative differences? Sikh institutionalisation in the SGPC for managing the temples and in the Akali Dal as a political party have been under attack by the extremists in the 1980s. Are Sikh channels for religious and political purposes being replaced by formerly obscure religious seminaries like the Damdami Taksal and the All India Sikh Students Federation? If the lessons from the 1920s movement are learned, it is more likely that reconciliation will be effected within the frame of the mainline institutions and the context of a dynamic Punjab. But, as in the 1920s, the cost is high.

PAUL WALLACE

University of Missouri-Columbia

An Introduction to Shi'i Islam. The History and Doctrines of Twelver Shi'ism

Moojan Momen

London: Yale University Press. 1985. 397pp. £18.50

Shi'ism and Social Protest

Edited by Juan R I Cole and Nikki R Keddie

London: Yale University Press. 1986. 325pp. £35.00. £9.95pb

The reason for the virtually simultaneous publication of two books on Shi'i Islam by Yale University Press is not hard to fathom. As interest in contemporary Iran, the country of Shi'i Islam, remains high, the books are timely. But has the passing of the first flush of the Iranian revolution brought us any closer to a deeper understanding of its causes and nature?

Although the aim of the two books is similar, the content differentiates them. Momen sets out to describe the major features of Shi'i Islam. It is, as the title proclaims, an introduction. And a useful one. The title of Chapter Two—'The question of the succession to Muhammad'—is, as the first line states, 'clearly the key question in Shi'i Islam and the principal factor separating Shi'is from the Sunni majority' (Momen p 11).

Shi'i belief revolves around the figure of Ali, also widely revered by Sunnis. Ali's charisma, comprised of personal chivalry and charm, is undisputed. The Prophet said 'I am the city of knowledge and Ali is its gate'. A sense of exclusiveness identifies the Shi'i. 'The Shi'is saw themselves as an "elect" (al-khassa) living among the generality (al-'amma) of the Muslims' (p 192). Characteristically Shi'i institutions which distinguish Shi'i from Sunni Islam are discussed, the Mut'a temporary marriage, for instance. 'Marriage for a fixed term and usually for a pre-determined financial arrangement is considered allowable by Shi'is. The marriage may be for any length of time, even for a matter of hours' (p 182). Sunnis scoff at the Mut'a, deriding it as a lustful act concealed under a religious cover. Also 'The more accommodating attitude to women expressed in Shi'i law over divorce and inheritance . . . attributed to the important position held by Fatima among Shi'is' (p 183). Shi'i women are more active than their Sunni sisters in other religious functions too: 'the sufra (literally tablecloth) . . . consists of an invitation by the hostess to a number of other women to join her for a meal which is usually preceded or followed by a discourse by a mulla (often female) on a religious theme' (p 243).

The appendices and photographs are helpful. The first appendix is a chronology of political and religious events in Shi'i history, the second lists Shi'i dynasties and the third contains biographies of prominent ulama.

Momen's detailed bibliography, which includes Arabic and Persian sources, has some strange omissions: for example, Professor Said Arjomand, himself an Iranian, edited From Nationalism to Revolutionary Islam which was published in 1984 and contains related material; also, only one of Ali Shariati's books is mentioned.

Thirdly, the low-key and descriptive nature of Momen's work balances the views of Shi'i Islam suggested by Professor Michael Fischer (Iran: From Religious Dispute to Revolution, 1980). Contemporary Iran, Fischer had argued, could be best understood in terms of what he called the 'Karbala paradigm'. Ecstasy, passion and a high degree of commitment were characteristics of the paradigm. Momen's view is a corrective to Fischer. But the book lacks a central focus. There are bits on Iraq, India—there was a flourishing Shi'i centre in Hyderabad—etc but they are not woven into broad, general arguments. No questions are answered as to what is causing the turbulence in Iranian society. Worse, questions are not even raised. It is to some of these questions that the contributors in Shi'ism and Social Protest turn.

The collection by the thirteen experts—a popular form of instant think-tank in contemporary Western social sciences—looks at Shi'ism from various angles: Iran's foreign policy, the Shi'i in Saudi Arabia and even sexuality in Shi'i Iran. Some of the authors are well-known—Professors Nikki Keddie and Fred Halliday, for example—others are still doctoral candidates, David Edward and Nahid Yeganeh. The collection suffers from uneven contributions. Old Middle East hands such as Fred Halliday are sure of themselves, others more tentative and groping.

The dedication to Malcolm Kerr who was killed in 1984 while President of the American University of Beirut may hint at an Orientalist predisposition. Although Orientalist clichés are in evidence in the arguments—in the introduction the editors talk of the 'Old World'—the contributors have kept a wary eye on Edward Said.

Cole and Keddie make three important points. First: 'Shi'ism is not now and never has been a monolithic movement, nor have either the ulama (religious scholars) or the followers of this branch of Islam always been activists or united in their views' (p 2). Second: 'Indeed, one of the conclusions indicated by several contributors . . . is that nationalism has often proven stronger than obvious religious or sectarian allegiances, even in states with weak national identities' (ibid). The content of Imam Khomeini's foreign policy—nah sharq, nah gharb, 'neither East nor West'—is as much a nationalist reflex as an Islamic one. Third, acting as a corrective to the Fischer thesis:

In the past several years the word Shi'i has often, especially in the United States, taken on the connotation of 'fanatic' or 'terrorist', and we are often told that Shi'is have a 'martyr complex' that makes them welcome death in pursuit of their cause. In fact, the majority of the world's assassins in the past century have been Europeans of Christian background, and with the exception of the mediaeval 'Assassin' sect, which belonged to a different line than today's politicized Shi'is, Shi'is were not known until very recently for either terrorism or special devotion to offensive holy wars (which most Twelver ulama have held were forbidden during the occultation) (ibid. p 28).

The book contains a major methodological flaw. It ignores the historical continuity of Shi'i Islam that partly explains contemporary Iranian society and politics. Take, for example, Muhammad Majlisi, in the seventeenth century, who is a precursor of Imam Khomeini. Author of over sixty books he was the undisputed religious scholar of his time, the Shaykh al Islam. Leading the ulama he forced the Safavid court to empty its wine cellars. The oscillation in power between the imperial authority of a semi-divine monarch and an aggressive, meddlesome Shi'i ulama is one of the important features in Iranian history. Khomeini's victory over the Shah may thus be seen as a logical culmination of the historical movement of the ulama to power.

In their emphasis on the diversity and complexity of Shi'i Islam these books serve a useful function. However, we are still far from possessing a cogent analytic understanding of Shi'i Islam or contemporary Iran. The search must continue.

AKBAR S AHMED

Sibi, Pakistan

The Role of the Military in Politics: A Case Study of Iraq to 1941

Mohammad A Tarbush

London: Kegan Paul International. 1982. 187pp. £8.95pb

Muhammad Tarbush's book is a meticulous and perceptive study of the first nine years of the state of Iraq, and in particular of the military coups that took place in Iraq between 1936 and 1941. The book is primarily based on British and Iraqi archival sources, Arabic memoirs and interviews with former politicians of the period.

Although Iraq gained a measure of political independence in 1932, the country remained firmly under British control until the Revolution of 1958. The main pillars of British control in Iraq were the monarchy—itself a British creation—and the tribal sheikhs. As a result of the gradual expansion of education and the growth of political awareness in the country as a whole, dissatisfaction with the narrow base and unrepresentative nature of the indigenous political system increased. Muhammad Tarbush shows convincingly the way in which the monarchy managed to hold the balance between the British and the various competing political groups and factions. King Faisal's death in 1933 left a political vacuum, and the newly created Iraqi army became an additional and influential source of power within the political system. Although a succession of army commanders were able to acquire influence and military authority for a time, British control continued behind the scenes.

It is a particular pleasure to read the complex story leading up to Bakir Sidqi's coup in 1936 and to that of Rashid 'Ali in 1941. Tarbush ably describes the composition and background of the various groups of army officers competing for power. Although the political complexion of the officers participating in the coup had not changed substantially by 1941, the idea of Arab nationalism had taken firmer root within the army, and the army itself had moved into the centre of the Iraqi political stage.

MARION FAROUK-SLUGLETT

Institute of Development Studies, Leiden University

Access to Justice—The Struggle for Human Rights in South East Asia

Edited by Harry M Scoble and Laurie S Wiseman

London: Zed. 1985. 224pp. £6.95

Over the past two years we have been treated to the spectacle of 'show trials' in Indonesia, in which many prominent dissidents have been imprisoned on patently trumped-up charges. What is striking is that President Suharto's regime should go to the trouble of immobilising its opponents through lengthy legal procedures when these only serve to give publicity to opposition charges against the government which would not otherwise have been heard. The key factor here is the search for 'legitimacy' among South East Asia's largely authoritarian governments. They have used references to ancient customs, modern legal practice or Western-inspired 'development' models to disguise political and human rights abuses as part of normal government conduct. Indeed, when challenged over specific examples of such abuses, many South East Asian governments have retorted that Western interpretations of democracy, press freedom and other human rights are irrelevant to the societies of South East Asia, without actually rejecting these concepts. Ruling elites in the region reserve for themselves, of course, the right to interpret how these concepts are put into practice.

The publication of Access To Justice is the outcome of a meeting of human rights activists from the member states of the Association of South East Asian Nations (ASEAN), held in the Philippines in 1982. The participants were all representatives of non-governmental organisations aiming to create a regional agency for the protection of human rights and their submissions make up the contents of the book. From the outset the contributors counter the common grounds on which governments in the region reject criticism of their human rights records, first by arguing that the principles of individual rights embodied in the UN Charter are rooted in general human experience, and are not merely a product of European culture. Then the articles analysing particular aspects of human rights in the ASEAN member states (Indonesia, Malaysia, Thailand and the Philippines) demonstrate just how far individual rights can be and are subverted within the law in each country. No delegate to the meeting could be found to represent Singapore, the fifth ASEAN member at the time.

The core of Access to Justice is the series of articles describing legal anomalies in ASEAN countries. Many of the contributing writers are lawyers, and legal defence is a crucial part of human rights protection in a region where the law serves as an instrument of oppression. Besides varying degrees of state control over legal procedures, ASEAN governments can use draconian legislation (for example Indonesia's Anti-Subversion Law, Malaysia's Internal Security Act and Thailand's Lèse Majesté law) to suppress opposition. The authors of these articles go further to acknowledge that infringements of more general rights, to education and subsistence for example, prevent most inhabitants of ASEAN countries from exercising the legal rights they do have.

Discussion of other human rights issues is confined to the last section of the book, covering freedom of the press and of association, and the special position of women in South East Asian societies. These are important issues but they do not fit in well with the rest of the book, and seem to reflect the specialised knowledge of other delegates to the meeting. It is also evident that the lawyers have restricted their debate to the limited areas where they can advance the cause of human rights while continuing to work, as they do, within the systems they criticise. No mention is made by the Indonesian contributors of the atrocities committed by Indonesian troops in East Timor and Irian Jaya, where rule of law is virtually non-existent. However, Access to Justice provides us with a striking picture of human rights problems as seen from inside South East Asian countries—something which has hitherto been badly needed.

JEREMY SMITH
London

Human Rights Activism in Asia: Some Perspectives, Problems and Approaches

Asian Coalition of Human Rights Organisations (ACHRO)

New York: Council on International and Public Affairs/International Center for Law and Development. 1984. 77pp. n/p

This short but enlightening publication summarises discussions held in Bangkok in December 1983 between human rights activists from seven Asian countries and from LAWASIA based in Australia. The meeting was convened by the International Center for Law in Development in New York, and led to the establishment of the Asian Coalition of Human Rights Organisations (ACHRO).

This is the second Asia-based human rights coalition to have been established in the last few years. The first was the Regional Council on Human Rights in Asia which came into being following a meeting in February 1982 of human rights non-governmental organisations (NGOs) from four South-East Asian countries, convened by the Washington-based Human Rights Internet. It would be easy to conclude that these are competing endeavours, but a more likely—and generous—explanation is that whereas the Regional Council concentrates on activities related to legal aid and access to justice, ACHRO seeks to deal with human rights activism around a far broader range of issues, encompassing social and economic rights and the right to enjoy the fruits of economic development. Whatever the differences, however, it seems difficult to justify the existence of two distinct bodies.

To judge by most of the contributions contained in this, ACHRO's first publication, it would appear that human rights activism is being promoted as an alternative to political activism. There is nothing wrong with trying to cope with the need for structural change through grass-roots organisations assisted by supporting organisations of human rights activists, the 'external catalysts' which concentrate on conscientisation, legal aid and so on, provided, as one paper points out, 'they resolutely refrain from dominating the community they work with' (p 38). But the trouble with most Asian countries is that the right to organise in political parties and to contest for control of the state in free and democratic elections has been all but wiped out. It is a pity that this problem is not addressed by ACHRO.

As is to be expected, the country contributions are widely contrasting. The most impressive are the short contributions from the Philippines which are meaty and informative, describing specific struggles and discussing the dilemmas faced when a grass-roots campaign is initially successful, only to be thwarted by the lack of power to safeguard implementation. A contribution from Bangladesh provides a fascinating account of the activities of the Bangladesh Society for the Enforcement of Human Rights, in defence of women's rights against violence and coercion at the hands of their husbands.

At the other extreme is the Indonesian contribution which offers no information at all about specific human rights struggles in Indonesia, but concentrates rather on the need for ACHRO to engage in a study of human rights NGOs. This hardly seems the most useful way to use the limited resources of the embryonic regional human rights movement.

The various contributions reveal differing and often conflicting strategies over the right to development. One paper offered in the second part of the book dealing with the Coalition's future programme, advocates a campaign pressing for a criminal code for development, establishing penalties for 'agricrimes' (ie crimes relating to agrarian development), 'crimes against health' and 'crimes against the right to development'. This would only reduce social, economic and political activism to a preoccupation with legal and constitutional procedures, detracting attention from the crucial issue of statepower. If this is the direction chosen by those promoting ACHRO, it reinforces the impression that the Coalition could have a detrimental effect on human rights activism in Asia. If for no other reason, this publication is well worth studying in order to understand the problems raised by alternative strategies being advocated through regional councils that are being nurtured and promoted by US-based organisations. They too should not be allowed to exceed their role as 'external catalysts'.

CARMEL BUDIARDJO

London

Chinese Democracy: The Individual and the State in Twentieth-Century China

Andrew J Nathan

London: I B Tauris. 1986. 315pp. £16.50

Nathan's book is one of the most important on contemporary China to appear in a long time. The argument is unlikely to be of comfort to those who would hope to see a liberal transformation of China under the present reforming leadership, but it is presented with a rare sensitivity for the character and nuances of the Chinese tradition.

In an extraordinarily atmospheric first chapter Nathan sets the scene with an account of the brief efflorescence of the democracy wall movement in 1978-79. Neither dissidents nor dissenters, its participants were in a long tradition of loyal remonstrance invited by a regime which, confronted with seemingly intractable problems, had 'opened the road for speech'. This did not prevent Deng Xiaoping, his dominance confirmed at the plenum of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of December 1978, from bringing the movement to a halt with a series of arrests and trials. Nathan develops a subtle series of parallels between these contemporary events and the activities and ideas of the reformers of 1898 (whose ascendancy lasted a mere 100 days). Liang Qichao, the most influential intellect amongst them, shared the major preoccupations of the democracy movement. Though experience tempered his early populism, he always assumed that there was no fundamental conflict between the individual and the state, the chief obstacle to the realisation of the public interest in China being the suffocating tradition of bureaucratic autocracy. It is unsurprising that the latter-day reformers should identify the same problem in the Chinese condition. As Nathan observes, in Liang's time the holders of official office in the bureaucracy numbered 27,000, though they were assisted by anything up to 1 million underlings. In the People's Republic, for a population twice the size, the number of cadres had swollen to around 75 million.

BOOK REVIEWS

Deng Ziaoping's Gengshen reforms of 1980, in seeking to make the bureaucracy more responsive to the people's demands, went some of the way to accepting the case made by the democracy movement's writers. These reforms required the bureaucracy to deal rapidly and impartially with the complaints of the public, sought to revitalise the electoral base and the effectiveness of local and small unit government, and aimed to revive the investigative and critical role of the media. Although radical critics were quick to point out that these reforms were bound to be superficial, and some brave spirits within the party even sought a deeper explanation for China's malaise, Wei Jingsheng was almost alone in basing his critique of the communist monopoly of political power on a theory of individual human rights. Nathan points out the conceptual difficulty entailed in any discussion of 'rights' within the Chinese political vocabulary. Thus has the Chinese tradition neatly dovetailed with the Marxist view of this issue, Chinese constitutions before and after 1949 being unanimous that rights are defined and granted by the state and limited by law.

The sections of the book dealing with the role of the media are less compelling, but the argument is sustained that reformers for a century have expected the press to perform a role more or less propagandist. This has produced a jaded and sceptical public, though one awake to subtle nuances even if only to anticipate trouble. The final chapter on the local elections of 1980—tragedy or farce according to perspective—shows how few of the democracy movement's ideas have been permitted official currency despite the emergence of a reforming leadership. Chinese democracy is no closer to a realisation than it was in 1898.

JAMES COTTON

East Asia Centre, University of Newcastle-upon-Tyne

The Economies of Central America

John Weeks

New York: Holmes and Meier. 1985. 209 pp. n/p

Although the amount of material published on Central America has risen dramatically in recent years, there is no standard work on the economics of the region. Professor Weeks' book is timely, comprehensive and combines detailed empirical analysis with a keen appreciation of political economy. The book comprises eight chapters; the first is an historical introduction and this is followed by two chapters which consider the region's growth performance relative to that of Latin America and the Caribbean. Chapters 4, 5 and 6 examine in turn the region's external sector, agricultural development and the growth of manufacturing occasioned by the establishment of the Central American Common Market. The special position of Nicaragua is considered in chapter 7 while the final chapter reviews the causes of the present crisis in Central America and includes a short summary of the prospects for each of the five countries plus Panama.

The book gets off to a fine start with an essay on the history of the region which emphasises the peculiarities of its colonial legacy, discusses early attempts at regional unification and, in particular, avoids the temptation of reducing history to an account of US intervention. Professor Weeks then focuses on the current period, buttressing his arguments with generous supplies of empirical data covering the period 1960-80. Not only is Central America poor, he argues, but the standard of living of the majority of the region's population, as reflected by social indicators and income distribution statistics, is substantially below that of other Latin American countries at comparable per capita income levels. At the same time, the author qualifies his argument by pointing to the unevenness of development, Costa Rica standing in sharp contrast to Guatemala and Honduras. The central argument, however, which takes up the three middle chapters, is that 'underdevelopment' is critically linked to the vulnerability of a development model driven by a narrowly specialised agro-export sector, in most countries at the expense of peasant-based food agriculture. The argument is developed with skill, eschewing dependency-style generalisations for rigorous analysis of balance-of-payments data including terms-of-trade swings, the region's chronic deficit in services and the growing problem of net capital outflows.

Food agriculture, which employs the bulk of the peasantry, deserves more than one chapter since it is central to the author's argument; capitalist development of agro-exports, starting with coffee but then incorporating bananas, sugar, cotton and livestock has substituted a 'quasi-proletariat' for a 'quasi-feudal' rural labour force and, except in Costa Rica, short-circuited the development of an independent peasantry. This hypothesis, appropriately documented and qualified, contrasts with the more traditional account of peasant marginalisation. An interesting observation is that Central American agriculture does not obey the 'inverse-size law'; ie, the inverse relationship between yield and holding size. Nor has the development of manufacturing industry following the establishment of the Central American Common Market done much to correct the structural imbalances inherent in the agro-export model. As Professor Weeks shows, it is the vulnerability of the model to external shocks, and not the limited size of the domestic market, which has acted as the crucial constraint on industrialisation.

Nicaragua alone has attempted to break the mould through agrarian reform, trade and aid diversification and state-led accumulation. Unfortunately, this attempt was crippled at the outset by the economic and social costs of the war against Somoza, the collapse of commodity prices and of intra-regional trade and, since 1982, by US aggression. In the rest of the region, growth prospects are virtually nil; the CACM has collapsed, growing social conflict has led to massive capital flight and indebtedness.

Moreover, the US recipe for recovery is tending to undermine the basis of further industrialisation. Nowhere is this more evident than in Costa Rica, the country which has probably suffered most from 'structural adjustment' policies while least requiring them.

This is quite a good book, certainly the most comprehensive and detailed account of regional economics published to date. Although the argument is occasionally submerged by statistical detail, overall it is cohesive and convincing. It will become a standard work for students of the region and will be a valuable addition to the general reader's collection.

GEORGE IRVIN

Institute of Social Studies, The Hague

Jose Marti: Architect of Cuba's Freedom

Peter Turton

London: Zed. 1986. 159pp. £18.95. £6.95pb

There are many who claim the legacy of Jose Marti. In today's Cuba, he is regarded as the precursor of the 1959 Revolution, and it is hard to refute that viewpoint. For Marti was the leader of the movement that finally brought independence to Spain's last Latin American colony. Marti himself was killed early in the second Independence War (1895-98), but he was the acknowledged leader of the movement and its architect in both ideological and practical terms. Perhaps there was a compensation in his early death (at 42 years old), for he did not live to see Cuba's independence wrenched from it within a year by a rapacious USA anxious for a Cuban bridgehead to the southern continent. Marti's project, therefore, was not completed until the 26th July Movement led by Castro and Guevara entered Havana in 1959—ousting the dictatorship of Batista—and declared Cuba's political and economic separation from the USA two years later.

The metropolitan countries remain largely ignorant of the writings of the major thinkers of Latin American independence (Mariategui, Recabarren, Mella, Farabundo Marti, for example). So Peter Turton's book is a welcome addition to the bibliography (in English) on Marti, which is as scant as the work in Spanish is rich and varied. He addresses Marti as 'an intellectual phenomenon', emphasising the Cuban revolutionary's adherence to the idealism of Karl Krause, a philosopher popular in late nineteenth-century Spain. The influence is undeniable, but Turton gives it a priority which ends by misrepresenting Marti's political and theoretical evolution. In giving equal weight to all Marti's writings, and sticking to a fairly strict chronological approach, the final impression is that Marti remained an idealist philosopher.

Of course, Turton is at pains to emphasise Marti's significance as an organiser of the independence struggle, yet the weight of material and the stress on the continuity of Krausist influence is at odds with that assertion. In my view, Marti's most important work was concentrated into the last eight years of his life when (see Turton's interesting chapter on Marti and American Labour) 'Marti's revolutionary zeal forced him into a political praxis that . . . outstripped the ideological premises that formed his view of the world'. The necessities of the struggle itself led him to criticise his earlier idealism for its failure to speak to his increasingly central political base among organised Cuban workers (especially the tobacco workers of Florida). It was in these last years that he levelled his sharpest attacks against racism (renouncing his earlier liberal view of the problem). And it was here too (after the Haymarket events in Chicago) that he came to acknowledge that change must be won through struggle, violent if necessary.

What is fascinating about Martí is not in his writings alone (which are often quite florid and confusing, the more so when the translations are rather awkward) but in the dynamic relations between the writer and the activist, whose ideas were always—in the end—forged in and for the coming struggle for Cuban independence, to which he finally gave his life.

MIKE GONZALEZ

University of Glasgow

Agrarian Reform and Rural Poverty: A Case Study of Peru

Tom Alberts

Boulder, Colorado: Westview. 1983. 306pp. £19.75pb

Miners, Peasants and Entrepreneurs: Regional Developments in the Central Highlands of Peru

Norman Long and Bryan Roberts

Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 1984. 288pp. £25.00

One positive outcome of the reformist military government of General Juan Velasco that ruled Peru between 1968 and 1975 was to stimulate interest in that country's history, politics and development problems. The two volumes reviewed here are a product of the 1970s boom in Peruvian studies. Tom Alberts' study on the agrarian reform process, the most important policy implemented during the military docenio, addresses the question of agricultural growth prior to 1968, the long-term performance of Peruvian agriculture and its potential for higher growth, in addition to rural income distribution before and after the completion of the agrarian reform process.

Alberts was a UN employee posted to work on agricultural planning in Peru between 1968 and 1971. This provides a key to the strengths and weaknesses of the book. On the one hand, the author had access to a wealth of statistical data, which he presents to suggest that although the Peruvian military were concerned with both equity and growth, more stress was laid on the former policy objective. It is also argued that the agrarian reform failed to attain its goals with respect to income redistribution, the stimulation of higher agricultural productivity and growth, or the provision of markedly greater employment opportunities. Alberts suggests that this disappointing outcome was due mainly to a shortage of good farmland and the pursuance by the Velasco government of the long-established policy of favouring the town over the country, and industry over agriculture. In addition, land was most commonly distributed to permanent workers and tenants on the haciendas, to the exclusion of the poorest minifundistas. If this helped to reduce the impact of land reform in the spheres of income redistribution and employment, productivity and growth also stagnated due to inadequate policies on prices, credit and shortcomings in the provision of extension services. All this is not controversial and is already common knowledge.

Other aspects of the book are less satisfactory. As an international bureaucrat, the author was parachuted into Peru and understandably does not have a good grasp of the nation's history, especially its rural history. This leads him to present an extremely simplistic and stereotyped view of rural society, one that adheres to the hacienda-minifundia dichotomy, to give one example. It also produces a number of erroneous statements, such as the claim that the sugar-cane plantation proletariat were not well organised until after World War II (p 127). Further evidence of the author's lack of a deep knowledge of Peruvian society and politics is his erroneous claim that in 1975 Velasco was replaced by General Maldonado (p 53). This deficiency is important because the author is as a consequence unable to place the agrarian reform in a historical perspective. He fails to realise that from at least the 1940s through to 1969 the hacienda in Peru was already in an (accelerating) process of dissolution. On the coast, for example, since the late 1950s landowners had been evicting tenants and reducing the number of permanent resident labourers in their employ. They had also begun to divide and sell off sections of their holdings to family members, outsiders or sitting tenants. The outcome of these trends was that when the military enacted land reform in 1969, a two-fold movement whereby the ranks of the casually employed rural proletariat were swollen, along with an expansion of a class of 'independent' relatively well-to-do farmers, was well under way. The agrarian reform did nothing substantial to alter these trends, which have gathered pace with the sub-dividing of many CAPs. Moreover, viewing the rural scene from his desk in the Ministry of Agriculture in Lima, it is hardly surprising that the author fails to adequately describe the dynamic of the various class conflicts taking place in the countryside over the years 1969-76, and the important effect of these on: (i) the implementation of reform; and (ii) the attainment of policy objectives. Another serious weakness of this book is that it completely fails to discuss in a meaningful fashion the cooperative structures established by the Velasco reform and the contradictions within them. These had important implications for productivity, employment and income distribution, which after all are some of the author's main concerns. Overall, this book says little that has not been more comprehensively described elsewhere by José María Caballero, Elena Alvarez, Mariano Valderrama, and others who possess a far better understanding of rural Peru. Finally, the volume is very repetitive, tedious and peppered with typographical errors.

The contributors to the volume edited by Norman Long and Bryan Roberts possess a far deeper knowledge of Peruvian history and contemporary society. This book sets out to explore 'whether integration into the international capitalist economy entails relative stagnation for underdeveloped economies or the possibility of sustained economic growth and diversification' (p 1). Through essays examining the impact of the mining sector on the urban and rural economy of the central highlands (social stratification in peasant villages, the creation of a labour market, migration, etc), the authors conclude that significant growth and diversification has occurred. This capitalist development, however, has not taken place along classical lines: a large proletariat has not been formed, nor has the peasantry been swept from the soil. A large middle class has failed to appear. Instead capitalist development in this region has spawned a diffuse class of small- and medium-scale entrepreneurs in town and country.

Remembering the pessimistic forecasts of the dependency school in the 1960s and 1970s, at a time when the Latin American economies were performing quite well, it is paradoxical that the authors reach optimistic conclusions about economic 'growth and diversification' during a period when these economies are in severe depression, especially Peru which is suffering its worst crisis since the War of the Pacific during the last century. Most of the research for this volume was conducted between 1970 and 1972. If they were working in Huancayo today, might the authors reach different conclusions? One weakness of the book is that it fails to theorise the economic circumstances leading to the form of capitalist development they describe, as well as the strengths and weaknesses of the regional elite in the economic and political sphere. In addition the chapters relating to the rural sector are less comprehensive than those on the towns, with the section on agrarian reform being particularly weak as it does not address the question of social conflict in the countryside in the post-reform era. Like the volume by Alberts, Long and Roberts also do not present an adequate discussion on the contradictions within the cooperative sector. Fortunately, Peruvian scholars are taking the lead in investigating such issues.

LEWIS TAYLOR

University of York

Peruvian Contexts of Change

Edited by William Stein

Rutgers, New Jersey: Transaction Books (distributed in the UK by CLIO). 1985. £25.40

This collection of papers organised around the related themes of town and country, and metropolis-hinterland, opens with a long essay by the Peruvian anthropologist, Luis Millones, showing the role of colonial urban culture in moulding social attitudes towards serranos, mestizos and blacks in contemporary Lima. The article is particularly interesting insofar as it concentrates on life histories and social relations among slum-dwellers resident in the centre of Lima, a group that has tended to be ignored as research has concentrated on the shanty towns that encircle the Peruvian capital. The remaining essays address various aspects of life in the highlands. That by César Fonseca on peasant communities stresses the high degree of class differentiation within what were once regarded as egalitarian rural institutions. This is now common knowledge to anyone familiar with contemporary literature on the Andean peasantry, although Fonseca's case studies from the Callejón de Huaylas are of value as this is an understudied zone. Unfortunately, the author fails to back up many statements with empirical evidence. Nor does he rigorously explore the impact of demographic increase and growing integration into the capitalist market as factors undermining the turno system of land allocation in the communities, so contributing to a decline in communal work practices and landholding.

In her essay on women and men in Vicos, Florence Babb demonstrates that the end of landlord domination in the 1950s has not brought an advance in the position of women in that district of the northern highlands. Greater opportunity for involvement and economic gain in new activities once the landlord departed from the hacienda has resulted in a tendency for peasant men to move into these mercantile, waged employment and production spheres, so increasingly entrapping women in domestic functions, as well as reducing their role in agricultural decision-making. Not only have men tended to monopolise the expanding cash economy in Vicos, girls experience unequal access to schooling. The book concludes with an essay by William Stein on townspeople's attitudes to country dwellers and vice versa in the Gellejón de Huaylas, where stress is laid on feelings of mutual suspicion, prejudice and contempt. Although several of the essays are rambling, overall this volume is of use as a teaching aid as much of its contents relate to the department of Ancash, which has in the 1970s and 1980s been relatively neglected as a region for research.

BOOK REVIEWS

LEWIS TAYLOR

University of York

I The Supreme

Augusto Roa Bastos

New York: Knopf. 1986. 433pp. $18.95

The work of the Paraguayan writer Augusto Roa Bastos cannot be understood without reference to the formative events of Paraguayan history. In his magisterial novel, I The Supreme, Roa takes as his focus the remarkable ruler Dr José Gaspar Rodríguez de Francia, who, after the independence of the country in 1811, established himself as the Perpetual Dictator of the Republic until his death in 1840. Francia inherited a divided and anarchic country and by systematic ruthlessness forged an independent republic. He destroyed the power of the creole elite, the Spanish merchants and the independence of the church, built up and strictly controlled an army, directed education, expropriated land for the national patrimony, fostered a process of miscegenation through enlightened racial laws, and created an egalitarian, rural-based, society. He limited foreign trade and encouraged economic self-sufficiency at a time when other republics were becoming dependent on the advancing British empire, and maintained the nation's boundaries despite the incursions of neighbouring Argentina and Brazil. Francia does not conform to our present-day stereotype of the cruel, selfish dictator: he was an extremely popular figure known in Guaraní as the Karai-Guasú (the 'great lord'). With these policies, Paraguay had become by the mid-nineteenth century a relatively advanced and prosperous nation.

Lack of space precludes an analysis of the destruction of this independence, which eventually led to the emergence, one hundred years later, of General Alfredo Stroessner, a grotesque parody of Francia's 'supreme' vision for Paraguay. Like Francia, he has developed the cult of personality. Unlike Francia, he has invited massive foreign investment benefitting a small, corrupt elite, allowed Brazil to make incursions in the country, waged war against the native Indian population, and increased an unequal system of land tenure. The country is ruled by fear, torture, imprisonment, and ruthless suppression of political parties, though there are signs that the system is beginning to break down. In such conditions there has been a mass exodus from the country: it is estimated that by 1979 almost a third of Paraguay's two million inhabitants lived outside the country.

The problem of exile is a dominant theme in Roa's work. The word exile has many connotations. It refers most explicitly to his own life as a writer, producing all his work since 1947 in what he calls the obsessive and alienating atmosphere of exile. There is also the exile from one's audience. How to write, not just for a public subject to strict censorship, but also for a people who are largely illiterate and whose culture is mainly oral? Even the language a writer uses cannot be neutral: Spanish is the language of the coloniser; Guaraní, the native Indian language, survives with great strength (Paraguay is a predominantly bilingual country) as an oral rather than a written tradition. Roa also constantly points to the limitations of his own profession: for him, the intellectual will always play an ambiguous and minor role in the necessary struggle for social justice in Paraguay. In The Supreme, Roa positions himself as a 'compiler' of texts that deal with Dr Francia. With this device he seeks to deny the author as an entity who can work in complete autonomy, unconnected to reality. He speaks insisted of books written by the people, made up of different voices, cultured and uncultured.

The novel is a dialectic between the words that make up the title: I (the first person, Francia, the writer), The (the third person, the audience, the people), Supreme (the supreme power, of law and of imagination). For the most part the dictator is dictating to his scribe and to the people. He is in charge of the word, of law, and of history. By appropriating language, by narrating his own story, he can appropriate history. He attempts to fuse within himself theory and practice, necessary to preserve the independence and increase the prosperity of Paraguay. It is impossible to summarise this extraordinary novel in a few lines. It incorporates the latest developments in linguistic theory and practice, talks of the arbitrariness and unreliability of language which purports to describe reality, re-reads and comments upon the various histories and travellers' accounts of Paraguay, ranges across the breadth of Latin American history, implicitly condemning Stroessner and debating with Fidel Castro, and exploring once again the gap between writer and reader. In the end, Francia's task is doomed: the supreme imagination of one man must be fused with the aspirations of the people, who cannot be treated as mere passive recipients. The final anguish of the dictator is also the anguish of Roa the compiler: how to write a message that can be received, how to make one's own commitment honest and useful?

The translation of Roa's novel into English is a major achievement: it is an extraordinarily complex and inventive text, and Helen Lane, the translator, has produced a very competent version. It is also encouraging that the work is receiving wide distribution: published by Knopf in the United States in 1986 and by Faber and Faber in Britain early this year. Roa's novel is one of the major achievements of Latin American fiction.

JOHN KING

University of Warwick

Recent Publications

BOOKS*

- Adamolekun, Ladipo: Politics and Administration in Nigeria. Ibadan: Spectrum Books. London: Hutchinson. 1986. 203pp. np.
- African Centre for Monetary Studies: National Financial Policies and Capital Formation in Africa. Dakar, Senegal: African Centre for Monetary Studies. 1986. 205pp. np.
- Agarwal, Bina: Cold Hearths and Barren Slopes: the Woodfuel Crisis in the Third World. London: Zed. 1986. 209pp. £18.95hb/£6.95pb.
- Ajami, Fouad: The Vanished Imam: Musa al Sadr and the Shia of Lebanon. London: I B Tauris. 1986. 228pp. £15.95pb.
- Akpabot, S E: Football in Nigeria. London: Macmillan. 1985. 104pp. £3.50pb.
- Amin, Sayed Hassan: Commercial Law of Iran. Tehran: Vahid Publications (Distributed in the UK by Royston). 1986. 144pp. $27.00 and £15.00hb.
- Amirtham, Samuel and Pobee, John S: Theology by the People: Reflections on Doing Theology in the Community. Geneva: World Council of Churches. 1986. 143pp. SFR14.90pb.
- Ata, Ibrahim Wade: The West Bank Palestinian Family. London: Kegan Paul International. 1986. 166pp. np.
- Attwell, Michael: South Africa: Background to the Crisis. London: Sidgwick and Jackson. 1986. 224pp. £9.95pb.
- Avnery, Uri: My Friend, The Enemy. London: Zed. 1986. 340pp. £20.95hb/£6.95pb.
- Barchard, David: Turkey and the West. London: Royal Institute of International Affairs. 1985. 100pp. £5.95pb.
- Barker, C E, Bhagavan, M R, Mitschke-Collande, P V and Wield, D V: African Industrialisation: Technology and Change in Tanzania. London: Gower. 1986. 227pp. £19.50hb.
- Baxter, Craig (ed): Zia's Pakistan: Politics and Stability in a Frontline State. London: Westview (Distributed in the UK by IPI). 1986. 122pp. £20.00pb.
- Blecher, Marc: China: Politics, Economics and Society: Iconoclasm and Innovation in a Revolutionary Socialist Country. London: Frances Pinter, Boulder, Colorado: Lynne Rienner. 1986. 232pp. £22.50hb/£6.95pb.
- Blondal, Gisli: Fiscal Policy in the Smaller Industrial Countries, 1972-82. Washington DC: International Monetary Fund. 1986. 230pp. $12.50pb.
- Bray, Francesca: The Rice Economies: Technology and Development in Asian Societies. Oxford: Blackwell. 1986. 154pp. £22.50hb.
- Breytenbach, Breyten: End Papers. London: Faber and Faber. 1986. 170pp. £12.50hb.
- Brink, Andre and Coetzee, J M: A Land Apart: A South African Reader. London: Faber and Faber. 1986. 256pp. £9.50hb.
- Brown, MacAlister and Zasloff, Joseph J: Apprentice Revolutionaries: The Communist Movement in Laos, 1930-1985. Stanford, California: Hoover Institution Press (Distributed in the UK by Clio). 1986. 463pp. £12.15pb.
- Browne, Robert S and Cummings, Robert J: The Lagos Plan of Action vs the Berg

* This is a list of books that have been received by Third World Quarterly for review; they are not available for sale through Third World Quarterly.

- Report: Contemporary Issues in African Economic Development. Washington DC: Howard University Press 1985. 216pp. $10.50pb.
- Butler, Nick: The International Grain Trade: Problems and Prospects. London: Croom Helm. 1986. 176pp. £25.00hb.
- Camba, Julio R, Caplin, David A, and Mulckhuyse, John J: Industrial Energy Rationalisation in Developing Countries. London and Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press. 1986. 114pp. np.
- Cassen, Robert and Associates: Does Aid Work? Report to an Intergovernmental Task Force. Oxford: Oxford University Press. 1986. 381pp. £25.00hb/£9.95pb.
- Cerne, Michael M (ed): Putting People First: Sociological Variables in Rural Development. Oxford: Oxford University Press (for the World Bank) 1986. 430pp. £23.00hb.
- Chatterjee, Partha: Nationalist Discourse and the Colonial World: A Derivative Discourse. London: Zed. 1986. 181pp. £16.95hb/£6.95pb.
- Choksi, Armeane M and Papageorgiou, Demetris: Economic Liberalisation in Developing Countries. Oxford: Blackwell. 1986. 278pp. £27.50hb.
- Cohen, Robin: Endgame in South Africa? The Changing Structures and Ideology of Apartheid. London: James Currey/Paris: UNESCO. 1986. 108pp. £4.95pb.
- Commonwealth Secretariat: Vulnerability: Small States in the Global Society. London. Commonwealth Secretariat. 1986. 126pp. £5.00pb.
- Dathorne, Ronald: Dele's Child. Washington DC: Three Continents Press. 1986. 158pp. np.
- Davis, David Brion: Slavery and Human Progress. Oxford: Oxford University Press 1986. 374pp. £6.95pb.
- de la Torre, Ed: Touching Ground, Taking Root: Theological and Political Reflections on the Philippine Struggle. London: Catholic Institute for International Relations. 1986. 214pp. £5.75pb.
- de Vries, Margaret: The IMF in a Changing World 1945-85. Washington DC: International Monetary Fund. 1986. 226pp. np.
- Dewar, David, Alison Todes and Watson, Vanessa: Regional Development and Settlement Policy: Premises and Prospects. London: Allen and Unwin. 1986. 175pp. £20.00hb.
- de Silva, K M: Managing Ethnic Tensions in Multi-Ethnic Societies: Sri Lanka 1880-1985. New York: University Press of America. 1986. 429pp. $36.50hb/$19.75pb.
- Di Palma, Giuseppe and Whitehead, Laurence: The Central American Impasse. London: Croom Helm (for the Friedrich Naumann Foundation). 1986. 252pp. £25.00hb.
- Dixon, C J, Drakakis-Smith, D and Watts, H D: Multinational Corporations and the Third World. London: Croom Helm. 1986. 200pp. £19.95hb.
- Donham, Donald and James, Wendy (eds): The Southern Marches of Imperial Ethiopia: Essays in History and Social Anthropology. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 1986. 308pp. £25.00hb.
- Drake, Paul W and Silva, Edouardo (eds): Elections and Democratization in Latin America, 1980-85. San Diego, California: University of California. 1986. 335pp. np.
- Ekins, Paul: The Living Economy: A New Economics in the Making. London: Kegan Paul International. 1986. 398pp. £8.95pb.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS

- El-Khawas, Mohamed: Qaddafi: His Ideology in Theory and Practice. Brattleboro, Vermont: Amana Books. 1986. 222pp. $18.95hb/$9.95pb.
- Erllich, Haggai: Ethiopia and the Challenge of Independence. London: Frances Pinter/Boulder, Colorado: Lynne Rienner. 1986. 265pp. £27.50pb.
- Fage, J D and Oliver, Roland (general eds): The Cambridge History of Africa, Vol 7. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 1986. 1063pp. £50.00hb.
- Farley, Lawrence T: Plebiscites and Sovereignty: The Crisis of Political Illegitimacy. Boulder/Colorado: Westview (Distributed in the UK by IPI). 1986. 179pp. £21.00hb.
- Fenton, Thomas P and Heffron, Mary J: Asia and the Pacific: A Directory of Resources. London: Zed. 1986. 137pp. £18.95hb/£6.95pb.
- Fenton, Thomas P and Heffron, Mary J: Latin America and the Caribbean: A Directory of Resources. London: Zed/New York: Orbis. 1986. 142pp. £18.95hb/£6.95pb.
- Foster, L J: Agricultural Development in Drought-Prone Africa. London: Overseas Development Institute with the Tropical Agricultural Association. 1986. 88pp. £4.95pb.
- Fukui, Haruhiro (ed): Political Parties of Asia and the Pacific. London: Greenwood Press. 1986. 1376pp. £137.50hb.
- Gallagher, Dennis (ed): International Migration Review: Refugees: Issues and Directions. (special issue). New York: Center for Migration Studies. 1986. 538pp. np.
- Gallagher, Dennis (ed): International Migration Review: Refugees: Issues and Directions (special issue). New York: Center for Migration Studies. 1986. 538pp. np.
- Gillon, Werner: A Short History of African Art. London: Penguin. 1986. 405pp. £9.95pb.
- Gregory, Peter: The Myth of Market Failure: Employment and the Labour Market in Mexico. London and Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press. 1986. 299pp. np.
- Griffith-Jones Stephany and Charles Harvey: World Prices and Development. London: Gower. 1985. 377pp. np.
- Gupta, Bhabani Sen: Afghanistan: Politics, Economics and Society. London: Frances Pinter. 1986. 206pp. £22.50hb/£6.95pb.
- Gupta, K L: Finance and Economic Growth in Developing Countries. London: Croom Helm. 1986. 241pp. £17.95hb.
- Hamilton, Clive: Capitalist Industrialisation in Korea. London: Westview (Distributed by IPI). 1986. 193pp. £26.00hb.
- Hamilton, F E Ian (ed): Industrialisation in Developing and Peripheral Regions. London: Croom Helm. 1986. 363pp. £27.95hb.
- Hamilton, Nora and Harding, Timothy F (eds): Modern Mexico: State, Economy and Social Conflict. London: Sage. 1986. 312pp. £16.50pb.
- Haq, Khadija and Kirdar, Uner (eds): Human Development: The Neglected Dimension. Islamabad: North-South Roundtable. 1986. 446pp. np.
- Harding, Harry (ed): China's Foreign Relations in the 1980s. London: Yale University Press. 1984. 240pp. np.
- Hemenway, Robert E: Zora Neale Hurston: A Literary Biography. London: Camden Press. 1986. 371pp. £7.95pb.
- Hill, Polly: Development Economics on Trial: The Anthropological Case for a Prosecution. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 1986. 198pp. £22.50hb/£7.95pb.
- Hinnebusch, Raymond A Jr: Egyptian Politics under Sadat: The Post-Populist

- Development of an Authoritarian-Modernising State. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 1985. 322pp. £25.00hb.
- Hope, Kempe Ronald: Guyana: Politics and Development in an Emergent Socialist State. Ontario, Canada: Mosaic Press. 1985. 136pp. $19.95hb/$12.95pb.
- Howard, Rhoda E: Human Rights in Commonwealth Africa. Totowa, New Jersey: Rowman and Littlefield. 1986. 250pp. $34.50hb.
- Howe, James, The Kuna Gathering: Contemporary Village Politics in Panama. Austin, Texas: University of Texas Press. 1986. 326pp. $27.50hb.
- Hubbard, Michael: Agricultural Exports and Economic Growth: A Study of Botswana's Beef Industry. London: Kegan Paul International. 1986. 284pp. £25.00hb.
- Huitman, Tami (ed): The Africa News Cookbook: African Cooking for Western Kitchens. London: Penguin. 1986. 175pp. £5.95pb.
- Institute for Black Research and 992 Women Workers: Factory and Family: The Divided Lives of South Africa's Women Workers. Durban: Institute for Black Research. 1984. 105pp. np.
- Isby, David and Volstad, Ron: Russia's War in Afghanistan. London: Osprey. 1986. 48pp. £3.95pb.
- Ismael, Tareq Y and Ismael, Jacqueline S: P D R Yemen: Politics, Economics and Society. London: Frances Pinter. 1986. 183pp. £22.50hb/£6.95pb.
- Jacobsson, S. Jamison, A. and Rothman, H (eds): The Biotechnological Challenge. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 1986. 181pp. £22.50hb.
- Joseph, Helen: Side by Side: The Autobiography of Helen Joseph. London: Zed. 1986. 249pp. £18.95hb/£6.95pb.
- Joshi, Barbara R (ed): Untouchable: Voices of the Dalit Liberation Movement. London: Zed. 1986. 166pp. £18.95hb/£6.95pb.
- Kamel, Mohamed Ibrahim: The Camp David Accords: A Testimony by Sadat's Foreign Minister. London: Kegan Paul International. 1986. 414pp. £25.00hb.
- Last, Murray and Chavanduka, G L (eds): The Professionalisation of African Medicine. Manchester University Press. 1986. 293pp. £29.95hb.
- Mazrui, Ali A: The Africans: A Triple Heritage. London: BBC Publications. 1986. 336pp. £14.95hb.
- McCord, William and Arline: Paths to Progress: Bread and Freedom in Developing Societies. London: W W Norton. 1986. 352pp. £14.50hb.
- Munck, Renaldo: The Difficult Dialogue: Marxism and Nationalism. London: Zed. 1986. 184pp. £22.50hb/£8.95pb.
- Nam Joo-Hong: America's Commitment to South Korea: The First Decade of the Nixon Doctrine. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 1986. 218pp. £22.50hb.
- Netanyahu, Benjamin (ed): Terrorism: How the West can Win. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson. 1986. 254pp. £14.95hb.
- Neuhaus, Richard John: Dispensations: The Future of South Africa as South Africans See it. Michigan: Eerdmans. 1986. 317pp. $16.95hb.
- Ndegwa, Philip: Africa's Development Crisis and Related International Issues. London: James Currey. 1985. 153pp. np.
- Pobee, John S and von Wartenburg-Potter, Barbel (eds): New Eyes for Reading: Biblical and Theological Reflections by Women from the Third World. Geneva: World Council of Churches. 1986. 108pp. SFr11.90, US$5.95 and £3.95pb.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS

- Said, Edward W: After the Last Sky: Palestinian Lives. London: Faber and Faber. 1986. 174pp. £6.95pb.
- Singham, A W and Hune, Shirley: Non-Alignment in an Age of Alignments. London: Zed. 1986. 420pp. £20.95hb/£7.95pb.
- Strange, Susan: Casino Capitalism. Oxford: Blackwell. 1986. 207pp. £19.50hb/£7.95pb.
- Valkenier, Elizabeth Kridl: The Soviet Union and the Third World: An Economic Blind. New York: Praeger. 1985. 188pp. np.
- Vickery, Michael: Kampuchea: Politics, Economics and Society. London: Frances Pinter. 1986. 211pp. £17.50hb/£6.95pb.
- Wheelwright, Ted (ed): Consumers, Transnational Corporations and Development. Sydney: University of Sydney Press. 1986. 390pp. $A19.00pb.
- Wright, Robin: Sacred Rage: The Wrath of Militant Islam. London: André Deutsch. 1986. 315pp. £10.05hb.

PAMPHLETS

- Anti-Slavery Society: Female Genital Mutilation: Excision and Infibulation. A Biography. London: Anti-Slavery Society. 1986.
- Ayb, Mahmood Ali and Hegstad, Sven Olaf: Public Industrial Enterprises: Determinants of Performance. Washington DC: World Bank. 1986.
- Brau, Eduard et al: Export Credits: Developments and Prospects. Washington DC. International Monetary Fund. 1986.
- Cater, Nick: Sudan: The Roots of Famine. Oxford: Oxfam. 1986.
- Coates, Ken: China and the Bomb. Nottingham, England: Bertrand Russell Foundation. 1986.
- Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People: Living Conditions of the Palestinian People in the Occupied Territories. New York: United Nations. 1985.
- Crossley, Michael and Vulliamy, Graham: The Policy of SSCEP: Context and Development. Papua New Guinea: Educational Research Unit. 1986.
- Davidow, Jeffrey: Dealing with International Crisis: Lessons from Zimbabwe. Muscatine, Iowa: Stanley Foundation. 1983.
- Erzan, Refik, Laird, Samuel and Yeats, Alexander: On the Potential for Expanding South-South Trade through the Extension of Mutual Preferences among Developing Countries. Geneva: United Nations Conference on Trade and Development. 1986.
- European Institute for the Media: EEC Assistance to Third World Media. Brussels: Commission of the European Communities. 1986.
- Evans, M: The Front-line States, South Africa and Southern African Security: Military Prospects and Perspectives. Harare: University of Zimbabwe. 1986.
- Food and Agriculture Organisation: FAO in Africa. Rome: FAO. 1986.
- Food and Agricultural Organisation: Strategy for Fisheries Management and Development. Rome: FAO. 1986.
- Freeman, Michael: Genocide in World-Historical Perspective. Colchester, England: University of Essex, Department of Government. 1984.
- Hansohm, Dirk and Wohlmuth, Karl: Promotion of Rural Handicrafts as a means of

- Structural Adjustment in Sudan, with Specific Reference to Darfur Region. Bremen: University of Bremen, Sudan Economy Research Group. 1985.
- Harper, Malcolm and de Jong, M F (eds): Financing Small Enterprise: Proceedings of a seminar organised by the Netherlands Development Finance Company. London: Intermediate Technology Publications. 1986.
- Heller, Peter S, Haas, Richard D and Mansur, Ahsan S: A Review of the Fiscal Impulse Measure. Washington DC: IMF. 1986.
- International Monetary Fund: Primary Commodities: Market Developments and Outlook. Washington DC: IMF. 1986.
- International Society of Human Rights: Human Rights and Namibia. London: ISHR. 1986.
- Isis International Women's Information and Communication Service: The Latin American Women's Movement: Reflections and Actions. Rome: ISIS International. 1986.
- Johnston, Alistair I: China and Arms Control: Emerging Issues and Interests in the 1980s. Ottawa: Canadian Centre for Arms Control and Disarmament. 1986.
- Karmiloff, Igor: Third World's Import Needs and Potential: A European Perspective. London: Overseas Development Institute. 1986.
- Landell-Mills, Joslin: The Fund's International Banking Statistics. Washington DC: IMF. 1986.
- Levitsky, Jacob: World Bank Lending to Small Enterprises: A Review. Washington DC: World Bank. 1986.
- Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development: Canada: OECD Economic Surveys. Paris: OECD. 1986.
- Palmer, Ingrid: The Impact of Agrarian Reform on Women. West Hartford, Connecticut: Kumarian Press. 1985.
- Price, Catherine: Britain and Tanzania: The Search for Real Aid. London: Independent Group on British Aid. 1986.
- Pugh, Cedric: Housing Theory and Policy. Bradford, England: MCB University Press. 1986.
- Sundaram, Jomo Kwame: Development and Population: Critiques of Existing Theories. Kuala Lumpur: Population Studies Unit, University of Malaya.
- Thiik, Ambrose R, Lok, John Luk, Bior, William and Benjamin, Barnaba M: Sudan Today: A Collection of Talks given at the Africa Centre. London, March 1985. London: Sudan People's Liberation Movement. 1986.
- United Nations: The United Nations and the Question of Palestine. New York: United Nations. 1985.
- United Nations Department for Disarmament Affairs: Conference on Security, Disarmament and Development in Africa: Meeting of Experts. New York: United Nations. 1986.
- Vogel, Robert C and Brukett, Paul: Mobilising Small-Scale Savings: Approaches, Costs and Benefits. Washington DC: World Bank. 1986.
- Wohlmuth, Karl and Hansohm, Dirk: Sudan: A Case for Structural Adjustment Policies. Bremen, West Germany: University of Bremen. 1986.

Information for Reviewers

Third World Quarterly is enlarging and widening the scope of its book review section and welcomes reviews of trade and academic, fiction and non-fiction paperback and hardback titles.

Third World Quarterly aims to publish timely reviews of a large selection of significant books every quarter. Our review will provide a valuable critique, even if the reader does not intend to turn to the book, or has already read it. It is beneficial to our readership if books under review, especially scholarly titles, are set in context against the author's past work or other trends in the contemporary literature.

Books covering current crisis regions are particularly welcome, as are biographies of eminent people who have made a contribution to the developing world. Strict 'development studies' titles will only be considered if the review is written without academic jargon and the books are not highly technical. Monographs and textbooks will generally be listed. Comparative surveys of a field of study will be accepted only if they include titles from the past few years.

Reviews of notable Third World fiction are welcome as are reviews of foreign language publications. Reviews of titles published in the Third World, particularly novels, will get special consideration, in order to redress the imbalance of books produced in the West.

As Third World Quarterly carries signed reviews, it expects an individual contribution from the reviewers in terms of insight and perception. Reviews should be written by those with a proven reputation in the relevant field, so that the reviewer's response is an additional point of interest to the book itself.

Presentation of Book Reviews

- Bibliographical details: Complete mention must be made of the book's title and subtitle (if any); author's full name as accredited; location and name of the publisher; as well as year of publication; number of printed pages; and the publishers price of hardback and paperback (if applicable).
- Reviewer information: The name of the reviewer as the person wishes to be accredited. Affiliation with any institution, including current position, needs to be communicated along with the review.
- Footnotes: Reviews should avoid footnotes. Only rarely will an exception be made.
- Jargon: Reviews should be free of jargon, clichés, pedantry, pointless information, personalised attacks and anecdotal asides.

Notice for Publishers

Please send Third World Quarterly review copies of titles upon publication, and bound galley in advance of publication if you have them; also include press releases and other information that might be helpful to a reviewer. Original paperbacks and important reissues will be reviewed.

Information for Authors

Third World Quarterly welcomes contributions on important Third World matters; preference will be given to those which deal succinctly with an issue which is both important and clearly defined. Articles which are narrative or descriptive and lacking in analytical content are unlikely to be accepted. Comparative articles are welcome but should incorporate a balance of empirical evidence and theoretical speculation. The writing style should avoid academic jargon and colloquialism, and manuscripts should be carefully checked for errors.

Articles submitted to Third World Quarterly should be original contributions and should not be under consideration by any other publication at the same time: if an article is under consideration by another publication the author should clearly indicate this at the time of submission; if published in Third World Quarterly it cannot be reproduced in whole or substantial part elsewhere without permission from the Editor of Third World Quarterly. The Editor is responsible for the selection and acceptance of articles, but responsibility for errors of fact and opinions expressed in them rests with their authors. Copyright in articles published in Third World Quarterly is retained by the journal.

Full names of the authors should be given together with the full address to which correspondence should be sent, and, where possible, a contact telephone number. Current and recent academic and professional affiliations, for use in the 'Notes on Contributors' section should be supplied, together with a list of major publications (with dates) and of forthcoming books.

Authors are not expected to correct proofs of accepted articles. Every effort will be made to avoid errors and contributions will be checked at both galley and page-proof stages.

Authors are entitled free of charge, to twenty-five offprints and five copies of the issue in which their article appears.

Presentation of Manuscript

- Authors should submit two double-spaced typed copies (in English) on one side of A4 opaque paper. An additional copy should be retained by the author as manuscripts are not returned to authors.
- An abstract should be submitted with the manuscript; this is to comprise a one-paragraph summary of the main points of the article in not more than 150 words.
- Allow one inch margin on left-hand side and number manuscript pages consecutively throughout the manuscript. Broad divisions and section headings should be clearly marked where appropriate.

Vision of the future: an anthology of writings and speeches

The overwhelming and all-consuming desire to overthrow the apartheid regime has made opposition leaders reluctant to commit themselves to specific long-term policy objectives after the present system has been dismantled. Anxious both to preserve unity at all costs and devote themselves totally to the immediate struggle, most supporters of majority rule have preferred general statements condemning the current social order and emphasising the need for justice, equality and freedom for all.

The Freedom Charter, adopted at the Congress of the People in Kliptown, South Africa, on 26 June 1955, remains the official policy document of the African National Congress (ANC), the banned political movement which represents the aspirations of the vast majority of black South Africans. The Charter is the ANC's blueprint for a post-apartheid state, and it is therefore reproduced in full in this special issue of TWQ. In addition, certain speeches and writings of key opposition figures throw some light on how they perceive the task of building a new society. The following sections, which are divided into six major policy areas, are not intended as a comprehensive and definitive survey of their beliefs and favoured strategies. Rather, they are designed to suggest how possible future leaders might grapple with the thorny issues likely to face them, and to give some indication of the alternatives they may offer a free South Africa.

State structure and economy

'The ideological creed of the ANC is, and always has been, the creed of African Nationalism. It is not the concept of African Nationalism expressed in the cry, 'Drive the White man into the sea.' The African Nationalism for which the ANC stands is the concept of freedom and fulfilment for the African people in their own land. The most important political document ever adopted by the ANC is the Freedom Charter. It is by no means a blueprint for a socialist state. It calls for redistribution, but not nationalisation of land; it provides for nationalisation of mines, banks, and monopoly industry, because big monopolies are owned by one race only, and without such nationalisation racial domination would be perpetuated despite the spread of political power. It would be a hollow gesture to repeal the Gold Law prohibitions against Africans when all gold mines are owned by European companies. In this respect the ANC's policy corresponds with the old policy of the present Nationalist Party which, for many years, had as part of its programme the nationalisation of the gold mines which, at that time, were controlled by foreign capital. Under the Freedom Charter, nationalisation would take place in an economy based on private enterprise. The realisation of the Freedom Charter would open up fresh fields for a prosperous African population of all classes, including the middle class. The ANC has never at any period of its history advocated a revolutionary change in the economic structure of the country, nor has it, to the best of my recollection, ever condemned capitalist society.²

(Nelson Mandela's statement from the dock in The Supreme Court of South Africa, Pretoria, 20 April 1964, at the opening of the defence case¹)

'The future government of this country is the African National Congress, which represents the majority of our land. We shall have a future South Africa where we shall have one person, one vote, we shall have a unitary state, we shall have a country which belongs to all the people who live in it, who have made the country what it is.'

(Winnie Mandela²)

'In the present political structure there is no room for dialogue any more. Not at all. The chapter was closed by the government on 12 June 1964, when they jailed the leadership. Dialogue can only take place on the release of all our leaders in prison, all the banned people and the return of all our exiled leaders. That's the only way to shape the country's future. Anything else is a sheer waste of time. And even then it is questionable whether they would still be prepared for the dialogue they were prepared for twenty years ago. Can you spend a quarter of your life in prison and still be prepared for the dialogue with your jailers that you called for twenty years ago, before they locked you up? The leadership would have to be involved in an entirely new kind of political thinking; perhaps a completely new basis for dialogue and negotiation.'

(Winnie Mandela³)

'In the newly independent Third World countries, we have often seen serious inroads into civil liberties and human rights. The position of the people has often been worse under their own rulers than it ever was under their colonial masters. There is often no freedom of speech, or press freedom. Criticism of the use of power by largely totalitarian military dictatorships is frowned on.

VISION OF THE FUTURE

Political dissent is not allowed on the pretence that developing countries cannot afford the luxury of having a democratic system, or that one-party states are not necessarily dictatorships.²

(Desmond Tutu, Anglican Archbishop of Cape Town⁴)

"We have to develop authentically African forms of democracy. Blacks believe in community. But we are now beginning to lose that and that is one reason why I loathe capitalism. It is against community, it is all competition and selfishness. You see blacks today who actually boast of their ulcers because that is a symbol of their success. As you know, I have seen this in America too, so I'm not just talking theoretically. Are people happy under capitalism? No, from everything I have seen capitalism gives unbridled licence to human cupidity, to the law of the jungle. Capitalism and the free enterprise system—it is un-freedom, it is morally repulsive."

(Desmond Tutu⁵)

"It (liberation) must be a totally new social order. We have to recapture what was sacred in the African community before the white man came. We have to recapture real community, solidarity, respect for life, all the things the modern world has destroyed . . . There are so many schools of thought about economics and I try not to talk about it in a detailed way. What I have said many times is that we have to find our own way, and it has to be an African way. It can't be the capitalism that oppresses people here or the system you have in the US where only the elite benefit from the wealth and it never reaches the masses."

(Allan Boesak, Senior Vice-President of the South African Council of Churches⁶)

"Our mission on the continent of Africa is to demonstrate the possibility of a nonracial democratic state," he asserts with an evident feeling of pride. There will be no confederation, no consociation, no qualified franchise, "nothing like that". Must it be one person, one vote? "Not necessarily. But these are all details that will be decided collectively. The important thing is that there will be a unitary state, a common citizenship, one South Africa." Somewhat surprisingly, since this is not usual in ANC literature, he says it could be a multiparty state. "Well, the whites, for example, are going to need their own party," he says. I note that there are few multiparty states in Africa. Yes, he knows that, probably no more than five. He includes Tanzania in his count and seems a bit miffed when I point out that Tanzania is a one-party state. "Never mind," he says somewhat defensively, "if democracy is a rare thing in Africa, then that's part of our revolutionary challenge." Evidently economic details will also have to await a collective decision. "My own contribution to the decision would be that it should be a mixed economy, something like Sweden or China.”⁶

(Interview with Mfanafuthi Makatini, head of the ANC's observer mission at the UN, and member of the ANC's executive committee⁷)

‘Let me be explicit. For some while after apartheid falls there will undoubtedly be a mixed economy, implying a role for levels of non-monopoly private enterprise represented not only by the small racially oppressed black business sector but also by managers and business people of goodwill who have or are prepared to shed racism. It can only be an indigenous representative of the disastrous Pol Pot philosophy who can project a pole-vault into socialism and communism the day after overthrow of white rule. If the political domination of the old ruling class is ended and new state apparatus is constructed within the framework envisaged by the Freedom Charter, the existence of a mixed economy “controlled” in the words of the Charter “to assist the well-being of the people”, will facilitate rather than hinder the continuing drive towards a socialist future; a drive which, within a truly democratic framework, could well be settled in debate rather than on the streets.’

(Joe Slovo, Chairman of the South African Communist Party and member of the ANC Executive Committee⁸)

Foreign relations and investment

‘The starting point of African nationalism is the historical or even pre-historical position. Africa was, has been and still is the black man's continent. The Europeans, who have carved up and divided Africa among themselves, dispossessed, by force of arms, the rightful owners of the land—the children of the soil. Today they occupy large tracts of Africa. They have exploited and still are exploiting the labour power of Africans and natural resources of Africa, not for the benefit of the African peoples but for the benefit of the dominant white race and other white people across the sea. Although conquered and subjugated, the Africans have not given up, and they will never give up their claim and title to Africa. The fact that their land has been taken and their rights whittled down, does not take away or remove their right to the land of their forefathers. They will suffer white oppression, and tolerate European domination, only as long as they have not got the material force to overthrow it. There is, however, a possibility of a compromise, by which the Africans could admit the Europeans to a share of the fruits of Africa, and this is inter alia:

- a) that the Europeans completely abandon their domination of Africa;
- b) that they agree to an equitable and proportionate re-division of land;
- c) that they assist in establishing a free people's democracy in South Africa in particular and Africa in general.

VISION OF THE FUTURE

It is known, however, that a dominant group does not voluntarily give up its privileged position. That is why the Congress Youth puts forward African Nationalism as the militant outlook of an oppressed people seeking a solid basis for waging a long, bitter, and unrelenting struggle for its national freedom.' (Basic Policy Document, 1948, issued by the National Executive Committee of the ANC Youth League in 1948⁹)

'The multinational companies, as far as we are concerned, are political criminals in this country. We wouldn't be where we are today—politically—if it hadn't been for these foreign companies. The role they are playing is simply to defuse a militant situation. If you give a man a salary comparable to that of his white counterpart, and he goes back to the ghetto where he has no rights and remains a 'Bantu' and must carry that document of oppression, that dompas (literally, a 'damned pass'), you are only defusing and demoralising him into believing that his situation is normal, because you claim that his work situation is normal. But that's not true and it never can be.

'That is why foreign companies must get out. We are only interested in sanctions now. Every alternative has been examined by those men who have spent their lifetimes in prison. One doesn't dream for one minute that sanctions alone would bring the government down, or disinvestment alone. But it is part of a tool one can use. And in fact, tools of this nature which are instruments of liberation would lessen the bloodbath we are heading for, because you would expedite this long, long process of relieving the black man of his suffering. We know that foreign companies have literally financed our oppression; we know who our friends have been in the struggle . . . At the moment it's irrelevant who helps the black man to get rid of the shackles of oppression. There is yet that extremely difficult transition period which will be more difficult than in any other country. It will be our own Vietnam. Our suffering of today is absolutely nothing. We are facing a very, very grim future.'

(Winnie Mandela¹⁰)

'I would be more impressed with those (in the international community) who made no bones about the reason they remain in South Africa and said, honestly, "We are concerned for our profits," instead of the baloney that the businesses are there for our benefit. We don't want you there. Please do us a favour: get out and come back when we have a democratic and just South Africa.'

(Desmond Tutu¹¹)

' . . . we in South Africa share the experience of virtually every other liberation movement in the world, of the most consistent and generous support from the Soviet Union and other socialist nations. Today our cause is becoming more fashionable and we are certainly gathering more friends. But neither we nor our people will forget or allow themselves to be separated from those who have been consistently with them from the very beginning. This includes our African brothers who have sacrificed so much in support of our struggle.'

(Joe Slovo¹²)

'... we should note and pay tribute to the sterling role that the independent states of our region have played in the furtherance of our struggle. . . . All these countries have, each according to its ability, including the latest among them to achieve independence, made it possible for us to survive outside the borders of our country and to advance our cause at home and abroad. We have to ensure that, at all times, we guard the fraternal relations that exist between them and ourselves, whatever strains these relations may come under now and again. Other countries in our continent and Africa as a whole have also played an important role in the struggle against the apartheid regime, confirming the primary importance of our continent as our first rear base.'

(ANC's National Executive Committee Report, June 1985, presented by Oliver Tambo, President¹³)

Labour and trade unions

'The workers are the principal force upon which the democratic movement should rely . . .'

(Nelson Mandela¹⁴)

'Nothing is more important than what is happening in the labour movement. We are the wealth of this country. We dig the wealth of this land. We could bring this country down through our labour—these black hands. We have made it what it is and we can bring it down in the same way. The people are there in industry—starving. They are there in the mines—starving. They are there as domestic servants—starving. It is not a question of outside agitators or communists from Russia. It is us, the people. We don't have to be told we are hungry. We are hungry. The government thinks it can divide us—separate the trade unions from the man in the township, when in fact the trade union is made up of the same people—the worker is the same man who leaves Soweto at one in the morning to be at the white man's factory at five, because the trains are chock-a-block. The worker is the same man who has been removed physically from his roots, from his father's land, a so-called "black spot", and has been placed by a white man in an arid, uninhabitable place, a so-called "homeland"; and this worker looks across and sees the graves of his children who have died of malnutrition in a land that is one of the richest in the world.'

(Winnie Mandela¹⁵)

VISION OF THE FUTURE

'He (President P W Botha) is too late because he has not come to terms with the determination, bordering on recklessness, of black youth who flaunt ANC emblems openly. He cannot control the militancy of black labour unions which are going to be the power to watch.'
(Desmond Tutu¹⁶)

'A wide range of resolutions were dealt with at the launching congress of COSATU (Congress of South African Trade Unions), such as to fight for a national minimum wage; to demand the right to work for all; to call for disinvestment and to support sanctions against the regime . . . Our revolution requires a united and strong trade union movement—South Africa's future lies in the hands of its workers.'

(Communiqué issued by SACTU (South African Congress of Trade Unions), COSATU and ANC¹⁷)

Attitudes to communism

'As far as the Communist Party is concerned, and if I understand its policy correctly, it stands for the establishment of a state based on the principles of Marxism. Although it is prepared to work for the Freedom Charter, as a short-term solution to the problems created by white supremacy, it regards the Freedom Charter as the beginning, and not the end, of its programme. The ANC, unlike the Communist Party, admitted Africans only as members. Its chief goal was, and is, for the African people to win unity and full political rights. The Communist Party's main aim, on the other hand, was to remove the capitalists and to replace them with a working-class government. The Communist Party sought to emphasise class distinctions whilst the ANC seeks to harmonise them. This is a vital distinction. It is true that there has been close cooperation between the ANC and the Communist Party. But cooperation is merely proof of a common goal—in this case the removal of white supremacy—and is not proof of a complete community of interests.'

(Nelson Mandela¹⁸)

'There can be no doubt at all that the most serious challenge facing the world today is not communism, despite the adventures of Soviet Russia in Afghanistan, which have given South Africa a temporary breathing space. Most of the Westerners who have tended to have an obsession with the threat of world domination posed by communism, would like us to believe that that is in fact the case. South Africa has capitalised on this by describing herself, and trying to project herself, as the last bastion of Christian Western civilisation, against the predatory advances of communism. It has passed such laws as the Suppression of Communism Act and other viciously repressive legislation, and many in the West have been duped. "Communist" in South Africa has become the favourite swearword of those who support apartheid and the Nationalist government. Any opponent of apartheid could fall foul of the Suppression of Communism Act, even if he was known to be an ordained minister of a Christian denomination, who believed in God and who worshipped regularly. Very few in South Africa care to point out the blatant contradiction in all this.

'We have had to tell our white fellow South African that for blacks, the immediate concern is not with communism, however defined. For us it is but a future and hypothetical threat. Our priority concern as blacks, is the harsh reality of the present, which we experience every day of our lives at nearly every point.'

(Desmond Tutu¹⁹)

'I am opposed to communism, I am opposed to anything that is atheistic and I would not myself want to live in a communist society . . . I abhor capitalism. The way the West has operated by and large in the matter of apartheid gives me no reason to want to change my views about capitalism. My own preference would be for some form of socialism.'

(Desmond Tutu²⁰)

'I am sorry, talk about communism is unreal to me. Maybe there are communists and communist conspiracies, but that's all we hear about here and it's always the language of reaction and racism.'

(Allan Boesak²¹)

'It is not correct to say that the ANC is communist-oriented. We are a liberation movement and our direction is socialist. It's got to be, it could not be anything else, otherwise you sit down and accept the status quo. But as for the idea that the ANC is controlled by communists, or is communist-oriented, I reject it outright.'

(Oliver Tambo²²)

The Law

'In its proper meaning equality before the law means the right to participate in the making of the laws by which one is governed, a constitution which guarantees democratic rights to all sections of the population, the right to approach the court for protection or relief in the case of the violation of rights guaranteed in the constitution, and the right to take part in the administration of justice as judges, magistrates, attorneys-general, law advisers and similar positions. In the absence of these safeguards, the phrase 'equality before the law', in so far as it is pretended to apply to us, is meaningless and misleading. All the rights and privileges to which I have referred are monopolised by whites, and we enjoy none of them.'

(Nelson Mandela²³)

‘When the laws have been passed by the people, or through their democratically elected representatives, and when the laws are just, then they must be obeyed. But South Africa’s laws fail to pass that stringent test. None of them have been passed by the people’s democratically elected representatives, because 80 per cent of the people are excluded from the democratic process of law-making, and many of the laws, the whole apartheid system, is patently unjust.’

(Desmond Tutu²⁴)

‘When we oppose the State and resist its oppression, the State makes use of the idea of law and order to try to make us feel guilty and sinful. But “law” here is the unjust and discriminatory laws of apartheid and “order” here is the disorder of oppression and exploitation. We must as Christians resist this type of “law” and “order” and obey the law and order of God.’

(The Kairos Theologians²⁵)

The white population

‘The ANC is committed to non-racialism. The ANC cannot imagine a situation in which the white man does not exist. We never look at the people as black or white; it is the enemy who compels us to use those terms. The umbrella organisation of the ANC (the United Democratic Front) embodies everyone who is fighting side by side with us against oppression. The white student at Wits or Cape Town University who is beaten up by the same system that is beating up my people here in the Free State—must I ignore him? He is fighting the same cause as me. That is a fellow comrade. And you can’t ignore those students who today are so brave as to hold anti-Republic demonstrations with a vacant chair labelled “Nelson Mandela”. They are fellow human beings who are fighting side by side in our struggle. The South Africa of tomorrow that I’m fighting for will include that white child who has been so brave defying his Broederbond parents and shouting the slogans of my movement on the campus. I can’t ignore him. He is part of us.’

(Winnie Mandela²⁶)

‘It is not us, but the white man, who should be thinking of how he will fit into our future society. It’s his problem. He has the audacity to talk about the protection of minority groups when he is oppressing the majority. The arrogance! That he sits there in power for over four hundred years, legislating against millions and millions of people and oppressing us for all these generations, and now we must worry about the protection of minority rights, and of his property and his culture.’

(Winnie Mandela²⁷)

'To talk of white minority rights is to propagate an anti-democratic principle. The government of our unitary, non-racial, democratic state will be based on the will of all our people exercised through one person one vote. To categorise the population of South Africa in racial or ethnic terms and advance a perspective of a federation of such entities is to seek to perpetuate apartheid and deny our own people a democratic system.'

(Alfred Nzo, Secretary-General of the ANC²⁸)

'For years we have tried to make white South Africa understand that what we want is not to drive white people into the sea, but that we want a share in the decision-making processes of our country, a full and meaningful participation in government, what we want is the recognition that we are people that belong to that land, which is, after all, the land of our birth.'

(Allan Boesak²⁹)

'I don't think that white people in South Africa will want to die simply to remain white. I think that when they are faced with the reality of one violent confrontation after another, or even with the reality that they will have to kill wave after wave of black people simply to remain in power, I don't think that in the end that is what the majority of the white people want. I am quite willing to accept that there might be a substantial minority who will want that and be prepared to go through with it. I believe that whatever happens within the next ten years South Africa will still have to go through what I could call our Ku-Klux-Klan period, both in terms of individual actions and a broadening of the violent front that we are facing right now; but in the end white South Africans have to come to terms with realities. It is a question of what pressures can be put on the South African government both internally and externally and how effectively. When they face those realities they will change and they will accept that they have to live in a country where 80 per cent of the population is black, and they will have to accept that there will have to be some way of finding a form of government in which everybody is represented, in which there is full and meaningful participation for every South African. I don't think they will do that simply through a change of heart. I think that we still have to find meaningful ways of exercising pressure to force the South African government to realise that the only alternative to coming to grips with the realities of the South African situation is the kind of senseless ongoing killing that would finally result in greater chaos.'

(Allan Boesak³⁰)

Notes

- ¹ Nelson Mandela, The Struggle is My life, London: International Defence and Aid Fund for Southern Africa, 1986, p 173. This book is a compilation of Mandela's speeches and writings, together with historical documents and accounts of Mandela's life in prison by fellow inmates.
- ² Interview with Winnie Mandela on Granada Television (UK) World in Action, 23 June 1986.
- ³ Part of My Soul, London: Penguin, 1985, pp 127-8.
- ⁴ Desmond Tutu, Crying in the Wilderness, Oxford: Mowbray, 1982, pp 113-14.
- ⁵ Interview with Desmond Tutu in Richard John Neuhaus, Dispensations: The Future of South Africa as South Africans See It, Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1986, pp 131-2.
- ⁶ Interview with Allan Boesak in Dispensations, pp 198-9.
- ⁷ Interview with Mfanafuthi Makatini in Dispensations, pp 287-8.
- ⁸ Speech by Joe Slovo at the 65th Anniversary Meeting of the South African Communist Party in London on 30 July 1986. This speech, and the one made by Alfred Nzo, Secretary General of the ANC, are published by Inkululeko Publications; 39 Goodge Street, London W1P 1FD.
- ⁹ The Struggle is My Life, p 25.
- ¹⁰ Part of My Soul, pp 124-5.
- ¹¹ New York Times, 16 June 1986, 'Sanctions vs apartheid'; this article by Desmond Tutu was adapted from a Commencement Address at Hunter College, New York City.
- ¹² Speech by Joe Slovo at the 65th Anniversary Meeting.
- ¹³ Documents of the Second National Consultative Conference of the ANC, Zambia, 16-23 June 1985, Lusaka/London: ANC, 1985, p 10.
- ¹⁴ The Struggle is My Life, p 57.
- ¹⁵ Part of My Soul, p 124.
- ¹⁶ Desmond Tutu, Hope and Suffering, London: Fount Paperbacks, and Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1985, pp 128-9.
- ¹⁷ Published by SACTU in the pamphlet called Workers' Unity (60, 61) 1986.
- ¹⁸ Statement from the dock on 20 April 1964; The Struggle is My Life, pp 173-4.
- ¹⁹ Crying in the Wilderness, pp 106-7.
- ²⁰ The Guardian (London), 11 August 1986.
- ²¹ Dispensations, p 249.
- ²² New York Times, 7 February 1982.
- ²³ 'Black man in a white court', Nelson Mandela's first court statement made in the Old Synagogue Court, Pretoria, in 1962; The Struggle is My Life, p 135.
- ²⁴ Crying in the Wilderness, p 54.
- ²⁵ South Africa in the 1980s, London: Catholic Institute for International Relations, 1986, pp 68-72. The KAIROS Document was released by the Kairos Theologians in Braamfontein, South Africa, and is 'a Christian, biblical and theological comment on the political crisis in South Africa today. It is an attempt by concerned Christians in South Africa to reflect on the situation of death in our country. It is a critique of the current theological models that determine the type of activities the Church engages in to try to resolve the problems of the country. It is an attempt to develop, out of this perplexing situation, an alternative biblical and theological model that will in turn lead to forms of activity that will make a real difference to the future of our country.' (Preamble to the Document).
- ²⁶ Part of My Soul, p 120.
- ²⁷ ibid., p 125.
- ²⁸ Speech by Alfred Nzo at the 65th Anniversary Meeting of SACP on 30 July 1986.
- ²⁹ Let us rise up and walk together, Allan Boesak's speech at the 75th Anniversary Conference of the National Urban League in Washington DC on 23 July 1985.
- ³⁰ Interview with Allan Boesak in Third World Quarterly 7(4) October 1985, pp 794-5.

South Africa's tomorrow

Liberalism and apartheid

The South African state is a British colonial creation embedded in the liberal ideology. Whatever the egalitarian claims of that ideology, its very emphasis on individualism made it prone to differentiation and discrimination. Discrimination is in fact the essence of liberalism—discrimination between individuals on the basis of their faculty of reason: 'Blessed are the reasonable for they will acquire the earth,' which is a restatement of the Calvinist doctrine 'Blessed are the wealthy for in them is the sign of the Lord's election.'

Humanitarian liberalism, especially in the form of Christian missionaries, attempted to raise the heathen from his ignorance, but rarely believed that he could be so raised: apartheid set its doubts at rest. It confirmed for it that it could not be so raised. Class and race groupings are an inevitable result of the liberal ideology. The liberal British parliament was privy to the 1910 Act of Union which excluded all 'non-Europeans' from franchise rights in the new South African state.

It is not racism that is alien to the liberal tradition, but the damming up of social mobility within racial enclosures, for that goes against its deepest belief, the freedom of the individual, albeit in an unfree society, to develop his faculty of reason, and enter into free competition.

Liberalism partnered apartheid, almost unquestioningly, up to at least 1976. While it periodically expressed horror at the violence that erupted, it sustained that partnership because it served its ends. Liberalism in fact has no great horror of violence and uses it as brutally as any, as it has in recent years in the Middle and Far East.

It was only after Soweto 1976, after the revolt of school children and the crumbling of Bantu education designed to socialise blacks for subservience, after the revolt of workers in the 1970s, and after the collapse of Bantu authorities in the townships, that international liberalism began to doubt the capacity of the Nationalists to secure the country and the interests of international capitalism. For the first time it began to see apartheid as a real threat to the economy. The argument that free enterprise was eroding apartheid anyhow, and that there was thus no need for sanctions or popular resistance, is no longer heard.

Foremost today on the liberal front within the country is an important group of businessmen who see economic disaster already on the doorstep. They are pressing the government to negotiate with the ANC. Tony Bloom, Chairman of the Premier Group, warns:

Unless something is done now South Africa may not have the luxury of a choice between P W Botha and the ANC; it may well be faced with a choice between a group far to the right of the present government, and the steely eyes of kids who are facing the police in the townships on a daily basis and who are rapidly getting out of control.¹

The President of the Azanian People's Organisation (AZAPO), Saths Cooper, shares this concern when he asks what kind of society this is where not only has a war been declared on school children but where we fear our children, and states: 'If a massive national intervention is not undertaken soon the likelihood of the country emerging whole at the dawn of liberation is remote.'²

Capitalism's immediate fear is the fear of sanctions. It has up to now relied to some considerable extent on Chief Buthelezi to allay sanctions. But Buthelezi's star is hitched to the Nationalist wagon; when that stalls, he too stalls and the stalling has not only begun, it is grinding to a halt. Few understand this as well as the liberal capitalist, and so it is that they are poised to back the ANC, inhibited only by one concern: the ANC's link with the South African Communist Party (SACP).

The Communist Link

The ANC's communist link goes back to the early part of the century, and has at all times been an uneasy one due to the conflicting interests of socialism and nationalism. But the conflict has been restrained by the fact that they share a common constituency. In mobilising Africans, the ANC mobilised an almost totally working-class population. The SACP, failing in its appeal to white workers turned its revolutionary task to the 'natives' as early as 1924 and became actively involved with the most popular African movement of the time, Clements Kadalie's Industrial and Commercial Workers' Union (ICU), but the involvement soon struck a precarious note with accusations of incompetence from the SACP and interference from the Africans. Similar conflicts were repeated in the relationship with the ANC. But there has always been the overlapping and shared leadership, and the unquestionable commitment of the SACP to Black Liberation, along with the material support the external movement has had from the Soviet Union, has maintained a healthy alliance for almost half-a-century. The tensions too have remained. In the past, rooted as the SACP was in the white political structure, and hopeful of uniting black and white workers, the SACP accepted those structures and worked through and within them, thereby conflicting with the strong boycott tendency of the radicalised ANC youth. Finally, the SACP's aim is a workers' revolution, and the establishment of a workers' state; that of the ANC, a populist national revolution.

¹ Sunday Tribune (Durban) 24 August 1986.

² Post (Durban) 3 August 1986.

The SACP strives to contain this ideological conflict by its thesis of a two-stage revolution in colonial situations: first, national liberation from imperialism, and then, the establishment of a bourgeois democracy; finally, a workers' and peasants' republic. However, the SACP sees itself as the party of the working class and in this it remains in continuous conflict with the ANC. Communist expectations of a take-over from the Islamic state did not materialise in Iran, and are not likely to do so in South Africa. A recent survey by the Institute for Black Research (IBR) reveals a 2 per cent support for the SACP as against 20 per cent for the ANC.

The Freedom Charter

The ANC is criticised for its absence of clearly formulated political and economic policies. The closest it has come to such a formulation has been in the adoption of the Freedom Charter in 1956. The policy adopted therein satisfies neither the extreme left nor the extreme right, asserting by that fact alone its middle-ground position. Its economic policy supports both limited nationalisation and private enterprise, the relevant clauses stating: 'The Mineral Wealth beneath the soil, the banks and monopoly industry shall be transferred to the ownership of the people as a whole.' But it quickly adds, 'All people shall have equal rights to trade when they choose, to manufacture and to enter all trades, crafts and professions.'

The Charter is thus not against private enterprise, but against monopoly capitalism. The liberal dilemma is then not whether the ANC will accommodate big business, but how far will the radicalised black electorate go in supporting the ANC in such an accommodation.

Recent surveys show that South African black people identify capitalism with white domination. They do not believe that racial inequality can be adjusted without state intervention; that if left to 'free' competition, the existing imbalance in the share of resources will be corrected. An IBR survey in December 1985 (1786 respondents) revealed 20 per cent in favour of non-racial capitalism, 74 per cent in favour of socialism, 3 per cent favouring total state control and 37 per cent favouring a mixed economy similar to the one outlined in the Freedom Charter. In September 1985, a survey of 800 respondents conducted by IBR and Mark Orkin of the Community Agency for Social Enquiry (CASE) found that 77 per cent of the sample supported socialism and 22 per cent capitalism.

Politically, the Charter supports a multiracial democracy with universal adult franchise: 'Every man and woman shall have the right to vote for and stand as a candidate for all bodies making laws', 'All native groups shall have equal rights.' The Freedom Charter, however, is only a guideline—it is not a constitution for the new society. That constitution will have to be adopted by a national convention, or a body representative of all South Africans. The participants of that body will in all probability be drawn from the existing political groupings.

White political groupings

White politics is broadly classified into its historic Afrikaner/English segments, but such ethnicity has little political significance today. The Nationalists have a clear mandate from a unified white electorate, whose main concern is to defend white power.

Afrikaner racism (apartheid) has dominated over English racism (segregation) only because the former has been so much more effective. It continued to be supported by Europe and the US despite Sharpeville and Biko, so long as it secured a stable economy and stable profits. It is no longer able to secure that stability, and hence the vigorous pressure for reform, and the mounting threats of sanctions forcing the Nationalists to begin their reform moves. But the inadequacy of those moves has provoked a virtual revolution in the townships and, to the extent that they threaten the integrity of the apartheid ideology, a serious splintering within the Nationalist Party.

The National Party (NP) remained a cohesive Afrikaner force so long as its nationalisation was based on white working-class racist interests. But as South African capitalism became Afrikanerised, so the NP came more and more to represent white bourgeois interests and its international capital links. And as the Afrikaner worker under protective custody and privileged wages moved into technical, professional and management jobs and thereby became absorbed into the capitalist fraternity, so the government began to modify the industrial colour bar that had become practically dysfunctional; but even that small step towards economic rationality threatened Afrikaner strife that the Botha government dared not ignore. Emotionally fixated to its archaic ideology, and caught between the fear of the Swart Gevaar (Black Threat) and the verkrampste (conservative) Afrikaner backlash, it remains today incapable of making the necessary intellectual leap to real change. So it continues worshipping the carcass when the holy cow is dead.

It is the worship of that carcass that many Western observers support when they warn that the Afrikaner will never give up, that he will fight to the last, his back to the wall, in the process ruining the whole country. The Afrikaner parted company with his tough frontier forebears who had fought to the last, because they had nothing to lose anyway. The present Afrikaner has accumulated so many creature comforts that he will ultimately bargain to save some of them rather than lose all. He will respond to the pressure of sanctions. There is no special mystique about the Afrikaner as some liberal commentators would have us believe. Had the British not returned his political power after conquering him at the end of the last century there may well have been no history of his ethnic unity, and no myth of his impregnability. Afrikanerdom, which rode to power through the political process, has lost faith in that process precisely because that process can no longer work for it. It has abdicated power to the military and the police and converted its parliament into a forum of meaningless words, or a wordless forum. The official opposition remains helpless, and even if it does not admit it, finds little if any function in parliament.

Black political groupings

The historical ideological strands in modern black politics are liberalism, nationalism and Marxism, (Leninist and Trotskyite). To these were added Africanism in the 1950s, and Black Consciousness in the 1970s.

African politics became modernised at the beginning of the century in response to acts that deprived the African people of land, and franchise rights. It saw an early splintering in the 1930s with the formation of the All-African Convention and in the 1950s with the Pan Africanist Congress (PAC), in opposition to the Freedom Charter and its non-African influences.

Cape Coloured politics was initially concentrated in the Non-European Unity Movement (NEUM), noted for its Trotskyite leanings. It affiliated to the All-African Convention and with it introduced the boycott strategy into black radical politics.

Indian politics concentrated in the Gandhi-founded Natal Indian Congress, its 'militant' phase being expressed by passive resistance, and by conservatism in negotiation. Like the ANC it became radicalised after the First World War and was influenced by socialist and Marxist doctrines. By the 1950s, the African and Indian Congress and the SACP constituted the Congress Alliance. The NEUM was strong in the Cape and adopted a position of hostile radical criticism.

The distinct feature of black politics is its insecurity, and the lack of inter-generational continuity as a result of bannings, banishments and detentions. The post-1960 generation was cut off from the traditions of the PAC, the ANC and the SACP. The vacuum created by the banning of the ANC and PAC in 1960 was filled for a period by the Black Consciousness movement which was acceptable to neither the ANC or the NEUM in exile though accommodated by the PAC. Black Consciousness too was suppressed in the 1970s, but the reform measures of the mid-1980s, and particularly the need to give credibility to the new constitution through 'free elections' created new space for black political alignments. Two distinct groupings emerged in the mid-1980s, those identified with the ANC and the Freedom Charter under the umbrella of the United Democratic Front (UDF) (Azanian Students' Organisation (AZASO) and the Congress of South African Students (COSAS)) and the NEUM Black Consciousness grouping under the National Forum (AZAPO, Students of Young Azania (SOYA) and Coloured Action League (CAL)). While leaders and activists draw fine distinctions between these components, the mass psyche sees them as cut from one radical cloth.

Intervening and mediating between these two black radical coalitions is the Church, headed above all by Allan Boesak and Desmond Tutu and operating through the South African Council of Churches (SACC) and the Christian Institute. The new trade unions—the gigantic Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU) identifying with the UDF, the ANC and the banned South African Congress of Trade Unions (SACTU), and the Council of Unions of South Africa (CUSA) identifying with the National Forum—constitute a third vital force.

The children

The fourth and presently most important political force in the country is that of the youth. This force burst on to the South African scene in 1976 when the security forces opened fire on school children peacefully resisting the imposition of Afrikaans as a medium of instruction. It resulted in the internal collapse of Bantu Education and unleashed the phenomenon of 'child power'.

After ten years of that sustained power, the whole fabric of township life has changed. Quite literally, the child has become the father of the man. Heroic at the outset, and heroic still to some considerable extent, the children's movement remains uneasy in discipline, partly because discipline is not a child's quality. It is acquired from teachers and parents. In 1976 teachers and parents, too overwhelmed by both the suffering of the children and the children's capacity to cope with that suffering, and to avenge it, stepped aside and the youth took over the leadership and in the process lost respect for authority; both for parental authority because it proved incapable of defending them, and secular authority because it declared war on them. No generation of blacks have hated the white state as wholly as the present generation of child-activists.

The youth of 1976 are today in their late twenties, and for the last ten years each generation entering its teen years has had this volatile youth as a reference model. With Bantu Education discredited, and the whole school system in a state of collapse, the townships are charged today with the explosive energy of the youth who form the single most populous group and who are neither at school nor in formal employment. They generate both political and criminal leadership and it is difficult at times to distinguish between the two. The youth who have assumed political responsibility work under the most hazardous conditions, are under constant police and military surveillance, and subjected to brutal attack from both the state and state-instigated black vigilantes. Many live precariously, too fearful of living in their own homes for fear of reprisals and detentions. They organise through fragile, makeshift structures, and strive to set up channels of consultation with the parent generations in nocturnal, candle-light meetings. They organise consumer and rent boycotts and set up street barricades and take on the military and the police and suspected informers. They have been criticised for high-handed action, for inflicting political decisions on the people and for employing coercive and terror tactics. There is truth in this, but it would be unrealistic to expect the youth to adopt conventional procedures in the circumstances in which they are forced to operate. They have been literally hurled into anarchy by a state which has blocked all access to democratic institutions.

The co-opted black bourgeoisie

The fifth black political grouping is made up of the co-opted salaried black bourgeoisie which fits into the administrative network of apartheid through the homelands, township and local affairs committees, and the Indian and coloured houses of the tricameral parliament. The institutions they man were popularly resisted at the time of their creation and continue to be deeply resented. The salaried incumbents commonly referred to as 'stooges' and 'quislings' by the radicals, constitute the most readily accessible 'Government' targets of black anger.

The roots of the present so-called 'black-on-black' confrontation are to be found in this hostility. When repression reaches unbearable proportions, when resistance against rent and transport price rises (and the government is both landlord and transporter) is met with military fire and death, retaliation is sought on government targets in the townships, on the administrative buildings and on the persons and property of the black police and community councillors who live there. Such retaliation has always been on a small scale in the past, confined to one or two targets, the anger apparently subsiding with the attack. Since 1985, however, retaliatory violence has taken a new turn, primarily because for the first time the government has incorporated its co-opted black leadership into its army and police, incorporating it into the first flank of its violent repression in the townships.

This was the anatomy of the violence inflicted by Chief Buthelezi's Inkatha, under the guise of bringing order to the townships in Natal and of a great deal of the black-on-black violence in Soweto and Mamelodi and at Crossroads. The lines are drawn between UDF and Inkatha, and 'Fathers' and 'Comrades' (counter-revolutionary forces and vigilantes who are usually manipulated by the government). In addition to this ongoing violence there has been ongoing dissension between radical groups, between members of the UDF and AZAPO. The latter violence is however no longer heard of and many believe that that too was state-instigated.

The future Parliament

It is against this political dynamic that one must consider South Africa's tomorrow. While economic changes may well proceed slowly, political changes will be immediate, and a forecast may be attempted on the basis of existing black and white political forces.

The post-apartheid constituencies will continue to be characterised by ethnicity for a considerable time. If the political structure is based on universal adult franchise, whites would have 14 per cent of the votes, blacks 73 per cent, Indians 3 per cent and Coloureds 10 per cent.

The political affiliations of South Africa's disenfranchised were most recently recorded in a national sample survey (1786 interviews) conducted by the Institute for Black Research in four regions: Durban, Johannesburg, and the Eastern and the Western Cape in December 1985. The results demonstrate a UDF and ANC majority of 45 per cent, leaving a splintered opposition of 55 per cent, the overwhelming tendency of the disenfranchised being to vote for groupings with socialist leanings, ranging from those supporting the Freedom Charter to communism. They also reaffirm that the vast majority of black South Africans support a socialist economy, 74 per cent opting for socialist models almost equally divided between those favouring total state control and those favouring a mixed economy.

Although only 4 per cent voted for religious parties (mostly Christian) 30 per cent expressed support for the two religious personalities Tutu and Boesak, and 35 per cent for ANC leaders Mandela (24 per cent), Sisulu (7 per cent) and Tambo (10 per cent). Both Tutu and Boesak are highly esteemed not as religious leaders per se but as religious leaders taking a positive stand against apartheid and in sympathy with the ANC. It seems probable that these church leaders would command considerable support even if they stood independently of the ANC for political office, but not sufficient, even if they combined, to counteract an ANC majority in parliament.

What is important is that with over 50 per cent of the disenfranchised inclined towards parties other than the ANC, and 65 per cent towards non-ANC leaders, an election fought on the basis of universal adult franchise would produce very varied results far from the monolithic expectations of anxious whites. Integrating the white vote on the basis of recent expectations published in Rapport (a Sunday newspaper with pro-government sympathies published in Johannesburg) 20 July 1986 (Table 1) and incorporating the black vote as indicated in the IBR sample

SEE WHAT'S REALLY HAPPENING IN THE THIRD WORLD

ORDER FORM YES I WANT TO SEE WHAT'S REALLY HAPPENING

PLEASE SEND ME COPIES OF THIRD WORLD AFFAIRS 1987
PRICES: UK £20 / USA & EUROPE 35 US$ / REST OF THE WORLD 39 US$

Name

Organisation

Address

☐ I enclose cheque for £/US$ (made payable to Third World Foundation)

☐ I would like to pay by credit card

Name of Card

Name of Cardholder

Card Account No.

Signature Date

When completed please return this card with your payment to the Circulation Department, Third World Foundation, 13th floor, New Zealand House, 80 Haymarket London SW1Y 4TS, England

TA04

I WANT TO GET ON TOP OF THE THIRD WORLD

ORDER FORM YES I WANT TO GET ON TOP OF THE THIRD WORLD

PLEASE SEND ME COPIES OF THIRD WORLD QUARTERLY

PRICES:	UK £	EUROPE US$	REST OF WORLD US$
1 Year (4 issues)	20	35	39
2 Years (8 issues)	35	61	69
3 Years (12 issues)	50	87	98

Name

Organisation

Address

☐ I enclose cheque for £/US$
(made payable to Third World Foundation)

☐ I would like to pay by credit card

Name of Card

Name of Cardholder

Card Account No.

Signature

Date

When completed please return this card with your payment to the Circulation Department, Third World Foundation,
13th floor, New Zealand House, 80 Haymarket London SW1Y 4TS, England

Affix
Stamp
Here

THIRD WORLD FOUNDATION
13th FLOOR
NEW ZEALAND HOUSE
80 HAYMARKET
LONDON SW1Y 4TS
ENGLAND

Affix
Stamp
Here

THIRD WORLD FOUNDATION
13th FLOOR
NEW ZEALAND HOUSE
80 HAYMARKET
LONDON SW1Y 4TS
ENGLAND

survey of December 1985 (Table 2), the following distribution of parliamentary power emerges:

ANC group, inclusive of UDF and AZASO:	39.3% or
Above inclusive of COSATU and Socialists:	48.0%
Afrikaner Nationalist and other ethnic minorities including Inkatha and PFP:	21.6%
Marxist (SACP, NEUM, Trade Unions, AZAPO, African Peoples' Democratic Union of South Africa (APDUSA))	12.3%
Conservative white (CP, HNP)	8.0%

It is conceivable that faced with an ANC with considerable non-African support, but primarily African and fundamentally responsible to an electorate constituted in the main of African workers supporting a socialist economy, the official opposition, while apparently a coalition of ethnic minorities, would simultaneously also be a coalition of capitalist 'free-enterprise' supporters. The Progressive Federal Party (PFP) estimates its present membership to be 10 per cent black. The anti-racist Marxist groupings such as the Communist, AZAPO, NEUM, and the trade unions might well form a coalition to the left of the ANC. It is unlikely that the element of extreme right Afrikaner conservatism will disappear overnight. Their present parliamentary strength is about 9 per cent, but this could be expected to dwindle considerably, losing out to the nationalist-capitalist fraternity.

Clearly then, there is available immediately to the South African people a parliamentary alternative to the existing one where a single party representing a small white minority has for decades held a majority of all seats and consequently monopolised all power. In the post-apartheid parliament the ruling party would hold a minority of seats but it would be constrained by a majority dispersed among a wide range of ideological and ethnic interests with opportunities for effective coalitions. This parliament, which would be based on a unitary political structure on the Westminster model (for this is the overwhelming choice of the disenfranchised, supported by 68 per cent in the IBR survey), would almost certainly be acceptable to all segments of the disenfranchised, including the homelands, dependent and independent, and to liberal capitalism. It would immediately remove from the country the stigma of a pariah nation, bestow on it the honour of legitimacy, and end all sanctions, operative and threatened. The war between the ANC and the Nationalists would end and the emergent new non-racial democracy would enter into friendly accord with its

Table 1

White voting behaviour

	1981(1)	1986(2)	Members of Parliament 1986
Nationalist	56.1	51.9	127
Progressive Party	19.1	16.2	27
HNP	13.9	2.2	1
NRP	7.7	2.7	8
Conservative Party	1.4	13.4	18

(1): Nic Olivier's analysis after 1981 elections.

(2): Rapport survey, 20 July 1986.

Table 2

Black voting behaviour as projected by December 1985 survey		Integrated black/white voting behaviour
UDF	23.5	ANC/UDF/AZASO	39.3
ANC	20.0	AZAPO	8.6
AZAPO	10.1	NRP	1.5
AZASO	0.7	Afrikaner Nationalist	8.1
PAC	2.6	Afrikaner Conservative	2.8
Socialist	6.7	PFP	7.2
PFP	6.4	Socialist	5.7
Inkatha	3.7	Inkatha	2.9
Coloured Tricameral	1.2	PAC	2.2
Indian Tricameral	1.2	COSATU	0.3
NEUM	0.5	CUSA	1.4
Communist	2.0	Coloured Tricameral	1.8
CUSA	0.4	Indian Tricameral	1.0
COSATU	1.7	Unity Movement	0.4
Christian	3.3	Christian	2.8
Muslim	0.4	Muslim	0.3
Hindu	0.4	Hindu	0.3
Nationalist	2.7	Communist	1.7
Other	11.7	Other	11.7
Total	99.2	Total	100.0

neighbouring states, liberating them from the economic stranglehold and military oppression of the apartheid society which imprisons them today.

The new government would in all probability pursue a non-aligned foreign policy, would become a strong member of the OAU and of the UN and undertake international trade which would be geared to benefit the people rather than specific interest groups. It would confront the enormous task of de-racialising the country materially, intellectually and emotionally, a task which is long overdue and for which time has already run out.

For all the violence that characterises South African society, an astonishing level of goodwill still remains. The vast majority of black South Africans do not want punitive action against white South Africans (IBR survey 1985). On such black goodwill towards whites, South Africans of all colour can confidently stride forward to a new society.

Living in the interregnum: crisis, reform and the socialist alternative in South Africa

'The crisis consists precisely in the fact that the old is dying and the new cannot be born; in this interregnum a great variety of morbid symptoms appear.'

Antonio Gramsci, Prison Notebooks

As apartheid goes through its terminal phase, a vigorous debate has emerged concerning the type of structures that should be established in a post-apartheid South Africa. To date this debate has to a large extent been dominated by liberal capitalist positions preoccupied with the problem of how to de-racialise South Africa's political economy without dismantling the capitalist economy. These positions, however, stand opposed to the demands and interests of the black majority whose popular organisations have in theory and in practice articulated a socialist rather than a capitalist solution to South Africa's fundamental problems.

This paper will analyse the major social processes that have shaped South African society over the last decade. The basic aim will be to explain these processes as the outcome of intense social conflicts over the goals of structural change and the means to achieve them. The paper will have four parts. Firstly, I will start with the unusual practice of stating what these goals should in principle be, rather than what they may be in reality. Secondly, I will provide an analysis of structural and political changes that have taken place since 1976. Thirdly, I will link an evaluation of the dynamics of the current interregnum to a prognosis for the future. Finally, proposals for how a socialist system could be constructed are briefly discussed.

Goals

The major organisations that represent the interests of the oppressed are in some way committed to a socialist future. Two documents articulate the demands around which they intend to build a socialist or at least a non-capitalist post-apartheid society. The first is the Freedom

Charter that was adopted by the ANC and its allies in 1955 and the second are the May Day demands that were drawn up by political organisations and trade unions in May 1985. Four sets of demands are contained in these documents. They are:

- 1) the restructuring of work and employment, eg the right to work, a living wage, a forty-hour week, the right to strike, maternity leave and control over prices;
- 2) the reorganisation of the provision of the means of collective consumption, eg transport, housing, social services and food;
- 3) the thorough democratisation of the political economy—the Freedom Charter talks about political rights and ‘democratic organs of self-government’ and the May Day demands refer to the creation of a system that holds ‘the interests of the working class paramount’;
- 4) the substantial redistribution of land and wealth coupled to the socialisation of the means of production, starting with the nationalisation of monopolies.

Much depends on the fundamental principles that will shape the way these objectives are realised. ‘To obtain the opportunity to govern at all,’ John Dunn argues, ‘socialists who do overtly intend to transform an existing society must appear capable of transforming it very broadly as they intend.’¹ Rather than present a coherent model, I will assert a few key principles drawn from contemporary socialist practice and theory.²

The first precondition for substantive social change in South Africa is the creation of a non-racial majoritarian unitary state. This will more than likely be constructed within a ‘national democratic’ framework which does not exclude the possibility of significant socialist forms of social regulation.³

Secondly, Gelb and Innes have argued that to realise the above demands a new ‘social structure of accumulation’ needs to be created that is regulated by socio-political institutions rather than by the market. Social regulation will enable the productive structure and the process of accumulation to be shaped and directed, so as to achieve social objectives . . . When regulation is ¹ J Dunn, The Politics of Socialism, London: Cambridge University Press, 1983, p 72.

² I will ignore for the moment the problem of transition.

³ P Hudson, ‘The Freedom Charter and socialist strategy in South Africa’, Politikon (13) 1 June 1986, pp 75–91.

dominated by the market, the accumulation process is instead directed towards the achievement of private objectives, such as profitability, growth in firm size, etc.⁴

The weight of evidence from Third World development experiences suggests that structural inequality cannot be overcome without substantial social regulation.

Thirdly, it is now accepted by socialist writers that social regulation (and nationalisation in particular) cannot work without substantial decentralisation of economic and political power to local and regional organs of popular decision-making. Without worker control over productive units and citizen control over cities, social regulation has proven to be both economically inefficient and undemocratic.⁵ Where participation in production has been maximised, productivity has increased and democracy extended (eg in Chile under Allende, Russia in 1918, and in Algeria before Boumedienne).⁶

Fourthly, the history of socialism has shown that the market cannot be completely abolished, not only because this results in economic inefficiency, but also because socialist states have not turned out to be omniscient rational embodiments of the general proletarian will. Brus' perceptive analysis of the economic problems of state socialism has led him to conclude that the answer lies in a 'planned economy with a built-in market mechanism'.⁷ However, the market under socialism can only work when decentralisation and popular participation are maximised. Gelb and Innes point out that '[i]t is by no means contradictory to combine democratic control within the enterprise and over the accumulation process, with market relations between enterprises'.⁸

Fifthly, given that socialists wish to replace market regulation with social regulation via the intervention of rational political institutions, this will more than likely degenerate into authoritarianism if socialists

⁴ S Gelb, and D Innes, 'Towards a democratic economy in South Africa', Third World Quarterly 9(2) April 1987, p 562.

For comparative studies of the Third World, see also G White, et al. (eds), Revolutionary Socialist Development in the Third World, Brighton: Wheatsheaf Books, 1983.

⁵ On the importance of decentralisation see W Brus, The Economics and Politics of Socialism, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1973.

⁶ See J Espinosa and A Zimbalist, Economic Democracy: Workers' Participation in Chilean Industry, 1970-1973, London: Academic Press, 1978; C Sirrianni, Workers Control and Socialist Democracy: The Soviet Experience, London: 1982; and I Clegg, Workers' Self-management in Algeria, London: Allen Lane, 1971.

⁷ W Brus, op. cit., p 18.

⁸ S Gelb and D Innes, op. cit., p 30.

do not have a greater respect than their capitalist forebears for the liberal tradition: the rule of law, governmental accountability, democratic freedoms, and constitutionalism.⁹ However, Eurocommunists have suggested that parliamentary-type institutions have to be complemented by controlling organs that represent the interests of the working class per se. The relationship between the Soviets and the Constituent Assembly in Russia before the latter was disbanded by the Bolsheviks is frequently referred to as a model for a post-capitalist socialist democracy.

Finally, socialists have begun to realise that they must jettison their utopian ignorance of the problems of scarcity and the realities of power relations by recognising that these cannot always be reduced to class forces.¹⁰ Socialist utopianism has frequently resulted in despotism because, in Kolakowski's brutally honest words, 'despotism is a desperate simulation of paradise.'¹¹

In short, in my view, the May Day demands and the aims of the Freedom Charter can only be realised in a democratic socialist post-apartheid society based on a complex synthesis of national democracy, social regulation, decentralisation, substantive democratisation, market relations and constitutionalism. This will ensure that capitalist social relations and racism are replaced with full political rights and a democratically organised economy without sacrificing either one of these objectives.¹²

Social Change 1976-85

It is commonly accepted that the 1976 Soweto uprisings were a turning-point in South African history. On the one hand, they brought to an end more than a decade of black political quiescence and forcefully reflected mass popular rejection of apartheid. Secondly, they were sufficiently serious to make an impact on South Africa's white political institutions which were forced to recognise that the uprisings

⁹ J Dunn, op. cit., p 81.

¹⁰ C Sirrianni, 'Production and power in a classless society: a critical analysis of the Utopian dimensions of Marxist theory', Socialist Review (59) 1981.

¹¹ L Kolakowski, 'The myth of human self-identity: unity if civil and political society in socialist thought', in L Kolakowski and S Hampshire, The Socialist Idea: A Reappraisal, London: Quartet Books, 1977, p 35.

¹² A Stalinist or authoritarian nationalist state may sacrifice the rule of law and political rights, whereas a mild nationalist capitalist state will probably sacrifice economic democracy and social regulation.

were a manifestation of a deeper crisis that needed to be resolved by reforming key components of traditional apartheid.¹³

After 1976, politically sophisticated and moderate elements in the military, foreign policy, academic and constitutional organs of the state (the so-called 'verligtes') began to formulate policies that would modify apartheid structures and rationalise state controls by way of a more sophisticated cooption-repression formula.¹⁴ This approach (which military officials referred to as a 'total strategy', designed to counter what they believed was a total internal and international onslaught against South Africa) was an aggressive reformist initiative that became the corner-stone of state policy after P W Botha became Prime Minister in 1978. (Botha came to power after his rivals were implicated in an extensive corruption scandal that the verligtes exploited to their own advantage. This was known as the 'Muldergate' scandal after Connie Mulder, until then a prime candidate for the premiership.)

'Total strategy' was an ambitious reform package involving four basic dimensions. First, the modification of key aspects of urban policy. The Commission of Inquiry into Legislation Affecting the Utilisation of Manpower (conducted by Dr P J Riekert) was mandated to re-examine urban policy, in particular influx control, and made its recommendations in 1979. Secondly, the Commission of Inquiry into Labour Legislation (headed by Professor N E Wiehahn) was instructed to review and recommend changes to the industrial relations system that had existed since 1924. Thirdly, a complex institutional structure was established under the President's Council to facilitate the formulation of a new constitutional dispensation to incorporate Coloureds and Indians into representative institutions at central government level. Fourthly, the military was put in charge of reorganising the security apparatuses.

To summarise the outcome of these four reformist initiatives. Following the Riekert Commission, the state accepted in principle that Africans living in and around the white urban areas should be recognised as permanent urban dwellers with the right to property, association, movement, and representation that they had hitherto been denied because of their status as 'temporary sojourners' in white South Africa. This group was seen as potentially co-optable and hence needed to be divided off from the rural majority by implementing even harsher controls over rural-urban migration. As far as industrial relations was concerned, the state accepted the Wiehahn Commission's recommendation that blacks should be recognised by statute as bona fide employees and hence legally eligible to join registered and recognised trade unions—a right that has been effectively denied to blacks since 1924.

¹³ See, for example, J Saul, & S Gelb, The Crisis in South Africa, New York: Monthly Review Press 1981; G Moss, 'Total strategy', Work in Progress (11) 1980; S O'Meara, 'Muldergate and the politics of Afrikaner nationalism', Work in Progress (22) 1982; R Davies, & D O'Meara, 'The state of analysis of the South African region: issues raised by South African strategy', Review of African Political Economy (29) 1984; D Glaser, 'The state, the market and the crisis', Work in Progress (34) 1984.

¹⁴ D O'Meara, op. cit.

The new constitutional dispensation that the President's Council formulated amounted to the creation of a consociational constitutional framework for whites, Coloureds and Indians linked to African organs of representation in the bantustans via an overarching confederal structure. The military, in turn, succeeded in rationalising the security apparatuses under the auspices of the State Security Council (ssc). The ssc is an extremely powerful structure with several hundred regional and local committees comprising security, government and business representatives who all share the desire to streamline and render more effective the structures of state control to cope with unstable political conditions.

Although these reforms were new, they addressed problems that plagued apartheid policy-makers since the early 1950s. Township resistance served to highlight these internal contradictions bringing them to the fore of political conflict.

The business community, who were initially dazed by the township conflicts, responded by demanding political reforms and gave their support to extra-state reformist initiatives, eg the Urban Foundation funded by the private business sector. The politicisation of the business community coupled to the pressures from the international community helped foster a reformist climate within which verligte policy makers in the state could proceed. The reforms, however, began to be introduced during the late 1970s when the balance of forces differed markedly from the 1976-77 period. The Black Consciousness movement had been decimated by arrests, bannings, deaths and a mass exodus of activists fleeing the country. Although the trade unions were the only mass-based black movement capable of resisting the reforms at this stage, their relative weakness and the absence of a political organisation prevented them from contesting the reforms outside the work-place. Consequently, the reforms were shaped to a large extent by the new verligte elements in the state and the demands of the business community.

Each dimension of 'total strategy' contained internal contradictions that lie at the heart of the current crisis in South Africa. After mapping out the broad parameters of state policy during the 1978-84 period, I will explain the demise of 'total strategy' in terms of a) the urban social movements that emerged in the 1980s and b) the persistence of structural forces that these reforms ignored.

The Riekert and Wiehahn strategy should be seen as complementary. In order to give urban blacks the right to live permanently in the urban areas, this needed to be complemented by rights that traditional apartheid had hitherto denied to 'temporary sojourners': trade union rights, property rights and (limited) political rights. Superficial liberal interpretations of these reforms at the time presented them as a major departure from traditional apartheid. However, they were constructed as part of an offensive designed to bolster the privileges of urban insiders at the expense of rural outsiders.¹⁵ The Riekert Commission did not question the 'homeland' system and hence implied that although urban blacks should obtain local political rights, national political rights should still be expressed through the (independent) bantustans.

As far as Coloureds and Indians were concerned, the tricameral parliament was designed to incorporate them into a 'consociational' central state structure without threatening the autonomy of the white parliamentary system.¹⁶ In other words, whites would continue to vote for their own house in parliament, whereas Coloureds and Indians respectively would each vote for their own houses. This resulted in a parliament with three houses with the whites having the largest number of representatives, followed by the Coloureds and then the Indians according to a ratio 4:2:1. The decision-making process involved a complex procedure whereby legislation would be worked out in multi-racial Standing Committees and then passed by each of the three houses of parliament deliberating in separate sessions. If all three houses could not reach agreement, the legislation would then be passed to the President's Council which could make recommendations or pass ¹⁵ D Hindson & M Lacey, 'Influx control and labour allocation: policy and practice since the Riekert Commission', South African Research Services, (eds), South African Review (1) Johannesburg, 1983.

¹⁶ Republic of South Africa, 'Joint Report of the Committee for Economic Affairs and the Constitutional Committee of the President's Council on Local and Regional Management Systems in the Republic of South Africa', PC 1/1982.

it without the legislation having to go back through all three houses. This is what government ideologues call 'consensual decision-making'. It is designed to give the appearance of consensus politics despite the fact that whites have the majority in the Standing Committees and President's Council.

Although Africans were excluded from the consociational structures of the tricameral parliament, the state continued to insist that this did not mean they were excluded from political power. Whereas the consociational structures were designed to facilitate joint decision-making between whites, Coloureds and Indians, a new overarching confederal structure was devised to link the South African consociational state to the 'independent' ethnic states in the bantustans. In other words, the South African state would be fragmented into relatively independent states and then integrated into a confederal arrangement that state officials frequently equated to the European Economic Community.

The confederal structure complemented the Riekert strategy in two ways. Firstly, during the early 1980s policymakers were trying to find a way to link up the non-bantustan based urban Africans to higher forms of political representation. To achieve this, the state created fully-fledged municipal authorities in the major urban African centres (eg Soweto)—the so-called Black Local Authorities (BLAS). These BLAS were given complete political and fiscal autonomy to run the townships. It was frequently suggested by officials that the BLAS should be used to link urban Africans to the confederal authorities at higher levels by creating 'city-states' which would then be entitled to representation in the central confederal decision-making body.

Secondly, the confederal schema (that was initially articulated as the 'constellation of states' idea), provided the framework for the formulation of a new regional development policy that was based on the concept of 'economic interdependence and political independence'—what the Buthelezi Commission described as the 'economic route' to power-sharing.¹⁷ The regional development policy was designed to make sure that the bantustans were economically viable confederal units and hence capable of coping with the rural outsiders—an extension of the Verwoerdian scheme to limit the rate of urbanisation.

In short, the confederal schema was designed to accomplish three things: to legitimise the South African state by softening the meaning of 'separate' political development; to provide a framework for granting urban rights while simultaneously retaining bantustans as the only form of central political representation for Africans; and, to rationalise industrial dispersal policy to slow down urbanisation. Whereas confederalism was aimed at streamlining the regional foundations of apartheid, the new labour dispensation and the legislation that emerged from the Riekert Commissions' policy framework (ie the Black Local Authorities Act and the Orderly Movement and Settlement of Black Persons Bill, which was shelved before it could be implemented) were designed to rationalise and stabilise the African urban areas.

¹⁷ The Report of the Buthelezi Commission, The Requirements for Stability and Development in KwaZulu and Natal, Durban: H and H Publications, 1982.

The intentions of state policy, however, differ markedly from the way policies are implemented and the social processes they give rise to. State policy cannot take account of all the structural forces that impinge on a given field of intervention, nor can the responses of a range of social actors be predicted. The fate of 'total strategy' is a particularly illuminating example of how the combined effect of structural forces and social conflict can substantially inhibit the implementation of a reformist strategy and, in the end force the state to change tack. Although there were numerous political interests that opposed the implementation of 'total strategy', their reasons were as varied as their agenda and practices. The most aggressive opposition came from the major trade union federations and community organisations, most of the latter being affiliated to the UDF. Ironically, these forces were complemented by some bantustan leaders, the business community, and the international community.

The major achievement of the trade unions was to oppose the state's intention to exclude migrant workers from the trade unions. After refusing to register until the relevant clauses of the legislation had been removed, the state backed down soon after the legislation was passed in 1979. Consequently, migrant workers, who were in any case the backbone of the new unions, began to organise and mobilise alongside urban insiders thus undermining the Riekert strategy that attempted to divide the working class along urban-rural lines. Trade unions have since given expression to the central political demand of migrant workers: the right to live and vote in the metropolitan political economies instead of being defined as members of a bankrupt bantustan.¹⁸

¹⁸ M Swilling, 'The politics of working class struggles in Germiston, 1979-1983', paper presented to the History Workshop, University of Witwatersrand, February 1984.

Furthermore, by emphasising the need to establish strong democratic organisations, the unions thwarted the state's attempt to bring the unions under control by institutionalising industrial conflict. Instead, beginning in late 1979, the unions took advantage of the 1979–82 boom to wage protracted shop-floor battles to win recognition, wage increases, maternity rights, pension pay-outs, and a range of concessions that challenged, in the words of Mike Rosholt (the head of the largest manufacturing monopoly), 'management's right to manage'. Even during the recession, strike levels rose and union membership increased dramatically.¹⁹

The growth of the unions was significant for three reasons:

- 1) the socialist leadership within the unions meant that workers were drawn into highly politicised organisations opposed to the perpetuation of apartheid;
- 2) in many areas unions provided the organisation training for a new generation of community activists who subsequently played leading roles in powerful community organisations;
- 3) during 1979–82, the rolling general strikes that rocked the Eastern and Western Cape, Natal, and the East Rand forged a space for the re-emergence of political organisations such as the UDF and National Forum (NF) in 1983.

Community organisations first emerged in Port Elizabeth and Soweto towards the end of 1979 (Soweto Civic Association (SCA) and the Port Elizabeth Black Civic Organisation (PEBCO)).²⁰ This was followed by the emergence of powerful student organisations in the Cape during the 1980 Cape Town schools boycott. This boycott marked a turning point because its leaders repeatedly emphasised the need to 'learn from the mistakes of '76'. These were perceived to be black exclusivism, student vanguardism, voluntarism, and the failure to recognise the leading role of the working class. Democratically organised neighbourhood-based 'civics' (community organisations) first emerged in Cape Town in the wake of the 1980 boycott. Although community organisations also ¹⁹ See R & L Lambert, 'State reform and working class resistance, 1982', South African Research Services, op. cit.; E Webster 'New frontiers of control', South African Research Services, South African Review (2) 1983; J Lewis & E Randall 'Survey: the state of the unions', South African Labour Bulletin 11(2) October–December 1985.

²⁰ C Cooper and L Ensor, PEBCO: A Black Mass Movement, Johannesburg: South African Institute of Race Relations 1981.

emerged in the other provinces, it was not until 1983 that they became a generalised phenomenon.²¹

Civics and Youth Congresses came to dominate the political terrain in the townships during 1983–85. The reasons for this were two-fold: the exclusion of Africans from the new Constitution and the failure of the BLAS. The BLAS that were introduced in 1983 were politically illegitimate because they were not linked up to higher forms of political representation. The boycott of the elections for the tricameral parliament was explicitly coupled to the boycott of the elections for the BLAS because the UDF was keen to use the inadequacy of these structures to demand substantive political rights for all—an agenda that facilitated the re-emergence of the Freedom Charter.

Mobilisation around the demand for political rights alone would not have resulted in the mass-based community organisations that exist today. Equally important was the fiscal crisis of the BLAS and the central government as the recession took its toll. In order to withdraw from the politically volatile task of providing the means of collective consumption, the central government built into the logic of 'self-government' the provision that BLAS should be self-financing. However, the townships do not have a viable tax base. Consequently, to improve township conditions, the BLAS were forced to increase rent and service charges, in some cases by 100 per cent. This triggered off dramatic township conflicts involving protracted rent boycotts, squatter movements, housing struggles and stay-aways. The final result has been the total collapse of the BLAS, as councillors resigned en masse or fled the townships in fear of their lives. State officials have now acknowledged that it was a mistake to give the BLAS inadequate fiscal resources.²²

At the central government level, the successful boycotts of the elections for the tricameral parliament were obviously a severe blow for the reform strategy. This was compounded by the fact that prominent bantustan leaders rejected the confederal schema preferring a more integrated federal option as suggested by the Buthelezi Commission. Moderate and radical black political organisations were not the only groups that opposed the consociational/confederal solution. As the ²¹ M Swilling, 'Stayaways, urban protest and the state', South African Research Services (eds), South African Review (3) 1986.

²² W Cobbett, D Glaser, D Hindson & M Swilling, 'South Africa's regional political economy: a critical analysis of reform strategy in the 1980s', South African Research Services (eds), South African Review (3) 1986.

crisis continued well into the 1980s, a growing caucus of disaffected Afrikaners in the National Party, the universities and certain branches of the state apparatus (referred to as the 'neo-verligtes') also began to admit that the bantustan system had failed and that blacks needed to be accommodated in new central government structures.²³ This was reinforced by the vocal liberal intellectual community and organised commerce and industry who took advantage of the cracks within Afrikanerdom and the bankruptcy of the reforms to demand far-reaching changes in a federalist direction.²⁴

The complex social conflicts described above did not determine state policy in a structural vacuum. Nor are structural forces apolitical processes moving relentlessly through history behind the backs of human agencies. Rather, new social conflicts bring into relief structural forces that were either hidden from view by discourses incapable of 'thinking' these processes, or else they were simply ignored by discourses that focused on 'more important' processes. Recent social conflicts have focused attention on the 'urban question' precisely because of the activities of the urban social movements (both union and community-based) which in turn reinforced the initiatives of organisations such as the Urban Foundation lobbying on behalf of big business. During 1984-85, the 'urban question' did not refer to the narrow problem of how to incorporate 'urban blacks' into a revamped apartheid structure as was the case in the post-1976 era, but rather on how the entire urban and regional system of production and reproduction can be restructured to cope with the 'realities of urbanisation'. Before this issue is addressed, a brief analysis of these structural forces is necessary.²⁵

The thrust of the argument in Cobbett et al is that the apartheid policy inadvertently created regional patterns of population movement and industrial location that undercut what state policy and analysts have hitherto assumed are the foundations of apartheid: a dual economy, ²³ For the most articulate presentation of this view see C Heunis, 'In search of democracy', Leadership SA (special international edition) January 1986; '... and what about the blacks?' (pamphlet published by the National Party, 1985).

²⁴ See, for example, J Lombard and J Pisanie, 'Removal of racial discrimination against blacks in the political economy of the Republic of South Africa', (memorandum published by the Associated Chambers of Commerce, 1985); L Louw and F Kendall, South Africa: The Solution, Johannesburg: Amagi Publications, 1986; J Lombard, Alternatives to the Consolidation of KwaZulu, Pretoria: University of Pretoria Press, 1980.

²⁵ W Cobbett, D Glaser, P Hindson and M Swilling, op. cit.

cheap labour and de-urbanisation. We argue that influx control and industrial dispersal policy have combined to extend the metropolitan space-economies in a way that enmeshes and incorporates populations located behind bantustan boundaries into systems of production and reproduction that cannot be separated into rural-urban categories.

These extended metropolitan economies or regions have not developed outside state policy. In fact, recent shifts in state policy have been shaped directly by the exigencies of these spatial forms. Some of the more important shifts are firstly, the absolute and relative quantitative decline of long distance oscillatory migration and the massive increase in the number of 'cross-border commuters'. Development Boards have for some years now tended to decrease the number of migrants employed in the metropolises while simultaneously granting commuters 'administrative section 10 rights', effectively giving rural outsiders (commuters) and urban insiders equal access to the labour market. This blurring of the distinction between rural and urban labour markets contradicts the logic of the Riekert Commission which in any case virtually ignored commuters as a factor. Geographically, these new labour supply patterns correspond with regional rather than racial coordinates giving rise to what may be called 'regional proletariats'. The new urbanisation policies as articulated in the President's Council Report on Urbanisation and the 1986 White Paper on Urbanisation are clearly designed to reinforce and rationalise this process.²⁶

Secondly, industrial dispersal policy since 1982 has also been shaped by the need to manage the new metropolitan space-economies. It is quite clear that although rhetorical allegiance is still paid to traditional industrial decentralisation policy to satisfy the demands of bantustan elites for 'development', in practice there have been two important shifts. First, the focus is no longer on industrial decentralisation to outlying rural peripheries, but rather on industrial deconcentration to the metropolitan peripheries. Secondly, the number of industrial development points have been scaled down to seven or eight key 'growth poles'. In short, industrial dispersal policy is firmly linked to the dispersal of industrial activities within the extended metropolitan space-economies, rather than acting as a component of the confederal schema based on spatially coherent bantustan economies. Once again, the geographical pattern that this produces corresponds with regional rather than racial coordinates—a process that is inscribed in the boundaries of the nine Development Regions.

²⁶ See D Hindson, 'Orderly urbanisation and influx control: from territorial apartheid to regional spatial ordering in South Africa', in M Addleson and R Tomlinson, Industrial Decentralisation and the South African State, Johannesburg: Ravan Press (forthcoming).

Thirdly, the new Regional Services Councils Act of 1985 explicitly states that sections of the bantustans will be incorporated into the area of jurisdiction of these new multi-racial metropolitan governments. The RSCs, therefore, are the institutional expression of these extended metropolitan space-economies. They are aimed at providing substantial fiscal resources for restructuring and managing the metropolitan areas by cutting across traditional Group Area and bantustan boundaries—the so-called ‘soft borders’ approach.

To sum up: massive structural changes have taken place that state policy has been responding to for some years now. However, this has not been expressed in a new or coherent ideological package that could serve as an alternative to apartheid. Instead, the state is caught between the exigencies of structural needs that transcend traditional apartheid boundaries and the vicissitudes of the political terrain where it defends the need for ‘orderly reform’—a euphemism for white and capitalist interests—against right-wing pressure for the retention of ‘grand apartheid’ and the demands emanating from the large majority of South Africans for the transfer of power to those parties that represent this constituency.

The interregnum

The interregnum consists of a social stalemate where ‘the old is dying and the new cannot be born’. The organisations and movements that represent the interests of the oppressed majority do not possess the organisational capacity, political power or coercive strength to overthrow the state. Nor does the state have the ideological and political resources required to re-establish its dominance without coercion. ‘Where . . . the hegemony of a dominant class is persistently and strongly challenged,’ Miliband argues, ‘the autonomy of the state is likely to be substantial, to the point where, in conditions of intense class struggle and political instability, it may assume “Bonapartist” and authoritarian forms, and emancipate itself from constraining constitutional checks and controls.’²⁷ This is where we are now: a social stalemate presided over by a defensive state constantly seeking to regain the initiative by liberating itself from the last remaining constitutional and political constraints on arbitrary power.

²⁷ R Miliband, Class Power and State Power, London: 1983, p 68.

The demise of 'total strategy' has been registered by key branches of the state that have since begun to formulate an alternative. However, unlike 'total strategy', current reforms have not been presented at the outset as a coherent package.²⁸ This means that state policy is not systematically organised around a single guiding principle, but rather around a few power axes that correspond with different modes of formative action. There are at least four main power axes: the coercive apparatuses governed by the logic of maintaining 'law and order'; the traditional apartheid apparatuses epitomised by the ailing Department of Cooperation and Development; some of the independent bantustan states who are resisting threats to their sovereignty (eg Bophuthatswana); and the reformist apparatuses concerned with the restructuring of the political economy, eg the Department of Constitutional Development and Planning. The State Security Council presides over the points of intersection of these axes attempting to retain the internal coherence of the state as the pressure builds up on the outside.

Although the relationships between these different power-axes depend on a range of subjective and objective factors, they essentially revolve around the conflict between officials genuinely committed to substantially restructuring political institutions and economic systems and those who remain reluctant to face the fact that, to use the words of a prominent National Party ideologue, Willie Esterhuyse, 'a point has been reached where a clearer articulation of long-term goals and more daring thought about possible models have become essential'.²⁹ This ideological hiatus within the state as a whole explains its incapacity decisively to transcend the Catch-22 position in which it currently finds itself: on the one hand it wants to end political instability to create the conditions conducive for the imposition of reforms from above, while, on the other hand, escalating repression fuels political instability. To escape from the paralysis of this internal crisis, the repressive and reformist branches have become increasingly 'autonomous' in order to break free from the fetters that proscribe certain actions, eg the more liberal demands of big business. Whether this will lead to real reform will depend on whether the actions of the reformist and repressive apparatuses begin to complement rather than contradict one another. The fact of the matter is that the capacity of black resistance organisations to oppose state policy directly affects the relationship between the reformist and repressive apparatuses: the more opposition there is the more repression is used which in turn destabilises the conditions for reform; as opposition diminishes, repression becomes increasingly functional to reform and so the resulting greater unity of purpose within the state reinforces the chances of success of reformist initiatives.

²⁸ Some newspaper journalists have suggested that policy makers are using the Samuel Huntington game plan for reformers which posits that reformers should not reveal their hand before the reform process, but only after it has been implemented. This prevents the radical left and right from shooting it down before its 'benefits' have been felt. There may be some truth in the notion that the South African state may present civil society with a fait accompli at a later stage, but this assumes that the state is more coherent and directed than it really is.

²⁹ Sunday Times (London) 20 November 1985.

State policy, therefore, is a curious mixture of reformist and repressive practices. The most coherent reforms, however, are clearly moving in a federalist direction. These include the granting of citizenship to most Africans, replacing Provincial Councils with a number of multi-racial Executive Committees at second-tier level, the introduction of Regional Service Councils at third-tier level, official acceptance that blacks need to be incorporated into 'higher levels of decision-making', and all the talk of creating a 'unified' South Africa that transcends the cardinal principle of bantustan sovereignty. The fact that the state is dusting the covers of the Buthelezi Commission and allowing white political parties and Inkatha to move towards establishing 'Kwa-Natal', reinforces the view that important sections of the state are willing to allow current reforms to move in a federal solution. The Kwa-Natal proposal (to merge Natal province and the KwaZulu 'homeland') was approved at an Indaba (conference) in Durban on 28 November 1986 by representatives of the whites, Indians and Zulus by a 24-2 majority with three abstentions.

The ingenuity of these reforms lies in the fact that instead of beginning by restructuring the central state, policymakers are focusing on the third and second tiers of government—the so-called 'bottom up approach' which lies at the heart of the state's strategy of repressive reform. The proposed structure of these tiers correspond to the technical and managerial requirements of metropolitan and regional space-economies that have turned out to be the unintended consequence of years of influx control, industrial dispersal policy and bantustan development. In other words, the state can establish these apparatuses under the depoliticised rubric of 'general affairs' in order to administer what the new generation of technocrats define as the 'realities of change'. These changes are tightly controlled by the Department of Constitutional Development and Planning which presides over the nexus between regional development policy, constitutional planning and labour movement and settlement controls. The pace and nature of the reforms will depend to a large extent on whether this department can gain the strategic initiative within the state as a whole.

The state cannot choose the terrain on which it intends to impose reforms. It will continue to do battle with the mass-based movements of the oppressed majority that are calling for completely different solutions to the crisis. If we take into account the squatter movements, bus boycotts, rent boycotts, stay-aways, strikes, school boycotts, housing struggles, anti-removal struggles, consumer boycotts and the electoral boycotts of the tricameral parliament and BLAS, we are talking about the mobilisation of enormous numbers of people around demands for change that affect the entire social structure. The logic of these struggles has produced a new political culture centred around the demand for popular control over the systems that govern the daily lives of ordinary people. This is why the Freedom Charter and the May Day demands are such crucial points of departure for meaningful change in South Africa.

Future directions

Social change will be determined by the relations of power between three major social actors: the state, capital and the popular organisations representing the interests of the oppressed majority. There are two dominant conceptions of what these relations are. First, there is the view that the state is monolithic and incapable of reforming itself. Consequently, community and work-place organisation and mobilisation are only significant insofar as they contribute to the power of a national movement that will eventually detonate the total collapse of the state. Although capital is seen as the state's ambiguous partner, the divisions between state and capital are seen as important to the extent that this weakens the state and hence hastens the moment of eventual collapse.

Secondly, there is the view that the state can reform itself. Ironically, what many liberal and Marxist analyses have in common is the view that the state is susceptible to capital's demands for reforms—although they differ on the reasons. The political and strategic implications of this view are that popular organisations are less important than the relations of power between capital and the state. Popular organisations are only significant as catalysts of social change—a process which will ultimately be controlled and directed by the ruling groups.

I would like to propose an alternative view. The relations of power between the state, capital and the popular organisations during the current conjuncture revolve primarily around the struggle over the goals of structural change.³⁰ The conflictive processes and struggle that generated 'total strategy' were rooted in the township revolts of the mid-1970s, the responses of the 'post-Muldergate' state and the reformist interventions of capital.

The current conjuncture is marked by the demise of 'total strategy' that was designed to reconstitute the ideological and material goals of the urban areas without restructuring the urban and regional foundations of apartheid. The popular organisations that emerged in the 1980s were 'aimed at the transformation of the institutionalised urban meaning against the logic, interest, and values of the dominant class.'³¹ The ruling groups have responded to these successful challenges from below with new discourses that transcend the structural goals institutionalised by apartheid. However, neither the popular organisations nor the state have managed to mobilise sufficient ideological and political power decisively to impose their respective frameworks on civil society. This has given rise to a social stalemate that is steadily pulling the country into a quagmire of violence, economic collapse, political bankruptcy and socio-psychological breakdown.

The downward cycle of social collapse, however, rarely develops without the emergence of countervailing forces that eventually give shape to a resolution of conflict that becomes the basis for a future consensus. In the South African context, this is clearly evident. As the crisis intensifies, the state institutions have become increasingly isolated from the main constituents of civil society. Although this is obvious as far as the black population is concerned,³² major white interests have more recently become increasingly disaffected. White business leaders have defied the government by going to speak to the ANC and, unlike 1985, they have not supported the 1986 State of Emergency. Evidence of significant disaffection is also evident amongst white students (including Afrikaners), Churches, academics, the press, political parties and even within National Party circles. The logical conclusion of the process is a point where the state can no longer govern because the distance between itself and civil society has become unbridgeable. At that point, the interregnum must give way to a transitional period.

³⁰ I am borrowing here from a theory of social change that has been developed by Manuel Castells, The City and the Grassroots, Los Angeles: 1983.

³¹ ibid., p 305.

³² For an attitudinal reflection of black political attitudes, see articles by Kock et al., Schutte and Couper in D J van Vuuren, et al. (eds), South Africa: A Plural Society in Transition, Durban: 1985.

The politics of transition—the phase that follows the capitulation of the old state and precedes the establishment of a new state—involves the creation of ground-rules to govern the relationship between conflicting parties as they hammer out the constitutional and related structures of a new system of political power. The minimum requirements needed to facilitate a transitional phase in South Africa have been stated often enough: release of all political prisoners, unbanning of banned organisations, the dismantling of apartheid structures, and a commitment to a national convention to negotiate the terms of transfer of power to the majority.

Contrary to the predictions of the first approach outlined above, a revolutionary rupture is unlikely. For a revolutionary rupture to occur the security forces need to collapse, the state's social base must disintegrate and reformist attempts to reconstitute the goals of structural change must be an unmitigated failure.³³ Whereas the last two conditions may exist, the possibility of the first will remain remote. Instead, we can expect the future to hold in store, to use Stanley Uys' words, 'a mighty upwelling of black rage that, over the years rather than months, will sap and haemorrhage the white power structure until it falls in on itself.'³⁴

The future, therefore, will revolve around social actors committed to contesting the meaning of social change over a prolonged period of time. On the one hand, the popular organisations will strive to impose a vision of social change based on the principles expressed in the Freedom

³³ A distinction should be made between a revolutionary rupture and a revolutionary process. A revolutionary process, ie the transformation of social structures, can occur without a revolutionary rupture that is centred around the seizure of state power. The storming of the Bastille or the Winter Palace—the classic vision of what a revolutionary rupture entails—has only tended to happen in relatively undeveloped societies where the state is not integral to the cohesion of social relations. Consequently, sufficient power can be mobilised outside state structures to launch a final assault on the fortress-type state. See N Poulantzas, State Power Socialism, London: 1980.

³⁴ S Uys, 'Blacks now know that they are going to win', The Guardian (London) 1 June 1986, p 7.

Charter and the May Day demands, while, on the other, capital and the state will attempt in different ways to restructure the urban and regional foundations of apartheid on their own terms. However, given that a revolutionary rupture is unlikely, the final outcome will not be a system that reflects the paradigmatic interests of a single class or group.

The meaning of social change will be shot through with symbols, interests, and processes that may reflect racist, capitalist or socialist discourses in differing degrees depending on the organisational capacities of the parties, movements and organisations involved. The socialist alternative formulated in the first part of the paper will, in my opinion, enable the oppressed and exploited classes to dominate the process that will shape the structures of a post-apartheid South African society. This is, after all, the fundamental demand that has emerged from the townships, factories and schools in recent years. The socialist alternative does not automatically guarantee that this will happen, but it does provide a framework for thinking how it can happen. Under the present circumstances this alternative may appear utopian, but if we can move beyond the current interregnum into the politics of transition, socialism will more than likely become the corner-stone of South African political discourse.

Visions of the future: a socialist perspective

Two basic points were made at the outset of this paper. These were, first, that the Freedom Charter and May Day Demands articulate four sets of demands:

- 1) the restructuring of work and employment;
- 2) the reorganisation of the provision of the means of collective consumption;
- 3) the democratisation of political and economic decision-making;
- 4) the redistribution of the land and wealth and the nationalisation of monopolies.

Secondly, that for these demands to be translated into a functioning political economy, six basic guiding principles will be necessary: These include:

- 1) The creation of a democratically elected unitary majoritarian state;
- 2) the establishment of a politically regulated social structure of accumulation;

- 3) the decentralisation of political and economic decision-making in order to maximise participation;
- 4) a balanced relationship between social regulation and market mechanisms;
- 5) constitutional checks and controls; and
- 6) economic policies that do not abstract out the problems of scarcity.

The following points will assume that we are looking at a post-transitional stage and for the sake of argument, the probable balance of power and class forces have been purposefully excluded from the discussion. Furthermore, what follows is not a blueprint but a discussion of some options. It is therefore not designed to pre-empt the broad-based popular discussions that are bound to take place when power is eventually transferred to the majority, but rather to aid and enrich these discussions.

Our understanding of the alternatives must be shaped by an understanding of the popular demands contained in the Freedom Charter and the May Day Demands. The most striking feature about these demands is that they all involve the rejection of structures that have been forged by South Africa's unique combination of capitalist exploitation and racial oppression. The central feature of this combination has been the direct intervention of the state in all aspects of social existence: work, living, representation and wealth generation. It was only by means of this intervention that the ruling classes were able to structure society so dramatically along racial lines.³⁵ It is not surprising, therefore, that the popular demands of the majority of South Africans will require massive state intervention in these self-same fields to redress the imbalances and inequalities that decades of racial capitalism have created.

This brings us to the need for alternatives. During the last few years, a range of books have been published arguing for a post-apartheid solution based essentially on the principles of 'free enterprise', minimal state intervention and maximum decentralisation of decision-making.³⁶ The logic at the heart of this view is that the racial structure of South African capitalism can be blamed on state intervention. It follows, ³⁵ See, for example, M Legassick, 'South Africa: capital accumulation and violence', Economy and Society 3(3) 1974; H Wolpe, 'Capitalism and cheap labour power in South Africa: from segregation to apartheid', Economy and Society, 1(4) 1972; D Hindson, 'The pass system and the formation of the urban African proletariat in South Africa', unpublished doctoral thesis, University of Sussex, 1983; M Lipton, Capitalism and Apartheid, London: 1985.

³⁶ J Lombard & J Du Pisannie, op. cit.; Buthelezi Commission, L Louw & F Kendall op. cit.

therefore, that the answer lies in bringing state intervention to an end and allowing socio-political relationships to be governed by the same mechanism that governs the economy—the market. De-regulation will in turn balance the economic inequalities and if local or regional political entities are allowed to hammer out their own means of co-existence in a federal framework, racial domination will give way to 'multi-ethnic' harmony.

Coupled to the anti-statist rhetoric of this view is the apparently democratic notion that 'minorities need to be protected'. Federalism is put forward as a system that is capable of entrenching these principles: 'economic freedom and the private enterprise ethic—as well as the norms with which they are associated—are best entrenched in a future political system embodying the principles of federalism or confederalism.'³⁷ Furthermore, federalism is regarded as preferable to both apartheid and a majoritarian unitary state, because it allows for the creation of a new nation-state which grants political rights to all its subjects while simultaneously 'protecting minorities'.

At the moment there are in fact two opposing reformist conceptions of how state structures can be de-racialised. The one can most accurately be called 'federalist' because it envisages the horizontal division of sovereignty, ie the creation of local, regional and central states each with their own inviolable spheres of authority. The other is modelled more on the principles of consociational democracy because it envisages the vertical division of sovereignty, ie the retention of the existing centralised structures with the pinnacles of each level of government providing a forum for 'joint decision-making' while the lower levels remain racially defined. The starting point of both models, however, is the need to protect 'group rights'. In reality, the concern for group rights is not unrelated to the desire to protect the capitalist system and its hierarchy of racial privileges, albeit in a legitimised form. The ideology of anti-statism and group rights masks more fundamental fears. First, that a state dominated by a black majority could begin building socialism, or at least impose a welfare state system that entails 'confiscatory taxation',³⁸ fiscal indiscipline, high minimum wages and nationalisation. Secondly, the too rapid advancement of an inexperienced black elite into senior positions in the civil service, government and business could lead to managerial inefficiency and administrative 'chaos'.³⁹ The third fear is that ethnic conflicts under majority rule (including violence directed at whites) could lead to economic and political breakdown.

³⁷ J Lombard & J Du Pisanie, op. cit., p 2.

³⁸ ibid., p 24.

Proponents of federalism argue that the only way to prevent a black majoritarian state imposing socialism or welfarism from above is to establish relatively autonomous local and regional political entities. These would hold sovereign power over limited coercive apparatuses and economic policies, fragmenting a national majority regionally. The consociationalists have the same objective in mind; however, with them it is to be achieved by creating a political system dominated by ethnic elites each representing their respective ethnic constituencies. Federalism, and to a lesser extent consociationalism, also lends itself to a system of institutional checks and balances both regionally and within the central state. These include structures such as an independent federal reserve bank, separate legislative houses with one of them having a white veto, and a separated legislature, executive and judiciary. Further, entrenched constitutional provisions could protect freedom of contract, the status of the currency, minority veto rights, the right to property, and so on. A federal system would thus limit any one national group's access to political power.

A central government operating according to these principles might for example have to:

- accept unpopular monetary measures imposed by the (ostensibly apolitical and neutral) federal reserve bank; and/or
- secure acceptance of legislation from two legislative houses, one of which may have a white minority veto; and/or
- accept limits on its power to impose its policies on particular regions or localities; and/or
- allow the constitutionality of its policies to be tested by an independent judiciary.

This is what Lombard and Du Pisanie call 'polycentrism'.⁴⁰ Such 'division of sovereignty' is a prescription for minimal or limited government, which leaves the state incapable of affecting radical changes. Reformers hope a federal system would place the central state above political conflict, making it difficult to mobilise nation-wide forces around demands with national scope. A federal state would by intended default leave intact the foundations of the economy and relations of production, and expose only marginal or localised elements of the economic system to modification. The meaning of 'group rights', anti-statism and 'free enterprise' thus becomes apparent.

³⁹ S van der Merwe, op. cit.

⁴⁰ J Lombard & J Du Pisanie, op. cit.

A willingness to use state power in an interventionist manner to redress political and economic inequalities will have to be the starting point of any government that is seriously committed to meeting the popular demands outlined at the outset. Extensive state intervention is not, however, synonymous with socialism. The creation of a non-capitalist non-socialist 'national democracy'—the immediate objective of the main national liberation organisations—is consistent with the type of state intervention necessary to meet most popular demands.⁴¹

What follows is an interpretation of national democracy from what may be called a democratic socialist perspective.

Majoritarianism—the defining feature of national democracy—is the political precondition for a more just and equitable future South Africa: the right of the majority to rule remains non-negotiable, no matter how unpopular the present rulers and their liberal shadows waiting in the wings may find it. The form this takes, however, is another matter. The principal characteristic of majoritarianism is a unitary state. By this is meant the creation of a central state that has sovereignty over a geographically unified South Africa and powers over the subordinate organs of government at local and regional level. This implies the legislature is sovereign and this sovereignty cannot be divided into local or regional components with totally autonomous decision-making powers that may be used by local constituencies to oppose central government policy. Furthermore, the legislature should be elected on a direct (and preferably proportional) basis. This will ensure that central government represents the will of the majority.

Three basic forms of representation at central government level are worth considering. These are a Westminster-type parliament, a federal structure with two houses elected on a direct and geographical basis respectively, and an Assembly elected by local popular Assemblies. They are all appropriate for giving institutional expression to a national democratic state. However, the constitutional format eventually adopted will depend to a large extent on the mode of economic organisation.

The economic foundation of national democracy will most likely be a 'mixed economy' that may, depending on whether socialists are dominant in the state, gradually make the transition to socialism. What is certain, however, is that if nationalisation is taken seriously, it will be necessary to strengthen the authority of the executive. This may militate against a federal-type structure based on the principle that 'many and smaller is better than fewer and larger' state authorities. If the new government comes to power with the belief that its role is to initiate substantial changes to the foundations of the system, it is more likely to tend towards concentrating than dispersing power. However, this should not preclude the necessity for the decentralisation of administration and representation.

⁴¹ For a full discussion of this subject, see P Hudson, op. cit.

A distinction should be made between policy formulation and policy implementation. The formulation of national policy should take place at central government level. These policies should then be binding on the local regional government structures. Although some might argue this encourages top-down control and eventually authoritarianism, it must be admitted that it can only work democratically if the system of representation is effective and if central government is firmly based on sound local and regional government foundations that link local and regional constituencies with central policymaking apparatuses on a regular basis. As far as the implementation of policy is concerned, local and regional bodies should play the dominant role.

This brings us to the question of social regulation. Social regulation of the economy basically amounts to the right of the state to nationalise sectors of the economy. This means that this will have to be provided for in the constitution, or at least, should not be prevented by entrenched constitutional provisions. This raises the question of the protection of property. Does the right of the state to nationalise violate the right of the individual to own property? Many socialists currently agree that a distinction can be drawn between private property owned by an individual and corporate property used to produce surplus value. If this distinction is constitutionally entrenched then it is possible to provide for the nationalisation of economic enterprises. The protection of the right of the individual to own property for non-accumulative purposes remains an important safeguard for individual freedoms.

Nationalisation, however, is by no means the end point for most socialists. Nationalisation is perfectly consistent with an essentially capitalist economy. As far as socialists are concerned, nationalisation is the first step towards 'socialisation', ie true democratic and direct control of production by the producers themselves. This can take one of two forms. Either through elected committees of workers which run the enterprises; or, if the enterprises are run by state-appointed managers, through state bodies elected by the producers themselves. The former option amounts to direct economic control, while the latter is a more indirect form of political control. (European social democrats have argued that socialisation can also be achieved by joint management-worker control where both management and workers have to agree before any policy can be implemented.)

If we assume that the future state is going to nationalise the 'commanding heights of the economy', it follows that it will require an extensive bureaucracy to manage various branches of the public sector. It is conceivable that the working-class movement (represented both by the trade unions and explicitly socialist parties) will have serious objections if the only decision-making bodies at central government level are national democratic ones. It is therefore possible that it may become appropriate to complement the national democratic organs of representation with an institution that specifically represents the interests of the working class, particularly in matters related to economic policy (eg minimum wages, productivity, investment, distribution and consumption). If this is the case, then we should consider a form of central government representation based on a popularly elected Assembly or Parliament coupled to an Assembly elected specifically by the working class. (The relationship between the Constituent Assembly and the Soviets after the 1917 Revolution in Russia comes to mind as an example. The Constitutional Assembly, however, was soon abolished.)

It is important to note that nationalisation does not only affect the organisation of the work-place and employment. Nationalisation is one of the ways that could be used to affect the redistribution of the land, a demand that all the oppressed classes share. Nationalisation also relates to the provision of the means of collective consumption, another sphere that affects all classes. The nationalisation of the transport industry, for example, has enormous implications for the daily lives of most people. The same applies to health care, education, housing, and other bulk services. This raises a fundamental question: although the nationalisation of the provision of collective consumption affects the relationship between workers in these sectors and their workplaces, it more importantly affects the relationship between these sectors and the consumers themselves. How this relationship is structured will shape the entire organisation of the post-apartheid city: the cost of transport (subsidised or not?), the quantity, quality and location of housing, the organisation of health care, and so on. It is clear, therefore, that it is not just the working class that is affected by nationalisation. It would therefore be inappropriate to believe that the working class should entirely dominate the economic organs of the state that will invariably be involved in running the nationalised sector.

This leads us to the problem of decentralisation. It is obvious that an enormous amount of power will be concentrated at the central government level in a unitary majoritarian state that also controls the most important sectors of the economy. Now although this can severely undermine democracy, this need not necessarily be the case. The most effective way of ensuring that majoritarian government and nationalised economic sectors run efficiently and democratically is by maximising the decentralisation of representation and administration. As the Cubans came to realise, the most important counter-weight against central power is the self-activity of local and regional constituencies.

As mentioned above, although national policy should be formulated at central government level, local and regional bodies should dominate the implementation processes. This implies that national policy should be formulated in such a way that it allows for variations in the way it is implemented. The reason why implementation should be decentralised is that this can give local and regional bodies a significant degree of control over policies that affect their constituencies. Now if these bodies are popularly elected and truly representative, this may help to facilitate broad participation in the implementation process.

Two forms of decentralised representation may be necessary. First, city government (or its equivalent in non-metropolitan areas) will have to involve a high degree of citizen participation in the running of cities. This is so because if the provision of the means of collective consumption are nationalised, the relationship between the supplier and consumer will have to be regulated by political rather than market mechanisms. How democratic and hence effective this form of regulation will be depends on the level of popular participation. City government will therefore need to be both manager of the means of consumption and political mobiliser. Secondly, the workers in nationalised enterprises located within geographically-bound regions may need to form local and regional councils concerned more directly with production.

Historical evidence suggests that decentralisation encourages and facilitates greater popular participation and this in turn raises productivity and efficiency levels. If the decentralisation of representation and administration is accepted as a necessary counter-weight to central power, then this may provide the basis for a unitary federal state which is not based on race/ethnicity, but rather on the necessity for decentralised authorities to manage local and regional space-economies as democratically as possible.

As far as the market is concerned, there is a popular misconception that the market is by definition a capitalist mechanism that socialists will immediately abolish as soon as they get into power. There is general acceptance now that although this view was held by socialists during the first half of the century and to some extent today, historical experience (particularly in Eastern Europe) has shown that the elimination of the market may abolish the 'anarchy of the market' but has tended to lead to a situation that one writer described as 'planned chaos'. Even those states that did attempt to abolish the market have recognised that the state is not omniscient and therefore the perfect central plan is impossible. It was in response to this problem that many socialists came round to the view that in order to maximise the efficient use of scarce or ('relatively abundant') resources, central planning must be coupled to market mechanisms in such a way that planning sets the basic parameters of economic policy while the market regulates economic relationships at lower levels. At all times, however, central planning policies must subordinate market-type decisions at the lower individualised levels of the economy. The aim is to achieve a balance: the market without planning leaves the producers and consumers at the mercy of dominant classes who make decisions based on profit, while planning without the market results in the subordination of all economic relationships to direct coordination and commands from above. The basic point is that central planning and the market are not incompatible. For example, there is no reason why market relations cannot exist between factories which are controlled and run by the workers. In the end, any attempt to abolish the market entirely will result in the over-dominance of the state and hence limit democracy, while the subordination of policy to the dictates of the market will leave the foundations of class inequality intact.

Finally, the concentration of power in the state makes it imperative that democratic freedoms including freedom of speech, association, press, culture, religion and so on are vigorously defended. These freedoms must in turn be defended by an independent judiciary that can test both the constitutionality of any public action or its validity in terms of a Bill of Rights. These freedoms and rights are the lifeblood of socialist democracy: if they are abolished in the name of socialism, then it is not socialism that will remain, but a new despotism. The more power concentrated in the state, the greater the necessity for ensuring that democratic freedoms are not violated by the expediencies of power.

This brings us to the question of race and the popular liberal wisdom that minorities (ie the whites) must be protected from 'majority domination'. And, indeed, one can readily concede that minorities should have 'rights'—rights to freedom of speech, press, association, religion, petition, to practise their own culture, to equal political rights, to safeguard their material well-being. But minorities do not have the 'right' to entrench their political and economic privileges at the expense of the majority. This boils down to racism, and in a post-apartheid South Africa, racism may well become a criminal offence. It would be wrong to conclude, however, that majoritarianism excludes by definition provision for the protection of minorities. However, when it comes to the protection of white minority interests, a clear distinction will have to be made between the interests of (white) capital and the symbols and traditions of white culture. There is no way a majoritarian government can afford to protect the former in the name of the latter.

Conclusion

The debate about post-apartheid alternatives is currently dominated by liberal capitalist positions. This essay has attempted to enter this field by critically analysing reformist solutions to the current crisis and making tentative suggestions as to how a socialist alternative might address some of the key demands of the majority. Because these proposals were made without reference to the structural constraints and probable balance of power in a post-transition future, the possibilities and limitations that will face a future government seeking to implement these kinds of policies have also not been dealt with. This does not, however, negate the validity of the exercise. The proposals were based on an understanding of what structures will be required to meet the demands contained in the Freedom Charter and the May Day Demands. They are therefore an interpretation of what policies may be pursued by a government dominated by the organisations that currently represent the interests of the majority of black South Africans. What the actual outcome may be in reality will depend entirely on future social struggles.

Post-apartheid South Africa and its neighbours

Apartheid South Africa is waging war on its neighbours. This raises the question: What will be the relationship of a majority-ruled South Africa to those neighbours?

The answer depends less on the political colour of the new government and more on whether that government sees itself as a 'regional power' which will be politically and economically dominant over all southern Africa. The present apartheid government has argued that it has the right to dominance over the region, and it is quite possible that a majority government of whatever political colour would have the same view. Many South Africans, even in the liberation movements, are surprisingly insular. They are demeaning about the neighbouring states and arrogantly assume that a more sophisticated and more industrialised majority-ruled South Africa would 'naturally' lead the region.

Elsewhere in the region, history shows a mixed picture; all too often liberation movements forget the friends that sacrificed for them. Zimbabweans quickly adopted an arrogant and dismissive attitude to Mozambique, and were very slow to reorientate trade patterns away from South Africa and toward Mozambique. Only in 1985—with the growing pressure of South African destabilisation, and with sanctions becoming a serious possibility—did Zimbabwe realise that it needed Mozambique, and this caused it to change its attitude.

Finally, any government in South Africa will face heavy internal demands for jobs and for increased spending on health, education and development. There will be little room to manoeuvre and limited scope for making concessions to the neighbouring states. Here the nature of the government could make a difference—a one-party state may feel more able to make initial concessions to build a better long-term relationship with the neighbouring states, whereas a governing party or coalition in a multi-party system will be under more pressure to come up with immediate results, even at the expense of relations with the neighbouring states.

The statistics and much of the detail about the present regional situation is taken from Beggar Your Neighbours by Joseph Hanlon (London: James Currey, 1986). The article was written in September 1986.

What kind of handover?

The other key factor in determining relationships will be the nature of the handover of power in South Africa itself. If majority rule comes about reasonably soon through a Lancaster House-type of conference, then the South African economy and its links with the neighbouring states will be more-or-less intact, and would probably continue after independence. Even if there were a limited period of sanctions and isolation, many of the old patterns would remain.

On the other hand, if there is a long and bitter revolution, it is harder to predict what the political economy of the region will look like when majority rule finally comes. Normal relations between most of the states and South Africa will have totally broken down, due to closed borders and stepped-up South African attacks and destabilisation. There is a real possibility that South Africa will have overthrown or suborned the governments of some of the neighbouring states. Particularly vulnerable will be the three countries which have at one time or another had close links with South Africa: Lesotho, Swaziland, and Malawi. All three possess different groups which support and oppose South African links, and Pretoria has already interfered in the internal politics of all three countries. Continued support from South Africa (and perhaps the United States) for the MNR, UNITA and other 'dissidents' would ensure that chaos continues to reign in parts of Mozambique and Angola, and possibly Zimbabwe and Zambia. In that case, there will also be large-scale destruction and destitution both in South Africa and in the neighbouring states. This will require some form of international 'Marshall Plan'. Much would then depend on how large the aid package was, how much went to the neighbours (as distinct from South Africa) and to what extent international donors forced the integration of the neighbouring states back into the South African economy.

The worst possibilities would involve continued fighting. One possible outcome is the 'Lebanon scenario', with no formal handover of power at all, but rather a collapse in which different armies and militias controlled different sectors of the country. Foreign powers would no doubt support different factions. Indeed, as in Angola, the USA may see this as preferable to the ANC taking power and could actively intervene to provide military and political support to Inkatha or other groups. Alternatively, as in Nicaragua, the USA might support 'contras' to attack a majority-ruled South Africa, perhaps working through neighbouring governments previously put into power by the apartheid regime.

The 'Lebanon', 'Angola' or 'Nicaragua' scenarios would ensure chaos for decades to come, and it would be impossible to predict what role such a divided South Africa would have in the region. Therefore, in the rest of this article, I assume at a minimum that there is some internationally accepted transfer of power to a majority-rule government. On that assumption, I will next consider economic relations between South Africa and the Southern African Development Co-ordination Conference (SADCC). Finally, I will deal with five specific and difficult areas which will cause problems in the first years after majority rule: demobilising 'puppet' groups and reparations, migrant labour, the four smallest neighbouring states, water, and, finally, the private sector and possible nationalisations.

SADCC and South Africa

The neighbouring states are economically very important to South Africa, which earns more than $1,000 million per year from them. This is profit, after deducting customs union payments and mine remittances. The neighbouring states are South Africa's main export market for manufactured goods, and the neighbours account for all the foreign earnings of South African railways.

It is highly unlikely that the neighbouring states (other than Lesotho) would continue to use South African ports and railways. The ports of Mozambique and Angola are closer and thus cheaper; these neighbours use South Africa now only because South Africa has blown up and closed some railways in Angola and Mozambique.

The issue of manufactured goods is much more complex. In general, South Africa is a high-cost producer, although the plummeting Rand has changed this somewhat, and its market in the neighbouring states is not 'natural'. Rather it is maintained by a collection of economic and political means, ranging from destabilisation to the dominance of key economic sectors by South African companies. These manufactured goods cannot, in general, be sold elsewhere. Thus, the market in the neighbouring states is important not simply as a way of earning foreign exchange, but also as a way of providing a larger market and facilitating local South African production of more goods. The main objection of the neighbours is that this dominance of South African industry hinders their own industrialisation.

For a post-apartheid South Africa, there will be conflicting pressures. On the one hand, local demand for consumer goods will rise rapidly, stretching industrial capacity to the limit. This would tend to reduce exports to the neighbouring states. On the other hand, a post-apartheid South Africa will be in financial difficulties, caused in part by the long independence struggle, and it will need foreign exchange; thus, a strong push for exports can be expected. Furthermore, South African industrialists (whether they are private or parastatal) will be anxious to continue exporting in order to maintain long term dominance of the region. These needs conflict, and imply that industrial export policy will be erratic and confused.

For their part, the nine majority-ruled states have formed SADCC, which is designed to promote regional development through economic cooperation. One fundamental purpose is 'to liberate our economies from their dependence on the Republic of South Africa'. In its founding declaration, SADCC explained that this dependence is not a natural phenomenon nor is it simply the result of a free market economy. The nine states and one occupied territory . . . were, in varying degrees, deliberately incorporated—by metropolitan powers, colonial rulers, and large corporations—into the colonial and sub-colonial structures centring in general on the Republic of South Africa. The development of national economies as balanced units, let alone the welfare of the people of Southern Africa, played no part in the economic integration strategy.¹

Majority rule in South Africa will not change the nature of this artificial dependence, nor the need to reverse it. Indeed, the SADCC states will expect a majority-rule South Africa to be more sympathetic to their demands to reduce the trade imbalance.

A basic element of SADCC is that it is not a free trade zone like the Southern African Customs Union or the Preferential Trade Area for Eastern and Southern Africa. Instead, it is based on negotiating bilateral balanced trade agreements. SADCC will want to negotiate such agreements with South Africa and thus reduce the huge trade deficit. In part this can be done simply by a majority-ruled South Africa making fuller use of structures created by the apartheid state—for example, buying electricity from Mozambique and Angola, water from Lesotho, prawns from Mozambique, and so on. South Africa may also need to buy grain from Zimbabwe, at least in the short term, but this will not be sufficient to meet its needs. Reducing the trade deficit will require South Africa to buy more raw materials and manufactured goods from the neighbouring states, as well as an agreement that certain factories will be developed in the SADCC states and not in South Africa. Similarly, South Africa will be asked to return to the use of Maputo port for substantial amounts of cargo. (Maputo is the closest port to the Transvaal, and is the historic port for the Rand, but as part of its sanctions against Mozambique, apartheid South Africa has substantially expanded the port facilities at Durban and Richards Bay.)

¹ Southern Africa: Toward Economic Liberation, a declaration by the governments of the independent states of southern Africa made at the founding conference of SADCC in Lusaka, 1 April 1980.

It is highly unlikely that South Africa would be asked to join SADCC. Precisely because of its size and economic power, it would dominate SADCC. Rather, the neighbouring states are more likely to see SADCC as a vehicle which gives them equal bargaining power with a more sympathetic South Africa.

South Africa will need to create jobs and earn foreign exchange, and will be loath to give up industries and exports, even for the long-term benefit of the region. A centrally planned, one-party state would be in a better position to take such long-term policy decisions; a government holding only a narrow majority in a multi-party parliament will feel compelled to sacrifice its neighbours to satisfy immediate local demands. Thus, even if the demand to use Maputo port is seen as justified (and is cheaper), the demand by dock workers for jobs in Durban will probably take precedence.

Meanwhile, the ending of apartheid will withdraw the common enemy which has been part of the glue that binds SADCC. This will strengthen the hand of those bourgeois (and petty bourgeois and bureaucratic bourgeois) forces which have continued to support trade with, and dependence on, South Africa, despite destabilisation. They would rather have luxury goods from South Africa than support the development of local industry making mass consumer goods and intermediate goods. They will argue that the ending of apartheid removes the need for SADCC, and that it is sensible to allow South African economic dominance.

Thus, both sides will face conflicting economic and political pressures, and a key factor will probably be how long it takes for majority rule to come to South Africa. The longer the struggle continues, the more the SADCC states will integrate their own economies and strengthen the institutions of SADCC. At the same time, they will steadily de-link from South Africa—spurred on by international sanctions and South African retaliation. If majority rule came by 1990, many trade links would still be intact and the pressure to allow South Africa to re-assert regional economic dominance would be stronger. If the struggle is still underway in 1995 or 2000, many more ties will have broken and are less likely to be re-established.

Another factor is the extent of South African destabilisation, which will surely increase in the coming years. This has already caused substantial damage and is the main factor in the economic crisis of several SADCC states. An end to apartheid will mean an end to destabilisation, and thus a chance for reconstruction. This could provide a substantial market for South Africa, but again there will be conflicting pressures. 'Marshall Plan'-type aid will probably be tied to purchases in donor countries, and thus will not help South African industry. Furthermore, the end of destabilisation will allow the SADCC states to buy on the world market. Until now South Africa has been an expensive supplier, and even its proximity may not make it competitive.

Destabilisation and 'puppet' armies

Part of the Lancaster House package was the rapid end to Rhodesian support for the MNR, and this in turn largely halted MNR activity in Mozambique. But Zimbabwe paid Zambia and Mozambique no reparations for the substantial damage (over $500 million in Mozambique alone), and South Africa quickly picked up support of the MNR and reopened the war in Mozambique.

Any proper settlement in South Africa will similarly end support for UNITA, the MNR and other 'puppet' groups (including those being set up in Namibia). But the MNR and UNITA now have both the infrastructure and supply of arms to allow them to continue fighting for some time on their own. It would be possible for white officials in military intelligence, as well as men in the reconnaissance commandos and other special units (some of whom had previously come from Rhodesia or colonial Mozambique and Angola) to move on to Mozambique, Angola and Namibia. International right-wing groups might provide them with support, and they might also gain covert (or overt) help from the CIA. Thus, an early military demand on the new majority government of South Africa will be to help to suppress the MNR and UNITA—probably at the same time that it will face continued pockets of white armed resistance inside South Africa.

It seems unlikely that the new government would be prepared to pay for the damage done to the neighbouring states ($15 billion between 1980 and 1986), and that repairs, especially to essential infrastructure like railway bridges, will depend on foreign aid. South Africa will be under pressure from its neighbours to ensure them a prominent place in any 'Marshall Plan' for the region.

The 'puppet' groups and past destabilisation could therefore be a source of tension, especially at first, between the neighbouring states and the new majority government.

Migrant labour

Perhaps the most obvious and demeaning form of dependence is migrant labour. There are nearly 300,000 migrant workers in South Africa. They are from Lesotho (140,000 in 1984, which is 69 per cent of the wage-labour force of Lesotho), Mozambique (60,000, 5 per cent of the Mozambican wage-labour force), Malawi (29,000, 8 per cent), Botswana (26,000, 18 per cent) and Swaziland (14,000, 15 per cent). The vast majority are gold miners. This number is sharply down (from 462,000 in 1974), as apartheid South Africa moved to give more jobs to South Africans. Nevertheless, it remains an important source of both jobs and foreign exchange (roughly $250 million per year), and is absolutely essential to Lesotho, and important to Mozambique, Botswana and Swaziland.

A majority-ruled South Africa would be under very strong pressure to give these jobs to South Africans. But the apartheid government has frequently threatened to send these workers home in retaliation for sanctions, which has been staunchly resisted by the mine operators who cannot afford to lose some of their most skilled workers. This argument will still be true in a few years time, so if independence comes soon, South Africa will have to continue with a high level of migrant miners.

On the other hand, as these men become older and retire, they are being replaced by South Africans. By the mid-1990s the numbers will be very much less in any case; this reduction will be speeded up by sanctions and retaliation. In all states except Lesotho, alternative jobs can (and should) be created, and this is dependent on foreign aid and on government priorities. But Lesotho is a special problem—its workers must be based in South Africa. It seems unlikely that, even as retaliation, South Africa would send home the Basotho miners, because hundreds of thousands of starving Basotho (Lesotho nationals) in its midst would only fuel the chaos. A majority-ruled South Africa would probably take a similar view. Thus the best guess is that migrant labour would be phased out, except for perhaps 75,000 Basotho.

Namibia and BLS

South Africa will probably retain some sort of special relationship with its four smallest neighbours—Botswana, Lesotho, Swaziland (BLS), and Namibia. Together they have a population of less than five million, a combined total which is smaller than the population of any other single state in the region. Furthermore, they all have a colonial history of being administered in conjunction with South Africa. Their small population and colonial history means their economies are almost totally integrated with that of South Africa. BLS are members of the South African-controlled Southern African Customs Union, while Lesotho and Swaziland are members of the Common Monetary Area (which until 1986 made the Rand legal tender in those two countries).

If, as now seems likely, Namibia does not gain independence before majority rule in South Africa, then its status could also be a source of problems. The neighbouring states will welcome Namibia into SADCC. But there will be a strong pressure from the new majority government for Namibia to retain its present integration into the South African economy, perhaps through some special status, or through membership in the Monetary Area and the Customs Union.

Similar problems relate to BLS. Their close integration into the South African economy has been of substantial benefit to South African capital, as they still provide the largest regional market. It has manifestly not been in the interests of BLS; the Customs Union is a free trade zone which has ensured that industry only developed in South Africa and not in the peripheral BLS area.

However, many South Africans see BLS as being historically and economically part of South Africa, and as being little more than glorified bantustans. The Freedom Charter specifically states that the people of BLS 'shall be free to decide for themselves their own future', but their inclusion in a charter for South Africa shows the assumption that they should choose to become part of a free South Africa.² This may have been a possibility when the charter was approved in 1955, but BLS all have clear and well-defined national identities now and would be most unlikely to give up their independence to South Africa. But they will be under strong pressure to remain in the Customs Union (and in the case of Swaziland and Lesotho, the Monetary Area).

² Under the heading 'There shall be peace and friendship!' in The Freedom Charter, adopted at The Congress of the People, 26 June 1955.

Namibia and BLS cannot ever be genuinely independent or self-sufficient economies, but they can be substantially more independent than they are now. Inevitably, they will assert their independence and allegiance to SADCC. At the very least, they will expect a majority-rule government in South Africa totally to renegotiate the customs union and accept a much less one-sided relationship. This could bring them into sharp conflict with the new majority government.

Lesotho is perhaps the most serious problem. Namibia, Botswana and Swaziland all have viable economies and sufficient land, and can survive and grow independently. For Lesotho, this is probably not true. Lesotho exists precisely because it was so mountainous that King Moshoeshoe I was able to hold out against the advancing Boers a century ago. But he was forced to give up the best farmland, and present-day Lesotho does not have the resources (in terms of farmland and minerals) to support its people. More than half of the labour force now work in South Africa. The proposed Highland Water Scheme would earn some money for Lesotho, and agricultural development could provide more jobs and food, but it seems that even with substantial development assistance, Lesotho will remain dependent on South Africa. Thus, Lesotho must have some special arrangement which guarantees it continued access to South Africa for jobs. How will the majority rule government respond to this? As already noted, there will be strong demands inside South Africa to take over jobs now held by Basotho. Will the new majority government be able to make sufficient concessions to Lesotho, or will it simply demand that Lesotho become part of South Africa?

This also points to possible border difficulties between South Africa and its small neighbours. Both Lesotho and Swaziland have historic claims to land in South Africa. Indeed, Lesotho was a food surplus producer before its best farmland was incorporated into the Orange Free State. And the apartheid regime actually entered into negotiations with Swaziland in 1981 for the possible handover of some South African territory claimed by the Swazis, although this never actually occurred. Swaziland and Lesotho can be expected to at least restate their claims to the new majority government. Some of Lesotho's economic problems would be resolved if Lesotho were given some land, thus perhaps dispensing with any continuing South African responsibility. This seems unlikely, however. In any case, OAU policy is to accept colonial boundaries, and a majority-ruled South Africa would surely join the OAU.

Namibia's boundaries are a different problem. South Africa has always claimed the enclave of Walvis Bay, and has said that the boundary between Namibia and South Africa was the north bank of the Orange River. Any Namibian government would insist, and a majority-ruled South Africa would probably accept, that Walvis Bay was part of Namibia and the boundary runs down the middle of the river (as is normal international practice). Much less clear, however, is the position of the seabed boundary between Namibia and South Africa. This is still undefined, and the meanderings of the Orange River mean that there are no clear international rules. A large economic zone, with possible gas fields and fishing potential, is at stake. This could be a source of serious tensions and might need to go to international mediation.

Water

Water is one of the region's most scarce resources and has already been the source of considerable tension. South Africa's lack of oil increases the problem, because coal-fired power stations and the Sasol oil-from-coal plants both consume massive amounts of water. Most of the key rivers rise in South Africa, and there are no firm international agreements, so South Africa has been taking more than what would be considered internationally acceptable from rivers flowing into Botswana, Swaziland and Mozambique. For example, the Nkomati River is often dry where it crosses into Mozambique. Lesotho is in the opposite position, having the headwaters of the Orange River. Proposals are now far advanced to buy water from Lesotho, without consultation with Namibia which is at the downstream end of the Orange River.

Thus South Africa will come to majority-rule having already taken more than its fair share of water from certain rivers, and with a still growing demand for more water (although the Sasol plants might be closed down because the oil they produce is so expensive and there would be no need for it after the end of sanctions). Mozambique, Swaziland, Botswana and Namibia will all demand negotiated water treaties with more water being left for the downstream countries. It might be possible, however, to negotiate a treaty with Botswana, Zimbabwe and Mozambique to allow South Africa more water from the Limpopo River. But for the SADCC states, an important test of the good intentions of the new majority government will be its willingness to give up some of the ill-gotten gains of its apartheid predecessors.

The monopoly groups

The Anglo American Corporation of South Africa (AACSA) and several other South African monopoly groups play central roles in the economies of BLS, Namibia, Zimbabwe, and Zambia. There is already some pressure to reduce this, and that pressure must increase after majority rule is achieved and there is a more 'sympathetic' government in South Africa.

The ANC has said it will nationalise AACSA, and there are strong reasons for any majority-rule government to want to nationalise the monopoly groups. On the other hand, if there is a negotiated settlement, the ANC may be forced to accept a new Constitution with entrenched property rights that make nationalisation difficult; this happened with the Lancaster House Constitution for Zimbabwe. Even if nationalisation is possible, the new government may feel the need to retain white 'confidence', as happened in Zimbabwe, in order to prevent the flight of essential technicians and managers. This could cause a delay in nationalisation, or a decision to take only a part share.

On the other hand, AACSA may move in advance of majority rule to ensure that its offshore companies such as Minorco are sufficiently separate that they cannot be nationalised. If that occurred, holdings in neighbouring states would surely be controlled from outside South Africa.

Finally, there is already pressure on the monopoly groups. One of the sanctions proposed by the Commonwealth in 1985 is 'a ban on government contracts with majority-owned South African companies.'³ Furthermore, the benefits of the Preferential Trade Area for Eastern and Southern Africa are restricted to majority locally-owned companies. AACSA has already shown in Zambia and Zimbabwe that it can retain effective control without majority ownership, and there is already a move by some South African companies to reduce their holdings to 49 per cent.

³ Paragraph 7 of the statement issued by the Commonwealth meeting in Nassau, 20 October 1985, under the category 'Some of us would, in the event, consider the following'.

Thus the response of the majority government in South Africa to attempts by its neighbours to take further control of 'South African companies' will be influenced both by the degree of South African government involvement in those firms, and by the level of continued South African involvement. But it is not hard to see the majority-ruled government becoming angry at neighbours' attempts to nationalise a South African government-owned firm, as happened in Mozambique and Angola, where the 1974 Portuguese coup which led to independence for the colonies also led to a nationalisation of Portuguese banks. This meant that the Portuguese state, through the nationalised banks, had large holdings in companies in independent Mozambique and Angola. More than a decade later, this tangle had still not been successfully unravelled.

Two examples will serve to show the difficulties involved. DeBeers, which is owned by AACSA, controls diamond production and marketing in Botswana, Namibia and South Africa. Through its monopoly control of the world market, it manipulates supply and inflates the price. It is in the interests of all three that this system should continue after majority rule. On the other hand, Old Mutual's (South African Mutual Life Assurance Society) Renfreight is the dominant freight and forwarding agency in the region and is mainly responsible for the continued flow of Zimbabwean cargo through South African instead of Mozambican ports. The SADCC states want a non-South African-controlled freight and forwarding agency, but changing ownership is not enough. Renfreight in Zimbabwe uses the firm's South African computer; indeed, the computer runs a pool of shipping containers for the entire region. Advocates of continued links with a majority-ruled South Africa will use this as a strong argument not to delink, while the pro-SADCC lobby will push for a regional computer and separate container pool. De-linking from South Africa is likely to involve thousands of similar small battles. In any solution, much will depend on how sympathetic the new South African parastatals are to demands for delinking and a different kind of relationship.

Dominance or cooperation?

There are always difficulties between large countries and smaller neighbours, because what is a big problem for a small country will be a small problem for the big country. It will require a foreign policy commitment by the new government to treat its smaller neighbours as equals and take their demands seriously. The neighbours' position may be helped if they can use SADCC as their negotiating body, because taken together the SADCC states are larger than South Africa. That in turn depends on the political will of the SADCC states themselves—will they be able to resist manipulation by the new majority-rule government and prevent themselves from being played off one against another?

However, resolution of all these problems hinges most directly on the attitude of the new South African government. Will its leaders see themselves as the 'obvious' political and economic leaders of southern Africa? Will they see South Africa as having a pre-ordained place as the 'regional power', a view some nationalist leaders seem to hold now? If that happens, tensions and conflicts with the neighbours seem inevitable.

The real question is whether the new leaders will argue that the imbalances created by a century of colonisation and apartheid are 'history' and are the unalterable basis from which the region must build, and thus that the rest of the region must accept the continued dominance of South Africa. Or will they listen to the SADCC view that these imbalances must be redressed, and that future development in the region must be more equitable and take into account the needs and demands of everyone in the region?

Giving up the White Man's Burden? Western relations with a free South Africa

When Rudyard Kipling (1865–1936) exhorted his readers to 'take up the white man's burden' in 1899, his poem's subtitle cited the USA and the Philippine Islands. As Britain fought an unexpectedly long war with Afrikaners for control of what the British government regarded as the 'richest spot on earth', the Imperial bard called on the Anglo-Saxon Americans, then fighting to acquire portions of the Spanish Empire, to join their elder siblings in world management. Kipling's friend, Cecil Rhodes, had already scribbled his first will calling for a global condominium of English-speaking white countries. The Afrikaners, like the Spanish, were regarded by the imperialists in London and Washington as not quite white enough to take on such responsibilities in the modern world.

Nevertheless, the constitutional planners of the Union of South Africa, formed in 1910, envisaged that the two white races—British and Boer—would take charge of their own 'natives'. Jan Smuts who had commanded troops against the British at the turn of the century, became not only the leader of white South Africa, but also an international statesman. Smuts played a leadership role in the British Commonwealth and in the League of Nations. He also participated in the drafting of the UN Charter, without noticeable awareness in that organisation's first gathering that the document's human-rights provisions might have some relevance to Smuts's own country.

In the four decades since the Second World War and the founding of the UN, the rigid racism of the National Party government in Pretoria has come into dramatic opposition to the Third World drive for freedom and the heightened international consciousness of racial injustice. Even Pretoria's allies have been dragged step by step into verbal condemnation and then into token sanctions against the apartheid regime. But the de facto alliance between the major Western powers and Pretoria is still largely intact, in economic and even military spheres. Even when the regime is condemned for its intransigence that mocks Western pleas for reform, Western statesmen are more likely to take their cues from English-speaking white businessmen in Johannesburg than from representatives of the majority of South Africans.

What then would the West do if confronted with a democratic South Africa in which the weight of political power shifted to blacks? Could Western countries adjust to a system in which white skin no longer granted special privilege? Could they live with a South African government trying its best to redress past grievances under undoubtedly different conditions?

There are no simple answers, for surely in the event the West will be divided, as today. Some will welcome the new order and others will adjust pragmatically. Yet others will resist bitterly, seeking to destroy the future even if they cannot preserve the past. Nor is detailed scenario-building likely to prove accurate as prediction. Yet considering some of the possibilities for cooperation, and for conflict, may help to prepare now for a constructive relationship with the future free South Africa.

A vision of friendly commerce

Seeking to reinforce ties with the South African regime, conservatives conjure up a nightmare of the West's industries deprived of vital mineral resources by a cartel of the Soviet Union and black-ruled South Africa. South African propaganda repeatedly stresses the figures: 90 per cent of the Western world's production of platinum, 45 per cent of vanadium, 39 per cent of chrome, 20 per cent of antimony and 19 per cent of manganese, not to mention gold and the domination of diamond marketing by the South African-based De Beers Consolidated Mines, which is controlled by Harry Oppenheimer's Anglo American Corporation.

One might argue about the inclusion of diamonds in such a list of strategic commodities, despite US Treasury Secretary Regan's lament about American women potentially deprived of jewellery. Still, the totals are impressive. Just imagine, the alarmists argue, the potential for blackmail should Moscow and Soweto decide to withhold supplies.

The same possibility of a cut-off arises in the sanctions debate. And the answer is that Western countries could indeed do without South Africa, making use of stockpiles, substitution of other minerals and expansion of supplies from new producers anxious to break into the world market. The same applies even more strongly in the long term. If Soviet and South African supplies were cut off, world prices would go up; prospecting and production elsewhere in the world would become more viable. A successful long-term cartel would be difficult to maintain, and of doubtful long-term advantage to either the Soviet Union or South Africa.¹

More important, it is highly unlikely that any South African government, of whatever political or racial complexion, would want to cut off such commerce. A free South Africa, in fact, is likely to need immediate revenue even more urgently, to address the economic and social needs of the majority of its citizens. Nor is it probable that it would be much more successful than the present regime and white-owned mining industry in extracting higher prices from the world market. The Soviet Union, spanning two continents, may be able to regard exports as supplementary to its domestic economy. But a country the size of South Africa, so richly endowed with minerals, will for the foreseeable future need to sell the bulk of its output on the world market.

African countries of the most diverse political orientation—Zaire, Angola, Zambia—continue to sell their oil and copper primarily to Western countries, at the best prices they can get. That is because that is where the markets are. Diversification of trading partners is certainly a goal, but its achievement is constrained by the realities of the world economy. There is no reason to assume South Africa would be different.

The mineral sector, moreover, is more capable of maintaining production under changing political conditions than agriculture, for example. Major purchasers, multinational companies, host governments and workers have a joint interest in keeping the mines going, however great may be the disputes over division of the proceeds.

The capacity to maintain production under a new order, and the cost structure of production, would depend on many variables, political and economic. Phasing out the system of compulsory migratory labour, redressing black/white wage differentials, abolishing the racial monopoly on mine management, coping with the possible flight of skilled white labour—all would pose complex problems. Such issues will arise whether the mines are nationalised or simply taxed and regulated. Balancing equity and production will be political as well as management issues.

¹ The minerals debate has a long history; see, for a clear discussion, Larry W Bowman, 'The strategic significance of South Africa to the United States', African Affairs (81) 1982, pp 159-91.

The greatest threat to production is likely to come, not from the accession to power of a representative South African government, but from the prolongation of conflict beforehand. So long as the Pretoria regime refuses to surrender power, violence will continue to escalate. The fact that no political movement wants to destroy the long-term productive capacity of the economy may not prevent damage that would be extremely costly. At some stage there will probably be a real danger of sabotage by recalcitrant racists on the verge of defeat. If the Western countries seek long-term security of mineral supplies, they should join in forcing Pretoria to accept a negotiated transfer of power sooner rather than later.

It might make sense to rely on the white regime to defend the sources of minerals for the West, if one assumes that white domination should and can endure forever, successfully repressing or diverting black aspirations for freedom. Even setting aside moral judgements, however, that choice provides no long-term assurance. Instead of shoring up crumbling white supremacy, the West would do better to help to lay the foundations of a new democratic order.

Similar considerations hold if one looks at South Africa as a market for Western exports. As long ago as 1954, the US Department of Commerce noted in a report that the apartheid system 'leads to inefficiency and [reduces] internal consumption levels and the size of the market'.² A prosperous white South Africa may itself be a significant market for imported consumer goods and 'high-tech' capital inputs. The lack of a wider market as an indication of apartheid's economic irrationality should not be exaggerated, for the system has clearly provided many compensating advantages for foreign and domestic capitalists.

It is true, nevertheless, that a white community of less than 5 million is in the long run a less attractive market than a nation of almost 35 million, black and white, with purchasing power distributed more equally. If one envisages such a transformation, the market would change, accelerating the trend toward increased black purchasing power. There is no reason to think that Western exporters would not get their share of the sales.

Certainly a non-aligned South Africa would turn to other countries for imports as well, as the options of trade with the Soviet bloc and Third ² US Department of Commerce, Investment in Union of South Africa, Washington DC: Government Printing Office, 1954, p 60.

World countries were explored. But the principal competition would probably be, as now, from East Asia, for reasons having little to do with the colour of the South African government. Factories importing machinery or spare parts would face constraints similar to those faced now, and there would be incentives to remain with familiar suppliers having the necessary experience and expertise. Attractive products at competitive prices would still be sold, and deals for imported technology sealed on strictly business terms.

But it is also likely that those countries seen as the most stubborn defenders of white minority rule would suffer a comparative disadvantage. When a question of choice emerged, such factors could count. Those companies, or countries, most identified with the old order could easily lose out to others with more foresight and willingness to plan for a non-racial future.

Commercial ties between the West and a free South Africa could continue and expand on the basis of mutual benefit and profit. There would be trauma in the transition, but the prospects on the other side could be bright. Less material exchange too could flow freely, as sports and arts boycotts were lifted. South African athletes and musicians could make even more significant contributions to the world than when hampered by exile or separated by the apartheid curtain. The West too would be enriched.

Would those who rule the West be content with such mutually beneficial trade? Such a vision is attractive. But despite its elements of truth it neglects another level of economic ties. The question of ownership—of property rights, past, present and future—is inevitable. And it will be contentious.

The property question

Direct investment by foreign companies amounts to about 10 per cent of all investment in South Africa, and foreign share holdings—principally in the gold mines—come to another 20 per cent. This share, a far smaller proportion than in most other African countries at independence, is nevertheless an essential component of the South African economy. Given a new government's determination to gain control over national resources, whether or not specific sectors are nationalised, it is easy to predict conflict. Analysing that conflict's potential shape and intensity is more complex. It will depend on the reaction of overseas investors to government measures and the consequent movements of capital. Even more decisive will be the extent to which South African owners of capital—overwhelmingly white—opt for ‘foreign’ status, taking themselves and as much of their assets as they can into exile.

Since the discovery of diamonds and gold a century ago, control of South Africa’s wealth has been shared among foreign investors, white capitalists and the white-run state. Foreign investors had a relatively minor role in ownership of agricultural resources, predominantly in the hands of local whites. The mines were another story. As much as 60 per cent of the £200 million in capital invested in the gold mines from 1887 to 1932 came from overseas, according to Frankel’s classic study. After the Second World War the development of new gold fields drew on foreign capital for roughly half of the massive new investment of £370 million. In 1986, even after significant recent selling of shares, foreign holdings in the gold mines amounted to almost 27 per cent of the total shares, or more than $5 billion.³

In contrast to mining enclaves elsewhere in Africa and the Third World, however, organisational control of the industry came to be rooted in a locally-based capitalist class. Companies were registered and shares traded in London as well as Johannesburg, but those firms that gave priority to local investments, led by Oppenheimer’s Anglo American empire, dominated the industry. As an Anglo American official put it, ‘the local community was financially strong enough and wide awake enough to take advantage of the situation created by the two world wars to re-purchase control of its own economy from Britain.’⁴

The result is that the bulk of overseas capital in South African gold mines is portfolio capital rather than controlling direct investment. Consolidated Gold Fields is the only major mining house not based in South Africa. Multinational mining companies from Europe or North America are more important in base metals and coal, but even here South African-based firms have the dominant role.

The Freedom Charter, the most widely accepted statement of the goals of liberation, despite its studied ambiguity on the building of socialism, does posit the need for the state to assume control of the nation’s natural resources for the benefit of the people. The mines are clearly one of the principal sectors at issue. In taking control, however, the greatest problem for a new state will be dealing with South Africa's own capitalist class. The issue of negotiating with overseas investors will be a secondary concern.

³ S Herbert Frankel, Capital Investment in Africa, London: Oxford University Press, 1954, pp 89, 93; also Duncan Innes, Anglo-American and the Rise of Modern South Africa, New York: Monthly Review, 1984; and The Star (Johannesburg) 14 July 1986.

⁴ In André de Villiers (ed), English-speaking South Africa Today, Cape Town: Oxford University Press, 1979, p 234.

The question of nationalisation is often misleadingly presented as a one-time all-or-nothing decision, a presumed measure of radicalism for both advocates and opponents. Even in retrospect, it may become a misleading myth.

In Mozambique, for example, the FRELIMO government nationalised such sectors as banks, insurance and rental housing shortly after independence. But there was no general decision to nationalise industrial, agricultural or even mining firms. The bulk of state property in these sectors was acquired after proprietors fled or were discovered surreptitiously draining capital out of the country. The state, with a crippling lack of technical and managerial personnel, took over enterprises that were in many cases already bankrupt. Nationalisation could hardly work well without the resources for effective control and management, not to mention the sabotage carried out in leaving or in subsequent attacks. The failures were predictable, but the reasons are far more complex than a mythical decision to nationalise everything, a decision that never took place.

If a new government moves with extreme caution, however, as in the case of Zimbabwe's stance toward the white farming sector, it may be at the price of locking in previous patterns of oppression, with a new ideological cover. The growing strength of the black trade union movement may make possible a different dynamic in a free South Africa, but the same dilemma is inevitable. How fast can the popular forces and a newly representative government take control of productive resources, without provoking sabotage by previous owners or a devastating exodus of technical and managerial personnel?

In theory, the large state and parastatal sector in South Africa—electricity, iron and steel, transport and more—should give a new government considerable leverage over the private sector. Indeed, the Afrikaner strategy after political victory in 1948 provides a certain precedent. The state, which had already been used to subsidise white agriculture and employ unskilled whites, took on an even larger role. New parastatals were formed, and the old ones expanded, as part of the Afrikaner drive to benefit their community and redress their economic disadvantages vis-à-vis the dominant English.

But however much 'free enterprise' ideologues may complain about the National Party's state socialism, its strategies were rooted in cooperation, not conflict, with domestic and foreign capitalists. In contrast, more than three-quarters of urban black South Africans support a socialist future for South Africa, according to recent surveys.⁵ And, though the exact definition of socialism may be disputed, so does the African National Congress, as well as virtually all other credible black political groupings. The socialism of a free South Africa may range from a social democratic model to one based on strict Marxist principles. But in either case popular demands would require a far greater challenge to capital's prerogatives than the concessions exacted by Afrikaner nationalists.

In addition, to talk of the 'state's' capacity to use its influence is a deceptive abstraction, which ignores the key issues of personnel and structures. 'Taking power' at the top by no means ensures that the organs of state power will respond to the new direction or indeed work at all.

The precise strategies for maximising popular and state leverage vis-à-vis capital is a topic beyond the scope of this brief essay. But perhaps some clues can be found in one wit's quip about Oppenheimer's financial empire, describing his policies as 'multifacialism'.⁶ The occasion was Anglo-American's effort to adjust to Zambian independence and to retain its dominant position in the copper industry under a new political order. But the idea may be more general. At least some sections of capital that have benefited from white supremacy will make efforts to outlive it, adjusting to a post-apartheid order. Indeed, this is already happening, as witnessed by the recent trek of leading businessmen to Lusaka to talk with the African National Congress.

It would be a gross exaggeration to say that capital now has a foot in both camps, for and against the old order in South Africa. The South African capitalist class and its overseas allies are more like a centipede than a biped, with ninety of its appendages still firm in the white supremacist order (albeit shuffling around to adjust their footing), the remainder tentatively placed in the anti-apartheid camp or waving undecidedly in the air. As the struggle intensifies, the balance will shift. The challenge for the liberation forces, before or after a transfer of state power, will be to play on the tensions between this giant force and the apartheid state, without making compromises so great that the objectives of liberation are betrayed.

⁵ Mark Orkin, Divestment: The Struggle and the Future, Johannesburg: Ravan Press, 1986, p 52.

⁶ Ruth First, Jonathan Steele and Cristabel Gurney, The South African Connection, Harmondsworth: Penguin Books, 1973, p 203.

For a free South Africa, a policy of no cooperation at all with big capital, domestic or foreign, is a sectarian fantasy. Somehow or other, deals will be made. Events may well pre-empt strategic planning. But success in taking control of South Africa's resources is likely to require taking medium-size steps, large enough to make a difference, while not so large as to provoke overwhelming opposition. Gaining effective control of the state's own parastatals may be the first priority, without directly raising the ideologically explosive issue of nationalisation. Questions of management—and of the relationship between the state and the unions—would be complex enough to work out here without over-extending the state even further.

Control over the private sector would probably be better exercised at first by taxation, regulation and promotion of workers' rights than by a formal nationalisation that might be ineffective both financially and socially. Selective foreign investment might well continue to be welcomed, although it would have to meet conditions imposed as part of the new government's reconstruction programme. In strictly economic terms, it is likely that foreign investors and a new South Africa could still do mutually profitable business.

Such pragmatic accommodation may, however, be as much a fantasy as the one of immediate successful nationalisation. For the scenario to work, capitalists must be willing to lose many of their prerogatives and to accept lower profits, in favour of a proffered share in future development.

Western capitalists, it is true, have shown the capacity to work out profitable business relationships with regimes of the left, from Western European social democracies to the Soviet Union or China. But such pragmatism tends to prevail only after the new order has survived repeated attempts to overthrow it. Bitter exiles, expropriated or harbouring other real and imagined grievances, seek and find patrons among their previous allies abroad. Such efforts may last a generation—or longer. There is little indication that South Africa would be different in this respect.

Kith, kin and other alliances

There is a misleading tendency in much popular talk of 'revolution' to focus almost exclusively on the moment of seizure of state power. The human need to commemorate significant dates and the importance of such turning points reinforces such a narrowed vision, which may obscure much of the critical but less dramatic process before and after. Among the aspects often neglected is the fact that the former rulers and other beneficiaries of the ancien régime rarely simply 'fade away'.

They may remain, embittered by their losses and the faults of the new order, or they may flee. Such exiles may succeed in taking with them substantial assets; some never abandon the dream of returning in triumph or at least exacting vengeance. They may keep up contact with dissidents at home, rejoice in the mistakes of the new rulers and campaign for sympathy or active support from international opinion.

An exclusive focus on the Afrikaners may underestimate the potential for such developments in the South African case. They have no home in Europe to go to, it is said, and the hardliners will commit suicide rather than abandon their country or live in a universal franchise state. Such attitudes do exist, of course, but to assume their permanence is to accept a false myth of Afrikaner uniqueness and uniformity.

After the Anglo-Boer War (1899–1902) the vast majority of Afrikaners adjusted to British rule; large numbers voted for parties advocating British/Boer cooperation. Following the narrow Nationalist election victory in 1948, a powerful patronage machine helped to reinforce the drive for unity. But today, the situation of many Afrikaners has changed, and the zigzag policies of the regime indicate a growing vulnerability. The Afrikaner constituency is already fragmenting under pressure, as some seek to reinforce the laager while others seek ways to escape. And the trend will accelerate.

Among the Afrikaner leadership, in particular, there may be many who will leave—professionals able to employ their skills elsewhere, politicians or businessmen who even now are reported to be building up Swiss bank accounts, ordinary families panicked into seeking an uncertain future as refugees. In 1986, the balance of white immigration turned negative, as it first did in Rhodesia in the mid-1970s. And although the majority of the emigrants were not Afrikaners, some of them were. If the regime were seriously close to losing power, it would be naive not to expect an escalation of this trend.

Even more numerous, of course, will be the exodus of English-speaking South Africans. In 1985 a Sunday Times (London) poll revealed that some 10 per cent of white South Africans expected to leave the country within ten years.⁷ Many in this stream will be liberal or apolitical, but there will be some available for plots or even mercenary adventures, particularly if turmoil in South Africa seems to offer opportunities. The same applies to the community of Portuguese-speaking South African residents, now as many as one in seven whites in the country.

⁷ Sunday Times (London), 1 September 1985. The sample comprised 500 white South Africans polled at 100 places on 19–21 August 1985.

White South African exiles would not be uniform in their views toward the country they left. But the community of exiles would be fertile ground for intrigue and, perhaps even more important, for forming public opinion in the West about the new South Africa. This effect would be intensified if, as is likely, the exiles also included a significant number of blacks. Some of that number will have cast their lot with the white regime in the struggle. Others will have other grievances, or simply have found it too hard to live in a country rebuilding from the devastation of apartheid and the years of struggle against it.

Just as this struggle has been waged internationally as well as within the boundaries of South Africa, so will be the struggle for reconstruction and development in a post-apartheid society. In Western countries, racial ties and conservative ideologies will continue to influence the media, government policies and public opinion. This tendency will be even stronger once the apartheid regime no longer exists to discredit itself with heavy-handed repression and crude racist ideology.

It would be utopian not to expect many problems and mistakes in a free South Africa. Neither economic structures of inequality nor social barriers will disappear by magic. Millions will have been scarred not only by the history of apartheid but also by the vicissitudes of the struggle against it. Those with negative expectations about black rule or radical regimes will doubtless be able to find much material to confirm their predictions. Some who naively idealised the freedom struggle, seeing not human beings but saints who would produce miracles overnight, will become disillusioned and cynical.

A future South African government, moreover, is virtually certain to take a non-aligned position in world politics. Some in the West may recommend pragmatic adjustment to such independence. But others, still unaccepting of any stance other than pro-Western exclusion of Soviet bloc ties, will see such policies as a defeat to be reversed.

Then as now, Western understanding of relations with South Africa will depend largely on political developments within each Western country. To what extent is there commitment to social justice, at home and abroad? To what extent is opinion about South Africa formed on the basis of real contact with the majority of South Africans, or derived from images and slogans easily changed or manipulated? It will also depend, profoundly, on events in the meantime, before the definitive end of white-minority rule.

Variations in the end game

The increasingly frequent discussions about 'post-apartheid' South Africa, of which this special issue is one example, are an important development, one indicator that the system is challenged as never before. The debate itself is part of the process of advancing the date as well as shaping the character of the new order. But it may also be deceptive; apartheid, its death repeatedly announced, may yet assume many guises before it is finally buried.

One of the stages which seems virtually inevitable in some form is an analogue of the internal settlement in Rhodesia. In such a scenario minority rule is officially renounced. Reforms have gone far enough to attract some black leaders with some previous credibility and capacity to impress foreign observers. It is no longer a white-minority regime, propagandists proclaim, but moderates of all races defending the hope of reform against 'extremists' and 'terrorists'. Yet the core power remains with white state officials, and the violence even intensifies.

The failure of this option in Rhodesia, with the dramatic discrediting of Bishop Abel Muzorewa and the others as figure-heads for the Smith regime, has been well noted by all sides in South Africa. It is said that this should be sufficient for politicians to have learned to stay away from such an obvious dead-end strategy. Perhaps. Certainly the details of the scenario would not be identical, both because of the precedent and because in any case the South African situation is different.

And yet, when the Pretoria regime is significantly weaker than now, but not yet ready to accept serious negotiations for an unrestricted universal franchise, such options will be explored. The fact that they will lack credibility with the majority will not prevent them being tried. The need to find such a solution—felt both by 'moderate' whites and opinion-leaders in the West—will help to rekindle illusions. At some point it is quite possible that P W Botha (or some verligte successor) will make Chief Mangosuthu Buthelezi (or some other candidate for the 'moderate' label) an offer he cannot refuse.

One indicator that such a scenario might be plausible is Chief Buthelezi's rising popularity among South African whites even as his standing among blacks deteriorates. In a survey among Afrikaner businessmen, for example, 83 per cent rated Buthelezi a 'good leader' as compared to only a 67 per cent rating for President Botha.⁸ The fact that Buthelezi is discredited among even a majority of urban Zulus should not obscure the fact that he does have followers who can be mobilised for a display of support. And even as ties with the regime have increasingly become a liability, he seems to be toying with a closer embrace.

Detailed predictions about Buthelezi's future, or who else might plausibly take such a step, are likely to be over-speculative. But it is probable that the white power-structure will offer more and more attractive carrots to potential black allies as its own position weakens. Some may result in temporary agreements.

To be sure, such settlements will not produce 'solutions' or an end to violence. They will, however, strengthen the propaganda portraying liberation forces as 'terrorists' intent on 'black-on-black' violence for ulterior motives. The swift switch in overseas opinion after the Rhodesian internal settlement should be a cautionary lesson. Opinion in key Western circles, including the US Congress, was clearly moving towards acceptance of 'Zimbabwe-Rhodesia', toward lifting sanctions and writing off the guerrilla opposition as 'external nationalists'. This trend was checked with the Lancaster House settlement, and soon forgotten. But it revealed underlying forces that could easily be revived in the case of South Africa.

So far the Botha regime has been the most effective saboteur of the credibility of its reform claims. That may not always be the case. In Western public opinion, opposition to apartheid is far from equivalent to support for liberation. The image of 'necklacing' is already a powerful propaganda weapon in the West against the liberation struggle. As escalating violence claims a larger number of white victims, the well-established racial bias in media coverage will further identify the liberation struggle with 'terrorism'.⁹ The regime's control over the media, meanwhile, may moderate the visual impact of state violence.

⁸ Unisa (University of South Africa) School of Business Leadership survey, reported in The Star (Johannesburg) 3 May 1986. For more on Buthelezi's social base and declining support, see Paul A. Wellings and Michael Sutcliffe, 'The widening rift: Buthelezi, Inkatha, and anti-apartheid politics in South Africa', TransAfrica Forum 3(4) Summer 1986, pp 51-82.

The anti-communist card

If there is some kind of 'internal settlement' with superficially credible black participation, anti-communism will become a powerful weapon in its favour in the West. This is not only because of the near-paranoid reaction so common in Washington, but also because the anti-apartheid movement itself has inadequately prepared public opinion to understand the complexity of the struggle.

It is easiest, and most effective in the short run, to stress the extreme actions of the apartheid state. The image of the racist Boer shooting unarmed black protesters is compelling, and it is real. But anti-apartheid sympathy based only on such images is superficial, and can itself reflect a simplistic race-based analysis. When black police, homeland leaders or vigilantes appear on the scene defending Pretoria, or whites turn up on the list of those dying in apartheid's prisons, this kind of anti-apartheid advocate is confused. The establishment media talk of 'black-on-black' violence, as if race should be sufficient to predict one's views and actions in a conflict. Even less naive observers may fail to ask why there are structures of collaboration, not just isolated traitors to the cause.

If the real reasons for such conflict are not understood—that some blacks do have a stake in the apartheid order, that political movements of any nationality or race are split by enemy action and by internal divisions of class, tactics and personal rivalries—then the gate is wide open for simplistic labelling. In the sanctions legislation (Anti-Apartheid Act of 1986) passed by the US Congress in October 1986, conservatives inserted a clause requiring government investigation of communist influence in the ANC. Few liberal Congressional representatives had the courage to oppose the measure, for fear of being thought 'soft on communism'.

⁹ To cite only one example from more than a century of selective perception, the images of the Mau Mau revolt diffused around the world in the 1950s left an overwhelming impression of black violence against whites. Yet only 32 white civilians and 63 white soldiers were killed during the four years of revolt. Meanwhile the British counted over 11,000 'insurgents' killed and more than 1,000 'legally' executed, some for offences as vague as 'consorting with terrorists'. See Chapter 4 of William Minter, King Solomon's Mines Revisited, New York: Basic Books, 1986.

There are real issues, of course, in the relative influence of different classes and ideological influences in a future South Africa. But these issues have little to do with the head-counting of members of the Communist Party in the ANC leadership. Such simplistic thinking—and more general labelling of opponents of a potential internal settlement as 'extremists'—puts South Africa into the context of a Cold War crusade to defend 'Western values'. The real debates over the best way to advance the interests of the majority disappear from view.

It would be a mistake to underestimate the potency of such anti-communist appeals, particularly in the USA. Overseas observers were baffled in 1985 and 1986 when the US Congress simultaneously imposed sanctions on South Africa and endorsed the far-right campaign to join in Pretoria's support of Jonas Savimbi in Angola. In terms of southern Africa reality, the two moves were obviously contradictory.

But decisions on foreign policy, even more than domestic issues, are based not on reality alone, but on the prisms through which that reality is seen. Because of Pretoria's media-reflected extremes of repression and of anti-apartheid efforts with a depth of organisation in every part of the US, the sanctions issue became one of racism as such; only the die-hards could avoid reaffirming the values of equality. On Angola, in contrast, the mainstream media collaborated with the far-right in portraying the issue as the 'Soviet-Cuban' threat. The connection with South Africa was relegated to an afterthought that politicians could ignore. Even on Mozambique, where the Reagan Administration took a more pragmatic line, Congress repeatedly restricted aid, bizarrely presenting itself as more anti-communist than the President himself.

South Africa is far closer to US public consciousness than Portuguese-speaking Angola or Mozambique, which are known directly to only a minuscule number of Americans. There are more people with direct contact and knowledge about South Africa, making such ploys more difficult. But it would be a serious mistake to underestimate the possibilities. The majority of the American people can identify with struggles for justice and get beyond labels, but only if they have access to the information, and it is not drowned out by official disinformation. The will to misunderstand and misrepresent is particularly strong among those with power to shape the debates and filter the information that reaches large numbers of people.

Distance and history alike place the United States and Western Europe in different positions vis-à-vis the future South African struggle, whether in some 'internal settlement' phase or in the phase of reconstruction of a free South Africa. The density of counter-revolutionary exiles and plots may be greater in the Old World, but the alliances may also be more predictable and understandable. On the other side of the Atlantic, the complex currents of symbolism, ideology, domestic politics and ignorance may produce unexpected peril as well as promise. Those concerned with South Africa's future relations with the West would do well to remember that neither the West's different countries nor the political forces within them are likely to react uniformly or consistently.

Are we the world?

In 1985, a group of musicians calling themselves 'USA for Africa' produced a hit record which sold more than eleven million copies in the first three months and raised $50 million for victims of African famine. Preceded by a parallel effort in London and emulated by a host of other ventures, the song 'We are the World' captured a vivid sense of interconnection between the consumer society in the West and those dying a continent away.

Yet the ephemeral character of such media-promoted musical togetherness in the USA also reveals the structural chasm separating the Third World and the industrial West. Apartheid replicates within a single country the global history of Western domination. And the struggle against it is part and parcel of the wider movement to substitute solidarity and mutual respect for domination and disdain.

This historical process of domination and freedom has its unity, but it also reflects an incredible diversity of experiences which labels such as 'Third World' and 'First World' may easily obscure. The response in the West to the anguished birth of a free South Africa will be as diverse as the histories of the different Western countries and their component classes and peoples, many themselves 'Third World' in origin.

The contrasts between Scandinavia and the German Federal Republic, for example, or between the Netherlands and Great Britain, are obvious to liberation movement activists seeking support for sanctions or other backing. So is the general difference between Western Europe, where each country has a politically significant socialist or communist party, and the USA, where the left in any guise is politically marginalised. Yet there is an Old World tendency, shared by European and African alike, to exaggerate the uniformity in the North American colossus. The dominant political tendencies in the USA, with their powerful media echo, often deceive not only their domestic opponents but also observers abroad.

To take only one example among many, the shift to the right in US policy, domestic and foreign, is often portrayed as a shift of mass opinion. Pundits echo the president himself in taking Reagan's electorala landslides and popularity polls as representing the majority of the American people. Yet because of low turnouts of potential voters, disinclined to accept either of the candidates offered, Reagan's victories in fact represent a maximum of 32 per cent of the eligible voters. Two-thirds majorities in opinion polls consistently disapprove of the Administration's war on Nicaragua. In general, public opinion on major domestic issues has remained stable or become slightly more liberal during the Reagan years.¹⁰

The right has indeed won impressive policy victories, but not by changing 'mass' opinion. Its success has come from successful mobilisation of conservative forces among 'opinion leaders', in the capitalist class, in both parties and in the media. The victories of the grass-roots anti-apartheid movement show that with extraordinary effort it is still sometimes possible to win against that current. They also show that the White House, despite its undoubted dominance in foreign policy, is not the only force that can have some effect.

In the United States, as well as in Canada or Europe, the Western response to the South African struggle is being fought out on countless fronts, not just in cabinet committees. And so it will be when a free South Africa begins its struggle for reconstruction. In the West, as in South Africa, there will be those who resist the struggle. And there will be those who try to understand and to lend a hand. Not carrying on the 'White Man's Burden', but joining with sisters and brothers in a common effort.

In 1973 a Mozambican poet penned lines that stand as a fitting reply to the paternalism of Kipling, or of those who today hold power in the West:

¹⁰ See the detailed analyses in Thomas Byrne Edsall, The New Politics of Inequality, New York: W W Norton and Company, 1984, and Thomas Ferguson and Joel Rogers, Right Turn, New York: Hill and Wang, 1986.

Brother from the West—

(How can we explain that you are our brother?)
the world does not end at the threshold of your house nor at the stream which marks the border of your country nor in the sea in whose vastness you sometimes think that you have discovered the meaning of the infinite.
Beyond your threshold, beyond the sea
the great struggle continues.

From you, brother, we expect and to you we offer not the hand of charity which misleads and humiliates but the hand of comradeship committed, conscious.

How can you refuse, brother from the West?

The dismantling of the apartheid war machine

The present extensive war in southern Africa is at the centre of any discussion of change and transformation in Africa. Apartheid has not only separated different 'racial groups' but has evolved a system of super exploitation of the labour power of the African majority. Segregation and exploitation has necessitated legal and other forms of coercion, and throughout the history of South Africa force and the threat of force has remained central to the social reproduction of the system. Free labour relations have not been allowed to develop and this has led to a major contradiction in South African society, where the majority are called upon to subsidise their own oppression. The subsidies from the producing classes provide the surpluses necessary to maintain the South African Defence Force (SADF). This armed force both protects apartheid and capitalism in South Africa and seeks to extend the region of South African capital accumulation. Since the tide of decolonisation has swept the region, the expansion of South African capital has been conceived of in the form of a Constellation of Southern African States (CONSAS). However, the determination of the people of Southern Africa to fight the spread of the apartheid monster has led the South African regime to seek to militarily destabilise neighbouring states while unleashing troops and police against the black majority in South Africa.

The South African armed forces, like swarms of locusts, leave death and destruction in their wake. Preliminary estimates are that by the end of 1985 over $10 billion worth of economic and infrastructural damage has been wrought on the Frontline states (FLS). Over one million persons have been killed, maimed, displaced or made refugees as the SADF has fought across the breadth of southern Africa. In Angola the SADF has fought both a conventional and an irregular war, (justified in the West as a fight against a Soviet/Cuban threat to Western strategic resources) and in Namibia the South Africans have deployed over 100,000 troops to fight a counter-insurgency war against the South West African Peoples' Organisation (SWAPO of Namibia). In Mozambique the South Africans have organised a war to destabilise Frelimo and in the other FLS the South African regime has carried out economic, political and psychological warfare. This has been justified under the military doctrine of 'total strategy'; the apartheid regime's response to what it sees as a multi-dimensional 'total onslaught' against the South African state.

To carry forward this strategy the military has become central to the reproduction of state power. This is reflected not only in the links between the military and industry, epitomised in the state armaments corporation Armscor, but also in the militarisation of the state and society. The management techniques of the SADF have been harnessed to militarise the state under a National Security Management System. An inner war cabinet called the State Security Council links the military to local administrative structures through joint management committees and a decentralised system of 'security management' at all levels.

Despite this 'total strategy' the military has failed to crush the rebellion of the South African masses at their places of work, in the townships and in schools. The ruthless repression of the regime has precipitated an international outcry against apartheid. As part of this outcry the call for comprehensive and mandatory sanctions against the system has developed. In response to the accelerated call for sanctions the South African regime has intensified its war against the FLS. In this heightened war President Samora Machel of Mozambique has fallen, killed in the struggle to transform Africa. But the South Africans have failed to achieve one of their most important tasks: to break the spirit of resistance. It is this resistance which has precipitated the international outcry against apartheid and the present intense discussions on the kind of South Africa 'after apartheid'. In the words of Fanon, describing another war of resistance in Algeria: 'In the course of the multiple episodes of the war, the people came to realise that if they wished to bring a new world with them they would have to create a new Algerian society from top to bottom.'

The possibility of creating a new society 'from top to bottom' in South Africa is on the agenda. The SADF and its place in the new post-apartheid society is part of this discussion, in which there are differing conceptions of the process of transformation and the dismantling of the apartheid war machine. To conceptualise the programme of change is a central concern of those social forces which seek to create a new society 'from top to bottom'. Other social forces see the problem in terms of structural reforms which would at most require an Africanisation of the state, including the military.

The literature on the SADF from the South African state, which has been developed in the mould of strategic analysis, deals with the function of the military not in terms of the relations of production but in terms of the defence of the ideas of anti-communism. Anti-apartheid scholarship in the IDAF publication, Brutal Force, and the literature emanating from the UN Centre Against Apartheid provide an alternative perspective on the place of militarism in the South African economy and society. This intellectual work has been a major advance beyond the modernisation theories which spawned studies of the military in independent Africa in the 1960s and 1970s. It is in part this new scholarship plus the history of transformations in other post-revolutionary societies which provides the starting-point for an analysis of the process of demilitarising the South African state. Such an understanding is a vital component of the gigantic undertaking now underway in South Africa to rid the society of racial capitalism.

The links between militarism, industry, the labour process and social reproduction in South Africa are explicit. This short inquiry into the post-apartheid process can in no way exhaust the range of questions generated by the requirements of the anti-apartheid struggle. Scenario-planning and damage-limitation are now established components of the risk consultancy business of Western scholarship. This intellectual tradition draws from the resources of those in power. Unfortunately in Africa, and in particular in South Africa, the exclusion of the African masses from institutions of higher learning means that the intellectual culture of that society is impoverished. For intellectuals to develop a coherent and consistent conception of the state after apartheid, whether of the coercive apparatus or the ideological apparatus, requires in essence an organic link with the oppressed classes. In the absence of this organic bond one can draw from other experiences to raise a number of issues which could stimulate further debate, discussion and research, especially by those locked in the quest to create a new society 'from top to bottom'.

The experiences of other African States and other oppressed societies which have engaged in armed struggle at once becomes pertinent. In the past capital has sought to recoup through negotiations and reforms what it has lost through battle. Under the umbrella of reforms, sections of South African capital are already calling for structural changes which would save capitalism, preserve the present military-industrial complex and recruit more blacks into the armed forces. However it is the view of this paper that a strategy to Africanise the structures of coercion is substantially different to a process of disentangling the link between race, capital, militarism and accumulation. For the whole structure of capital accumulation in South Africa shows that the system is in crisis and more profound changes are needed beyond the Africanisation of the state.

Far from being seduced by the reform process there is a heightened spirit of resistance among the producers. The translation of this spirit into concrete forms of popular power is part of the project of establishing a non-racial society after apartheid. The embryo of this new society which is slowly emerging in the street committees, amongst the organised workers and the organised students opens vast possibilities for the conceptualisation of a new society. The initiatives unleashed by the popular struggle could threaten the future of capitalism in Africa.

The forms of military organisation open to a popular government in South Africa are considerable, given the depth of the contradictions of the present mode of social organisation. Transitional forms of military training and sources of military capital will be part of the process of the dismantling of the SADF if the popular forces aim to break the integration of South Africa with NATO and the Western Powers. Such a break would inevitably invite hostile military acts; the low intensity war against Nicaragua shows that imperialism seeks to destroy popular experiments. The Nicaraguan experience has shown that it is necessary to transform a guerrilla army into a standing army capable of defending the people from external aggression after liberation.

A slow but popularly based dismantling of the SADF could release major resources presently tied up by the military, and unleash the potential of the masses in a manner that was not possible elsewhere in Africa during the period of decolonisation. South Africa after apartheid could be the foundation for the process of change in Africa or the basis for the recomposition and reconstruction of capitalism in Africa. Profound transformations are possible and regressions are also possible. Unless clear ideas are marshalled on how to dismantle apartheid, the outcome could be the integration of the freedom fighters into the old system. Whether this possibility exists will be dependent on the pace and the intensity of the strengthening of popular power. Experience elsewhere since the Bolshevik revolution, and more recently in Zimbabwe, shows that guerrilla armies can be integrated into the old weapons system and thus maintain the lopsided requirements of the military.

The contradictions of the apartheid war machine

According to Lenin, 'The bureaucracy and the standing army are a parasite on the body of bourgeois society—a parasite created by the internal antagonisms which rend that society, but a parasite which chokes all its vital forces.'

This conception of the standing army as a parasite on society properly grasps the essence of the South African Defence Force. For in South African society the military is not only a parasite but a destructive force. The developed literature on the organisation and structure of the SADF has shown clearly the way in which the South African military is at the centre of economic planning, investment patterns and the present use of resources in the society. This literature has illuminated the size, composition and external linkages of the SADF in the destructive war now unleashed in southern Africa.¹ The SADF is divided into four principal arms: the army, the navy, the air force and the medical services. Through the Joint Management Committees the defence establishment of the South African state is linked to the police and administrative structures of apartheid to form an integrated security system.² At the apex of this system is the State Security Council which coordinates the war effort.

Most of the literature on the SADF, even the house journals, points to the fact that the South African military structure emerged out of the traditions of European militarism with clear links to the armaments manufacturers of the West. Even though the nationalism and chauvinism of the Afrikaner journals masks it, the continuity in the form and structure of the armed forces can be seen in the way in which the South African soldier is still subordinate to the weapons system.

Of the armed forces, the army is the largest component with over 80 per cent of the total men under arms. In this army the brigade structure is organised around the concept of the 'mechanised battlefield' with a vast array of tanks, armoured cars, armoured personnel carriers and heavy artillery. This mechanised army is integrated into an air force which boasts over 250 combat aircraft in a number of squadrons. Behind the army and the air force lags the navy with obsolete patrol boats, frigates and a few submarines. The whole armed structure is very capital intensive, with vast sums being poured into the establishment of a domestic arms industry. The military budget thus reflects the links between the relations of warfare, industry and the social system.

¹ There is considerable literature on the South African armed forces emanating from both the South African state, centres for strategic studies and from anti-apartheid centres. Three books which are particularly useful are a) Gavin Cawthra, Brutal Force: The Apartheid War Machine. London: International Defence and Aid Fund, 1986; b) Philip H Frankel, Pretoria's Praetorians: Civil-Military Relations in South Africa, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984; c) Phyllis Johnson and David Martin (eds) Destructive Engagement: Southern Africa at War. Harare: Zimbabwe Publishing House, 1986.

² In September 1986 the Weekly Mail (Johannesburg) brought out a lengthy article on the JMCS as the new shadow government in South Africa. As early as 1984 the implications of the NSMS were analysed for the US Naval College. See James M Roherty, 'Managing the security power base in South Africa', South Africa International Quarterly, October 1984.

In this capital-intensive and socially destructive military system the soldier is defined in relation to the weapons.³ Since the era of monopoly capitalism, a characteristic of the modern army is the way in which it has shared the style of capitalist production, in that the means of warfare have been capital-intensive. The modern army employs the management techniques of the large corporation; in South Africa this management technique is now manifest in the National Security Management System. Soldiers are organised around the fetish of equipment, around specific weapons in the same way that workers are organised in the factory. In capitalist industry the embodiment of technology is in the machine, which dominates human beings in the labour process; in the military the equivalent of the machine is the weapons system. In her book, The Baroque Arsenal, Mary Kaldor developed the concept of a weapons system which combines a weapon platform (ship, aircraft or tank, gun, missile or torpedo); and the means of command and communication.⁴

South African society is today organised around the conception of the weapons system of the West (as characterised by Kaldor) along with the industrial and technological imperatives demanded by this system. The drive for technological improvement and absolute destructive power which has been justified in the West by the jargon of 'strategic edge' has found its place in South Africa with the attempt by the regime to develop nuclear weapons. The South African regime has initiated a military technological infrastructure in an effort to generalise the development of the modern skills of military science in the society. Hence today the SADF embraces the entire political economy of the society in that the missiles and armoured cars are assembled in factories by workers while soldiers are trained to use these weapons on the very same workers and their children.

³ Mary Kaldor, 'Warfare and capitalism' in E P Thompson et al., Exterminism and Cold War, London: Verso Books, 1983.

⁴ Mary Kaldor, The Baroque Arsenal, London: Sphere Books, 1983, p 7.

In the advanced capitalist centres there was a spin-off of consumer items from the factories of military production. In these societies the surpluses earned from international trade allowed the state to integrate the producers as consumers and as citizens with basic democratic rights. The working class as a whole could be persuaded to part with labour for the purposes of fighting foreign powers or to produce armaments. This same citizen could be persuaded to kill or risk getting killed in the national interest. This form of ideological reproduction served as a buffer to the system, for the forms of the subordination of labour ensured the dominance of ideological forms of subordination over the direct use of force or non-economic forms of subordination. In South Africa the state cannot mobilise the African majority on the emotive appeals of loyalty, patriotism and anti-communism. The SADF is maintained as a modern, mechanised army primarily through its technological and political links with the West, despite the UN's mandatory Arms Embargo.

The capital intensity of the SADF increased dramatically after the crisis in the open procurement of Western arms following the UN arms embargo of 1977. As early as the Second World War, through the establishment of the Munitions Production Office, South African capitalists were mobilised to respond to the defence needs of the state. This was transformed in the post-Soweto period when local capital needed the protection of the military inside South Africa and in order to maintain or expand their influence in the liberated states of the region. The interconnections between the industrial magnates and Armscor helped to define the nature of industrial development in South Africa. Guided by common interests, capital and the military both espoused the 'total strategy' which incorporated the concept of a regional security and economic zone for South African capital. This zone of capital, conceived as the Constellation of Southern African States, would serve to secure the subcontinental military, political and economic objectives of apartheid.⁵

Apartheid in South Africa emerged out of racial discrimination, job reservation, influx control and a system which structured the relations of production in the society. The historic and contemporary forms of apartheid have been adequately documented and do not bear repetition here. What is of importance for this article is the role of force in the society and how the South African capitalist class grew fat on bonded labour. Bonded, cheap, migrant and coerced labour provided sufficient capital for South African manufacturers to develop a type of industrialisation where free capitalist labour relations were not present. This industrialisation was comparable to the form of industrialisation of those states in the Third World which industrialised after the Second World War with the technology of the Second Industrial Revolution, the era of electricity, railways, iron and steel. While the advanced capitalist states were forging ahead in the new era of space research, micro-electronics, bio-technology and solar energy, a few Third World economies were able to industrialise on the basis of some of the old industries of the West.⁶

⁵ M Evans, The Frontline States, South Africa and Southern African Security: Military Prospects and Perspectives, University of Zimbabwe, 1986.

The bantustan strategy of the South African state met the needs of the kind of industrialisation carried out in the South African economy where cheap labour and low wages guaranteed high profits to strengthen the pace of industrial accumulation. However, the narrow domestic market meant that the whole subcontinent was viewed as a region for the expansion of South African capital.

The military-industrial complex was oiled to guarantee the supremacy of South African capital in the region.

Yet the rigidity of apartheid and the coercive instruments developed in its wake dictated the limits of the kind of industrialisation possible in the racially divided society. The conception of racial superiority/inferiority meant that the form of industrialisation was not based on a pool of skilled black labour but was dependent on the importation of skilled labour from Europe. But black labour could not be totally suppressed. Inevitably the bureaucracy of the Bantu Administration Boards and the apparatus built up to enforce the Group Areas Act and influx control could not contain the tide of resistance, rebellion and protest. From the formation of the ANC in 1912 to the present, the spontaneous and organised resistance of the majority has sharpened the divide between the rulers and the ruled. And for the rulers to continue to rule, especially after the resistance of Soweto and the independence of Mozambique and Angola, the military has become central to the system of governance. This has led to the articulation of a total strategy.⁷

⁶ R Kaplinsky, 'The international context for industrialisation in the coming decade', Development and Change, October 1984.

⁷ H Campbell, 'Total strategy and total failure', Zimbabwe Herald (Harare) 9 December 1983. See also R Davies, D O'Meara and S Dlamini, South Africa's Strategy in the Southern Africa Region, Centre of African Studies, Mozambique, 1984.

Total strategy as a counter-revolutionary doctrine was developed by the French military specialist Andre Beaufre in a failed effort to turn the tide of decolonisation. After Soweto in 1976 the militarists and the industrialists developed an explicit conception of how military institutions were to 'stimulate economic growth in the industrial sectors linked to production and technology of the national war machine. . . . The South African military today is not only an army of soldiers . . . but an army of industrialists, financiers, economists and other business personnel.'⁸ At the centre of this national war machine is the Armaments Development and Production Corporation, Armscor.

Armscor and industry

Today Armscor is central to the subsidies provided by the state for local capitalists to maintain a certain level of industrial activity. This industrial activity is a necessary logistic component of the mechanised army. Armscor is one of the largest industrial concerns in South Africa with assets of over R1,600m, and with over nine subsidiaries. Over fifty main private sector contractors are engaged in producing components and military materials and over 400 sub-contractors service the Armscor subsidiaries. However, behind the metal factories, engineering works, aircraft assembly factory and vehicle assembly plants lies one fact. Armscor was integrated into a licensing arrangement with Western arms manufacturers and did not engender a local scientific and technological capacity. One critical assessment of Armscor has observed that:

Despite its size, Armscor's capabilities are restricted by the limited technological base of South Africa's domestic industry as a whole and its subsidiaries remain dependent on components and technology imported from other countries. While it has managed to provide the SADF with some of its basic arms requirements, largely as a result of licensing arrangements with Western countries during the 1960s and 1970s, Armscor is unable to assemble or manufacture more sophisticated military equipment, leading to serious shortages, especially in the airforce.⁹

While South African state intellectuals have attempted to sell the myth of military self-sufficiency, they have been forced to decry the aged ⁸ Philip H Frankel, Pretoria's Praetorians, p 81.

⁹ 'South Africa's military capacity', International Seminar on the UN arms embargo against South Africa, London, May 1986. For a list of companies of Armscor see Brutal Force, Table XIII p 275. 'Major armaments producers in South Africa.'

nature of key military equipment in the air force and the navy. Even recently when the South African air force launched its much heralded combat aircraft the Cheetah, the SA Digest admitted that this aircraft was a Mirage III converted and upgraded by the Atlas Aircraft Corporation, a subsidiary of Armscor.¹⁰ The South African economy does not have the expertise to design, develop and build sophisticated aircraft engines.¹¹ Even in Western Europe the effort to build modern jet fighters to compete with the US aerospace industry involves multi-national cooperation within the EEC

Armscor is capable of making weapons consistent with the level of industrialisation of South African society but the military industry of South Africa has been built through its integration into the Western military order. Armscor was essentially an assembly point for the prime contractors of armaments in the West and this state controlled corporation in turn became the pivot for local subsidiaries to take over some arms production and to build the nuts and bolts. This much was clear in the loudly heralded artillery system which was developed after the South African defeat in Angola in 1976:

The manufacture of the SADF's 155 mm artillery system, the G5, is dependent on imported machine lines and technology and the same applies to its mortars and other equipment. South African claims to have made major breakthroughs in the fields of missile research and development appear on the surface to be impressive, but in every case the missiles turn out to be modifications of equipment obtained from other countries.¹²

This technological weakness reflects the way in which the organic composition of capital could not develop under the conditions of job reservation, segregated schools and cheap, unskilled black labour. Instead, Armscor and South African industry enjoyed the advantage of cheap labour while at the same time using the surpluses generated to import skilled labour and white scientists from Western Europe and adapting the technology of the West to the production of armaments. Current research underway in South Africa by scholars associated with the South Africa Labour Bulletin seeks to underscore and highlight the limited extent to which the state has been able to adapt sophisticated technology for local use. This exposition is not central to our discussion of the process of demilitarisation except in so far as it has restricted a wider diffusion of skills and knowledge needed for building a new society after apartheid. The fact is that the racist ideology of the present state hinders the development of a modern scientific culture among the African majority.

¹⁰ 'New Milestones for South Africa', SA Digest, 18 July 1986, p 640.

¹¹ South Africa's air force is a particularly vulnerable part of the war machine. The weaknesses of the air force are examined from time to time in international defence journals. See Flight International, January 1985.

¹² Brual Force, pp 97-103.

A second and related feature of the links between Armscor and industry in South Africa is the relationship between military research, military spending and economic growth. More than thirty years ago Baran & Sweezy in Monopoly Capital tried to show a positive correlation between defence spending and economic growth. They argued that defence spending, development and research into new weapons and the defence industry provided a powerful motor of technological and economic growth.¹³ More recent studies on the British and US economies have pointed to a negative correlation between defence spending and economic growth. A very recent and persuasive study on the British economy showed that defence spending must be by definition non-productive, with a perverse effect on economic growth. This study showed that in the areas of industrial production in the capital goods sector which is dependent on military sales, productivity growth was negative.¹⁴ The questions raised by the present research are profound and it is significant that those in the forefront of this research are those in the campaign for nuclear disarmament.

In the South African economy the work on the military has not yet disaggregated the share of military output of commodities in the military industrial complex.¹⁵ Such a disaggregation between sectors of the economy and the economic and strategic roles of military expenditure has not yet been documented. This future documentation will be an essential requirement in the process of conversion; of changing over the production of sophisticated weapons of death to creating commodities for the well-being of the majority.

The experience of the South African military industrial sector shows that despite the claims made in the South African military magazines Paratus and Armed Forces, there is very little product innovation by Armscor. In essence, the monopoly conditions of South African capital and the limited nature of the domestic market mean that there is no real market for the products of Armscor. Capitalist and socialist arms manufacturers operate in conditions of fierce international competition. Thus despite the attempted forays of Armscor to the arms bazaar of the West the principal market for the products of Armscor is the SADF. This was so especially after the political independence of Zimbabwe in 1980; prior to this international sanctions against the Rhodesian regime made it a captive market for the products of the armaments sector of the South African economy. Today South Africa boasts of the sales of weapons to Africa and Latin America but this has not been verified by the centres that monitor international arms transfers, except in isolated cases.

¹³ R Smith, 'Military expenditure and capitalism' Cambridge Journal of Economics, March 1977

¹⁴ Mary Kaldor, Margaret Sharp and William Walker, 'Industrial competitiveness and Britain's defence commitments', Lloyds Bank Review, September 1986.

¹⁵ This has been done in Western Europe. See the work of R Smith op. cit. 'Military Expenditure and Capitalism'.

Because of the local use of arms by the SADF South African society is in the position where the armaments factories are subsidised by workers on whom the same arms are being used. The extent of the subsidy can be measured by the relationship between social expenditures and military expenditures. Current research by the Counter Information Services in London exposes the extent to which the social wage of African workers is depressed so that the state can maintain and replenish the coercive apparatus. This situation can be compared to the production of armaments in the advanced capitalist countries where the changing organic composition of capital led to commensurate changes in the skill, knowledge and organisational capacities of the working class. Hence the process of military expansion was effected by mobilising the political support of the dominated classes. This was done through major concessions to the working class such as the redistribution of income, trade union rights, the right to the franchise, subsidised housing, pensions, technical education and those elements of state rule which have come to be associated with the welfare state. These concessions have allowed for the basis of ideological coercion so that the workers in the capitalist states have been willing to fight for and to defend capitalism. South African black workers are super-exploited in the foundries which are part of the weapons industry and these same weapons are used to kill their children and to unleash terror and war in the Frontline states.

The subsidies of the workers to the capitalist class

As the working class movement develops in South Africa and a corresponding intellectual culture is harnessed it will be possible to quantify the full extent of the depression of the social wage to subsidise the state. For these workers the task of dismantling the war machine is urgent, but the local monopoly capitalists do not have an interest in the total dismantling of the military industrial complex. The total military expenditure of the South African state is difficult to measure because security expenditures—including police, intelligence, paramilitary and other security expenditures—are significantly higher than the published estimates of military spending. In the ten-year period since the South African defeat in Angola and the Soweto uprisings, official defence spending has increased by over 500 per cent. By 1986–87 the official defence budget had reached R5,123.3m, a 19.9 per cent increase over the 1985–86 budget of R4,274.1m. Comparisons can be made from the official figures on the amount spent on the military as opposed to housing, health, education, and other forms of social reproduction. The 1986–87 budget for defence was almost five times the amount budgeted for black education and nearly nine times the amount spent on housing. The official figures for defence do not include:

- 1) The police budget of R1,071.2m.
- 2) The amount spent on defence buildings and property, for the Department of Public Works pays for the construction of military bases.
- 3) The amount spent on the South West African Territorial Force for the illegal occupation of Namibia.
- 4) Defence and police expenditures in the so-called independent bantustans.
- 5) The costs of intelligence gathering which are incorporated under the treasury.
- 6) Loans to the Atomic Energy Commission for the nuclear industry and
- 7) The direct subsidies to industry under the heading of the 'transfer of technology'.¹⁶

The defence budget represents only a fraction of total military expenditure and excludes support to industrialists who provide clothing, buildings, food and other equipment for the more than half a million persons under arms in South Africa and in occupied Angola and Namibia. Under the National Security Management System implemented by P W Botha it is impossible to distinguish military and non-military expenditure as all departments are integrated into the defence effort.

¹⁶ Weekly Mail 27 March 1986.

One important question which arises from this vast expenditure where defence spending is about 20 per cent of the official budget is: Does militarism in South Africa create the conditions for industrial production and thus facilitate accumulation? On the contrary, militarism in South Africa registers itself as a destructive factor in the process of accumulation. The military-industrial complex subsists in an economy where the wage rate is lowered beneath the physical capacity of reproduction for the workers. Moreover, in the words of one study, 'Modern military technology is not advanced, it is decadent.'¹⁷ The decadence of this technology is evident in South Africa as it is in those states of the Third World which have industrialised since the Second World War. This decadent industrialisation is interconnected to the rhythm of capital accumulation in the capitalist centres. Secondly the licensing arrangements and reliance on foreign imports create conditions for the direct military intervention and/or collaboration with the advanced capitalist countries. For these reasons all the major Western countries collude to break the UN arms embargo against South Africa. This was clearest in the way in which the South Africans built up a capacity to produce nuclear weapons.

Through financial, military, scientific and cultural links with the West, the South African capitalist class survives. Under state protection South African capital has blossomed and the effect of the political hegemony of the ruling class has generated monopoly conditions. This concentration and centralisation has led to the situation where four of the large monopolies control over 80 per cent of the shares on the Johannesburg Stock Exchange. Of these four, Barlow Rand is heavily involved in the military-industrial complex, producing armoured vehicles and electronic and communication equipment originally under licence from Marconi, a British military electronics firm.¹⁸

The degree of monopolisation in South Africa means that the potential for the shift from monopoly control to popular control could be greater than anywhere else in Africa. For this reason those who organise for the transition to a non-racial society pose the question of the socialisation of the ownership of the means of production, beyond the simple nationalisation of existing industries.¹⁹ Faced with the clear and developing consciousness of the workers, the South African capitalists seek reform so that ideological control can take the place of physical coercion. For this reason the class which was nurtured under monopoly conditions now speaks of free enterprise. Free enterprise never existed in South Africa, because the racial barriers to accumulation were always present. This debate on free enterprise is of interest however in so far as this is part of an overall reform process which would want to see an Africanisation of political power. This would then provide for the release of white labour from the military to be available for industry. The integration of Africans into the military has so far been articulated under the homelands policy and the SADF has established nominally separate military forces in the so-called independent bantustans. But the representatives of the Progressive Federal Party, the party of reform, seek a process where blacks would provide the bulk of the manpower for the army. In early 1984 the parliamentary defence spokesperson for the PFP argued:

¹⁷ The Baroque Arsenal, p 1.

¹⁸ See Register, June-July 1986, pp 12-16.

¹⁹ Robert Davies, 'Nationalisation, socialisation and The Freedom Charter', paper presented at 'The Southern African Economy After Apartheid Conference', York University, 1986.

We need to consider the advisability of scaling down the conventional forces and/or replacing them with a highly mobile, full-time professional army. This together with national servicemen drawn from all groups who enjoy full citizenship rights ought to provide sufficient manpower to counter the objective threats against our freedom and sovereignty.²⁰

At the core of the present discussions on federalism and other political reform strategies is the concern to maintain the present military industrial complex, releasing white manpower for industry while recruiting larger numbers of Africans, and at the same time maintaining the bantustans.

The need to expand the armed forces

The totality of the crisis of the South African society can be seen on all levels. The political and economic crisis has forced the oppressed to register their opposition in the factories, in their communities, in the schools and in the fight against the SADF occupying the townships. That the strategic initiative is in the hands of the oppressed can be seen from the way the state has resorted to the use of more and more force, yet being less able to resolve the contradictions. Two states of emergency and tens of thousands of troops deployed in the townships have failed to stem the resistance and the armed struggle. Faced with this unprecedented resistance the coherence of the ruling class has fragmented so that the economic and political crisis is now compounded by an ideological crisis.

²⁰ Quoted in Armed Forces, July 1984.

No ruling class rules simply by force. There must be a coherent ideology to motivate those who carry the arms to defend the state. The ideas of white superiority, of separate development and of civilising Africans are now dysfunctional for the reform process necessary to give capital a new lease of life. An army trained in conventional war and counter-insurgency warfare is confronted by the very people that it is supposed to be protecting. In this battle the state finds that it cannot cope with the requirements of a modern army and its weapons needs when race constraints prevent the mobilisation of skilled labour from among the black population. The SADF is fighting on too many fronts, in the ungovernable townships, in occupied Namibia, in Angola and at the same time destabilising the other Frontline states. Over-stretched and weakened by the unabating industrial and political struggles inside South Africa the South Africans have called on the Pentagon to give more open support to the perceived war against communism. Some support was offered in the guise of support for UNITA but the heightened sanctions debate in the West has isolated the South African racists.²¹

Neither covert nor overt Western military support could solve the problems of the apartheid war machine. Once the South African defence structure was organised on the basis of the mechanised battlefield the SADF needed the complete mobilisation of the citizens. In the absence of majority support the manpower requirements of the army had a negative effect on industry, the military and the state. This crisis is already evident in the shortage of skilled labour for industry—job reservation excludes black workers from the higher skilled jobs and the military machine enmeshes every white male in some form of military service from the ages of eighteen to fifty-five. With the addition of the various police and armed administrative functionaries, up to 25 per cent of the active white male population is directly under arms to defend apartheid. The Military Balance, produced by the International Institute for Strategic Studies in London, estimated the total mobilisable force in 1986 at 404,500, with a standing force of 83,400

²¹ This came in the form of US support for UNITA. However UNITA did not have the logistics or command structure for the kind of aid offered by the US military. In this case the support was a hardly concealed support for South Africa. For details of the links between UNITA and the South African armed forces, see Destructive Engagement, pp 73–111.

which includes 53,000 conscripts. Alternative figures from the International Defence and Aid Fund concluded that the total mobilisable strength of the SADF in 1986 was 639,000 with a standing force of 178,000 (including the bantustan forces and the South West African Territorial Force). With the addition of the various police forces the total strength of the apartheid armed forces was calculated at 755,000.²²

No society with 4.5 million whites can continuously sustain an armed force of this size when the majority of the population is in the midst of armed resistance. Not even the attempt to rationalise the competing demands of industry and the military through a Defence Advisory Council solved the problem of labour and skills shortages, although it exposed the way many of the luminaries of the corporate world were incorporated in defence planning. The military permeates all areas of society and 'the SADF has become an important source of semi-permanent bureaucratic labour. In the Department of Inland Revenue, SADF accountants are active as sales tax inspectors and in the Department of Cooperation and Development military doctors and agronomists have emerged as important, if seconded elements in the process of "homeland" development.' The placing of soldier-teachers in the schools also reflects the depth of the militarisation of the state and the society.

Police and army violence, and the states of emergency all pointed to the struggle for a new system as the decadance of militarism has degenerated with mass shootings at Langa, Mamelodi, Alexandra and Soweto. The pressures for reforms led to a new constitutional dispensation in an attempt to win allies among non-whites and to solve the manpower crisis by providing the ideological legitimacy for greater co-optation of Indians and Coloureds in the armed forces. But the inbuilt racism of the society acted as a disincentive. By the end of April 1986, after massive recruitment drives, the South African army comprised 76 per cent whites, 12 per cent Africans, 11 per cent coloured and 1 per cent Indian. A growing campaign of war resistance has sapped the morale of the SADF as the cohesion of the white laager has come under pressure.

The racism and bigotry unleashed by apartheid means that many whites recoil at the idea of arming Africans. This historical fact was grasped by George Orwell:

²² 'South Africa's military capacity', p 3.

There is one thought which every white man thinks when he sees a black army marching past. How much longer can we go on kidding these people? How long before they turn their guns in the other direction?²³

This fear continues to permeate the reformers, so much so that it was only in 1986 that the first black officers were commissioned. Apart from the black chaplains whose task it is to minister to the spiritual needs of the blacks mobilised in the army, the officers even of the elite black 21 Battalion and the regional ethnic armies, are white. Kenneth Grundy in his book, Soldiers Without Politics: Blacks in the South African Armed Forces, has documented the contradictory nature of the place of Africans in the armed forces. In the struggle to dismantle apartheid more studies will be necessary not just to quantify the numbers of Africans but to identify those social forces now in the SADF capable of revolting against the system. Previously in other post-colonial societies there was an explicit plan to build local armies complete with socialisation in Western military academies to ensure that Africa remained within the military culture of Western capitalism. Zimbabwe is the most recent example—a British Military Training Scheme was brought in as a last ditch effort to retain the weapons system and military integration into Western Europe and North America. With the concrete lessons of Zimbabwe, the reformers are pushing for more Coloureds and Indians to be trained for the air force and the navy. The effort to Africanise the SADF has reached the furthest point in occupied Namibia with the swift Africanisation of the SWATF. The core of the SWATF, 911 Battalion, is the most integrated of the units of the SADF. And here the haste is precisely to present the future independent government of Namibia with an army ready to defend the interests of the West.²⁴

The creation of the SWATF was a result of the perception of the South African generals that the present form of apartheid in South Africa and Namibia will be transcended. The SADF has built up its forces in Namibia so that today Namibia is one of the most militarised countries on earth with one armed person to every twelve civilians. Yet even this level of militarisation has not been able to defeat SWAPO.

The present war in southern Africa, the resistance in the townships and the collapse of the reform process have been major steps towards liberation which will lead to the dismantling of the apartheid war machine. The war in the streets has placed the issue beyond a debate on restructuring. By 1986 the direction of the struggle was manifestly towards the seizure of power. The President of the ANC asserted in January 1986:

²³ Quoted in K Grundy, Soldiers Without Politics: Blacks in the South African Armed Forces, University of California Press, 1983.

²⁴ H Campbell, 'The decolonisation process in Namibia', Maji Maji, July 1986.

Our strategic goal must be to shift the balance of strength decisively in favour of our struggle, through the further ripening of the revolutionary situation beyond the point where it is in fact able to govern. Thus, we must continue to make South Africa ungovernable and apartheid unworkable. . . . We must build our forces into an ever more formidable united mass army of liberation, an army that must grow in strength continuously, able to deliver and actually delivering bigger blows at every stage and fighting as a conscious force with its eyes firmly fixed on the goal of the destruction of apartheid and the transfer of power to the people.²⁵

The kind of liberation army built in the process of the war and the nature of the transfer of power to the majority will be central to the manner in which the SADF will be dismantled.

The transfer of power

The war in the region and the organised resistance of the popular forces in South Africa places that country in a revolutionary situation. With more repression, the youths and workers move from spontaneity to organised action. 'Comrades' taking over townships and the organised workers mobilising the workforce are the hallmarks of this transition period. Faced with this revolutionary situation, international capital has been seeking solutions based on the concept of power sharing and the assurance of guarantees for minorities.²⁶ These initiatives and the growing support for sanctions in the Western establishment are part of the recognition that every day of the survival of the Botha-Malan regime the alternatives towards popular power are sharpened. Capitalism is caught in a fundamental contradiction, for while there is need to further dismantle the racial manifestations of apartheid, it is this very form of exploitation which has guaranteed super-profits for local and foreign capital. Capitalism and warfare in South Africa have proved incompatible with democracy for the concrete conditions of reproduction have required force or the threat of force to alienate the labour power of Africans. It is for these reasons that the method of ²⁵ Message of the National Executive of the ANC on 8 January 1986, delivered by the President, O R Tambo.

²⁶ Mission to South Africa, The Commonwealth Report, Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1986.

defeating the regime is now interwoven with the question of how to dismantle the structures of warfare and repression. Already there is a growing discussion on the tactics and strategies needed for the seizure of power.²⁷

This discussion on people's war and insurrection is a necessary step in the process of enhancing resistance and must form the basis for rendering the apartheid war machine ineffective. But whether these efforts will lead to a defeat of the enemy or a negotiated settlement will in part rest on the strategies adopted by the liberation forces. Already there are formulations by Marxists and non-Marxists (on the development of the productive forces) which could justify the retention of the present capital-intensive armed structure, except that this structure would be Africanised. Secondly and more profoundly are the limitations and problems of the transition of a guerrilla army into an army for national defence. In the past many socialists tended to assume that a guerrilla army or a citizens militia could represent a new form of defence. But because the guerrilla army is simply insurgent and establishes a framework for countering established armies, the transition to new forms of defence has always been problematic. This has been so since the Bolshevik Revolution in 1917 and even more vividly so in southern Africa recently. Many questions will emerge in the process of dismantling the SADF but the fundamental issues will be decided by the political and military preparedness of the popular masses. This will be dependent on how the concept of a people's army takes root among the people and is actually translated in the ensuing battles. It is here that many lessons can be learnt from the debates among the popular forces of the different branches of the Sandinista army during the Nicaraguan Revolution.

In essence, the fact is that in a post-apartheid South Africa, imperialism could accept the integration of the fighters of the ANC into the present structure of the SADF. The form of warfare adopted by the ANC and the links to the popular organs of power now emerging in the townships will sharpen the options and limit the room for planning by imperialism. Guerrillas in all revolutionary situations have shown that without superior military technology they can win by forcing their opponents to fight under conditions which neutralise the technological advantages of sophisticated weaponry. A people's army which, after liberation, seeks to use the existing military-industrial complex will be forced to maintain the despotism of the factory and the social relations where the workers subsidise the armaments sector.

²⁷ This discussion is most developed in Sechaba. Most of the issues in 1986 were caught up with this issue. See in particular May and March 1986. See also the African Communist No. 104, First Quarter, 1986.

Other experiences this century in the fight against oppression provide various examples of how to dismantle an old army, or incorporate freedom fighters in a new army. South African freedom fighters are faced with the need to build a people's army, yet one with the resources and skills to guard against external aggression after liberation. It is here that the recent revolutionary experiences in Cuba, Nicaragua and El Salvador become relevant to African revolutionaries. The Cubans were able to develop the concept of the civic soldier who was both capable of defending the community yet handle very sophisticated weaponry, and to be able to do this without becoming merely a cog in a mechanised weapon system. In Nicaragua the guerrilla army has developed into a fighting force capable of withstanding extensive military aggression sponsored by the USA. But the illuminating experience is that of El Salvador where the guerrillas and the popular organs have been able to form a common front to transcend the divisions which historically prevented the full mobilisation of the oppressed.

Conclusion

The debate and discussion on the future dismantling of the apartheid war machine is taking place at a time when the war in Southern Africa is at the centre of the world stage. The persistence of apartheid and war saps the energy of the people as the popular masses seek alternatives to poverty, job reservation, racial discrimination and the military destabilisation of the region. This reality calls for prompt action and at the same time issues new challenges to those in combat. For the transformation of South African society is inextricably bound up with the process of organisation and mobilisation of those with an objective interest in creating a new social order. The emergence of street committees, peoples' courts, popular forms of defence, and other grassroots forms of democracy has made the system ungovernable and unworkable. These committees which form the embryo of a new popular state after apartheid, have eroded the conventional methods of administration and forced the military to bare its fangs in the Joint Management Committees. How the embryo will develop will depend on the extent to which the broad masses are drawn into the process of the transfer of power.

All the social forces with a vested interest in the region recognise that the present structure of governance cannot survive. From the Georgetown Centre for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, to the South African Institute for Race Relations, to the Commonwealth leaders, there is a recognition of the fact that the South African struggle is in a revolutionary stage. The economic crisis, the flight of international capital (epitomised by Barclays, IBM, Kodak, etc), the sanctions campaign added to the continuous uprisings in townships, force international capital to seek alternatives to the present form of the subordination of labour. The military is central to non-economic forms of coercion in South Africa. This, plus the place of the military-industrial complex in the South African economy, makes the dismantling of the SADF central to a discussion of the society after apartheid. In this paper three broad possibilities were developed:

- 1) A reform process which could spread the ideas of capitalism among blacks, to bring about some devolution of power without changing the present relations of production. This would serve to release more black labour for the military.
- 2) The coming to power of the liberation movements with the integration of the present freedom fighters into the weapons system of the SADF (even with a diversified source of military capital).
- 3) The development of a popular army based on the popular alliance now emerging in the struggle. This army would combine the best traditions of guerrilla and conventional forces and draw from the experiences of other revolutionary transformations this century. Such a popular army would also progressively withdraw the subsidies of the working poor for the military-industrial complex and lay a programme for the conversion of some of the factories in the military-industrial complex.

Western capital and the local monopolists are the social forces with the greatest interest in a reform strategy to defuse the present militancy and political organisation among the people. Already in Western Europe and North America the transnational corporations have given notice of their intention to economically and politically dominate southern Africa. The West would like to be able to chart a reform process which excludes the broad masses from real democracy while paving the way for more overt military links between the West and a reformed South African military. For these elements the promotion of a black capitalist class with full economic participation would ensure the survival of the monopolies and the subsidies of the working class to the mechanised army. However the racism which up to this point has excluded potential black capitalists from political power dictates that the process of creating African allies for the survival of capital has started too late to be of any lasting political significance in the society.

The tremendous energy being channelled into the present reform strategies from both inside and outside South Africa should sharpen the need for clarity by those in combat on the questions of insurrection, wearing down the enemy and the seizure of power. This discussion is carried on in the pages of Sechaba but there is a need for a more generalised debate on the processes involved and the centrality of the popular masses.²⁸ One section of international capital with foresight saw the implications of the developing popular organs of power. The report of the Eminent Persons Group (EPG) in 1986 did not shirk from mooting the question of the West supporting an ANC government in Pretoria. It was significant that this report made profound suggestions for the peaceful negotiation process.²⁹ There was no conception in the EPG report of a move away from capitalism even with an ANC led government. Moreover progressive elements within the South African struggle have raised questions on the experience of nationalisation in other Frontline states and how this nationalisation is far from the process of socialisation.³⁰

Socialisation with regard to the military in this context requires that a thorough discussion of the dismantling of the apartheid forces lays bare the implications for an African government. It was Lenin at the dawn of the Bolshevik Revolution who declared: 'the working class cannot simply lay hold of the ready-made state machinery and wield it for its own purposes.'³¹ Lenin was referring to the experience of the Paris Commune in 1871.

The concrete experiences of the transition period in post revolutionary societies have shown the potentialities towards retaining a lopsided military structure, particularly because by its very nature a revolution invites attack from the old and dying social forces. Beginning with the first socialist state, the Bolshevik Revolution had to fall back on the military-political traditions of the former Tsarist army in the very ²⁸ At a recent conference in the UK on the Southern African Economy after Apartheid there was a lively debate on 'workerism' and 'populism' in South Africa. Unfortunately none of the principle debaters were Africans.

²⁹ See Mission to South Africa, pp 130-41.

³⁰ R Davies, op. cit., pp 17-25.

³¹ V Lenin, The State and Revolution, in Selected Works—Volume 2, Moscow: Progressive Publishers 1963, p 263.

process of consolidating Soviet power against internal and external enemies. These traditions had important consequences for the shaping of the socialist economy.³² The lessons learnt in building popular armies in Vietnam, Cuba and Nicaragua should form an indispensable part of the present anti-apartheid war.

Recent experiences in Africa from Algeria to Zimbabwe should show that the problem of the dismantling of the apartheid economy and military is not simply one of the seizure of power. Though this is essential to any programme of transformation, the very process of the capture of power must in essence determine how power will be transformed to the people. Liberation is not simply a military/technical question but is linked to the consciousness and political mobilisation of the broad masses. Unfortunately, the legacy of racist education ensures that the present intellectual debate on post-apartheid society does not sufficiently draw the African majority into a discussion of the full implications of the transfer of power and the retooling and conversion of the factories.³³

Monopoly capital in South Africa has created large scale production and on this basis the majority of the functions of the old state could be democratised and socialised in a very short period. This process of democratisation of the economy requires not only a discussion on the political reorganisation of society but a full analysis of the present structure of the society. And in South Africa it must also break the alienation embodied in the structures of the state as well as deracialise and demystify science and technology. This process must, in the words of Franz Fanon, lead to a 'situation where the people who take their destiny into their own hands assimilate the most modern forms of technology at an extraordinary rate.'³⁴ Questions of the place of nuclear energy, of the method of the mining of minerals, of the surpluses from agriculture and mining to industry, are all related to the discussion of the war machine. However, it is not in the scope of this short commentary to make meaningful statements on these questions. My effort has been to stimulate greater discussion and future research by the oppressed Africans in South Africa and their allies on the tasks ahead.

³² David Holloway, War, Militarism and the Soviet State, Working Paper No. 17, World Models project.

³³ The discussion on conversion is part of the discussion on demilitarisation in Western Europe. For one interesting study see Lucas Aerospace: Turning Industrial Decline into Expansion, Lucas Aerospace Confederation Trade Union Committee, London, 1979.

³⁴ Franz Fanon, Studies in a Dying Colonialism, New York: Monthly Review Press, 1965, p 145.

In South Africa the failure of apartheid has been compounded by the failure of the army to suppress the urban uprisings. The youths, students, workers and guerrillas have not been intimidated by the South African military arsenal. And not even the massive destabilisation campaigns nor the killing of Samora Machel have crippled the peoples of neighbouring states. These episodes in the war point to the way in which the ideas of social emancipation have taken root in southern Africa. African workers have given notice that they will not continue to subsidise their own repression. But the experience of popular alliances elsewhere in Africa during the decolonisation process shows to the working poor that even after liberation they can continue to subsidise their own repression by African governments. The health, safety and security of the working people plus the collective security for the oppressed Africans must be the basis for the creation of a new armed force after apartheid. The evolution of this force is tied up to the present struggle and to the process of the self emancipation and self organisation of the people.

South Africa: assistance and aid programmes

The economy of South Africa is the most developed as well as the most technologically sophisticated in all of Africa. With an annual per capita income of $2,340,¹ a state-of-the-art transportation and communication system, a highly advanced medical sector, and a substantial nuclear capability, South Africa might appear to be a developed rather than an underdeveloped economy. That impression, however, is misleading.

Apartheid South Africa is perhaps the supreme example of the dualist pattern of economic development so often cited in development theory. The misleading nature of 'average income' figures is never more dramatically illustrated than by the bi-polar reality which lies behind South Africa's $2,340 per capita income. This $2,340 constitutes an averaging of an income of over $8,000 for whites, with an average of less than $1,000 per year for blacks. In the bantustans, where nearly half of the black population is obliged to live, per capita income is believed to average less than $400 per year. The misleading aggregated statistic thus hides massive disparities. It also serves the convenient political purpose of enabling smug South African officials to brag that, economically speaking, blacks are much better off in South Africa than anywhere else on the continent.

When we disaggregate the income figure and focus on the actual plight of the people of South Africa, we soon understand why South Africa must be perceived as an underdeveloped economy, as an economy as desperately in need of restructuring and of development as any in the Third World. The eradication of the gross income disparity (and of the even larger disparity in wealth which inevitably lies behind it) will certainly be a priority goal of the post-apartheid South African government. The achievement of such a goal will require more than a little skill, plenty of luck, and ideally, a measure of foreign assistance.

In this paper we will explore what the role of foreign assistance might most appropriately be in aiding a post-apartheid South African government to build an economy which meets the needs of its people.

¹ Measured in gross national income per capita; The World Bank, The World Development Report 1986, London: Oxford University Press, 1986.

The opinion expressed in this article are the author's own and do not necessarily reflect those of the institutions with which he is affiliated.

This is, of course, a highly speculative exercise, for we cannot know when the post-apartheid South Africa will become a reality, the condition of the economy and of the national infrastructure which will survive the liberation struggle, the nature of the human relationship which will characterise the new society, nor the type of economic and political system which post-apartheid South Africa may choose to pursue. Lacking this information, we will assume that liberation occurs within the next five years and that it is achieved without serious destruction of the basic physical infrastructure.

Because these assumptions are heroic and somewhat optimistic, there is a high risk of understatement in any attempt to attach dollar figures to the aid recommendations. A Johannesburg in ruins is quite a different proposition from a Johannesburg intact, and its revitalisation would entail aid figures of a totally different order of magnitude. For this reason, no effort will be made to quantify foreign assistance needs.

Uneasiness in the aid relationship

Among the many massive tasks which the post-apartheid government will face are three² in which foreign assistance could be particularly helpful:

- 1) Ensuring that the economy continues to function while the reins of control are being transferred to new hands and while the grosser economic inequities of the past are being expunged.
- 2) Bringing the ten million bantustan residents into a more normal relationship with the national economy, whether by bringing productive agriculture and industry to the bantustan areas or by transferring the residents to more viable sites.
- 3) Harmonising the South African economy with those of its neighbours to create a viable southern Africa regional economy.

The installation of democratic government in South Africa will mean that twenty-three million black people, the vast majority of whom have been deliberately denied education and the training and experience of running a modern economy, will be enabled to assume control of a highly sophisticated and technologically advanced society. Having been the victims of the most vicious exploitation and the most inequitable allocation of rewards devised by modern man, the black South Africans' post-apartheid demands for a redistribution of income and wealth are likely to be as strident as is their clamour for majority control of the government. To accommodate these demands while maintaining the operations of government and of the economy will be no mean feat.

² If Namibia's independence is not achieved prior to the arrival of a post-apartheid South Africa, then it is likely Namibia will be a valid claimant for foreign assistance, alongside post-apartheid South Africa. This paper does not include a discussion of independent Namibia.

Outsiders can be of invaluable assistance in this process though the aid relationship may initially be extremely perilous. In its relationships with outside creditors, the new South African government would likely be highly protective of its newly-achieved sovereignty and suspicious of possible subversion. There might be tension over any debt which might be outstanding at the time of the transition. In addition, the government would likely be sensitive to exploitation through profiteering and manipulation by the industrialised nations.

South Africa's past history of racial relationships may also interfere with an effective harnessing of Western finance and technical assistance to the cause of South Africa's development, the role of race being one of the two wild cards in the post-apartheid South African deck (although the African National Congress, the pre-eminent organisation in the liberation struggle, has steadfastly articulated a non-racial basis for the future of the country).

The other wild card is the role of ideology, which could become an even greater deterrent to a substantial foreign assistance linkage than race. In today's climate, both bilateral and multilateral assistance to Third World countries is increasingly conditioned on movement by the recipient country towards the free market model. This has intensified in recent years, as demonstrated by the increasing prominence of free market and privatisation requirements (a) among IMF conditionalities; (b) as part of the structural assistance loans increasingly favoured by the World Bank; and (c) as the principal criteria for determining eligibility for both United States and the World Bank's special programmes for African Development.

With capitalist ideology so clearly in control of most aid sources, the prospects for foreign assistance to a South African government whose embrace of capitalism is likely to be lukewarm at best, should not be exaggerated. It will not take long for the post-apartheid government to recognise that the tension between its own ideology and that of the foreign aid community may translate into much of the aid being made available on terms or for purposes which fundamentally conflict with its development plans. The less post-apartheid South Africa must depend on foreign aid, the greater its freedom in choosing its own path of economic and social development.

At the same time it would be a dis-service to exaggerate the roles which race and ideology may play in post-apartheid South Africa. In this regard, the post-revolutionary experiences of Zimbabwe may provide some indication as to how post-apartheid South Africa may work with the West. Both of the socialist parties (Zimbabwe African National Union (ZANU) under Robert Mugabe and Zimbabwe African People's Union (ZAPU) under Joshua Nkomo) were cautious in articulating economic development strategy.

The practice of socialism in Zimbabwe has been implemented over time. It is likely that the outcome of a more radical transformation, in which industries were nationalised in the absence of compensation, would have polarised the society along class and race lines; Zimbabwe appears to have successfully avoided such a path, and post-apartheid South Africa should be careful to do the same. In addition, the Zimbabwean experience reflects an awareness of the need for a sophisticated modern capitalist sector in which the retention of white skilled manpower was essential to the long-term transition to socialism.

Despite the dangers inherent in accepting foreign aid, however, the magnitude of the tasks which will confront the new government as it attempts to remedy the prevailing inequities will be such that assistance from external sources will be essential. But precisely because of the dangers, it is imperative that the post-apartheid government be extremely selective in seeking aid and in establishing the 'conditions' for that aid. In Table I, we have attempted to identify the principal aid sources and to suggest those types which might be most suitable for South Africa to consider seeking.

Selecting the proper type of aid

The concept of international aid emerged in the aftermath of the Second World War. The USA, finding itself to be the only operational major economy as well as the holder of the bulk of the world's sound monetary assets, realised that if the global trading system were to be restored and a stable international economy re-established, the shattered economies of Europe and Japan would have to be rebuilt. The funds could only come from the USA and thus the concept of foreign assistance was launched. As the European and the Japanese economies recovered, aid was subsequently extended to the newly-emerging countries of the Third World.

Throughout most of the next forty years there was a general consensus that foreign aid made a useful and positive contribution both for donors and recipients. Had it been otherwise, the aid would have ceased or declined precipitously. There have, of course, always been sceptics in both the donor and the recipient camps, but the overall commitment to the aid concept has proved surprisingly hardy, and while aid levels have consistently fallen short of targets, the absolute level, at least in nominal terms, has not suffered noticeably.

In recent years, however, the cries of the doubters have become more strident and the terms on which aid is offered have become more stringent. The major donors have been increasingly obliged to face criticisms that the aid has not been effective and that it is contrary to the national interest (more precisely, contrary to the interests of certain groups within the nation). The recipient countries, on the other hand, have come to realise that foreign aid is a double-edged sword which can have substantial negative consequences for them. While outright refusal to accept foreign aid remains rare among Third World leaders, the increasing scepticism about it among the masses has led Third World politicians to exercise greater selectivity in accepting the aid offered them.

Despite this scepticism, the need for aid, especially in Africa, is enormous. With the possible exception of British policy in its West African and Caribbean colonies, traditional colonialism consistently pursued a myopic pattern of deliberate refusal to train and prepare its subject peoples for assumption of the reins of government. A comparable pattern has been pursued by South Africa where, despite the unmistakable indications that majority rule is moving inexorably toward realisation, the ruling whites have persisted in leaving the African population ill-prepared for assuming control. The mass black population enjoys meagre educational opportunities, and while the stream of college-trained blacks is growing, it is small compared to the needs.

At least equally handicapping to blacks has been the denial of any opportunity to acquire experience in running either government or major business units. (It is probably too late for gestures in this direction now, and any black who deigned to participate in them would risk being viewed as a 'collaborator'.) In fact, the business sector has probably offered more opportunities for advancement than has government,

THIRD WORLD QUARTERLY

Table I: Major types of concessional and non-concessional foreign assistance

Type of Assistance	Typical Form	Principal Sources	Comment
Education and Training: Scholarships and bursaries to enable participants to acquire training within and outside the country.	Grant	Bilateral; PVO; WB; ADB	Necessary
Technical Assistance: Provision of teachers, trainers, experts, craftsmen and management personnel Provision of technical advice and evaluation of current practices.	Sale and/or Grant	Bilateral; PVO; WB; ADB; UNDP	Necessary
Project Aid: Financing construction of social and physical infrastructure; also available to assist in institution building.	Loan or Grant	WB; ADB; Bilateral; PVO; UNDP; IFAD	Desirable, if it can be tailored to needs of recipient rather than of donor
Capital Transfer: To buy out property and businesses of whites who want to emigrate.	Grant	Bilateral	A one-time political decision
Structural Adjustment Loans (including sectoral loans and export rehabilitation credits): loans linked to policy changes desired by the donor.	Loan or Grant	WB; ADB; bilateral	Useful for post-struggle rehabilitation. Can also be highly useful to SADCC if donors are willing to cooperate
Commercial loans: Conventional bank loans, extended either to the government or to the private sector.	Loan	Commercial banks	Acceptable for self-liquidating undertakings only

ASSISTANCE AND AID PROGRAMMES

Table I: continued

Type of Assistance	Typical Form	Principal Sources	Comment
Private investment:
May take form of direct investment in a new or existing enterprise, or of purchase of debt or equity in a South African corporation.	Equity or Loan	ifc; transnational corporations venture capital firms; private corporations	Potentially very useful, but must be treated with great caution
Military Assistance:
May take an infinite variety of forms. Entails heavy political cost.	Loan or Grant	Bilateral	Unnecessary. To be avoided
Food Aid/Emergency Relief:
Humanitarian response, as appropriate, to specific crises.	Loan or Grant	Bilateral; pvo	Only as a last resort
Key ADB African Development Bank IFAD International Fund for Agricultural Development IFC International Finance Corporation PVO Private Voluntary Organisation UNDP UN Development Programme WB World Bank

although such opportunities have been confined to relatively few firms.

The installation of a post-apartheid government will abruptly change this situation as the government will be under great pressure to Africanise critical sectors of government, much of the civil service, and at least a portion of the 'commanding heights' of the economy. Failure to do so would not only subject the government to serious criticism from its constituency but would also risk continuing sabotage (by unsympathetic incumbents) of its efforts to implement whatever policies and programmes it might hope to launch. Meanwhile, the strain placed on society by the need to replace experienced personnel with inexperienced people can itself become a major threat to the new government, for if the economy collapses then the new policies and programmes may prove unrealisable in any case.

It is in the resolution of this dilemma that foreign assistance may have its greatest role to play. In the remainder of this paper, we will examine the following types of concessional and non-concessional foreign assistance in terms of their likely availability and suitability in aiding the economic and social development of post-apartheid South Africa.

Education and training

Black South Africans have for many years benefited from a variety of education and training programmes supplied by foreign governments. Under these programmes, black South Africans have been able to pursue pre- and post-baccalaureate education both within and outside South Africa. Such programmes have become controversial in some anti-apartheid circles for fear that they could be construed as lending support to the apartheid government and because it was felt that blacks returning home with such training might be easily co-opted by the government.

Private industry has also sent a few of its blacks abroad for training and groomed them for middle management slots in the corporate world—a practice viewed with ambivalence by some of the more thoughtful anti-apartheid cadres. A prominent black labour leader, in expressing his opposition to such programmes, flatly declared to the author that 'We don't want the whites creating a black middle class here in South Africa. They're likely to become traitors to the struggle.' An official of the ANC, when apprised of this exchange, indicated that he was familiar with that perspective but that the ANC did not necessarily endorse it because it recognised the importance of having adequate numbers of blacks capable of assuming the controls in all sectors of the society.

The ambivalence which surrounds the issue of foreign financed education and training in apartheid South Africa will likely find little quarter in post-apartheid society, where the demand for education and training can be expected to exceed the supply. This would seem to be one area where foreign aid will be welcomed without dissent, and where donors can be supportive with a minimum of odious conditionalities. Even so, one can anticipate some disagreement as to where education of various types can best be provided—within South Africa, elsewhere in Africa or the Third World, or in other industrialised countries. These controversies are mild, and with the need so vast there should be plenty of candidates to utilise all resources which are made available.

Technical assistance

Closely related to the education and training type of aid is that of technical assistance. This generally refers to the provision of expatriate personnel to fill positions for which there are no available local persons with the requisite training and experience. These may be teachers, agronomists, engineers, economists, doctors, well-drillers—indeed experts in any occupation. They may be assigned as advisers to ministries or to parastatal organisations or they may actually be placed in operating positions in government or in the parastatal sector. Such teachers and experts have been used widely in independent Africa, perhaps most widely in the former French colonies (where they are referred to as ‘cooperants’).

Their utilisation has not been without controversy. Although these technicians are sometimes supplied under grant aid programmes, they are primarily a charge on the domestic economy, at least for their local currency costs. Such costs can be substantial, for these expatriates generally expect to be provided with a level of living and benefits which greatly surpass the local standard. Besides being costly, the foreign technicians are also frequently criticised for not being sufficiently in touch with and respectful of the local customs and aspirations. The competence of many of the expatriate technicians who have been sent to Africa has also been questioned, but all in all there would appear to be a consensus that technical assistance is on balance a valuable resource for a newly independent country.

Technical assistance is almost always available—bilaterally and via various UN agencies, the World Bank and private voluntary organisations. Donor governments are usually pleased to provide such aid because of the opportunity it affords for national penetration into the operation of the host country. For this reason, beneficiary governments are well advised to exercise some caution in accepting expatriate technicians, though when properly monitored, technical assistance can provide benefits far exceeding the costs.

The extent of South Africa's need for expatriate personnel will be determined by the manner in which South Africa's white community reacts to the introduction of majority rule. The 4.5 million whites are already running the South Africa economy in a productive fashion. Clearly it is not as productive as it might be were the black community not excluded from so many aspects of it. Nor is it as productive as it might be were the rewards more equitably distributed. But it is a productive and profitable economy as it stands, so the need for expatriate technical assistance is somewhat artificial. Artificial because, if the white labour force could be miraculously transformed into egalitarian non-racists, eager to remedy the inequities of which they have long been the beneficiaries, there would be no need for expatriate technicians. The skills are already within the country.

Unfortunately, human nature assures us that no such miracle will happen, so a clearly defined need for external help will certainly exist. Because the white South Africans have few options in terms of emigration, it is likely that most will remain. However, even if we assume an accommodationist transformation in their racial attitudes sufficient to allow them to work harmoniously in a relationship of equality with blacks, a significant percentage of them will certainly balk if they are obliged to accept sizeable cuts in their standards of living.

Yet, such cuts are inevitable, a reality which explains the intransigence displayed by white South Africans toward the yielding of power to majority rule. Without the benefit of theoretical constructs or statistical analysis, the white South Africans have instinctively understood that their high standard of living is the counterpart of and directly traceable to the desperate poverty of South Africa's black millions. To attempt to shrink this disparity exclusively through a process of 'levelling up', (ie paying the newly-hired blacks in the public sector salaries equal to whites performing the same job) would destabilise the economy. In addition, it would transform the lopsided income disparity between the races into a dangerous disparity within the black population itself, gravely exacerbating a stratification which has already begun to appear. This could in turn lead to a potentially explosive situation.

One is left, then, with the option of 'levelling down', that is reducing the salaries and wages of whites employed in the public sector to a level which would be sustainable for both blacks and whites. But is this any less dangerous than the first option? Would the white labour force, embodying the skills, the technology, the experience which the economy must have to maintain its momentum, be willing to acquiesce to a massive cut in its income, especially within the climate of sullen defeat which would most probably characterise the white community's frame of mind in a post-apartheid South Africa? In the face of such circumstances, would the economy experience a decline in the productivity of the whites parallel to the reduction in their income, or perhaps worse, would the whites withhold their labour, whether by strike or by emigration?

Considering only the public sector, which is substantial in South Africa and includes such vital sectors as iron and steel, power, and transportation, the implications of a 'white strike' are enormous. Nor would the private sector be unaffected. Presumably, it could handle the wage and salary issue as it pleased; but if the government were really determined simultaneously to eliminate the dual wage system and enforce fair employment practices, private employers would face a dilemma similar to government's—to level wages upward or downward.

Foreign technical assistance could potentially play a major role in addressing this complex and delicate issue. Launching the post-apartheid economy on a sustainable growth path while introducing: (a) fair employment practices (Africanisation of the public sector), and (b) a unified wage and salary scale, will clearly entail a reduction in wages for many, perhaps for most, whites. Perhaps the only way to implement so drastic a change would be with external assistance in the form of either expatriate personnel or wage and salary supplements.

If the industrialised countries were to agree to make their nationals available to fill positions in South Africa, the local whites, seeing their leverage thus weakened, might be persuaded to acquiesce in wage and salary adjustments. (In Zimbabwe, for example, real income cuts were successfully imposed after independence with only a modest reliance on expatriate technical assistance.) There are real limits to the number of technicians available globally, so only a portion of South African whites could be replaced by foreign nationals in any case.

A more feasible and considerably less expensive tactic (although perhaps not properly classified as technical assistance) would be for concerned foreign governments to provide funds for a wage subsidy to those South African whites holding critical jobs for which black personnel were not available. These subsidies would supplement the newly-lowered wage and would enable the employee to continue to receive his former income, or a significant portion thereof, but only for a specified period. Additionally, he would be obliged to train an apprentice. The problem with such a scheme, however, is that the South African government could afford to bear these (essentially local currency) costs itself. But if it did so, it would bear the full onus of perpetuating a dual wage scale, a charge which would be softened somewhat were the wage supplement provided from abroad.

However it is achieved, maintenance of an effective work force at all levels of the society is a sine qua non for a successful transition to a healthy post-apartheid society. To the extent that the white South African community is unwilling to aid and abet the transition to fair employment practices and a unified pay scale, then foreign expatriates will have to be relied upon to fill the gap and to train the new personnel.

Project aid

The type of aid which comes to most persons' minds when they hear the term 'foreign aid' is likely to be project aid—roads and bridges, dams and power plants, schools and hospitals. This is the most visible type of aid, absorbs the most money, and carries a certain dramatic flavour not enjoyed by other types of aid. Project aid has been particularly needed in Africa because the colonial governments built so little in the way of social and physical infrastructure there.

South Africa may find that its greatest need for project aid will arise from its effort to address the mammoth problem of creating employment and decent living conditions for roughly one-half of the black population which resides in the bantustans, or 'homelands'. Some ten million people—predominantly women, children and the elderly—currently strive to eke a living out of some of South Africa's least promising real estate, where they are confined by law.

In a few cases there are limited employment opportunities to be found in adjacent white communities, but in most bantustans the men must live elsewhere, in distant cities, and send home such money as they succeed in earning. The normalisation of this vast population's relationship to the larger society will be a task requiring economic wizardry of the highest order. The cessation of white rule will trigger a clamour to leave these dreary enclaves, but the impact of 10 million persons descending on South Africa's urban areas en masse could seriously disrupt the society. On the other hand, any restrictions on movement which smack of influx control would be socially distasteful, if not politically impossible in post-apartheid South Africa. Serious discussion and contingency planning should already be under way with regard to this highly explosive problem.

To the extent that any of the homelands have potential viability as areas for permanent habitation, efforts to retain the inhabitants and to create on-site livelihoods for them should be encouraged. Such programmes would be natural candidates for project aid, which can build the needed infrastructures and help to create the other community institutions (such as schools and clinics) which the people would require. Similarly, for those areas where a determination was made that no heavy concentration of population could be sustained, project aid could assist in the development of promising alternative sites to which the displaced persons could be moved.

The single most frequent type of project aid currently being provided in Africa is aid to large-scale and subsistence agriculture, designed to encourage the more efficient production of food and cash crops. Historically, large-scale agriculture in South Africa has been highly successful, although it has fallen on hard times in recent years. The transition to majority rule will almost certainly entail some transformation in this sector, but it can conceivably survive without foreign assistance.

Peasant agriculture in South Africa, however, has low productivity and foreign assistance can play a significant role here—in research, in the improvement of current farmer practices, in land reform, and in provision of government services to agriculture. Such aid has become increasingly conditional in recent years though the conditions have generally not been too objectionable to the recipient community. The World Bank and the African Development Bank will almost certainly be in the forefront in making such aid available.

Capital transfer

During the Lancaster House negotiations surrounding the independence of Zimbabwe, the key Western powers agreed in principle to make a one-time capital grant to the new government to permit it to purchase land from large landowners and redistribute it to landless blacks. This programme was never funded and the inequitable distribution of land in Zimbabwe has continued as a cause for internal unrest.

In South Africa the situation is far more serious than it was in Southern Rhodesia. Although it is unrealistic to think of a fund of sufficient magnitude to buy out all large landowners, a fund of £1,000 million (pounds sterling), such as was proposed for Zimbabwe, would at least permit the post-apartheid government to begin to address the issue without having to tap its regular budgetary resources, which will be overtaxed in any case.

Western donor nations could justify their contributions to such a fund (as well as aid to post-apartheid South Africa generally) both on the basis of equity (returning some of the benefits which they have been enjoying) and of security interests. For at least two decades, investment in South Africa has yielded the highest, or nearly the highest, return on investment in the world. These profits are directly traceable to the impoverishment forced upon the black population. They are an index of the exploitation which underlies the production of the gold, platinum, chromium, manganese and other minerals which the West considers to be so vital to its survival.

A massive capital transfer from the Western industrialised nations to the post-apartheid government offers a concrete means by which this historical injustice might be acknowledged, if not compensated for. It would, at the same time, help immeasurably in the peaceful restructuring of the distortions in South African society, thus contributing to stability, which is in the Western interest.

Conceivably there might be resistance to such a transfer on the part of the post-apartheid government, especially if it were tied to compensating the Boers for land rather than for structures. The government could reasonably argue that since the whites had effectively stolen whatever land they have, any effort to compensate them for it would be an unacceptable admission of the validity of their land titles. Thus the question of a buy-out fund along the lines proposed for Zimbabwe may be a non-starter within the South African context. It is a decision to be made by politicians, not by economists.

Structural adjustment loans

Structural Adjustment and other forms of policy-based lending constitute a relatively recent addition to the menu of foreign aid offerings. They are particularly associated with the World Bank, although the African Development Bank and some bilateral donors are beginning to find them useful as well. The growth in popularity of these loans can be traced to the efforts to deal with the Third World debt problem in the 1980s.

The inappropriateness of the IMF's short-term lending programmes for countries which were suffering from ills requiring major restructuring in their economies led to the popularity of policy-based types of loans. These loans provide for rapid disbursement of the funds and permit them to be used within a broad range of activity. The borrower must, however, agree to adopt certain mutually agreed policies which are meant to facilitate the necessary restructuring.

It is possible that post-apartheid South Africa may find itself in need of this type of assistance. The type of restructuring which the South African economy will need is rather unlike that which is currently being demanded of most Third World borrowers, but there is every reason to believe that the multilateral financial institutions would be forthcoming with structural assistance loans for South Africa if the need were demonstrated.

South Africa's neighbouring states, are particularly suitable candidates for structural assistance lending, very largely because of the events associated with the struggle in South Africa. The BLS countries (Botswana, Lesotho and Swaziland), for example, have had their trade and their monetary systems linked to South Africa so intimately that should the liberation struggle lead to a break in this linkage, it would entail a major readjustment of their economies. To varying degrees, the other front-line states face similar problems, relating to their dependence on South Africa for the transit and the transport of their imports and exports and for supplying a host of other services and products.

The creation of SADCC (the Southern African Development Coordinating Conference) was inspired by a desire to weaken the dependence of the SADCC members on their powerful racist neighbour. Several of these states are currently suffering extensive physical damage as a result of South Africa's destabilisation tactics and its efforts to destroy the ANC.

The reality of the southern African cone is that the SADCC countries enjoy natural linkages to one another and to South Africa, linkages whose encouragement can rebound to all parties concerned. Some of the linkages, however, are politically—rather than economically—based (ie, the North-South transportation corridors) and have been used as political weapons by the South Africans.

A post-apartheid South Africa should indeed be an integral part of a grouping of southern African states, unified for the avowed purposes of mutual reinforcement of their economic strengths. The current efforts of SADCC to provide alternative transportation routes via Mozambican ports for the land-locked economies of Zambia, Zimbabwe and Malawi are probably justified on economic grounds because of the shorter distances involved and also because such projects serve to open up the neglected hinterlands of these countries. For land-locked Botswana, however, it may be that trade can more efficiently be handled through the traditional South African arteries than by any likely alternative, although transit via Walvis Bay, or even Beira, deserves further exploration. Similarly, the South African Rand, now used by Lesotho and Swaziland but shunned by others, may in fact be a logical currency to use throughout the SADCC region at some future date. The treatment of the half million black expatriate miners currently employed in South Africa has strong implications for several SADCC nations (assuming President Botha has not already expelled them), and the economic viability of Lesotho without direct or indirect support from South Africa may be brought into bold relief. Clearly, democratisation of South Africa will have major ramifications through the entire region.

These future relationships between the economy of South Africa and those of her neighbours is of such over-riding importance for the SADCC nations that it would be extremely useful for the major South African liberation groups to assign a permanent delegate/observer to SADCC so as to begin the important liaison work which can pave the way for a harmonious and effective integration of South Africa into SADCC.³ Past experience with regional organisations has already clearly demonstrated the difficulties which arise from major disparities between the size, wealth, or level of development of the members of such organisations. The problem of Kenya in the (now defunct) East African Community and of Nigeria in ECOWAS are two well-known African examples. Because the South African economy will inevitably overshadow those of its neighbours, under black rule just as it has under white rule, the integration of South Africa into SADCC promises to be one of the most delicate transitions which post-apartheid South Africa will be called upon to make.

Early participation of black South African representatives in SADCC's deliberations would permit that organisation to address the problem in a preliminary way without waiting until majority rule is actually achieved. In the aftermath of liberation, the availability of substantial Structural Adjustment lending to SADCC and its members can provide additional lubrication to facilitate the emergence of a harmoniously integrated sub-regional economy for the southern African cone.

Commercial loans: private investment

The extent of the financial linkages between South Africa and the industrialised nations is already massive, though the liberation struggle is precipitating a major shrinkage of foreign lending and investment within South Africa. Nonetheless, the international lending community is sufficiently familiar with the South African economy that the foundation clearly exists for a swift resumption of commercial lending and investment once an attractive political climate is restored to the country. The creation of such a climate will not be a simple task, however, and in its broadest sense it depends upon virtually everything else the post-apartheid government does in both the political and the economic spheres (as well as upon the status of South Africa's credit when the transition takes place). Commercial loans are more easily obtained than foreign investment, although the continuing crisis created by the Third World debt overhang has unquestionably cooled the ardour of the international lenders toward Third World borrowers in general. At the same time, Third World borrowers have presumably learned something from recent history as well, such as the maxim that the use of commercial loans should be reserved for self-liquidating purposes only. With a modicum of good judgement on the part of both lenders and borrowers, there should be ample scope for the use of commercial credit in post-apartheid South Africa.

³ The same may be said for Namibia, whose admission to SADCC would bring the organisation's membership to eleven (ten if Namibian independence preceded the democratisation of South Africa).

The case of foreign investment is somewhat more complex. The extent to which a post-apartheid South Africa will be amenable to foreign private investment is not clear at this time. The Freedom Charter of the ANC is not explicit on this point, and it is probably an issue which has not yet been definitively dealt with by the black leadership. Even if the official position of the government is favourable toward foreign private investment, the experience in other African countries has been that foreign private investment is viewed with some suspicion, and not without reason in many cases.

While South Africa has arguably not endured a colonial experience similar to that of the rest of Africa, the foreign private sector is probably not held in higher esteem in South Africa than it is elsewhere on the Continent. There has been little involvement of the foreign private sector in the liberation struggle, and except for the few companies which have genuinely embraced the Sullivan Principles,⁴ there has been little to distinguish the policies of the foreign private sector from those of the other oppressive sectors of the apartheid society.

Foreign capital came to South Africa because the return on investment was very attractive there. These overseas investors had no difficulty in closing their eyes to the inequitable political, economic, and social reality which characterised South Africa. Indeed, they were well aware that the reason they enjoyed above average earnings was precisely because the powerlessness of blacks permitted their labour to be grossly exploited for the benefit of capital. More recently, foreign capital has recognised that the apartheid system is no longer in its best interest and has spoken out against it. Whether this history will influence the receptivity of post-apartheid South Africa to foreign private investment remains to be seen. This issue will undoubtedly be the source of tremendous tension during the early years of post-apartheid South Africa.

⁴ The Sullivan Principles were formulated in 1977 to set standards for US companies operating in South Africa. They are a private initiative of Reverend Leon Sullivan, a director of General Motors.

There is, at present, a move afoot to create a black-controlled entity to take title to those properties being divested by foreigners as the situation within the country continues to deteriorate. If such a movement should establish itself—and the odds are heavily against it—ownership of a number of significant foreign-owned firms could pass into black hands prior to liberation and a promising base be laid for post-apartheid expansion of these firms on a joint-venture basis. Clearly, the entire matter of foreign investment must await the unfolding of the struggle, for the manner by which liberation is achieved is likely to be a major factor determining the flavour and ideology of the new regime.

Balance of payments financing

From time to time even the best managed economies are likely to encounter liquidity problems in their international accounts. The IMF was created to provide the funds necessary to steer countries through such temporary disequilibria in their balance of payments. In recent years, the IMF has been perceived as an ogre by some Third World nations due to the conditionalities which it has imposed on its borrowers. These conditions have often incited social unrest, rioting, and even overthrow of governments.

The IMF deserves much of the criticism which it has received insofar as its demands on clients have often been inappropriate, excessive, and over-concerned with ensuring that the borrower service his debt while reflecting an insufficient concern for the welfare of the populace. In defence of the IMF, however, it should be noted that the recent and current indebtedness of many of the Third World countries reflect problems of insolvency rather than of liquidity. The IMF was never designed to deal with problems of insolvency.

South Africa will almost certainly encounter balance-of-payments deficits and liquidity shortages, and at such times it should freely call upon the IMF to assist it on reasonable terms. The new South African government should studiously avoid insolvency. However, should insolvency occur, South Africa should not seek assistance from the IMF (as it is currently structured). Structural Adjustment Loans (SAL), discussed earlier, would then be appropriate. It is to be hoped that by then a suitable international agency will have been created to help countries in distress to make the adjustments necessary to return them to a satisfactory growth path.

Military assistance

Military assistance is often the type of foreign aid most readily available to Third World countries. It takes many forms: outright provision of weapons and related hardware; training of military and paramilitary personnel; construction of roads, telecommunications and other infrastructures; and even the provision of balance-of-payments support—allegedly to counter inflationary pressures which may be created by other parts of the military aid programme.

It is difficult to foresee any serious external military threat to a post-apartheid South Africa. Certainly none of South Africa's neighbours would be in a position to threaten her, nor is it likely that such a threat would come from outside the continent. On the contrary, a heavily-armed post-apartheid South Africa could be cause for concern to its neighbours.

It is, of course, not unreasonable to expect post-apartheid South Africa to be confronted with internal dissension. The containment of internal dissension can best be handled through democratic procedures or through minimally armed civilian police forces. No case can be made for the use of military forces for the suppression of either internal or external threats to post-apartheid South Africa. Given the myriad dangers which are an inseparable part of foreign military assistance, it is hoped that South Africa will not accept this type of aid.

Food aid/emergency relief

South Africa is currently a self-sufficient producer of food and, indeed exports food products. Unless the liberation struggle devastates the agricultural sector, there should be no need for food and emergency relief for post-apartheid South Africa. If the need arises, such aid should be carefully monitored and held to a minimum. In the current situation of global food surpluses, food aid is almost too readily available, with the attendant danger of the recipient developing an excessive dependency on food imports. Food self-sufficiency in the entire southern Africa cone is a necessary underpinning to a sound and independent economy in that region, and while most of the countries in the region have the potential for food self-sufficiency, South Africa is well placed to fill the gaps in the short run.

Conclusion

The extent to which foreign assistance will be necessary for creating and maintaining an economically sound and growing post-apartheid South Africa will depend largely on the manner by which the post-apartheid society is achieved. If majority rule comes to South Africa with the races genuinely committed to creating an equitable society, and without extensive human and physical destruction resulting from a full-scale civil war, then the outlook for a viable and healthy post-apartheid economy is encouraging. Extensive foreign assistance will not be needed.

That is not a very realistic scenario, however. Even if civil war and massive physical destruction can somehow be avoided, it overtaxes one's imagination to expect that the mass of white South Africans will voluntarily cooperate to keep the economy functioning at maximum efficiency while simultaneously acquiescing to the elimination of their privileged status. Consequently, there is likely to be a need for foreign assistance. This need will be increased, the greater the destructiveness of the liberation struggle and the greater the recalcitrance of the whites toward acceptance of their new status.

The South African economy has consistently demonstrated its ability to generate a healthy surplus even during periods of moderate social unrest, although the events of the 1980s have on occasion shrunk the growth rate to near stagnation levels. Its commodities-based economy is highly diversified, and gold—its major export item—appears to have established a floor in the neighbourhood of $300 per ounce. However, the markets for its strategic minerals may or may not remain strong. One effect of the sanctions movement may be to drive the industrialised countries to find substitutes or alternative sources for South African platinum, chromium, and manganese, thus resulting in some permanent loss of markets for South Africa. On the other hand, sanctions may drive the industrialised countries to seek more temporary solutions, such as drawing down their stockpiles, opening/reopening high cost mines, and recycling existing metal. This would result in a sizeable pent-up demand awaiting the removal of sanctions.

Even assuming that the demand continues for South Africa's traditional exports, there will be a need for South Africa to expand its manufacturing sector if it expects to speed up the growth of its economy sufficiently to achieve its presumed social and economic targets. The minerals sector is not likely to experience massive growth unless war breaks out among the industrialised countries. Simply regaining an efficient level of operations in mining, mineral processing and shipping may prove to be problematic. Presumably, these operations will have been eroded moderately if the liberation comes relatively peacefully, or eroded seriously if there is extensive warfare. In the latter case, the need for extensive foreign assistance will be virtually inescapable.

Much the same may be said for the other sectors. The need for foreign aid in a form other than technical assistance (and, of course, education and training) will depend on the severity of the destruction and the ability of the economy to return to previous levels of foreign exchange earnings. Some project aid may well be needed.

Improving the living conditions of the 10 to 11 million blacks now confined to the bantustans and integrating them into a more normal relationship with the national economy will be the most massive and complex task which post-apartheid South Africa will face. It is in this undertaking that foreign assistance will be most needed. Statistically, South Africa is a food-surplus country, although with so much of its population under-fed and under-nourished, one is obliged to question this characterisation. It is perhaps more correct to call it a net food exporter. Since a post-apartheid South Africa will almost certainly seek to eliminate the most egregious instances of hunger and malnutrition, this alleged food surplus will probably disappear in the domestic market. If project aid is sought for the remediation of the bantustan problem, the dollar figures could become astronomical merely for providing minimum adequate nutrition, health care, education and housing for so many people.

The Frontline States, most of which have suffered mightily at the hands of South Africa because of their support for the liberation struggle, deserve to be included in the planning for economic rejuvenation of post-apartheid South Africa. The SADCC countries are presently on record as experiencing in excess of $2,000 million in damages annually at the hands of South Africa.⁵ This figure is believed to be an understatement, and some estimates go as high as $7,000 million. To help compensate these beleaguered nations for their sacrifices on behalf of South African liberation, the developed countries and the multilateral financial institutions should be generous in providing them assistance. Together with South Africa and Namibia, this cluster of countries constitutes a coherent sub-region whose economic integration can offer substantial benefits to all of its members.

⁵ 'An illustrative assessment of the cost of destabilisation on the member states of the Southern African Development Coordination Conference,' pages 1 and 2, a SADCC paper submitted to the OAU summit, Addis Ababa, July 1985.

The recession and stagnation which has characterised most of the global economy during the 1980s has sharply restrained foreign assistance spending by the developed countries. When the Third World's debt servicing obligations are considered, net foreign aid flows to many developing countries, including some of the neediest, are negligible and in some cases negative. There is, thus, little reason to expect that the foreign aid made available for post-apartheid South Africa will be large, regardless of the magnitude of the need. Because of its high per capita income, South Africa may not easily qualify for the more concessional types of aid such as that offered by IDA (International Development Association, the soft-loan window of the World Bank) and the ADF (African Development Fund, the soft-loan window of the African Development Bank). It may have to settle for the less concessional loans of the World Bank and the ADB, together with bilateral aid funds, commercial loans and private investment. Such indebtedness should be incurred with considerable caution. Fortunately, the underlying solidarity and resiliency of the South African economy should enable it to thrive reasonably well on its own resources and productive efforts without becoming overly dependent on foreign financial and technical assistance. All the more reason for the liberation to be achieved with as little destruction and ill-will as possible. But, of course, the struggle must be won regardless of what the cost is.

From apartheid to neocolonialism?

Within the next decade the South African apartheid system will join German nazism and Italian fascism in the history books. Like them it will be used as an illustration of the horrific aberrations that the manipulation of nationalism can produce in the hands of a threatened class in control of a powerful state apparatus. But what is the mainstream that South Africa will return to or join?

Will it be liberal capitalism in its current international form, in which the market (aided by the IMF) sets the same rules for landless peasants as for Silicon Valley entrepreneurs? If so, the operation of 'the imperialism of free trade' will bring most of South Africa's population into the same condition of exploitation as the majority of the Third World's masses; except for the rising bourgeoisie, the presently exploited will continue to be exploited, but there will no longer be an identifiable enemy to fight. Instead the enemy will be abstractions like 'market forces', 'international capitalism', or 'neocapitalism'.

Or will it be a form of centralised state socialism, similar to that in Eastern Europe, which has proved itself as a method of bringing rapid fundamental structural change and economic growth to backward or exploited societies, but equally has shown itself incapable of meeting either democratic or economic aspirations at higher levels of development.

Or is there a democratic socialist alternative adumbrated in different ways for short periods in Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia, Chile, maybe at Mondragon in Spain, in which the market is partially displaced or controlled by economic democracy in a decentralised planning system? The outlines of such an alternative system are described in the article by Innes and Gelb, whose overall thrust we fully support. The purpose of the present article is to probe, largely in the dark, into the domestic and foreign social forces that may develop to make such a transition possible—or alternatively, (and more likely), to retain South Africa for neocolonialism. First, we need to outline the main dimensions of neocolonialism that distinguish it from formal colonialism on the one hand and meaningful economic and political independence on the other.

What is neocolonialism? How can it be avoided?

An imperial power that loses colonies from which it had previously been extracting economic benefits will naturally seek to continue the process by other means. Usually the process of decolonisation opens the area to other imperial powers which had previously been wholly or partially excluded. 'Free trade' under which the new nation can apparently for the first time strike free bargains in a market, causes many to deny the reality of neocolonialism, but although there are likely to be some benefits as compared with earlier naked exploitation, the poverty and structural characteristics of most ex-colonies makes a mockery of market freedom.

This is most simply demonstrated by inquiring how the economic structure of such a country arose: Cuba, for instance, over-specialised in sugar through the will of colonial masters in Spain and later the USA. An independent country would have tried to industrialise on the basis of the sugar revenues (which in the event went to Spain). Collectively, the capitalist countries have an interest in maintaining cheap supplies of primary commodities for their industries. Whether or not Prebisch was correct in holding that there is a structural reason why the terms of trade should secularly turn against primary producers, the fact is that since the end of the great European empires, most of the commodities produced by the erstwhile colonies have declined greatly both in real value, and in relation to manufactured goods. A unit of Zambian copper or Ghanaian cocoa now buys half the number of tractors it did at independence. And the trend continues: in 1986 the dollar price of manufactured exports from the eight major OECD exporters rose 17 per cent (and is expected to rise a further 5 per cent in 1987); meanwhile the dollar prices of Third World commodity exports declined 2 per cent (with a further 4 per cent expected in 1987).

It is not necessary to claim that neocolonialism is a conspiracy on the part of imperialist powers that consciously set about producing such results. The outcome however is probably much the same as if they had, for we observe that we are dealing with ex-colonies whose economic structures were usually formed expressly to supply cheap commodities to the imperial power (so that this is what they are currently most efficient at doing); that they have been thrown into a market which is either controlled by a few transnational corporations (TNCs), or in which they are bidding each other down¹ and finally that 'international' organisations (in reality organisations of the advanced capitalist powers), insist on a package of inappropriate policies from which we will focus on three. These require first, the pursuit of static comparative advantage (ie continue producing the same primary commodities as before, in competition with other poor countries) instead of 'inefficient' industry; second, a respect for property rights (ie allow continued profit extraction by TNCs); third, a reduction in subsidies, controls, and state interference generally (ie allow market concentration and inequality to increase, partly to the benefit of an internal bourgeoisie, itself heavily compromised by association with the main beneficiary, the foreign traders and owners).

This is necessarily (in the space available) a highly schematic and generalising account; but it is near enough the truth to provide us with an illuminating contrast to the situation which has arisen in those countries which have managed to escape from neocolonialism, most notably those in Eastern Europe, Japan and the so-called NICS (newly industrialised countries). In all these cases (sometimes directly contrary to the World Bank/IMF message), there was a deliberate attempt to transcend existing comparative advantage (which for them also was originally in the primary and labour-intensive products), which required protection of the new (inefficient) industries for long periods; second, there was a relatively slight role for foreign direct investment (near zero in Eastern Europe, Japan and South Korea), and recourse to other forms of financing (grant aid or debt) which have closed instead of open-ended implications for debt-servicing, and avoid the illicit additional drain of surplus through transfer pricing; third, (and this is also a condition for the first two), a central role for the state in changing the economic structure away from the underdeveloped mode to an industrialised one, through planning the development of capital goods industries, picking winners in export industries, protecting domestic industry and subsidising exports, directing investment or making its own investments in default.

South Africa, having had a high level of settlement from the imperial powers, and formal independence since 1910, naturally does not fit exactly into the standard neocolonial pattern. Indeed the high level of state involvement in the economy, and its attempts to force industrialisation, invite comparison with the NICs. However, whether because of apartheid, or for whatever reason, the structural changes have largely aborted, leaving South Africa still heavily dependent on exports of primary commodities, with an inefficient industry, and with a relatively high level of dependence on foreign capital.

¹ Small quotas into Europe hardly compensate even for the ending of the exploitative contracts with the former colonial master.

In summary, we are maintaining that if the future independent South Africa is to escape neocolonialism, it needs both highly developed internal social forces capable of recognising and meeting the challenge it will face from international capital (as well as from its internal allies), and an international environment in which it has some leverage, either through the protection of another power (the role that the Soviet Union played for Cuba) or through the sort of special dispensation that was granted to South Korea and Taiwan as show-cases (although there seems no reason why South Africa should command such special concessions). It will also need a strong central government with a clear plan for raising the integration and efficiency of industry and reducing dependence on gold and other primary exports by promotion of manufactured exports. The role of foreign capital will also need close scrutiny, although its earlier dominance has already been somewhat reduced by economic nationalism; nevertheless, control of investment decisions—in terms of both what technologies are to be employed and what products are to be made—is not a matter that is left largely to the decision of outsiders of world markets in any state that has any pretensions to economic independence.

The present balance of forces inside South Africa

If we are to discuss realistically how any transition may proceed, our starting point must be the present disposition of forces inside South Africa. This is not to suggest that during the period of transition to a liberated society the present balance will not be radically transformed, but it would be rash to assume that free South Africa will begin with a tabula rasa; depending on the actual scenario there will be some traces of the existing structures which will continue to exert influence over events.

Given the small size and underdevelopment of the South African economy, dependence on external markets for realisation of surplus value has been inevitable.² By restricting the internal market, apartheid has slowed down forces reducing dependence, thereby slowing the gradual growth of an indigenous capitalism. On the other hand, within the limits set, Afrikaner capital, both through the state and increasingly at the private level also, has succeeded in challenging and displacing a proportion of English capital in a process that may have lessons to teach to other national capitalisms. This dramatic growth has not, however, been matched by a proportionate decrease in foreign dependence: the economy's main motor is still external demand, with exports accounting for 30 per cent of GDP (1980–85), and gold and other primary products providing 80 per cent (1985).

² Although its GDP of about US$50 bn is large in African terms, it is very small in world terms, about half that of Belgium, for instance.

Despite this, South Africa has still generally run heavy current account deficits with the developed world, covered partially by its surplus with neighbouring states, partially by foreign capital inflows. The result of the latter has been a rising invisible balance, which has prompted moves to reduce the foreign share in key industries, especially banks, which have been required to reduce their foreign shareholding progressively to below 50 per cent. In the past year or two the outflow of foreign capital has become significant,³ especially on the part of US companies.

A rough token of real independence would be given by the existence of an internationally competitive industrial sector. South Africa in fact has a large and quite well integrated industrial sector, but it is inefficient and still requires protection long after it could reasonably claim 'infant industry' status. Only about 11 per cent of exports are of manufactured goods (in 1985), and most of these have to be sold at about half the internal price. This situation can be attributed to the feather-bedding of industry allowed by gold exports, especially after the price rises of the early 1970s. Although Japan and the NICs were equally protectionist towards their industries during early phases of development, because they lacked any exportable primary products they were obliged to force the process of raising efficiency.

The economic power of capital in present-day South Africa is exercised through a number of different institutions with different implications for future attitudes to neocolonialism. Starting with those least dependent on the South African economy we can distinguish:

- 1) TNCs with firm foreign control of ownership and technology;
- 2) semi-indigenised TNCs, quoted on the South African Stock

³ In 1985 the private long-term capital outflow was over R500 mn; short-term outflows have been much greater, reflecting reduced access to export and other forms of short-term credit. South African Reserve Bank, Quarterly Bulletin.

Exchange, though with a 40-70 per cent of the shares still held by the foreign parent, sometimes with local partners, and usually with local management;

- 3) locally owned and controlled companies, including the big monopolies such as the Anglo American Corporation, often with widespread shareholdings in the white population and institutions, plus minority foreign holdings, and with increasing foreign investments of their own;
- 4) locally owned companies, including the Afrikaner-dominated institutions, with few foreign connections;
- 5) state and parastatal organisations, such as Iscor and Sasol and infrastructural institutions;
- 6) businesses owned by non-white South Africans.

The further down this list we go, the less is likely to be the interest in collusion with a neocolonialist outcome. In particular, we assume that the state apparatus, including the civil service and state industry and utilities will be rapidly Africanised in a process similar to that which occurred in Zimbabwe.

The key problem areas will be in the attitudes of companies in groups 3 and 4. In Zimbabwe, companies analogous to those in 4, have since independence developed marked economic nationalist characteristics, involving increasingly close relationships to government (which controls their foreign exchange allocations), and exhibiting hostility to foreign capital incursions and World Bank ideology (with the exception of the clearly beneficial export-revolving funds). To date little Africanisation has occurred in this group, but the dominant white (and formerly racist) owners and managers have found no viable alternative to cooperation with government, certainly not in any neocolonial direction. Group 3 companies are more problematic; are we to interpret the approach of Anglo American's Gavin Relly to the ANC as in this category, or, given the company's profound international connections, the first step in a concerted neocolonial programme?

At present, however, the South African economy is such that if liberation occurred without further changes it would be unlikely that neocolonial status could be avoided. The effect of sanctions, however, might, on the basis of Zimbabwean experience, both increase the ability of the economy to behave self-sufficiently, using trade and foreign investment for calculated benefits rather than live-or-die necessities, and reduce the integration of companies with the world economy. It was widely predicted by orthodox economists that Southern Rhodesia would not survive sanctions for many weeks, as it was a smaller, less developed and even more externally dependent country than South Africa. In the event, even though exports fell by a half, GDP fell only one or two per cent in the first year, and after two years the economy entered on a rapid growth path averaging 7 per cent per annum for six years. Zimbabwean subsidiaries of foreign capital behaved (and to some extent behave to this day) as if they were local.

Might such an experience recur in South Africa? Although the economy is larger and more industrialised, it seems unlikely. We take up the possible effects of sanctions in the next section, but here it is appropriate to point out that Southern Rhodesia had two advantages denied to South Africa: two neighbouring countries that refused to apply sanctions, and that indeed were prepared to cooperate in disguising exports and ordering imports; and a relatively unmilitant black population that failed to mobilise for nearly a decade in face of intensified repression designed to guarantee white living standards. The drop in export earnings and consequent import capacity might therefore be much more serious in South Africa; and although the economy is widely diversified and manufacturing industry could (at a cost) meet most of the demands made on it for import substitutes, a range of critical bottlenecks could soon develop; indeed this is more likely in a more advanced industry used to availability of high technology from abroad, than in the mine-and-farm based industry of Southern Rhodesia.

How the transition to independence might affect the outcome

The trajectory of the transition is clearly unpredictable, but there are a number of (in themselves unlikely) extreme paths which may contribute elements to the actual path. Taking them in order of increasing length of the time taken for transition, there may be:

- 1) an immediate military imposition of majority rule by external forces;
- 2) immediate and effective economic sanctions which bring down the regime, leading to an ANC takeover;
- 3) an early negotiated settlement leading to a coalition government with power-sharing between the races on the Zimbabwe model;
- 4) a gathering revolution which would ultimately unite the country under a government involving the liberation movements and other internal forces such as the UDF, unions etc.

- 5) protracted violence from all communities, leading to independence in a chaotic, balkanised situation.

Let us look at the consequences of these briefly, before moving to a more detailed consideration of a more likely combination of several elements. On present evidence this combination would draw most from the last on the list, with progressively smaller contributions from earlier items.

A military solution?

There is clearly no prospect of an early military success by the liberation movements or an alliance of African forces because of their relative weakness as compared with the SADF; for political reasons there is also no serious prospect of military intervention by the West, which failed to take such action in the case of clear-cut rebellion in Southern Rhodesia. Hardly more likely is intervention by the Soviet Union or another East European power. Just conceivable, after a major massacre by the SADF (or use of atomic weapons), would be a combined operation, possibly under UN auspices. More plausibly, but again requiring a major South African crime (to guarantee at least acquiescence from the West), would be a Non-Aligned Movement intervention, with India and Nigeria carrying the burden.

If such action were quickly successful, with little damage to industry and infrastructure, it seems likely that the immediate post-independence situation would be one of 'pragmatism', with increasing Western influence (for financial reasons). The emphasis would be on rebuilding the economy and reconciliation between the races, with radicals being marginalised. Although Indian influence (with its experience of self-reliance and independent technological development), might colour many aspects of the political economy, it would remain a basically neocolonial context.

Rapid and successful sanctions

In the unlikely event of the key trading countries of North America, Western Europe and Japan resolving to institute economic sanctions of immediate, comprehensive and mandatory nature (all three adjectives being necessary), there would be a measurable chance of effective capitulation by the regime inside a year. Sanctions would have to be introduced rapidly to reduce the economy's ability to adjust (as happened in Southern Rhodesia over the period 1966 to 1970); they would need to be comprehensive, reducing the regime's ability to import, both through a reduction in its export earnings and through direct prohibitions on exports to it, and through such measures as releasing a proportion of the world's gold stocks on to the market to cause a significant drop in the gold price (probably the only realistic way to prevent the rapid growth of smuggled South African gold); and they would have to be mandatory to prevent (if necessary by a naval blockade of South African ports) countries like South Korea, Taiwan, Israel and Switzerland filling a high proportion of the vacuum.

Could all these conditions be met, the regime would be faced quite early with a decision as to whether to continue its intransigence in the face of worsening economic and security positions and the prospect of a more radical eventual outcome, or whether to seek a compromise whilst its Western allies were still likely to be playing a major role in determining the outcome (as they did for Zimbabwe at Lancaster House). A related consideration here is the prospect of changes of government in the UK and the USA in the next two years.

Such a 'Lancaster House' type settlement would undoubtedly parallel the one for Zimbabwe in important respects, ie it would seek to tie the new country firmly in a neocolonial status by a combination of aid, trade and investment inducements (with their denial coupled with unspecified sanctions as the obverse), plus guarantees of property rights safeguarding landowners and capitalists from both economic nationalism and socialisation.

As we are concerned with a 'pure' extreme, we again assume that radical forces would not yet be powerful enough to shift this outcome significantly in the direction of a more independent policy. They would however be more strongly placed than in the next scenario, and, as in Zimbabwe, might be strong enough to gain acceptance of socialism as an ultimate aim, although the growing black bourgeoisie would gradually undermine any such thrust.

An early negotiated settlement under the threat of sanctions

South Africa's economy has been in decline for most of the 1980s, and three factors suggest that this decline will continue: first, the costs of apartheid itself, rising steeply because of the increasing militancy of blacks; second, the increasing cost of sanctions; and, third, the costs of repression, and destabilisation of neighbouring states. However much the economy may be able to bear such costs, and no matter for how long, it is clear to all observers and most participants inside the country that the system has nowhere to go, and will sooner or later be replaced, either as a result of force majeure (sanctions or revolution), or through compromise. As the former could lead to a non-capitalist outcome, whereas the latter stands at least a good chance of steering South African capitalism nearer to the Western norm, a number of white South Africans, particularly big businessmen, and especially those with international interests or connections, see merit in making significant concessions to the liberation movements very early, before the economy is seriously damaged.

The white electorate, and especially Afrikaner workers and small farmers, feel that they have most to lose, and the signs are that they will prevent such a settlement until the situation has become much worse. Around a third of the white electorate are directly or indirectly employed in privileged positions by the state, and recognise that they would almost certainly be displaced fairly rapidly under the majority rule on to the wider job market, as occurred in Zimbabwe. The other two-thirds have more economic independence, and their skills would remain at a premium for some time to come; an early settlement would seem to be in their best long-term interests, as well as that of capital. Clearly, considerable pressure is likely to be applied from within and without the country to achieve this. Indeed, the threat of sanctions (but not their actual implementation) may be seen as the most potent force towards bringing about such a settlement. It is most unlikely that the liberation movements would be prepared to accept the severe constraints that such a settlement would involve, but the pressure on them could be severe, and in the short run they might have few alternative options.

If foreign and domestic capital were able to persuade the white electorate of this case, a settlement might possibly be achieved which would make a number of concessions to the liberation movements (such as a unitary state) in return for the safeguarding of property rights and a de facto confirmation of South Africa's continuance in the Western camp. Such a settlement, in the context of a white South Africa that was undefeated either politically or militarily, would undoubtedly result in the most thoroughgoing neocolonial outcome, in which even the political power of the new government would be tightly constrained (for a long interim period) by various international guarantees. These would probably be similar to the provisions in the Lancaster House Agreement for Zimbabwe, in which racism remained built into the system for the first seven years of independence, giving the 3 per cent of whites 20 per cent of parliamentary seats and a veto over constitutional change. Although the first aim of the constitution-mongering—to keep

Robert Mugabe's ZANU-PF out of power by building a majority coalition of the whites, ZANU and the UANC—failed, such provisions in the South African case could work much more easily than in Zimbabwe. Given the greater proportion of whites and the greater number of distinct groups on which to appeal to sectional or ethnic interests against a supposed 'tyranny' of a unitary party like the ANC, a conservative coalition that excluded the ANC or at any rate the radical part of it, might be forged. Constituents of the coalition might include whites, Inkatha, some 'homeland' groups, and sections of the Coloured and Indian communities. Most workers and the more politically conscious would undoubtedly go into opposition in such a scenario, but they would not necessarily have good immediate prospects of winning power given the greater, and internationally supported, legitimacy of the new government.

It should again be emphasised that we are not predicting such an outcome, merely stating that it would be more likely in the event of an early settlement imposed by the major capitalist powers.

A revolutionary outcome

However, the intransigence of a majority of whites, and the failure of the UK and US governments to bring sufficient pressure to bear on the regime, may force the liberation and workers' movements into ever more radical positions. The outcome could be increasing urban guerrilla warfare, coupled with industrial action, possibly leading to general strikes, and ultimately as the downward economic spiral worsened, defection of key sections of the white population, and even sections of the state apparatus.

This would undoubtedly be a long and bloody process, but it could lead to a genuinely independent and socialist outcome, offering the chance of rapid economic growth through restructuring industry under democratic control. Initial disruptions might be severe, with most whites leaving, committing sabotage and theft as in Mozambique, and even then there would remain the risk of outside intervention which might drive the country into seeking protection from the Soviet Union; this would probably result in a more centralised and less democratic society, and ultimately a less flexible and dynamic one, but neocolonialism would be avoided.

Protracted violence with inconclusive sanctions and balkanisation

Already tendencies to secession can be discerned in some quarters

(proposals for federal solutions may be seen as first steps), and in the absence of either determined international action or a single force strong enough to impose its will, these tendencies may well grow. The Afrikaners have a history of seceding from rule they dislike, and rebelling to preserve their hegemony in what they regard as their heartlands. It is inevitable that proposals will be heard for the preservation of the Orange Free State or parts of the Transvaal, as 'whites only' reserves, maintained by military force. It is less likely that such areas could be viable, especially without access to the sea. Clearly also, certain black groups are susceptible to ethnic appeals, or may support them through the force of intimidation and patronage. In these cases as well, some may be tempted to go it alone in an attempt to opt out of the sharpening struggle and enter fundamentally neocolonial relationships with outside powers.

Ultimately such a process, with balkanisation and inconclusive struggles, and no side being able to come out definitively on top, could lead to a downward spiral of directionless violence between groups identified as the enemy or as collaborators. This has been characterised as the 'Lebanon' outcome; in broad terms it seems, depressingly, more likely than any of the other extremes of prediction in attempting to construct a more plausible scenario.

The 'most likely' scenario: escalating sanctions with increasing black militancy and external intervention

A number of ingredients, most of them mentioned in the preceding five sections will almost certainly be involved in the actual outcome; none will occur in the extreme forms outlined above, and interactions between them may be of great significance. The following should not be taken as a prediction, for the relative weights of the factors influencing the situation are unpredictable, as are the degrees of interaction, but it is to be hoped that this exercise will set 'confidence limits' to the infinite range of possibilities. Statisticians will of course be familiar with the fact that once (or five times) in a hundred trials, the rogue result will occur; in this type of exercise there is of course only one trial.

We will therefore assume from (1) above that the first ingredient in our scenario is growing military pressure from the liberation movements; this will gradually increase in effectiveness and impact on the white population and the economy, although there will be reverses; it is not likely to prove a decisive factor on its own, at any rate in the short run. Partly because of continuing attacks by the SADF on South Africa's neighbours and bases in their countries, a second ingredient may eventually be more direct support for liberation from other African countries, and (in declining order of likelihood) India, Cuba, the socialist countries, the Nordic countries, and the West. The possibility or threat of an escalation of such support, may be a more significant factor in the short run.

As a corollary, the regime's military excursions into other countries, in particular Angola and Mozambique, (especially if it installs an MNR government in the latter and then finds itself in military conflict with Frelimo supported by Zimbabwe) could, through the resulting military and economic costs, produce major domestic consequences, as American involvement in Vietnam showed.

The second ingredient, already operating, is sanctions, and the threat of more severe sanctions. They will almost certainly not meet the three conditions for early success laid down in (2) above, in that they will continue to be introduced in piecemeal fashion, with key countries like the UK, USA and West Germany resisting all the way, just as if they wished to ensure the survival of the regime by giving it ample time to adjust and find alternative sources of supply and markets. They will thus be neither rapidly introduced nor comprehensive; they may however eventually become fairly comprehensive and even be made mandatory by the United Nations (as occurred in the case of Southern Rhodesia); it is much less likely, however, that effective policing will occur, and less likely still that a naval blockade would be instituted to stop continuing trade with Switzerland, Taiwan, etc, or through the criminal circles that would be attracted by the higher profits to be expected when (as with drugs) attempts are made at international action to stop a trade.

Nevertheless, sanctions will impose a rising cost on the regime and on white living standards, which may eventually prove crucial. They will also impose costs on blacks, especially workers; on balance this may increase solidarity, as the distinction between those in relatively secure jobs and the unemployed majority is blurred.

Along with official sanctions we may include disinvestment by private companies, which will have similar effects on economic activity and morale. As with sanctions, the slow rate of withdrawal will give the economy time to adjust, but however much it increases domestic control of the economy (which could be beneficial in the long run), the immediate effect will be to reduce the level of investment in the country and to harm the balance of payments.

The third ingredient is pressure for a negotiated settlement from capital, both internal and external, which having benefited from apartheid's cheap labour policies is unwilling to pay the cost of repression now that the demise of white supremacy is seen as inevitable. As we have argued in (3) above, this ingredient alone is also unlikely to prove sufficient to produce a settlement, both because black militancy has gone beyond acceptance of any possible compromise that could currently be proposed, and because a majority of whites would also still reject it, too many feeling that they have too much to lose. This latter position could change over the next two or three years, with the one third in state employment possibly becoming isolated from the majority who may come to feel that they would lose less from an accommodation.

Perhaps the major ingredient of present and future scenarios is the increasing black militancy being exhibited in the townships and in the rapidly radicalising trade union movement in particular. This has gained the crucial psychological dimension in the last few years of a belief that majority rule is inevitable within our own lifetime, in fact probably within a decade. As townships become ungovernable, and fewer and fewer collaborators with apartheid can be found, confidence grows, and with it economic boycotts of white businesses, municipal transport services and state education, and strikes and other forms of industrial action. Before long there could be serious economic costs arising from such causes, possibly culminating in widespread strikes and disruptions, although the prevailing economic insecurity makes such action very costly for the strikers. Clearly, there is some way to go yet before the labour movement is wholly dedicated to liberation; the intrinsic limitations of trade union activity force an essentially economic approach, with concentration on issues of pay and job security. However, the South African context is forcing increasing politicisation of trade union activity and COSATU, with its links to the UDF (and thereby ultimately the ANC) may come to determine the future style.

The interaction of the above ingredients seems likely to produce a strong incentive towards seeking a compromise settlement from sections of the ruling class in South Africa, but how long it will take for this to lead to majority white willingness to compromise depends not only on the degree of pressure from these various ingredients but also a resolution of two conflicting tendencies in the white population: a large minority will undoubtedly continue to believe that it has nothing to lose by fighting on, whereas another large minority may already have learned the lesson of Zimbabwe, in which the roughly 50 per cent of whites who remained have retained a higher standard of living than they could maintain anywhere else (including South Africa).

But it is not simply a matter of which minority becomes the majority and when, for the whites are divided on other grounds, with many Afrikaners being both more vulnerable to black competition and psychologically more willing to fight on. This will probably manifest itself in the rise of vigilante groups and terror squads, attacking blacks at random and black leaders in particular, but also no doubt those whites who are seen as traitors. At the same time, these divisions are already reflected in the growing hostility between the military and Nationalist politicians. Indeed it is not clear that the politicians fully approved some recent military actions which undercut more conciliatory approaches; for instance, the raids on neighbouring countries timed to destroy the pressure for further negotiations with the 'Eminent Persons' Group'; equally the dishonouring of the Nkomati Accord and (if not accidental) the death of President Samora Machel, may have been the result of military challenges that the politicians would not have initiated, but as they were in no position to attempt to repair the damage they were forced to concede the fait accompli. Such actions by the military and semi-official vigilante groups and terror squads could significantly delay the time of any serious settlement negotiations, and might furthermore ultimately be the precursor of actual secessionist attempts to set up 'pure' white homelands or laagers, possibly in association with compromised leaders of neighbouring bantustans.

It seems quite likely that such events will have occurred or will be developing before serious attempts to reach a settlement are made; by then a number of abortive meetings may have already have been held between certain parties—possibly the leaders of the regime with the sanctioning powers, but without the liberation movements, and with the military reserving their position—before any viable meeting of all relevant parties is convened. And, as with Zimbabwe, it may take several turns of the screw, with the regime's case visibly weakening, before they are prepared to negotiate seriously. In the meantime, centrifugal tendencies in the white population may be advancing, so that the regime's authority over its own people comes into question. The longer is the delay, the stronger and more revolutionary is the side of the liberation forces likely to be, and the less is the regime going to be able to negotiate for all whites. A distinctly possible outcome, at any rate for a period, is a large ingredient of the fifth scenario, in which right-wing whites and corrupt bantustan leaders will have actually seceded or rejected any discussions.

If the whites are so divided towards the end, and the West has been unable to impose a solution, a civil war may develop in which a significantly revolutionary liberation movement attempts police action against a seceding region, possibly like the Indian occupation of the princely states after independence. This must be regarded as unlikely as there is certain to be considerable pressure towards compromise on the part of the West, whose calculation is likely to take the form of allowing the major costs of weakening the regime to be carried by the blacks (again as in Zimbabwe), only turning the economic (or conceivably military) screws as a coup de grace in time to prevent the further evolution of the liberation movement in a revolutionary direction. In the case of Zimbabwe there was a serious miscalculation in this strategy in that the first line of defence was demolished by Robert Mugabe's victory in the elections; the second line of defence for a neocolonialist solution in that case was the Lancaster House agreement tying British guarantees of sovereignty and aid to respect for property rights; and the third line of defence was in fact the still undefeated Rhodesian army, backed up by South African force if necessary. For there to be a clear possibility of avoiding a similar neocolonialist outcome in South Africa, therefore, more serious miscalculations from the West need to be assumed, and these could arise if intransigence on the part of sections of the white population resulted in a hardening of black attitudes, coupled with balkanisation. Although it is hard to conceive of a situation in which the SADF were destroyed as an effective force, it might well find itself diverted into defending a white heartland, leaving large liberated areas, intermittently attacked, which would eventually starve it into compromise. If the Western hand in this process were too slight, there would be no other power to hand to back up its will, and a likely preoccupation, on this scenario, would be the evacuation of the intransigent elements from the continent, leaving promises of reconstruction aid as the main instrument of policy.

Inevitably there will be a final settlement conference at which compromises will have to be made by both sides. But it may be predicted that the West, whether the UK or the USA, will play a lesser role than in the Zimbabwe settlement. In the latter, both the liberation movements and the regime were under severe pressure from outside forces in the region; Britain was able to extract concessions from the former through the Frontline States, and from the latter through South Africa. In South Africa's settlement, the Frontline States may again be under severe military and economic pressure, but may well be receiving significant aid from overseas to enable them to withstand it. And of course, South Africa itself has no 'big brother' to force it to make concessions. As a consequence the final settlement may well be very largely between South Africans, and therefore may revolve around guarantees of a future white role in the country (which the ANC would certainly give). It cannot of course be guessed how strong the various parties will be relatively, but two of the major actors will undoubtedly be the liberation movements and local capital, both likely to be fairly hostile to neocolonial moves; the military and internationally oriented capital (like the Anglo American Corporation) will also be likely to be present, but both probably significantly weakened relative to their present position.

In summary, the likely balance of forces at the time that the liberation movements come to form the first majority government in South Africa, is likely to be significantly less inclined to accept a neocolonialist outcome than in other cases. Depending on the level of popular pressure, there thus could be a powerful impetus to follow the type of democratic socialist policy outlined by Innes and Gelb.

How secure will be the initial post-independence trajectory?

If we now assume that liberated South Africa's first government proposes a socialist programme, how successful is it likely to be, and what will be the pressure on it? There can be little doubt that even if, as we have argued, Western leverage to re-incorporate the country is less than in other cases, its determination not to lose so valuable a source of surplus value may intensify its efforts. In any case it is a matter of observation that any country proclaiming socialism or even economic nationalism rapidly attracts unfavourable attention from the USA and the IMF, with modes of leverage being rapidly devised.

To take the example of Zimbabwe: according to orthodox tenets its relative isolation for 15 years, during which trade declined greatly in importance as a share of national income and import substituting industrialisation was taken further than would otherwise have been possible, should have produced a very inefficient economy. The World Bank and the USA assumed that this was the case, and much of the initial aid was related to rehabilitation, which was welcome, but there were also recommendations for closure of 'inefficient' industry (almost anything that was inconsistent with preconceived ideas of what a poor country should have a comparative advantage in); and aid programmes aimed at export promotion, and competitive international tendering for World Bank projects, all pushed against the proclaimed intention to promote self-reliance.

Meanwhile the IMF, having told the new-born Zimbabwe that it was 'under-borrowed' by Third World standards, encouraged unwise borrowing, and then imposed its usual package of conditions once the country needed an IMF loan. As the causes of the imbalance were only partly the overborrowing but also the consequences of South African destabilisation (including excessive freight charges through being forced to use the long routes through South Africa), a three-year drought and the world slump, these conditions were largely irrelevant to Zimbabwe's problems as it itself perceived them, but related rather more obviously to the IMF's desire to increase the country's integration into the world market through wider use of international prices; this would of course have the consequence of aborting any too ambitious industrialisation proposals, especially those emphasising capital goods or any endeavour in which the country did not yet have a comparative advantage (ie precisely the successful strategy of Japan or South Korea!); however, Zimbabwe took matters into its own hands and corrected its balance-of-payments problems through a temporary suspension of profit and dividend payments to foreign shareholders; three years later, and following a number of good harvests which have eased the balance of payments (though with both exports and imports down in real terms), the IMF programme remains suspended, with the fund having again lost its leverage.

How might a newly independent South Africa take a similar and hopefully more pronounced course of action? And under what conditions will she have to do so? The independence path envisaged above in many ways mirrors that of Zimbabwe. There may be additional constraints to those that faced Zimbabwe and some conditions are likely to be exacerbated in the South African case. The principal causes of such conditions are likely to lie first in the impact of the sanctions process and second in the destructive impact of the war of liberation.

Sanctions will probably produce the following effects on the South African economy:

- 1) there will be reduced dependence on world trade in the sense that the ratios of imports and exports to GDP will fall markedly;
- 2) exports will still depend overwhelmingly on primary goods whilst the

- import pattern will shift towards intermediate and capital goods inputs;
- 3) nevertheless, import substitution will be carried much further than at present;
 - 4) effective control of TNCs is likely to pass to domestic managers, either because as at present TNCs are allowing control to pass to domestic capital, or because TNCs still nominally owned and controlled by their parent company will be subject to legislation that will locate decision-making power firmly in the local management structure;
 - 5) there will be in existence a battery of administrative controls developed under sanctions that will enable control of the foreign sector in pursuit of domestically determined objectives;
 - 6) there will be a run down of the capital stock. Whilst the economy will be able to maintain the existing capital stock albeit at increasing cost, it will not be possible to replace existing machinery with more up to date technology. Indigenous technology may as in the Zimbabwe example receive a substantial boost. This run-down is likely to precipitate a post independence surge in the demand for capital goods imports;
 - 7) the outflow of profits, interest payments etc will have been curtailed under sanctions and more locally generated surplus will have been invested. Foreign debts will probably not be repaid in the interim, but nor will new loans be possible, so total foreign indebtedness will not increase. Under a negotiated settlement blocked transfers may have to be paid though probably via a Zimbabwe-type mechanism, ie repatriation over a period of time.

On the face of it an independent South Africa would have the potential of undermining one of the two main pillars of neocolonial domination, viz., that of control of substantial sections of the economy by external capital. In the immediate post independence period the domestic economy will be under a greater degree of local control than at any point in South African history since prior to the discovery of diamonds. More important too will be the battery of administrative systems built to handle the foreign exchange problem. It may well be that the objectives of the new government may change in terms of foreign exchange priorities but the all-important allocative mechanism will be in existence, subject of course to provisos about the continued functioning of the bureaucracy.

The second pillar would still exist in the structure of imports and exports, the inability of the industrial sector to compete fully in the international market, and indirectly in the structure of consumption and investment demand resulting from a highly unequal income distribution. Adjusting to changes that will alter the export position is a long term aim. However, depending on the balance of post-independence forces, ie the conflict between the economy as it exists and operates, and the aims of the popularly elected government, changes in the structure of imports and changes in the distribution of income towards a more equal society could come about in the short term.

Against this background must be set the immediate domestic political demands that will face a majority government and the constraints that may be set in attempting to achieve these ends.

Taking the immediate demands first, we consider the removal of the legislation controlling the freedom of movement and settlement of non-whites. What one can be sure of here is that such an abolition will precipitate a massive rural-urban population shift as families seek to be reunited, and forcibly relocated peoples seek to return to their original abodes or seek work in the urban economy. Such shifts will only be tempered by migration within rural areas as the policies of forced removals are reversed. Second, there will be a compelling need to start the process of redistributing incomes, wealth, including land, and social incomes. And, third, will be the need to generate employment, formal or informal, for the growing numbers of unemployed and under-employed.

Urbanisation

The apartheid system has exacerbated the expected rural-urban divide for a country at South Africa's stage of development. Not only is the proportion of the population urbanised less than elsewhere, but the rural-urban imbalance in terms of incomes and production opportunities is greater. Coupled with this there will be both pressures to undo the effects of deliberate apartheid social engineering, and also the costs and consequences of a rapid urbanisation. The present position is as follows: the urbanisation rates for non-blacks from 77 per cent for 'coloureds' to 90 per cent for whites. And these urbanisation figures are normal in that the figures refer to the permanent residence of whole families and not as in the case of blacks where single temporary migrants are a significant proportion of the black percentage. Official estimates of the black urbanisation ratio are around 33 per cent, unofficial estimates put the figure at 43 per cent. Not only is this figure low but it masks the disproportionately high number of wage earners without families. It also masks the corresponding age and sex structure in the bantustans where family structure is dominated by mothers, children and the elderly. The costs of reversing this situation are twofold. First the straightforward costs of creating the necessary urban infrastructure and job opportunities for a family-based urban population. These costs will increase considerably since immigration and urban births will increase the urban population by a million or more every year for the next ten years at least. For example, such an increase requires say 200,000 new housing units per year when the existing construction rate is only 10,000. Second is the more difficult task of remedying the impact of forced removals into areas incapable of meeting minimum levels of nutrition, let alone other basic needs. Children in particular are suffering from malnutrition, and to the educational consequences of malnutrition must be added the low level of provision of rural education and those factors hindering school attendance. In addition, there will be the lost generation of children and adults in the townships who, lacking education, skills and employment, may well be as much alienated from the new South Africa as the old.

Redistribution

Much has been made in recent years of the increase in black wages since 1970, and of a parallel decline in the white share of total income. These figures are useful in throwing light on some aspects of the current political struggle in South Africa, most notably on the increasing power of the black trade unions, and the consequent move of relatively disadvantaged whites into yet more extreme forms of politics. They have little bearing however on the overwhelming necessity for a redistribution of income in South Africa.

The ratio between black and white incomes in 1984 was 1:7, with average black households earning R3,300 and white households R22,000. 'Asian' and 'coloured' household incomes averaged about R8,800. These contrasts, stark in themselves, nevertheless understate the true division of income in South Africa and the scale of current poverty. White incomes, for instance, are supplemented and buttressed in various ways, from fringe benefits in employment, from state expenditure on education and health, from the ownership of assets such as land, property, shares and pensions, as well as from the general impact of white dominance of government and parastatal employment, firm-employee agreements, and the framework of racial discrimination.

In all these areas blacks are disadvantaged, and black wage rates are further affected by much higher dependency ratios, and by the recent removal of subsidies on basic foodstuffs, commuter transport and housing, which have hit black purchasing power. These figures relate primarily to the formal sector, mainly male employment and make little reference to the distribution of incomes within the black community, or to the incidence of poverty in South Africa. Black women in particular form the lowest paid category of formal employment, they also dominate amongst the low-income people in the informal sector in urban areas, and the poverty-stricken households in the bantustans. To quote from the findings of the second Carnegie Commission, the proportion of families below the poverty line is 7 per cent in the cities, 14 per cent in the platteland, and 80 per cent in the reserves. So some 93 per cent of poverty is outside the major cities.

Social income is that income received by households in the form of the provision of various services by local and central government: education, health and social services. As with ordinary income, considerable inequality exists between whites and non-whites in the provision of services by the government. Starting with expenditure on education in 1984-85, R2,645mn was spent on white education, R2,290 mn on non-white. These totals hide a sevenfold discrepancy between expenditure per caput on white and black children.⁴ Whatever provisos are made over the interpretation of such figures, the raising of per caput expenditure for black children to the levels for white children would require a black education budget of some R5.9 bn per year.

The state of health and healthcare is characterised by the following distinguishing features: white and 'Asians' get roughly the same access to health care, and measures of health status such as the incidence of disease and infant mortality, throw up similar values. The health status of blacks and 'coloureds' is markedly inferior. For example the proportional incidence of diseases such as cholera, TB and measles is higher for these groups than for whites and 'Asians'. Infant mortality rates in 1982 were as follows: blacks 80 per 1000, 'coloureds' 60, 'Asians' 21, whites 13. Much of the health status of blacks and 'coloureds' can be explained by poverty-related factors such as malnutrition, unsafe water, lack of sanitation and inadequate housing. Health care provision itself is highly unequally distributed with respect to the urban-rural division of medical manpower. The urban doctor population ratio is 1:750, in the rural areas 1:25,000. These ratios conceal the differential access by race in the urban areas and by distance in the rural areas. The provision of curative medicine is concentrated in large technologically sophisticated hospitals and staffed by personnel requiring long and expensive periods of training. In addition preventive medicine and public health provision is concentrated in urban rather than rural areas.

⁴ In 1982-83, R234 per caput was spent on black education in the white areas and the non-independent homelands, whilst R1,654 per caput was spent on white education; expenditure on black children in the bantustans was well below R234. South African Institute of Race Relations, Annual Report, 1985.

The black-white divide exists in the provision of welfare services as in other features of South African life. Two main features are apparent. First, that the per caput provision of funds and facilities is weighted in favour of whites and the take-up rate is inversely related to need. Blacks, with the greatest needs, have the least spent per head, and the numbers eligible for and taking up welfare benefits is well under their proportion in the population.

The last major area of redistribution is that of land. The 87:13 ratio in the division of the land area in South Africa is well known. Taking the view that land is a resource yielding income to those who own or work it, then the unequal distribution of land is reflected as follows: with respect to urban land distribution, inequality is apparent in the location, population density and associated social infrastructures in the black townships, plus the racially based restrictions on forms of land ownership and tenure. Distribution of land in the rural areas is characterised by much higher population densities in black areas: population density in the bantustans is approximately 68 people per square kilometre compared with the overall population density in South Africa of 20 people per square kilometre. The division of land quality is unequal too: white South Africa has a higher proportion of its land area in the arable category, and lies in better watered areas. Lastly, white agriculturalists have differential access to such agricultural inputs as credit, water, technical advice, and transport, and also to marketing services—cooperatives, price support schemes, and transport subsidies.

To be successful rural redistribution will thus involve three major facets. First, the movement of displaced non-whites to white rural South Africa with all the implications for land ownership and the form it should take, compensation (if any), ownership of farm capital etc. Second, the extension of existing and/or new forms of agricultural support programmes to all agriculture. And, third, the extension of the modern infrastructure into the present bantustan areas.

Employment

The third major problem facing a post-apartheid government will be the need to create employment, including self-employment. The employment problem in South Africa is not that there is a gap between rich and poor, or between modern and developing sectors, or even between capitalist and pre-capitalist modes of production. It is that the state in various degrees of alliance with capitalism has engineered an economy in which a large and increasing proportion of the population is regarded as surplus.

In 1980 the population of South Africa was just under 30 million, of whom 25 million were non-white. In 1982 the economically active population was given as 11.5 million blacks and roughly 2 million whites. Of the economically active blacks, two-thirds were in formal sector employment, while the remainder were either unemployed or earning low incomes in the informal sector. The official 1985 unemployment figure was 600,000. Unofficial estimates put it at 3 million.

The longer the present regime survives the worse unemployment is likely to become. By 1990 the estimated population will be 36 million of which 31.1 million will be non-white. These estimates assume a growth rate of 2.3 per cent and 0.7 per cent for non-whites and whites respectively.⁵ Both the absolute numbers and the growth rates are dominated by non-whites, and it is clear too that dependency ratios are higher for non-whites, and that by 1990 some 40 per cent of blacks will be under fifteen years of age. This under-fifteen group includes potential mothers of the next generation so even if crude birth-rates fall, overall population growth rates will not decline for ten to fifteen years.

With a stable age distribution the economically active population grows at the same rate as the overall population; as the age distribution moves down, so the economically active population increases faster. In addition, participation rates of both female and male blacks is increasing. Thus, the number of job-seekers are predicted to be in the region of 300,000 per year to the year 2000.⁶ By that year and given that present trends and policies continue only half the economically non-white population will be in formal employment. Thirty-six per cent will be unemployed and 13 per cent in informal sector employment.

⁵ Economist Intelligence Unit, South Africa to 1990: Growing to Survive, London: Economist Publications, 1986, p 41. The growth rate for blacks 1970-80 was in fact 3.4 per cent per annum, so the figures quoted may be serious underestimates.

⁶ ibid, pp 41-3. The average number of jobs created in the 1970s was about 120,000 a year, or half the increase in job seekers. However it is clear that these figures refer to the urban sector only: in the black population as a whole, the age cohorts are approaching 1 million for the under-15s, so by 2000 the potential number of new job-seekers each year could be a million.

Thus a majority rule government will be under strong pressure to generate wider production opportunities, not only to cater for the expanding population but also to incorporate the existing surplus peoples.

The implications for neo-colonialism

Within the context of the existing economic system the implications of these three major demands are: first, the need for rapid economic growth and thus capital accumulation, and, second, the need to increase government expenditure and cope with the cost of rapid urbanisation and the provision of social income in education, health and welfare services. Whilst there may be some scope for redistributing within current government expenditure, for example, away from defence towards education, considerable increases in tax revenue will be necessary, with all that that entails for the various tax bases that exist and the incidence of various tax types.

If the economy on independence has much the same system as now then two major problems arise. First, given the trend of the aggregate capital-labour ratio of the past few years, to create sufficient new formal employment job opportunities and to replace depreciated capital will require an aggregate savings ratio of at least 30 per cent of GDP; to absorb all school leavers would require approaching 40 per cent. Though these figures may fall as the distribution of income and thus expenditure moves in favour of more basic goods, there will be pressure for the government to seek foreign assistance to achieve this savings target. Such pressure will be increased by the need to rebuild those sections of the economy damaged in the struggle for independence. And it is worth remembering here that there is the view that Zimbabwe's transition to independence stemmed as much from economic pressures in which the ageing of capital stock played an important role, as from military pressure. Remember, too, that much of the promised post-independence reconstruction aid to Zimbabwe has never been made available, in part due to Zimbabwe's independent stance in international affairs. Finally, and again drawing on Zimbabwe's post-independence experience, there is a danger that the country could become over-borrowed and that the conditions attached for example to World Bank loans may be inimical to the growth of the industrial sector.

Second, the present tax base is very narrow. Present South African income tax rates are very low and based on a narrow section of income earners. The raising of income tax rates may have disincentive effects for high income earners when in the transition period itself their skills and experience will be necessary until such skills can be transferred to the wider body of the people. Indirect taxes, if broadly based, would strike at the very people in need of help; indirect taxes on luxury goods may reinforce the disincentive effects outlined above and depress investment and employment in those sectors of the economy. This may be no bad thing as the consumption patterns of high income South Africans reflect those of high-income mixed economies. Such a demonstration effect serves only to distort the composition of demand and to encourage the use of inappropriate technologies in the pattern of production.

Lurking in here too is the role of the IMF. If government spending runs out of control, ie expenditure exceeds taxation by an excessive margin, the government will be forced to borrow locally or overseas, or to print money. Crowding out, inflation and balance-of-payments crises are all possible outcomes, and their correction is generally painful, not least because IMF conditions for help are characterised by recommendations to return to market forces, the removal of subsidies and reductions in government spending.

There may be appropriate solutions based on a mix of the above policies. The core of the problem is income distribution and the resulting composition of demand, which together with factor prices dominates the production technology, in turn affecting employment and so on. A judicious mix of indirect taxes, appropriate interest rates and wage policies could be used to shift the balance of demand away from high technology goods to a lower key and more broadly based pattern of demand and the lower capital/labour ratios such production might imply. At the same time informal sector employment has to be encouraged if only as a short run stop-gap measure.

The conflicts inherent in this type of policy are manifest. Will skilled whites stay in a South Africa where their standard of living at best remains static and where the initial effect of transition is likely to reduce the quality of state education and health care provision? And how important are high-technology industries to future growth? Will appropriate technologies be available from other developing countries as India or China? The experience of the non-socialist NICs suggests a manufacturing export-led growth strategy is possible under in circumstances, though one of the conditions may be a large inflow of capital, either in the form of grant aid (as for South and Taiwan) or through considerable foreign private capital tration (as in Brazil). The problem here is that to compete in the market for many manufactures requires state of the art ology. Such technology is overwhelmingly developed in the OECD of countries and reflects their factor mix, one not necessarily ppropriate to the factor availability in South Africa. Not only that, but s to such technology either means inward investment by TNCs or ment to conditions about use and trade that reduce the value of technology to the recipient.

possibility of a radical alternative

e constraints that are inseparable from any neocolonial policy will inevitably prevent majority aspirations in the three areas discussed being met. The bind that open capitalist economies are in is that is a straight contradiction between the need to compete on national markets (including the market for skills) and employment e mass of the population. Where half or more of the wage and y bill is the cost of skilled labour and professionals at near national rates, the benefits of even the cheapest unskilled labour to alists is marginal. The outcome is that unless all employment costs e kept down (as in South Korea and Taiwan in the 1960s), the mass e population becomes excluded from the job market permanently. h Africa's racial domination allows the ruling race to find this ome acceptable, but after liberation, a capitalist South Africa d find itself in a similar dilemma to Zimbabwe's, in which tenance of the living standards of the elite (white and black) and terests of capital, demand international competitiveness at the cost ployment for the majority.

e solution to this dilemma may only be through socialism (but one ct to the constraints caused by existing white skill domination and tial for sabotage as discussed below). Its components will have to de an at least temporary withdrawal from the world market during tructuring period (ultimately even socialist countries will not wish main isolated from world markets), allowing an approach which in t treats every person on the job market as already in a job, albeit in / cases with extreme low productivity. With such a reorientation of thinking, the productivity of each person becomes central, suggesting the use of capital investment not to 'create' jobs, but to raise the productivity of existing jobs. That is labour, measured by the total number of jobs, has a demand for capital, rather than the number of jobs being determined by capital's demands. In part, the viability of such an approach is clarified by a change in accounting procedures. Most countries cannot simply expatriate guest workers when labour is no longer required, imposing the costs of social security on the countries of origin; South Africa's attempt at this through the 'homelands' policy has clearly failed. Private firms however have a high incentive to 'repatriate' superfluous workers to the charge of the state, and yet the unemployed remain a charge on the country as a whole; this charge rises as education, health, housing and social services become institutionalised. So international competitiveness, bought at the expense of greater unemployment, through the higher productivity of those remaining in work, is in large part an accounting trick, because the country's productivity is not equal to the average of its firms' productivities. Of course in the end it may cost a welfare state only half as much to keep a person unemployed as it would to keep them on full pay where their marginal output was zero, so the benefit is not only to the private employer; but the social cost of an employment-oriented policy is also much less than the private cost to employers, even at the first-order direct level. Zimbabwe's experience in preventing retrenchment in recent years has shown that there are numerous second-order benefits, both through maintenance of demand, but also through the diversification forced on previously unenterprising companies feather-bedded by secure monopolies, which have been obliged to find ways of creating productive employment for workers who have become a fixed cost. This may be seen as a paradigm for the future: when the South African state can no longer 'sack' workers and their dependents by sending them to the 'homelands', and when it is committed in any case to redistribution, it has an economic incentive to help them produce something rather than nothing.

If the resulting labour-intensive economy is not internationally competitive 'because of overmanning', the long-run remedy is clearly the provision of more capital per worker, to raise productivity. The short-run palliatives are either devaluation, which in principle for a country exporting manufactures in a competitive market, can always be continued until the price of the goods becomes competitive. More appropriate in most developing country contexts might be export dies or wage subsidies. Again, planning to counter the external position this would meet through ideologically loaded free market rhetoric, would be important: it should be pointed out that the counting could be recast with a proportion of the workers notionally referred to direct state support equal to the value of the subsidy, making the firm in question competitive by orthodox standards; or alternatively it could be pointed out that a disguised subsidy is received by firms in market economies providing social security for the unemployed out of the common exchequer.

radicalising South Africa with sufficient political will could easily devise a strategy that progressively and irreversibly weakened white economic ownership and control, and foreign influence, at a pace just slow enough to avoid serious sanctions. The existence of an implicit threat or option to move much faster—and if necessary into alliance with the USSR—would be a key factor.

It is not to minimise the potential weight of the constraints that will be faced. It is easy to envisage a West which had refused to stop buying South African gold severely damaging a socialist South Africa by such means. Most other trade would be much less vulnerable. Sabotage, capital flight by capital and skilled whites could also be disastrous as the ambiguous showed. But most whites will find it hard if not impossible to leave and would be highly susceptible to a strategy which in effect exceeded their expectations but still left them with a lot more to lose if it failed to cooperate.

Here we may begin to pick out some key requirements for a successful radical strategy. Given the necessary condition of a high level of political will on a base of popular support, technical planning for land reform, socialisation of production under workers' self-management, national planning of trade and investment to meet popular needs, and so on, could proceed, but only if coupled with equally careful planning to flank the internal and external opposition or sabotage that would be inevitable. The essence of this planning would have to be to induce entrenched interests to cut their losses. As should be obvious, but is demonstrated well by the Zimbabwean case, a relatively poor country cannot sustain developed world per caput incomes and wealth concentration for a minority without extreme exploitation of the majority, and even successful capitalist development requires redistribution. An approach which always threatens redistribution without actually doing much about it (as in Zimbabwe) seems to get the worst of both worlds: the bourgeoisie and their international supporters think that they are suffering but the poor feel no benefit and become demoralised. On the other hand a confiscatory policy would produce immediate non-cooperation and sabotage.

If, on the contrary, the policy were spelt out in such a way as to emphasise the benefits that would be left to the elite in a context of radical redistribution, those amongst the skilled whites with few prospects elsewhere (probably the majority) would choose not to lose everything. With the resulting freedom to manoeuvre, the state could then keep the option to marginally relax the impact of the policies on cooperating whites, psychologically a better way of reforming them than having undefined threats hanging over their heads, always feared, and sapping initiative. In more precise terms, white (and other high-paid) workers might be told that although (as in China after the revolution) the rate for the job was being greatly reduced to levels consistent with the country's wealth, this would not apply (or else only to a reduced degree) for present incumbents.

Owners of capital would need different treatment: they could be formally expropriated, but then paid in government bonds redeemable according to a strict timetable, and under conditions related to how cooperative owners are during a transition period in aiding planning for a reorientation of investment; owners of small businesses, farms etc, might become de facto managers of their former businesses.

It can be argued that, in a decision-making sense, a post-apartheid South Africa will be able to take such decisions. Given the current and continuing rate of withdrawal of foreign companies and capital, much of the power to make decisions is passing to domestic capital and managers, so that an independent government is likely to face more pressures from its own capitalists than from those outside. This circumstance, in conjunction with the present role of a broadly defined public sector, would mean that South Africa's dependency would lie primarily in the structure of her foreign trade and not in decisions made outside the country about TNC operations within it. The issue then to be faced is how to increase the importance of industrial goods in trade outside Africa itself. Her regional position dictates that South Africa may be able to maintain her existing competitive position within southern Africa.

In general and given the assumptions made about the transition of South Africa to majority rule, she will have achieved many of the necessary conditions to avoid neocolonial domination. However these achievements although necessary will not be sufficient; sufficiency lies in political will.

Towards a democratic economy in South Africa

Over the past few years the South African economy has variously been described as being in recession, in the worst depression since 1932 and in crisis. While all these descriptions broadly reflect the fact that the economy has experienced a negative real growth rate since 1982,¹ it is important for analytical reasons to clarify precisely the nature of the current malaise.

In this article we distinguish between an economic recession, which we define as a short-term process lasting approximately a year or two, and an economic crisis, which is a longer term phenomenon lasting as much as twenty-five years. However, the distinction between recession and crisis is not simply one of duration, but refers more fundamentally to the distinction between a relatively minor cyclical downswing and a more serious, and therefore longer term, disruption to accumulation. While the former problem may be redressed by fiscal and monetary tinkering which leaves the existing system more or less unchanged, the latter requires a major restructuring of the accumulation process, in its social and political as well as economic forms, before accumulation can advance rapidly again.²

Our argument is that the South African economy is currently experiencing both these phenomena: that is, it is undergoing a short-term recession, but is also trapped in a long-term decline.³ While certain of the economic measures carried out by the South African authorities since 1984 seem to be having some success in starting to lift the economy out of recession, the longer term crisis remains essentially intact. Empirical confirmation for this lies in the fact that, despite the economy having recently experienced its ~~worst~~ recession since 1932, inflation remains high (at around 20 per cent), the surplus on the balance of payments is too small to sustain a significant upswing unemployment continues to rise to new highs, business confidence remains at an all-time low and real fixed investment continues to decline.⁴ Thus, while the economy may well experience a slight upturn over the next year or two, this will not be strong enough to break the crisis.⁵

¹ Since 1980 South Africa's GDP grew in real terms as follows: 1980 7.8 per cent; 1981 5.1 per cent; 1982 -0.9 per cent; 1983 -3.3 per cent; 1984 -4.7 per cent; 1985 -1.1 per cent.

² See Ernest Mandel, Late Capitalism, London: New Left Books, 1975.

³ See Stephen Gelb and Duncan Innes, 'Economic crisis in South Africa: monetarism's double-bind', Work in Progress (36) 1985.

How, then, can the crisis be broken? It is our contention that in order for the present South African state to pull the economy out of the crisis the state would need to extricate itself from the double-bind in which it is trapped. A sustained economic upswing can only be secured through a restructuring of social relations which would create favourable conditions for economic growth; but in order for such a restructuring to have any chance of success, a vibrant and expanding economy is needed. This is because no political solution can be achieved in South Africa unless the fundamental issues of mass poverty and huge disparities in wealth and income are addressed. Any attempt to resolve the crisis without addressing these issues must of necessity rely on direct repression, but here again a vibrant economy is necessary to finance such repression.⁶ It is precisely the government's failure to extricate itself from this vicious circle which lies behind its inept attempts to create a black middle class through reform on the one hand and, on the other, its increasingly desperate and vicious responses to township opposition, trade union militancy and foreign pressure.

Yet it is important not to be swept along by current events and not to assume that because the government, and for that matter the state, is in crisis, it is about to collapse. Although a number of townships are now ungovernable and resistance continues to spread, this situation appears to be leading to a stalemate with the state rather than to its imminent collapse. As yet the alternative to apartheid state policy remains at a very general level and there is surprisingly little debate around the issue of concrete alternative proposals.

⁴ Recent research estimates black unemployment to be running at 3-5 million. In some cities, such as Port Elizabeth, unemployment is over 50 per cent of the economically active population in the area. Since 1982 real fixed investment has fallen by over 20 per cent. In manufacturing, the largest sector of production, real fixed investment has fallen by 50 per cent since 1980. (The figures refer to new investment only.)

⁵ Short-term upswings may continue to occur during a long-term crisis just as short-term recessions occur during longer term growth phases. Preliminary indications are that the South African economy remained stagnant during 1986, while projections for 1987 suggest a modest real growth rate of 2-3 per cent. As foreign sanctions begin to take hold and even intensify it is possible that this increase may not be achieved.

⁶ See Gelb and Innes, Economic Crisis . . . for details.

Nowhere is this more obvious than in the sphere of economic policy. Despite the fact that South Africa is currently experiencing an economic crisis, no coherent alternative to government policy is being developed. Certainly, there is no shortage of criticism but, as we intend to show, such criticism in the main does not radically depart from the premises of the government's own standpoint.

Current alternatives and their 'solutions'

Egged on by private sector business leaders and like-minded economists, the English-language press is constantly lambasting the government's handling—or, as they see it, mishandling—of the economy. But these attacks invariably confine themselves to the government's approach to stabilisation: issues such as too much government spending (a favourite theme), too much taxation and too much intervention hold the headlines and dominate the debate.

Some economists have sought to go beyond this superficial reading of the problem. Jill Nattrass and Charles Simkins have attempted to probe below surface appearances to reveal underlying structural trends. Rejecting the hollow arguments that see high unemployment levels among blacks as a temporary response to the recession, these writers have all sought structural causes for the phenomenon. Nattrass, for example, has suggested four causes of the high level of black unemployment: high population growth rates; a slowing down of economic growth; an increasing tendency towards economic concentration; and the use of more capital-intensive production methods. While we would agree that these factors do play a part in creating unemployment, Nattrass herself fails to see the link between these phenomena and the capitalist relations which form the material foundations of South African society. For Nattrass the only conflicts which arise in the economy occur around the distribution of resources. Thus she states that:

Finally, it is also essential that the union movement continues to grow, as this will provide both the workforce and employers with a platform on which to negotiate the differences that are bound to arise⁷ as the power of the black workforce increases. The National Manpower Commission estimated that in 1981 only 9 per cent of the African workforce were members of trade unions. As an essential element in a healthy economy is a smoothly operating labour relations system, it is important that this percentage increases.⁷

⁷ J Nattrass, 'Black economic power grew in past decade . . . but recession is eroding gains', Indicator South Africa, January 1983, p 16.

Here a 'healthy economy' is one which has an institutional mechanism for smoothing over the conflicts that arise between capital and labour around the distribution of resources. The contradictions inherent in capitalist production relations are ignored and instead such relations appear as basically 'healthy'.

In this model unemployment is seen as a response to a particular form of capitalist industrialisation (for example, one which is too capital-intensive). All that has to be done to erase this unpleasant friction is simply to embark upon a different—for instance, more labour-intensive—form of capitalist industrialisation. As Nattrass puts it: '... the South African economy must continue to grow and to do so in a manner that will generate the jobs necessary to prevent rapid increases in black unemployment levels ...'⁸

Certainly, unemployment is in part a consequence of a trend towards capital-intensity, but at a more fundamental level unemployment is also a crucial condition of the very process of accumulation itself under capitalism. The creation of an army of unemployed, sometimes referred to as the industrial reserve army, plays a key role in disciplining those in employment: for example, in preventing their wages from rising too rapidly, inhibiting their use of strikes as a weapon and controlling them on the shop floor. The effect of this, of course, is to promote production in the interests of capital. Thus unemployment is not simply a product of a particular form of capitalist accumulation; it is a sine qua non of advanced capitalist accumulation in general.⁹

By missing this point economists like Nattrass fail to understand the key role which the unemployed are being forced to play in the current process of restructuring in this country. The restructuring which is necessary to generate sustained economic growth in South Africa involves creating a permanent industrial reserve army to carry out the disciplining functions mentioned above. It is thus difficult to see how proposals for more labour-intensity in industry can be reconciled with Nattrass's proposition that economic reform must be 'built squarely upon the existing capitalist structures of production.'¹⁰

Other economists working from within a similar paradigm have also sought to resolve some of the 'injustices' in South Africa's economic structure. For instance, Simkins et al. put forward detailed proposals for a redistribution of income and fiscal spending which is to be achieved largely through increased taxation on the rich and greater public spending on education, health services, social welfare and housing for blacks.¹¹ Such demands, if enacted, are presented as opening up the possibility of 'rapid progress . . . in the direction of justice and development.'¹² As in Natrass's argument, this presentation sees conflict and inequalities as lying in the area of the distribution of resources and not in the realm of capitalist production relations. These latter are assumed to be not only 'healthy' but presumably 'just' as well.

⁸ ibid., p 16.

⁹ See M Legassick and H Wolpe, 'The bantustans and capital accumulation in South Africa', Review of African Political Economy (7) 1976.

¹⁰ J Nattrass, The South African Economy: its Growth and Change, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1982, p 304.

Thus what the above arguments are suggesting is that South Africa's capitalist economy should be reformed in the direction of the 'distribution of economic power on a more equitable basis', towards what Natrass calls 'the creation of some type of social democracy.'¹³ It is thus in part a form of 'welfare capitalism' which is being propounded. We say 'in part' since the argument is not confined to the economic level, but also involves for Simkins et al. a 'political commitment' to justice and development¹⁴ and for Natrass 'the decentralisation of political power into mutually non-dominating sectors.'¹⁵ In other words, the movement is towards a democratic form of welfare capitalism. Laudable though such an aim may be, the fact that these analyses commence from an incorrect understanding of the location and cause of the problems they address means that the 'solutions' they propound can only be partial and temporary—which in the end means they are not solutions at all.

The government, on the other hand, has recognised the inadequacy of this position, as well as that of the stabilisation critics. The government clearly understands the need to confront the issue of class power directly, or, to put it crudely, to limit the power of the working class. Hence, the government does not seek, as in social democracy, a compromise between classes, but rather it seeks a fundamental reallocation of power between classes. In doing this the South African government is moving in a similar direction to that of the US and British governments. However, unlike South Africa, serious attempts are being

¹¹ See, for instance, C Simkins, D Hendrie, I Afedian and P le Roux, 'Justice, Development and the National Budget', Second Carnegie Inquiry into Poverty and Development in South Africa, Post-Conference Series No 6, 1985.

¹² ibid., pp 17–18.

¹³ Natrass, The South African Economy . . . , p 304.

¹⁴ Simkins, et al., 'Justice . . .', p 18.

¹⁵ Natrass, The South African Economy . . . , p 304.

made by radical intellectuals in these other countries to begin both to challenge monetarist orthodoxies and to propose alternatives which seek to reallocate power towards the side of the working class and popular forces.¹⁶

What is enlightening about these attempts from a South African point of view is that they begin from a similar standpoint to that in which we presently find ourselves: that is, in a monetarist-induced recession within the context of a longer term downswing. While these alternatives are not intended as blueprints for a socialist economic policy nor even strategies 'that will . . . create a socialist society',¹⁷ neither do they seek to salvage capitalism from the ravages of its own internal contradictions, as does for example Keynesian theory. Instead, they offer 'a more radical programme than that offered by Social Democracy': that is, a programme which 'seeks not to work within the constraints imposed by the logic of the capitalist economy but to transform those constraints'.¹⁸ This they aim to do by anticipating, challenging and progressively dismantling those constraints and substituting new forms of control, especially 'in the form of greater working class control over production'.¹⁹

It would of course be foolish to assume that proposed democratic solutions formulated for the USA and Britain can be crudely imposed on South Africa. There are such vast disparities of a political, economic and social kind between the countries in question that such an undertaking would be meaningless. At the same time it is becoming increasingly clear that, within South Africa, the majority of both the working class and the poor have no commitment to ruling class ideology in its entirety and in fact are consistently calling for alternatives. For instance, a recent nationwide survey of urban-based black South Africans found that 77 per cent favoured 'the socialist vision . . . on the economic future of the country,' compared with only 22 per cent who favoured the capitalist vision.²⁰ Thus while it may be true that there is ¹⁶ Two important works to have emerged over the last few years are CSE London Working Group, The Alternative Economic Strategy: a Labour Movement Response to the Economic Crisis, CSE Books and the Labour Coordinating Committee, 1980 and S Bowles, D Gordon and T Weisskopf, Beyond the Wasteland: A Democratic Alternative to Economic Decline, New York: Anchor Press/Doubleday, 1983.

¹⁷ CSE Group, p 7.

¹⁸ CSE Group, p 4.

¹⁹ CSE Group, pp 4 and 7.

²⁰ Mark Orkin, Disinvestment: The Struggle and the Future, Johannesburg: Ravan Press, 1986, p 52.

not much clarity on precisely what form the alternative economy should take the fact remains that the majority of South Africans are calling for an alternative.

We would argue that the emphasis placed in the American and European debates on the broad notion of a democratic economy has much relevance to South Africa. Not only has the question of democracy assumed centre-stage in South Africa, but demands which are currently emanating from within the ranks of the oppressed, especially among the working class, point to the need for a far more radical approach to the issue of the post-apartheid economy than is to be found in the standard theoretical literature. For this reason we believe that debates analogous to those occurring in Europe and the USA need to be raised inside South Africa as well, though obviously the form and content would be very different.

Some possible objections

As in any situation in which an attempt is made to shift the terrain of debate within the workers' movement, there will obviously be differences of opinion, some of which will be held with deep conviction. Such differences should not be swept under the carpet but need to be aired openly and systematically worked through. Unless the workers' movement in general is clear both that it wants to embark in a particular direction and also precisely why it is doing so, there is little point in undertaking any new project.

It is common knowledge that the workers' movement in South Africa has had, and continues to have, differences over a range of issues. Some of these have been largely worked through, such as the differences over whether or not formal unions should be established, whether these should be industrial or general unions, whether unions should register under the Industrial Relations Act and whether unions should participate in Industrial Councils. However, as these differences were resolved, so new issues came to the fore, such as questions of how to link shop floor struggles to community problems and of how the trade union movement should respond to popular political organisations. The fact that it took almost five years of talks before a new federation of trade unions could be formed points to the problems such differences pose for the movement. On the other hand, the fact that a new federation combining many of the unions which participated in these talks was eventually formed points to the capacity inherent in the workers' movement to overcome differences within it.

By throwing up new issues for debate we have no wish to add to existing problems in the movement, nor to create new differences. However, perhaps it is worth emphasising that the workers' movement can simply not avoid tackling new and contentious issues. The progress of the workers' struggle means by definition that new issues constantly present themselves for debate and resolution. Our argument, then, is that it is the current recession and crisis in South Africa which is confronting the workers' movement directly with the question of how it should respond. If that movement is to advance this question can not be avoided. We hope through this paper to assist in the process of developing that response. As an initial step it is perhaps necessary to take up the question of looking at possible objections to the particular form of response we are arguing for here: that is seeking to develop an alternative economic strategy. These objections may be broadly classified into three groups which we will examine in turn.

The first objection relates to the issue of how the workers' movement perceives its role at present and is therefore largely a strategic objection. The argument here is that the role of the workers' movement is to constantly criticise and attack government and employers' policies but not to develop a coherent alternative to such policies. In other words, such critiques should be ad hoc, attacking this or that aspect of policy, rather than developing a coherent theoretical alternative which can be counterposed to existing policies. According to this argument, to pose such an alternative is not the task of the worker's movements in opposition. Furthermore, it carries with it certain dangers that need to be avoided. First, that in posing an alternative the workers' movement runs the risk of being incorporated by the state which will attempt to draw workers into the realm of policy formulation. Secondly, and in a sense alternatively, the state and private economists will attack the workers' alternative, thus putting the workers' on the defensive and diverting the debate away from state policies. Furthermore, as worker leaders and sympathetic intellectuals get pulled into increasingly complex debates around these issues, so they will become more and more divorced from the masses who will regard the debates as increasingly irrelevant.

These arguments do spell out some real dangers that exist for the course we are suggesting. There should be no doubt that the danger of incorporation is there, just as it exists in other realms of workers' struggle, such as agreeing to register or work within Industrial Councils or even enter into negotiations with management. But to argue that there are risks involved in a strategy is not sufficient reason that it should not be undertaken. Similarly, it is true that the workers' alternative may well come under attack, but such an attack need not necessarily divert attention away from state policies nor lead to workers' disillusionment. The question here is one of working out the appropriate tactics, an issue to which we will return in looking at the third objection.

At a more general level our response to this argument would be to point out that the workers' and popular movement in South Africa has already raised the issue of alternatives.²¹ So it is already on the agenda and not to follow it through and assist in its development means in effect that one is constraining the progress of the movement. Before one embarks upon such a hazardous constraint one needs to be absolutely sure of one's position, for one runs the clear risk of alienating oneself from the masses. As we have said, we are not yet convinced by the arguments. Furthermore, we need to understand why the workers' and popular movement has placed the issue on the agenda. It is because they recognise, especially at a time of falling standards of living and increasing immiseration, the dangers these pose for political and trade union organisation. Without economic growth the oppressed are forced onto the defensive, seeking to salvage what they can. What is needed is a campaign to ensure that economic growth occurs, but on terms which are more favourable to the workers and the poor.

Of course such a campaign will find itself under attack from capital and the state, who will seek both to repress it politically and discredit it ideologically. But such struggles cannot be avoided. In fact, we would argue there is an urgent necessity to oppose capital in the ideological arena of broad solutions to the crisis, for unless one does so, one concedes an important area of struggle. The problem with allowing capitalist ideology to rule unchallenged by any coherent alternative is that the dominant ideology becomes internalised in individual consciousness as 'common sense'. The danger is that it may become 'common sense' for workers and the poor to accept that in a time of recession 'we' all need to tighten our belts and that retrenchments are 'necessary'. In order to challenge capitalist 'common sense' successfully workers need to develop their own coherent ideology which can win acceptance at the level of 'common sense'. This alternative will then feed into national and local struggles around political issues as well as into union negotiations.

²¹ As just one example, see the Orkin survey mentioned above. See also recent calls by some black unions to construct a workers' programme to build a new South Africa.

The kind of ideological coherence to which we refer cannot come simply from ad hoc critiques nor even from looking solely at the causes of the crisis. Identifying the causes and form of the crisis as well as criticising the state's response to it is not sufficient to develop a coherent and substantial alternative (though it is of course a part of the process). To create such an alternative is an entirely different intellectual exercise.

A second objection which is sometimes raised to the exercise we are undertaking relates to the question of state power. Essentially, this argument is that since the state plays such a key role in capitalist society all energies must be devoted to the question of winning state power and that there is therefore simply no point in raising the issue of alternative economic strategies until this has been achieved. Such objections amount to saying that we are putting the cart before the horse. Again we take such criticisms seriously and agree that the question of state power is crucial and cannot be ignored. However, the winning of state power is but one moment in a broad and ongoing process of social transformation and we would resist any attempt to artificially delimit that process into phases: first the political phase; then the economic. On the contrary, we would argue that the question of developing an alternative economic strategy is crucial to political mobilisation at this point in time. Furthermore, it should be remembered that we are not proposing that a blueprint for an alternative economy be created, but only that a debate be commenced. We are aware that, as the struggle develops, so needs and problems will change and new issues emerge. But this is not an argument for putting off the point at which the debate commences. Such changes as emerge can easily be incorporated into the ongoing discussions.

Another aspect of this argument which it is important to consider is that, as any social movement develops, so it inevitably raises demands and sketches out broad goals, often of an economic, as well as political and social, kind. Around these demands and goals people are mobilised and expectations created. The problem is that some of these goals may not be realistic or, at any rate, not achievable in the near future. There may also be conflicts between goals and potential conflicts between social groups around certain demands. This can occur even within a class, such as the working class, where there is a potential conflict between the producers and consumers of a product or service in that the former may want to raise its price in order to cover a wage increase while the latter may want its price reduced.

Debates around these issues need to be commenced as soon as possible so that the feasibility and coherence of demands and goals can be carefully scrutinised. Are they realistic and, if so, in what time frame? What potential conflicts exist between goals and which are the priorities? And where conflicts remain, how can these be institutionalised and regulated? It is only by commencing such debates now that we can hope to avoid the dangers of unrealistic expectations being created and of the political problems which arise when they are not fulfilled. The example of Allende's Chile, where the governing coalition's support was fatally fractured, expresses the dangers that exist if such groundwork has not been done.

One final objection that needs to be dealt with relates to the issue of how one goes about constructing an alternative strategy. The argument here is that any attempt by university-based intellectuals to construct a theory of this kind means that such a theory does not originate among the masses. It therefore has to be conveyed to the masses and injected into their organisations. Here, then, is a clear danger that such intellectuals are actually guilty of elitism in that they are attempting to impose their ideas on the masses. The only way to avoid this charge, so the argument goes, is to wait until the workers' and popular movements themselves construct such a theory.

Clearly, there is a potential hazard here and there is certainly no shortage of examples, particularly from the capitalist centres, of the occurrence of practices similar to those described above. However, it would seem to us that there is a problem in the formulation of the objection: namely, that it displays a workerist tendency which undervalues the role of intellectuals. Certainly, the broad mass of the workers' movement is composed of workers, but it is wrong to assume that intellectuals have no place in a workers' movement. On the contrary, certain tasks which face that movement, especially those relating to education and theorisation, cannot be carried out by workers alone, particularly in the early phase of the struggle when their lack of education is most sorely felt. In these spheres sympathetic intellectuals have an important role to play. The issue, then, is not one of arguing that intellectuals have no role to play in such a movement but rather, given that they do have a role to play, how do the workers control them in the exercise of that role? We would argue broadly, that such control can only be secured if intellectuals are submitted to the democratic control of those in the organisations in which they are involved.

At this point a number of problems immediately suggest themselves. First, it is of course possible to envisage this in the case of intellectuals, regardless of colour, who are actually employed in a worker organisation. It is relatively straightforward to subordinate this group to formal democratic control, though we would argue it is far more difficult to subordinate them to actual democratic control. But in the case of sympathetic intellectuals employed outside the worker organisation the situation is not so straightforward. Because they are not formally part of the organisation they cannot be subordinated to the same form of organisational discipline, but this hardly means that they are free to do as they wish. On the contrary, the organisation presumably only calls on their services if and when it needs them. In this sense, they too are subordinated to the democratic control of those in the organisation who are free to dispense with their services and/or replace them whenever they choose. The criterion for the retention of their services then becomes the extent to which the organisation values their contribution.

It is precisely this criterion which must be applied in assessing intellectuals' contributions to the construction of an alternative economic strategy. If such an alternative is constructed from the actual demands of the workers and circulated through their organisations, it is they who will finally decide on its value to their struggle. By testing it in debate themselves and, most important, by applying it actively in their day-to-day struggles workers will come to know whether or not it is useful to them or to what extent it needs to be modified or strengthened. In other words, it is the workers themselves through their organisations, who will decide on whether or not to make the strategy theirs.

We intend in the rest of this article to begin to construct a broad framework for an alternative economic strategy in South Africa. It should be said at the outset that our aim is essentially to initiate a debate around the issues we raise and that we are not proposing a blueprint for such an alternative. Partly because there has been no serious attempt to do this up until now there is a marked scarcity of empirical material to draw on, and therefore of necessity much of what we have to say will be quite abstract and theoretical. One of the benefits which we hope will flow from the commencement of a debate around these issues should be the initiation of research into some of the areas specified in this article.

Hopefully, such research could be carried out with the active participation of those in the labour and popular movements.

We shall begin by examining the Freedom Charter, a manifesto with wide support in South Africa which has emerged from the struggle, to see whether a basis exists here for an alternative democratic economic programme. Although the intention behind constructing the Freedom Charter was not simply to focus on economic issues, but rather to present a broader manifesto for a democratic society, nonetheless sections of the Charter do refer specifically to economic policy. Thus the germ of a democratic economic programme is to be found here. By focusing on this aspect of the Charter we are, of course, interpreting it in a particular way. We would argue that not only is such interpretation inevitable, but it is also desirable. The Freedom Charter is constructed in terms of general principles and therefore requires interpretation and elaboration. There are, of course, a number of directions in which such interpretation may lead and in this article we identify three broad possibilities. We then seek to examine these possibilities in terms of our stated requirements for what we term a democratic economy and to elaborate the approach which, in our view, best meets these requirements.

The structure of a democratic economy

In this section, we attempt to draw out a broad economic framework which would satisfy the demands raised in the Freedom Charter. It is worth emphasising that the very general terms in which the demands are framed means that they are potentially compatible with more than one combination of socio-economic structures and institutions. What we present here is our interpretation of a structure that we feel would be sufficient to fulfil these demands. There are, of course, other interpretations of the demands suggesting structures different from ours. We briefly examine two of these in the course of our discussion—social democracy and state socialism—arguing that ultimately neither is capable of meeting the demands. Further, we examine here only the structure itself of a democratic economy, leaving the all-important issue of transition—‘how do we get there from here’—to another occasion.

In the first part of this section, we discuss social relations in ‘the economy' as suggested by the Charter.²² The demands, we suggest, emphasise above all that these relations must be democratic in both the determination of objectives, and in the process of regulation, or directing the economy towards these objectives at the same time as reproducing its basic social relations. The meaning of the term 'democracy' will become clearer as we elaborate our argument.

Secondly, we look at the productive structure of the economy, its material organisation. Here the Charter suggests, perhaps not surprisingly, a bias towards the production of 'basic' goods and services, rather than production of investment goods. In other words, the bias is toward current consumption, rather than accumulation and growth in the present, with consumption postponed to an (unspecified) future date.²³ The implications of such a bias for income distribution, growth and other issues will be spelled out in the second part of this section.

The various demands in the Freedom Charter can be grouped into four sets: The first concerns security of employment with adequate wages. Included here are not only the right to a job, and a minimum wage at an appropriate level, but also demands for a 40-hour week, unemployment benefits, and paid leave, including maternity leave. The second set of demands is for the increased (and affordable) provision of basic goods and services, most importantly food and clothing, housing, transport and social services.

While the above all relate to the standard of living, the other two sets of demands relate more directly to social relations. They focus on full democratic rights, including 'democratic organs of self-government' (clause 1). The final set of demands is contained in clauses 3 and 4 of the Freedom Charter, which demand socialisation ('transferred to the ownership of the people') of the mines, financial institutions and monopoly industry, controls over other productive and distributive activities, and the redistribution of land amongst the agricultural proletariat and peasantry.

Stated in the above fashion, these demands might seem to be ²² The concept of 'the economy' is a problematic one, since it carries the connotation that it is a separable social region, which contains no political processes. One of the major assumptions implicit in our approach is that politics are part and parcel of economic activity, so that politics and economics cannot be completely separated. However, we use the term 'the economy' to indicate that we are concerned with non-economic issues only to the extent they impinge on economic ones.

²³ For a discussion of 'accumulation bias' in Eastern European Socialist economies, see D M Nuti, 'The contradictions of socialist economies: a Marxian interpretation', Socialist Register 1979, London.

somewhat utopian. It is important, for this reason, to underline their relevance to the black working class today as they find themselves under attack from the economic crisis as well as from state policies in response to the crisis. It hardly needs repeating that the primary factors underpinning current high levels of militancy in the townships and at the workplace are a combination of, on the one hand, unemployment and the rising cost of living (leading to falling living standards) and, on the other, continued exclusion of black people from political representation at all levels of society.

Therefore the elaboration of a democratic economic structure able to fulfil these demands is not a process of abstract speculation about a distant future. Rather, these demands are immediately linked to the concrete actions and immediate concerns of the working class and others at the present time. Fulfilling these demands is arguably the most appropriate route to resolving the present long-term crisis. Certainly it is not the only route: the state appears to have chosen an alternative approach of physically suppressing these demands.

Repression is, of course, the flip side of ruling class attempts to implement its own policy of restructuring a wide range of institutions and structures which have characterised South African capitalism for decades. Although 'restructuring' can be understood in a number of different ways, from a political-economic perspective it is useful to examine it as the attempt to develop a new 'social structure of accumulation' (SSA) for South African capitalism. The SSA 'consists of all the institutions [and practices] which impinge upon the accumulation process.'²⁴ They serve the function of regulating economic processes. Within and through these institutions and practices, capitalist social relations can be reproduced over time, because social conflict of all types is regulated and channelled within their determined bounds. For a high rate of accumulation and economic growth to be achieved in the long-run, the various institutions of the SSA should be functioning smoothly, both individually and as a coherent group. In such a situation accumulation would be greatly facilitated, since capitalists' confidence is boosted and uncertainty about the future reduced. The lower rate of growth characteristic of the long-term economic crisis is associated with difficulties in the functioning of some of the SSA's institutional elements, as well as with the collapse of its internal coherence.²⁵

²⁴ G Gordon, R Edwards and M Reich, Segmented Work Divided Workers, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1982, p 23. The concept is discussed more generally here. It has considerable affinity with the concept 'mode of regulation' used by the French regulation school, and originally developed by M Aglietta, A Theory of Capitalist Regulation, London: New Left Books, 1979. It should be noted that while there is a certain purpose in ruling class efforts to develop a new structure of accumulation, the rationale for specific policies and actions cannot be reduced to such an intention. The SSA is an example of a posteriori functionalism, rather than a priori functionalism.

The central feature of the 'apartheid SSA' in South Africa which underpinned the high rate of economic growth from the early 1960s until the mid-1970s, was the tight control over Africans and suppression of their organisations, by means of the institutional structuring of, inter alia, the labour process, the labour market and the sphere of political representation. This cannot be discussed here, but what is important to note is that these institutions were not put in place without a long process of struggle and resistance which affected their original conception by policymakers, and thus the nature of the apartheid SSA as a whole.

Nevertheless, the 'apartheid SSA' functioned well once it was finally in place. But by the late 1970s economic and political realities clearly indicated that the SSA was exhausted, and needed rebuilding. The attempt to develop what can be labelled a 'free market' or monetarist SSA²⁶ is a response to this. The demands being made by trade unions and political organisations, when they take the form of documents concerned with the whole of society (like the Freedom Charter or the 1985 May Day demands), can be seen as demanding an alternative SSA to that which the ruling class is attempting to put in place at the moment. In elaborating these demands, we will in effect be spelling out the SSA which is implicit in them. In taking this theoretical direction, we are of course transforming the concept of the SSA, developed originally to help in understanding the behaviour of individual capitalist firms. As will be seen, the agents whose economic behaviour we are concerned with in the context of what we call a 'democratic SSA' are very different from capitalist firms. However, the concept is both relevant and useful. It is intended primarily to illuminate and systematise the social factors which influence individual behaviour. Since the democratic economy, and society, envisaged in both documents aims to facilitate people acting as ²⁵ The development of the economic crisis should be seen both as being caused, in part, by the degeneration of some of the institutions, and causing in turn the degeneration of others. It should be noted however that there are coherent accounts of economic crisis which have no need of a concept such as the SSA.

²⁶ The notion of a 'free market' SSA might at first seem contradictory. However, 'free' markets are not free, merely regulated in a different way (see note 22).

social beings, the concept is appropriate. In addition, the idea behind the SSA is that the actions of individuals and of groups in conflict do not simply occur in a 'black box' (sometimes labelled class struggle), but are regulated, most of the time, through formal and informal institutions. This is not specific to any particular type of economic system—it is true of all: for a society to get on with its business, social conflict must be somehow contained. Thus the democratic economy also requires regulation, since social conflict will not disappear, but growth and accumulation must continue, if the demands are to be fulfilled. The SSA is a valuable conceptual tool with which to analyse the appropriate form of regulation.

To develop some of the basic principles of the SSA based on our approach to the demands, we will examine briefly the other two possible interpretations identified above, beginning with social democracy, as in the Swedish economy. Despite the public ownership of a fairly wide range of industry in most social democracies,²⁷ as well as the exercise of control over capital by the state, particularly in the labour market, the market remains the dominant principle of regulation. In other words, the institutions of the SSA achieve their effects primarily by the regulating market forces, shaping and defining various markets as the context for the interaction of social groups.

Thus, attempts to guarantee full employment, to take the first set of demands, have involved primarily a 'Keynesian' concern with state intervention on the demand-side of the economy: the public sector expands to fill the gap as private sector demand for labour (but not necessarily its overall growth) shrinks.²⁸ There is little difference in regulation of the labour process itself between the two sectors, an issue which relates to demands for full democratic rights. But even full employment becomes impossible to maintain in the long run via market-dominated regulation, the Swedish experience suggests. As that economy, together with the rest of the capitalist world, moved into crisis in the 1970s the demand for labour by private capital shrank too quickly to be absorbed by the expansion of state economic activity, which was already creating its own problems of inflation and fiscal difficulty.

²⁷ For a useful critical discussion of the nature of Swedish social democracy, see J Pontusson, 'Behind and beyond Social Democracy in Sweden', New Left Review (143) January–February 1984.

²⁸ ibid., p 83

The above argument suggests that an SSA capable of fulfilling the four sets of demands coming out of the Freedom Charter needs to be dominated by institutions which enable regulation to take a social (or public) form, rather than being limited to trying to shape the private, atomised forces of 'the market'. This requires some clarification, since 'the market' is itself a social phenomenon, its existence being premised on the social interaction of private entities.

Regulation must be primarily social, firstly, in order to enable the productive structure and the process of accumulation to be shaped and directed, so as to achieve social objectives, such as employment security or adequate provision of basic goods and services. When regulation is dominated by the market, the accumulation process is instead directed towards the achievement of private objectives, such as profitability, growth in firm size, etc. While the first two sets of demands imply that social regulation is necessary, the other two, and especially those concerned with transformation of the structure of ownership, demand it explicitly. Thus, the Freedom Charter talks of non-monopoly enterprises being 'controlled to assist the well-being of the people'. In addition to demanding social regulation in this way, the Freedom Charter also spells out one of its essential preconditions: social ownership of, and control over, all or most of production. Without this, no attempt to institutionalise control over accumulation can be successful in the long term, since conflict between specific and general objectives would likely be resolved in favour of the former.

One important implication of social ownership of the means of production is the 'fusion' of state politics and production politics.²⁹ Because enterprises are socially-owned, the state, whatever its form, is necessarily present at the point of production, as representative of 'the people as a whole'.³⁰ Thus confrontations of authority in the workplace are also confrontations with the state and can quickly develop into wider challenges to it. This is in contrast to market-dominated regulation, where the atomised structure means that confrontations with management—production politics—are structurally insulated from state politics.³¹ In South Africa, racial oppression is a common feature of both state politics and production politics. Nevertheless, the two arenas of politics are not institutionally fused, as under social regulation. Thus although workers' challenges in production may often lead quickly to challenges to the state, a successful broad-based challenge to the state, involving its transformation, would not necessarily involve the simultaneous transformation of enterprise management.

²⁹ See M Burawoy, The Politics of Production, London: Verso, 1985, pp 157–8.

³⁰ It is only through the state that the entire population could act as owner. A comparison can be made with a cooperative owned by its members, where the state is not necessarily present.

³¹ This insulation of the two political arenas from each other is often elided into a supposed separation of 'politics' from 'the economy'.

The other central feature of social regulation is that the institutions through which it is expressed are those in which economic agents (groups or individuals) act, and interact, socially or publicly, rather than privately, as in market regulation. In other words they are defined within such institutions in their social role (as producers, consumers or whatever), rather than as owners of private property, buying or selling in the market. Although negotiations (and thus a political process) are part of the interaction of such publicly defined agents, the outcomes are not linked to the relative market powers of the participants. This is in contrast to a regulatory institution such as the Industrial Council, which cannot be regarded as part of a system of social regulation, since it in effect merely facilitates the operation of the labour market.

The central institution in a framework of social regulation is inevitably a plan, which unites the two features of this form of regulation discussed above. The planning process incorporates the intentionality inherent in the need to achieve specific objectives through production and accumulation over time, with the public character of economic agents, in both the formulation and execution of the plan.

For an economy able to fulfil the four sets of demands with which we are concerned, on the other hand, it seems that an SSA whose central principle is social regulation is necessary. Examination of one such SSA—that of Eastern European-style 'state socialism'—provides a negative example which sheds useful light on some further basic principles necessary to satisfy all these demands. In state socialism, the political principle of democratic centralism has resulted in a system of economic regulation dominated by a highly centralised planning process. This is enabled by state ownership of wealth, while through planning, the economy's supply-side is controlled. On this basis, long run full employment is made possible, though often only by hiring of excess labour which is in fact underemployed.³² In addition, this form of social regulation allows the productive structure to be adapted, and the social surplus allocated, to those ends the central planners consider appropriate. However, these economies have tended to die 'accumulation bias', invariably choosing investment over consumption when this key planning choice is made. While such a 'socialist' economy in South Africa might conceivably be able to satisfy the first, second and fourth of our sets of demands (relating to employment and wages, basic goods and services and social ownership and control), it founders on the rocks of the third, the demand for full democratic rights. The issues here are twofold.

³² See M Ellman, Socialist Planning, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1979, chapter 6, especially pp 158 ff.

First, the planning process is not achieved through a process which can be regarded as democratic. Rather, it is centralised and hierarchical,³³ despite the existence of 'bargaining' between enterprise managers and planning bureaux. But, in addition, relations in production³⁵ under state socialism are undemocratic: as Burawoy has argued, they can be seen as taking the form of 'bureaucratic despotism', 'because coercion prevails over consent . . . [and] because it [is] constituted by the administrative hierarchy of the state.'³⁶ For both of these reasons, state socialism is unable to fulfil the demands arising out of the documents 'democratic rights'.

Behind this conclusion lies a conception of what constitutes 'democracy': this deserves elaboration. As was noted above, if democracy is based upon social regulation, there is a fusion of politics in production with global politics. For this reason, a particular form of politics, 'democracy', cannot be restricted to one arena; it will be common to all, though perhaps differentially institutionalised. Thus, in state socialist societies, the absence of democracy in production is connected with the absence in the process of economic regulation, and in other aspects of society. As Alec Nove has pointed out; 'The hierarchical structure of the planned non-market economy is paralleled by a similar hierarchical structure of society as a whole.'³⁷

Conversely, political democracy—universal suffrage and accountable representative bodies—can only remain meaningful in a context of social regulation of the economy, if it is complemented by economic democracy. In other words, the institutions and practice.

³³ ibid., chapter 2.

³⁴ Burawoy, The Politics of Production, p 160.

³⁵ For the distinction between relations in production and relations of production, see pp 13–14 and 29. It is elaborated below.

³⁶ Burawoy, The Politics of Production, p 12. See also pp 180 ff.

³⁷ A Nove, The Economics of Feasible Socialism, London: George Allen and Unwin, 19 constitute the SSA (including those that regulate the labour process itself) must be based not simply on mass participation,³⁸ but on the active exercise of power by those whose economic circumstances are affected by the relevant institution. Under social regulation, political democracy without economic democracy would involve the contradictory situation where those formally in control of the state within one sphere of their lives (political representation) are dictated to by it in another sphere (their work).

There are other reasons why meaningful democracy should include not only representation at various levels of the state (local, regional and national), but also power in the workplace and as consumers (especially of basic commodities and social services). First, there is a long tradition going back to Rousseau³⁹ within the political theory of democracy which argues that there is a close link between individuals' attitude towards, and participation in, formally democratic structures of representation, and the authority structures in their workplace. Thus the 'crisis' of liberal democracy, involving widespread apathy towards political participation in many advanced capitalist societies,⁴⁰ may well be linked to the increasingly authoritarian and hierarchical nature of the labour process as capital has tried, in its usual ham-fisted fashion, to raise productivity. Conversely, greater democratic control over work is the most promising route to wider political participation, because of its educative potential. As C B MacPherson has pointed out, shop-floor democracy provides people with experience of participation in that side of their lives—their lives at work—where their concern is greater, or at least more immediately and directly felt, than in any other. They can see at first hand just how far their participation is effective . . . an appetite for participation, based on the very experience of it, may well carry over from the workplace to wider political areas.⁴¹

In South Africa, of course, the reasons for lack of democratic participation have little to do with apathy. But a high degree of ³⁸ 'Participation' is a highly ambiguous concept and it can take a variety of forms. For discussions of participation in capitalist enterprises, see J G Espinosa and A Zimbalist, Economic Democracy: Workers' Participation in Chilean Industry, 1970-1973, New York: Academic Press, 1978, pp 20-4. See also C Pateman, Participation and Democratic Theory, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1970.

³⁹ Pateman, Participation . . . , chapter 2.

⁴⁰ This has led rightwing analysts to argue for the further limitation of democracy. For a critical discussion of this response, see G Hodgson, The Democratic Economy: A New Look at Planning, Markets and Power, Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1984, pp 33 ff.

⁴¹ C B MacPherson, The life and times of liberal democracy, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1977, p 104.

participation would not be automatic, if the society were to be democratised. Both the desire for, and especially the practice of, democratic behaviour would need to be learned by a people deprived of such rights. In this process, democracy in the workplace could play a very practical part.

An additional argument in favour of workplace democracy is its very positive effect on productivity levels. For several reasons productivity increases are absolutely crucial to the growth necessary during the transitional phase. As many elements of capital are once again discovering in the current economic crisis, 'worker participation' (ie incorporation) through schemes like 'quality circles' can be as effective (and often cheaper in the long run) in raising productivity, as more authoritarian approaches to work intensification. But there is substantial empirical evidence showing that more genuine efforts at worker democracy have raised productivity.

In their detailed quantitative study of socialised enterprises in Chile between 1970 and 1973, Espinosa and Zimbalist found that productivity either went up or remained constant in four-fifths of their sample. In 40 per cent of the firms, it rose by over 6 per cent annually. They point out also that the 'positive association between productivity and participation has been found by many authors under widely varying conditions, and no major study has found there to be a negative association between the two.'⁴²

The third additional reason for the extension of democracy goes beyond the workplace, and relates to society generally. Several commentators have pointed to the physical impossibility of a 'total' plan for a large and complex economy producing millions of different goods and services.⁴³ Decentralisation of decisionmaking is thus inevitable, and has occurred in state socialism, though not on a democratic basis.

Democratic decentralisation is an important counter to the 'statism'—the excessive reliance on, and power of, the central state—which is common to state socialism and social democracy. The restoration of power to those affected by its use, and a smaller involvement of the central state in peoples' lives is an important political consideration in South Africa, which has its own form of statism: state controls of a more or less direct nature are the daily experience of most of the population. This has in fact been recognised by the ruling class:

⁴² Espinosa and Zimbalist, Economic Democracy . . . p 185. See also Pateman, Participation . . . chapters 4 and 5.

⁴³ See A Nove, 'The Soviet Economy: problems and prospects', New Left Review (119) 1980

one justification made for their 'free market' strategy is precisely the high government profile in the economy, and the consequent expressed desire to 'depoliticise' it. This is myth-making; no economy can be depoliticised. Nevertheless, the politics that are involved need not be statist: they can be of a very different nature from either the existing statism, or the direction the ruling class is moving in, which is towards increasing the power of the central state. The need for democratisation in this sense is explicitly recognised by the Freedom Charter, in its demand for 'democratic organs of self-government' (Clause 1).

It is worth underlining again that this discussion of economic democracy concerns not only workers, but social agents in other capacities also, as consumers or as citizens, for example. The arguments here are not suggesting that unqualified priority should be given to the location of power in the production process. There are potential conflicts of interest between various social groups, which should not necessarily be resolved in the same direction each time. For example, without some intervention in prices, workers producing a commodity have an opposite interest to its consumers in relation to wage increases, which can then become a price increase. Although a price increase could be avoided through price controls, this reduces the overall social surplus available for accumulation, which may be detrimental to yet other groups in society. Democratic resolution of such difficulties means that the various interests involved need to be weighed up, rather than simply taking one into consideration.

While several arguments have been adduced in favour of 'democracy', little has been said as to how it might actually operate. History is littered with examples of societies, and organisations, where lip service is paid to democracy through formal structures, but power is actually wielded in a highly authoritarian fashion. There can of course be no iron-clad guarantee against any erosion of democratic practice: the best hope lies with the continued interest, and active participation, of the mass of the population, defending against any chipping away at their 'full democratic rights'.

Two features of decentralised democracy can be raised, though, which relate to these concerns. First, direct democracy in so large and complex a society as this one is impossible; the quantity of information required would simply be too large, even more so than in the case of overall planning.⁴⁴ Elected representatives in all institutions and at all levels are thus necessary. However, these representatives must be accountable to those who elected them. This is greatly facilitated by the relatively small distance, in a decentralised system, between representative and represented.

⁴⁴ See C Sirianni, 'Production and power in a classless society: a critical analysis of the utopian dimensions of Marxist theory', Socialist Review (59) 1981.

Secondly, it should hardly need emphasising that democracy necessarily involves space for the organisation and expression of differing ideas and attitudes. The point was made long ago by Rosa Luxemburg, in criticising Lenin:

without general elections, without unrestricted freedom of press and assembly, without a free struggle of opinion, life dies out in every public institution, becomes a mere semblance of life, in which only the bureaucracy remains as the active element.⁴⁵

The role of the state, in her view, was not to eliminate democracy by becoming identified with one grouping; rather, it is to enforce the application of democracy—'freedom in other words for a plurality of parties and tendencies'—within the operation of public life.⁴⁶

In turning now to look in more detail at the institutions which might constitute a 'democratic SSA', both productive enterprises and those with a specifically regulatory function, it should again be emphasised that our discussion is not proposed as a 'blueprint'. It is intended merely to outline, schematically and tentatively, a direction of analysis in response to some of the issues which necessarily arise in any attempt to restructure an economy. This direction of analysis is guided, in broad terms, by the demands we are considering.

When the Freedom Charter was formulated thirty years ago, its demand that the mines, banks and monopoly industry should 'be transferred to the ownership of the people as a whole' applied only to a very small proportion of the corporations in the South African economy. The mining and banking sectors were, of course, highly concentrated, and had been for decades. But industry remained a sector of primarily small-scale establishments owned by individual capitalists: in 1953–54, 92 per cent of industrial enterprises employed no more than forty-nine workers.⁴⁷ The situation today is fundamentally different—not only is privately-owned industry highly concentrated (as is commerce), but a small number of major interconnected corporate empires control industry, mining and the now highly-diversified financial sector.⁴⁸ In addition, there are the massive corporations owned by the state: such as SAIS, ISCOR and ESCOM.

⁴⁵ Quoted in N Poulantzas, State, Power, Socialism, London: Verso, 1980, p 253.

⁴⁶ N Geras (1976), The Legacy of Rosa Luxemburg, London: Verso, 1983, p 188–9. See also pp 172–3, and chapter 4 passim.

⁴⁷ Duncan Innes, Anglo, Johannesburg: Ravan Press, 1984, p. 169.

The demand for social ownership therefore applies now to the overwhelming majority of economic activity in the country. Once transferred to social ownership (a process that will doubtless entail substantial difficulty), there can be no good reason for the various productive units and control structures to remain intact. The decentralisation of power discussed above demands not only that auto manufacturing plants currently owned by the Anglo American Group be entirely independent from Anglo's gold mines, but also that many gold mines be independent from one another as well (to mention a few examples from within the Anglo American Empire). Enterprise boundaries would thus be closely tailored to the actual activity undertaken, as well as to the location of that activity. Thus there is no necessary connection between Tiger Oats Mills in the Orange Free State and another in the Transvaal. On the other hand, there is a useful link between branches of the same bank, or the same supermarkets, in a single town or city.

Thus, in some industries, enterprises could consist of a number of productive units, in various locations, with a single administrative and control structure. Examples of industries where this would be sensible are electrical power, media and communication, transport, finance and, to some degree, distribution of commodities.⁴⁹ In all of these, networks are required to distribute some item, while information needs to be centralised for coordination of the activity.

In other industries, the enterprise could be based on a single productive unit. However, the concept of a 'productive unit' remains somewhat blurred. For example, do enterprises producing cars or washing machines include the production of the components, or does this fall under a separate enterprise from the assembly operation? In practice, of course, it would vary, depending on a number of factors, from the existing situation when the industry was transferred to social ownership, to the decision on investment in the industry made through the planning process. What is important to note here, however, is that there is no need to distinguish between the control structures of different types of enterprise on the basis of size of investment or potential scale economies, as is suggested by some commentators on the issue.⁵⁰ There seems to us to be no good reason why a chemical corporation like AECI with several large, capital-intensive plants should not be divided into several enterprises, one per plant, with some perhaps providing inputs into the production processes of others. The nature of investment in such enterprises does involve substantial costs in a context of uncertainty, as Nove points out. But a coordinated investment process across enterprises and industries, as will be discussed below, would eliminate the need for greater centralisation of control over production, which such uncertainty might otherwise emphasise.

⁴⁸ See Innes, Anglo, chapter 8, and 'Monopoly Capitalism in South Africa', South African Review One, Johannesburg: Ravan Press, 1983, pp 171-83.

⁴⁹ See J Kornai, Anti-equilibrium, North-Holland, 1971, pp 339-41.

The most important issue at stake in relation to the management and control structures of socially-owned enterprises is the division between those decisions which should be under the sole control of the workers in the enterprise (naturally including the administrative workers performing some of the management functions of a privately-owned firm), and those decisions which should be made jointly by the workers, the central and local state planning bodies and also, perhaps, the consumers of the particular product or service.

A useful approximation to an appropriate division is provided by Burawoy's theoretical distinction between relations in production and relations of production.⁵¹ The former refers to the social relations in the productive process itself, involving the organisation and execution of tasks. Relations of production, on the other hand, concern the appropriation and distribution of the surplus. In this context, therefore, they refer to the relations between workers and 'society' (the owners of the means of production, represented inevitably by the state), as well as relations between enterprises.

Using this distinction as a basis, control over relations in production would best lie with the workers in the relevant production process themselves, while control over relations of production should be more broadly based. Factory direction should thus be based on a two-tier structure.⁵² At the first level would be a workers' council, with representatives of different sanctions of the enterprise. This would have control over the division of labour within the enterprise, working conditions, quality control, and the intensity of work. The latter would provide at least partial control over the level of output. The second tier would be an overall administrative council with members of the workers' council, as well as perhaps workers elected directly, together with representatives from central and local state planning bodies. There could also be other members in particular circumstances, for example, representatives from the foreign trade ministry in the case of enterprises producing export commodities, or representatives from civic associations in the case of those making consumer goods.

⁵⁰ This appears to be the basis of Nove's distinction between 'centralised state corporations' and worker-controlled 'socialised enterprises' in A Nove, The Economics of Feasible Socialism. London: George Allen and Unwin, 1983, pp 200-203.

⁵¹ See above, note 29.

⁵² For an example of such a structure, see the outline of the normas basicas in socialised enterprises in Chile between 1970 and 1973, in Espinosa and Zimbalist, Economic Democracy . . . pp 52-3.

The function of this higher council would be, firstly, to negotiate wages and certain other conditions of the wage contract with the union, such as leave, length of working-time, and so on. Issues which are the prerogative of the workers' council could also be included. There are of course demands around these issues in the Freedom Charter, so that there would certainly be a minimum legal requirement. Also, the Charter demands trade union rights, so unions should continue to exist, despite the existence of the workers' council. (Also, though the Charter is silent on the issue of the right to strike, we would argue that this should also exist. The scope of the control to be exercised by the workers' council is somewhat limited, and it would operate within some partially flexible constraints specified by the administrative council (on which it has representatives). Thus there is no guarantee that the workers in an enterprise would feel satisfied that they could achieve their aims and fulfil their interests solely via the enterprise structures. For this reason, independent representation in unions able to act in the interests of workers is an essential feature of the democratic SSA. Their continued existence and activity would reflect the fact that workers' control is not absolute, and could not be (for reasons already outlined). Conflicts of interest would continue to exist, and workers (like community residents and other groups) need organisations independent of the regulatory structures themselves, so that there is some structure over which they do have full control (at least in principle), and which can act on their behalf.

There is a common perception that with both a union able to press for higher wages and worker representation in the managing structures, wages would automatically increase faster than productivity, pushing up costs and squeezing the social surplus. However, quite the opposite is more likely to occur. Precisely because of their role in managing the enterprise and having access to key information, workers are likely to tie their wage demands to the situation of the enterprise (their enterprise), and underrate them when other, less controllable costs are rising or other problems present themselves. Espinosa and Zimbalist (p 185) found that enterprises with a high degree of worker control also had a high rate of investment, indicating that earnings were not simply diverted towards wages. This suggests also that workers did not oppose the introduction of new technologies, since there was security of employment.

To return to the functions of the administrative council, it would also have the task of managing relations with other enterprises, and be the arena in which the state would act in order to direct and shape production and accumulation. In order to discuss these processes further, we need again to distinguish between enterprises according to the nature of product (or service) they produce, but here according to the function of the product in social reproduction.

The essential division here is between producer goods and consumer goods. However, it is necessary to make a further division between 'basic' and non-essential consumer goods. In this way, the economy is divided up into three departments, in the same way as Marx analysed certain aspects of capitalism. Although Marx' main model of the capitalist economy used only two departments, he did in certain places further divide Department II into 'basics' and 'luxuries'. We will do the same, though commodities produced in what we will call Department III (rather than Marx' Department IIa) can by no means be generally regarded as 'luxuries'.⁵³ Some enterprises will, of course, produce commodities that belong in more than one department, but for our present purposes we can ignore this, and divide enterprises into the different departments also.

Looking first at Department I, where capital goods and raw materials are produced, we need also to consider foreign trade. While a broad range of material inputs into production are produced in South Africa, the capital goods sector is not as well developed, so that imports are largely composed of a high proportion of machinery and equipment. On the other hand, South African exports are dominated by partially processed minerals, whose production is also part of Department I. The mediation of international trade in the provision of capital goods is critical to the functioning of the democratic SSA (as to the present functioning of the South African economy), since it implies that exchanges between the departments are not fully determined through local regulatory structures, but are subject to variations in international commodity prices.

⁵³ See Marx, Capital, vol 2. An interesting recent article making use of this approach is E V K Fitzgerald, 'The problem of balance in a peripheral socialist economy', World Development, 13(1) 1985.

Since foreign exchange obtained from sales of minerals and other exports will be part of the social surplus available for accumulation, this will fluctuate with commodity prices. Export commodities should be sold to the central state which will also handle imports of capital goods. Because the social surplus is closely tied to foreign trade, by controlling the latter the state will be able to achieve substantial control over the accumulation process. Allocation of capital goods can then take place through the planning process, to be discussed below. The price at which minerals are purchased from the mining enterprises should be related to their cost of production, so that the overall surplus obtained will be determined by the price at which they are sold on international commodity markets. However, if the latter drops below costs, these should still be covered, and production cut back for the moment.

The administrative council in enterprises producing export commodities will thus have limited control over both production and pricing. The products of other enterprises in Department I are inputs for either other Department I enterprises or Department II or III enterprises. Transactions between enterprises should generally be left to the enterprises involved themselves. Within enterprises, such transactions should be the responsibility of the administrative council, which would negotiate over price, quantity, delivery date and so on with the administrative council of the other enterprise.

What is being suggested here is that inter-enterprise transactions occur within a market situation. This would be most consistent with the overall approach of decentralisation as far as is possible. It is by no means contradictory to combine democratic control within the enterprise and over the accumulation process, with market relations between enterprises. In any economic system, there is necessarily a mix of different structures of regulation.⁵⁴ However, as Hodgson points out, 'in a stable and viable system, one [principle of regulation] must prevail'.⁵⁵ In the democratic SSA, while it is a social regulation that is dominant, this does not mean that market forms should be completely excluded, only that they should be subordinate to social forms. The presence of worker representatives on the administrative council would help to ensure that pressures emanating from the market did not result in interference in the production process which was beyond their control. At the same time, such pressures would create constraints within which their control over production, as well as the wage determination process, would have to operate. This, in turn, might help to limit any significant deviation which might develop between their sectional interests and the more general social interest. Furthermore, one function of the state representatives, both local and central, on the administrative council would be to ensure 'rationality' in the enterprise's market transactions. For example, purchases and sales should be local, wherever possible. Beyond this, there would be a process of auditing of enterprises carried out at least annually by the planning apparatus of the central state, with one of the purposes being to obtain information on the market transactions of the enterprise. The planners would thus have fairly immediate information available on pricing, sources of supply, and destination of sales. This could be used both in the planning process itself, and to propose necessary changes in enterprise policy.

⁵⁴ See G Hodgson, The Democratic Economy: A New Look at Planning, Markets and Power, Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1984, p 85 ff.

⁵⁵ ibid., p 187.

Not all market transactions would be carried out by means of negotiation between enterprise administrative councils, as suggested above. In many cases this would be both practically impossible and inappropriate. This would apply especially to transactions between 'monopoly' enterprises, the first type discussed above, and others. The nature of the commodity here, such as electrical power, dictates that rates be set for purchasers, though these could of course be differential for different categories of buyers. The central planning apparatus would necessarily play a role in price determination by such enterprises, since in general essential inputs for all other enterprises would be involved.

The central state would also play a role in price determination for enterprises in Department II, producing basic consumer goods and services. This follows directly from demands in the Freedom Charter for controls over prices. Of course, input prices for these enterprises, and those in Department III, would be determined in ways already outlined. As with productive inputs, prices would be set to match costs as closely as possible. The enterprises making up this Department would be those producing consumer goods, such as food, clothing, housing (including some level of household goods), and those providing various services, such as education, health, basic community infrastructure and human transport. The division between basic and non-basic consumer goods is clearly somewhat arbitrary (though not necessarily any more arbitrary than that between consumer goods and producer goods, since a large grey area exists here too). What constitutes 'basic needs', that is, minimally adequate provision of these items, is socially determined, via the same institutional process which makes another central and all-encompassing social decision: that concerning the division between current consumption and accumulation.

The emphasis given in the Freedom Charter to adequate provision of goods and services in this department suggests that it should take priority in the planning process. It must be assumed therefore that this sector will be much larger than its present size, so that these demands are able to be fulfilled, or close to it. There is in general significantly less dependence (at least potentially) in many of the industrial sectors in this department on imported capital equipment than in the other two. Relatively labour-intensive technologies can be adopted in a number of production processes, thereby tying in the demand for full employment with that for provision of basic goods and services. The generally higher cost of this type of technique will imply a reduced social surplus, and thus a lower overall rate of accumulation, but this is precisely the implication of the demands.

On the other hand, the increased emphasis on this department means that enterprises supplying machinery and especially raw materials to it from Department I will also need to be adapted and their output substantially increased. The possibility arises here in particular of supply bottlenecks, which are potentially inflationary. In addition, they could be politically problematic if aroused expectations are not satisfied. Avoiding these problems may require the importation of capital equipment to allow the adoption of more capital-intensive techniques in Department I enterprises supplying Department II, to achieve increased productivity. For Department II, lower costs of other inputs may to some extent offset the higher costs of employing more labour.

Costs of production within Department II can be expected to be quite variable, because there will be different types of enterprise here, in addition to socialised ones. These would include cooperatives, small private traders and manufacturers and perhaps also individual artisans. There is at present in South Africa a large 'informal sector' providing a wide range of goods and services to consumers in black townships and squatter settlements. Rather than simply eliminating this by absorption into formal industrial enterprise, it seems more sensible to evolve it into a cooperative sector in which the workers would themselves own their means of production. Some would inevitably be privately owned, though a limit could be placed on how large such enterprises could grow.

Equally important to consider here is the distribution network of small traders. The distribution of commodities, especially to consumers, is a notorious problem in directed economies, with food often rotting because it cannot be transported to, and distributed in, areas where it is desperately needed. Existing networks should therefore be maintained wherever possible. This also applies to systems of human transport. At the same time, one objective for the long term should be to replace these privately-operated enterprises with worker-run socialised ones. As the Freedom Charter demands, non-socially owned enterprises should be controlled 'to assist the well-being of the people'. This applies, of course, in particular to their pricing policies, since the high prices of small traders have been a longstanding problem for workers and other poor people. They would thus have to be incorporated into a more general system of price controls over consumer goods and services, posing special problems of administration within this, given the large number of such small non-socialised enterprises that there would be.

Price controls are highly controversial policies, and potentially subject to much abuse, including the development of black markets to subvert them. Nevertheless, the alternative of a continually rising cost of living and falling real wages is equally problematic, so that some workable scheme must be developed. Two aspects are necessary. Firstly, costs of production for each particular commodity must be maintained within some determinate range. For socialised enterprises, this can be achieved by allocating investment funds for new technologies which could lower costs, and in extreme cases by closing down plants. (In either case, workers made redundant would have to be employed elsewhere in the enterprise.) For non-socialised enterprises, the process would be considerably more complex. The overall process of monitoring and adjusting production costs would be carried out through the auditing process referred to above, and the planning process.

The second step would be to limit price increases to a given percentage annually, with exemptions where larger rises were unavoidable (for example where imported inputs increased by a larger percentage). Within these ceilings enterprises could determine their own policies as to levels of output, work intensity, and other factors, which could enable them to earn a limited enterprise surplus. Such a surplus would then be allocated by the workers' council in the enterprise, to wage bonuses, some improvement of working conditions, or to investment.

In Department III, non-basic consumer goods, would be found many items considered essential in advanced capitalist economies as well as many services, especially recreational. These would have a significantly lower priority, in terms of resource allocation, though presumably over the long run, many items initially regarded as non-basic would come to be seen as basic, as the latter were increasingly available for most of the population. The production process for many of the commodities here are more capital-intensive, and therefore a greater drain on foreign exchange, than those in Department II. The main issue is therefore not so much price control, as output control, that is, limiting the quantity produced. One way of doing this might be to raise the prices of some of these items substantially, in order to cut the demand for them. The excess of revenue over costs could be appropriated by the state, if the price rise took the form of a sales tax. In this way the state could obtain control of some of the unsaved surplus income received by those at the upper end of the wage and salary scale. However, there remains a delicate political issue here, since the opposition of the middle classes could be aroused by such a policy relating to what can not, in the main, be regarded as real luxuries.

The fact remains, however, that many of these 'non-basic' items would be produced by the same enterprises that were producing basics. For example, buses and kombis would be produced in the same plants that produced small cars, which are more costly for society, if numbers transportable are the criterion. It is thus somehow necessary to have such enterprises devote their resources to producing items for more collective consumption, without setting specific enforced production targets. It seems that the most appropriate way of doing this is by shrinking the market for the less desirable item.

The state and the transition

The viability of an economic framework, such as the one sketched out above, depends crucially on the role played by the central state. It will have to maintain a dynamic equilibrium or tension between, on the one hand, the democratic decentralisation necessary for worker and community control over production as well as consumption decisions and, on the other, the achievement of the objectives of the central plan in relation to employment, the 'use-values' produced and investment and growth. The role of the central state lies essentially in setting targets for these and other basic macroeconomic variables, as well as in conflict regulation, in other words, managing the process of negotiation among enterprises and communities. Crucial to this role is the redistribution of data collected through auditing procedures and through the state's operation of the financial system.

The state, then, is at the nexus of the conflict between the two logics—of centralisation and decentralisation—which is inherent in the concept of a democratic economy. The feasibility of the concept—that is, whether it can be achieved in practice—depends in large measure on the way the relationship between these tendencies develops during the transitional process, starting 'the day after liberation'. At this point the central state is the main locus of political power for those forces seeking a transition away from the domination of the market, or, to use Joseph Schumpeter's terminology, from the private to the public sphere.⁵⁶ The need both to expand and to transform material production towards popular basic needs (along the lines discussed earlier) and to obtain the conformity of still-private decisionmakers to this objective means that mobilising and allocating resources depends almost entirely on the state. There is as a result a powerful tendency towards over-centralisation which is greatly reinforced by the opposition corporations inevitably mount to the challenge to their power and profits.

The real challenge during the transitional period is therefore not to lose sight of the other major goal, which is to infuse the process of economic development and upliftment of living standards with a meaningful democratic content. The experiences of other societies which have attempted such a transformation suggests that the perceived imperatives of growth and industrialisation quickly come to dominate, at least for a protracted initial phase, any decentralising impulses which exist.⁵⁷ The pattern is both familiar and depressing, but on this issue the South African case has always seemed to hold some grounds for optimism. This is not simply because of the relatively high level of capitalist development in the country, but also because of the realisation that the arrival of 'the day of liberation' is itself contingent on the active participation of very wide layers of the black population and the accompanying development of at least some tradition of localised decisionmaking and execution.

⁵⁶ W Brus, 'Socialism—Feasible and Viable?' New Left Review (153) 1985.

⁵⁷ G White, et al. (eds), Revolutionary Socialist Development in the Third World, Brighton, England: Harvester Press, 1982.

However, the contradictions of the transitional process also need to be discussed at a more concrete level. First, we will examine this issue as it affects productive enterprises. While the Freedom Charter calls for the commanding heights of the economy to be 'transferred to the ownership of the people as a whole', this should in our view remain the goal of a long term and cautious process. Precipitous action in this regard would be counter-productive in that it would arouse significant opposition, encourage sabotage and lead to a further drain of capital and skills causing bottlenecks and shortages. In the perspective adopted here the immediate priority is not the transfer of the structure of ownership and property rights (though this is necessary over the longer term), but rather to gain control over the application of economic resources. Thus a first step would be to ensure that companies be required to enter into planning agreements, specifying at least the nature and levels of their output and employment as well as their plans for future expansion and technical change. In negotiating these agreements with management and trade unions central planners could make use of the tax, credit, pricing and wage systems to provide incentives to corporations. The high degree of concentration in most South African industries should facilitate the drawing up of such agreements.

The primary weapon for enforcing these agreements could well be the implementation of a 'socialisation' procedure as a penalty for repeated contraventions.⁵⁸ In terms of this penalty the management of the firm could be replaced, while at the same time making it possible for workers and consumers to play a much greater participatory role in running the enterprise. Obviously, the capacity to enforce such a penalty depends crucially on having the political weight to overcome corporate resistance.

Such a gradualist approach towards 'socialisation' of the productive sector cannot, however, be extended to the financial system. The nature of financial assets themselves makes private financial institutions notoriously difficult to regulate, whether via direct controls and agreements or through market intervention. This is particularly true of the process of credit creation. For this reason nationalisation of the banking and credit system (as demanded in the third clause of the Freedom Charter) at an early stage can only be advantageous, providing it is politically feasible, that is. While this will enable the state to control the level of credit, it must also be recognised that there remains a real need for caution and vigilance,⁵⁹ since entirely reasonable demands for rapid and significant improvements in wage levels, living standards and job prospects will inevitably produce substantial pressure 'from below' on any new government. The temptation will be to allow normal aggregate demand to outstrip the constraints on supply, but should this occur then the outcome can only be runaway inflation and economic crisis. As Ellman puts it: 'Socialist monetarism is entirely rational.'⁶⁰ In other words, the money supply and creation of credit will need to be strictly controlled.

⁵⁸ A Glyn, A Million Jobs a Year: The Case for Planning Full Employment, London: Verso, 1985.

Of course, the financing of economic growth during the transition cannot rest only on the money supply process. An additional key objective must be to bring to bear the massive cash flows presently controlled by the handful of giant financial conglomerates which dominate South Africa's peculiar corporate structure. Probably the most appropriate method to employ here, initially at any rate, would be to raise the prescribed asset requirements and extend them to financial institutions to which they do not apply at present, particularly the mining finance houses.

Finally in relation to financial questions, central state control over foreign trade would necessarily be linked to a substantial tightening of controls over foreign exchange flows, so as to minimise capital leakage and optimise the use of scarce foreign currency.

At the same time as the central state intervened heavily to transform existing economic activity it would also have to massively expand its own role in providing infrastructure and social services. By approaching the issue of upgrading communities and the construction of housing, schools, clinics and so on in a decentralised and participatory fashion a counterweight may be developed to any statist trends which occur in the industrial and financial sectors.

The production of goods and resources in the transitional economy will undoubtedly be characterised by the shortages and bottlenecks which are all too familiar in centrally planned economies. However, it must be recognised that the economic structures which produce such unevenness and difficulty on the supply-side also make possible the fuller utilisation of unemployed and underemployed resources, especially labour. The major sources of economic growth and expansion of output over this transitional period are likely to derive, not from higher productivity based on technological progress, but from employing previously unemployed workers and from reallocating currently unproductive resources, such as those used for so-called 'defence'. Furthermore, improving the quality of life of the black population should raise the productivity of the labour force over time.

⁵⁹ S Griffith-Jones, The Role of Finance in the Transition to Socialism, Allanheld & Osman, 1981.

⁶⁰ M Ellman, 'Monetarism and the state socialist world' in K Jansen (ed), Monetarism, Economic Crisis and the Third World, London: Frank Cass, 1983.

While the process of growth within the democratic economy requires far more consideration than it has received here, it is evident that the balance between centralisation and decentralisation is a crucial factor. The experiences of state socialist economies up to the present have resulted, in general, in an emphasis on statism accompanied by an investment bias. While this has enabled a phase of rapid growth and movement to full employment, once this latter point has been reached slower growth has produced pressures towards decentralisation and a return to market-based incentives to encourage productivity improvements.⁶¹ Our argument here is that wider democratic participation in the process of production and consumption itself during the transition-cum-reflation process may make possible a continuation of adequate growth rates once full employment is reached. This in turn may lead to an avoidance of the social difficulties associated with a slowdown in expansion.

Conclusion

By its very nature this article cannot really have a conclusion since our aim has been to open up a new terrain of discussion, not close off the debate. What we can perhaps do by way of a conclusion is to take note of some of the many missing elements in our analysis as presented here.

First, there is the issue of whether the schematic outline of a democratic economy as presented here is in fact feasible and, more concretely, attainable? In this regard, there is no doubt that our discussion of the transition to a democratic economy is far too brief to cover all the issues that need addressing and, therefore, much more detailed work is required in this area. Furthermore, our article focuses on the issue of constructing a democratic economy in which the organised working class plays a vital role. But what of other sections of the South African population, such as women, rural workers and peasants? What role would they play in a democratic economy and how would their interests be articulated? Such questions are not peripheral to the discussion at hand, but need to be centrally located in the debate. And again, while we have focused mainly on the formal processes involved in constructing a democratic economy, a key question not fully covered here concerns the role the informal sector would play in such an economy. It may be envisaged that in a post-apartheid society a much larger informal sector than currently exists would develop. How would such a sector be incorporated within a framework of democratic participation?

⁶¹ J Kornai, Growth, Shortage and Efficiency, London: Basil Blackwell, 1982.

In addition to the above social issues are a host of more specifically economic questions not covered by our article which, nonetheless, require answering. What, for example, are the different conditions of accumulation in agriculture, mining and manufacturing industry and how does a democratic economy relate to these? For instance, how can the specific labour supply requirements of each sector be met without resorting exclusively to administrative controls on the one hand or market incentives on the other? How should the income differential between black and white South Africans be bridged without jeopardising prospects for growth? And what are the most likely areas of potential conflict in a post-apartheid economy?

To answer these and other related questions requires input at two levels. First, there is a crucial need to gather and analyse a mass of empirical data about the economy's present material structure, as well as its capital structure. As we have found in writing this article, without this data the issues cannot be concretely addressed and the debate will tend to assume an abstract, and even speculative direction.

Secondly, it is crucial that the issue of a democratic economy should be taken up directly within the ranks of the workers' and popular movements. The South African economy will never come under the control of democratic social forces unless those forces themselves are sufficiently organised and conscientised to take control. It is thus crucial that they actively participate in debates around these issues. The extent to which a post-apartheid economy becomes democratic rests ultimately in the hands of the South African people.

Alternative urbanisation strategies in South Africa: a critical evaluation*

This article evaluates the South African state's official strategy of orderly urbanisation and compares it with the policy of positive urbanisation advocated by the Urban Foundation, a body representing the interests of big business in South Africa. The paper argues that both these policies fail to address adequately either the causes of urban problems or the demands and needs of the majority of South Africa's population. An alternative approach to urban problems is set out and the question of a post-apartheid urban policy is taken up.

Part 1 examines the recent debate about the extent and pattern of African urbanisation in South Africa. It concludes that the effect of apartheid policies has been to displace urbanisation geographically and promote the development of quasi-urban forms of settlement in the countryside rather than to retard or stall these processes. Parts 2 and 3 examine the theoretical underpinnings and policy implications of orderly and positive urbanisation. Part 4 puts forward an alternative approach to the urban question in South Africa and takes up some of the major policy issues which flow from it.

1) The impact of apartheid on African urbanisation

In common with all semi-industrialised, or peripheral, capitalist countries, urbanisation in South Africa has been accompanied by the concentration of industry and wealth in a few major urban areas, and control over this wealth in the hands of a small section of the population.¹ It has been associated with the rapid growth of unemployment, chronic shortages of housing, inadequate services,

* This article is based on a lecture given to the Senate Special Lecture series at the University of the Witwatersrand in September 1986, and a paper presented to the 'Southern African Economy after Apartheid' Conference at the University of York, England, September/October, 1986.

¹ D Slater, 'Towards a political economy of urbanisation in peripheral capitalist societies: problems of theory and method with illustrations from Latin America', International Journal of Urban and Regional Research 2(1), 1978.

extremes of wealth and poverty, and widening social and regional inequalities. What differs about South Africa is not the presence of inequalities as such, but the extent to which state policy has given these inequalities a specific racial and geographical imprint.

For three and a half decades, urbanisation policy in South Africa has been framed in terms of the objectives of territorial apartheid. Official policy has sought to restrict and eventually to reverse the flow of Africans into the designated white urban areas by means of influx control, removal and resettlement. Temporary migrants in towns have been confined to single-sex hostels and families to residentially segregated townships with government built and owned matchbox houses. The corollary has been the bantustan and border industry policies which sought to re-create the bantustans as economically and politically independent entities, thereby justifying the removal of Africans from the rest of the country.

What impact did apartheid have on the extent and pattern of African urbanisation? One influential view, advanced by Charles Simkins, is that influx controls have delayed this process.² Simkins estimates that the level of urbanisation in South Africa in 1980 was 12 per cent below the international average for countries with similar levels of industrialisation.³ This, he argues, was the result of influx controls, which prevented African settlement in urban areas. In 1980, after three decades of influx control, only 31.9 per cent of the African population was living in urban areas.⁴ But these estimates are based on the population census of 1980 which defines an urban area as an area with an officially recognised local authority. Thus, only people living in proclaimed townships with officially approved housing, infrastructure, services and administration are defined as urban.

The inadequacies of the official definition have been pointed out by a number of writers, including Simkins himself.⁵ Its chief weakness is that

² C Simkins, Four Essays on the Past, Present and Possible Future of the Distribution of the Black Population of South Africa, Cape Town: South African Labour and Development Research Unit, University of Cape Town, 1983, p 84.

³ C Simkins, Four Essays . . . , p 115, Table 1.

⁴ C Simkins, Four Essays . . . , p 76, Table 6.

⁵ In his first three essays, Simkins uses official definitions of urban areas and finds that urbanisation in South Africa has been held up. As an afterthought his fourth essay discusses the status of unrecorded quasi-urban areas in the bantustans and here he concedes that their inclusion would result in a 'spectacular' change in his earlier results (Four Essays, pp 151-7). J de Villiers Graaf has estimated urbanisation levels on the assumption that quasi-urban settlements with a population above 5,000 should be regarded as urban. The status of 'semi-urban' areas in the bantustans is also discussed by A Mabin in 'Material and political factors in South African urbanisation, with some illustrations from the Transvaal', unpublished paper presented at University of Natal, Durban, 30 May 1986.

it fails to take account of the burgeoning population living in quasi-urban settlements both on the peripheries of the cities and in remoter areas of the bantustans. Exclusion of people living under these conditions fosters misperceptions about the impact of apartheid policies on patterns of urbanisation. It also results in gross underestimation of the extent of African urbanisation.

Apartheid policies have influenced African settlement in complex and often contradictory ways. The first decade of apartheid—from the late 1940s to the late 1950s—witnessed the rapid growth and residential stabilisation of an urban African proletariat, albeit mainly in segregated locations on the outskirts of the major industrial centres. I have argued elsewhere that the effect of influx controls in this period was to foster the reproduction of differentiated African labour power: a permanent urban proletariat and temporary migrant labour.⁶ Between 1950 and 1960, a decade when influx controls were relatively ineffective, the number of Africans living in proclaimed urban areas (inside and outside the bantustans) increased from 2.4 to 3.9 million, or from 29 to 32 per cent of the total African population (domestic and foreign). The proportion living in households (as against single persons) increased from 45 to 65 per cent in the metropolitan areas and from 72 to 84 per cent in towns.⁷ These results indicate that a process of growth and residential stabilisation took place in the urban areas during the 1950s, despite the aims of apartheid.

From the 1960s a policy of relocating urban Africans to commuter areas in the bantustans was pursued. Existing townships were either 'deproclaimed' and their residents removed or they were incorporated into bantustans by redefining boundaries. The outcome was the creation of urban townships within the bantustans from which Africans were forced to commute to work in white designated urban areas, sometimes over very long distances. In 1960 there were only 639,000 Africans living in towns in the bantustans but by 1970 there were 774,900, an increase of 28 per cent per annum.⁸ Most of these people lived in commuter belts abutting on the metropolitan areas. The effect of urban relocation of this kind was clearly not to stall or retard urbanisation, but rather to displace it spatially.⁹

⁶ D Hindson, 'The Pass System and the formation of an urban African proletariat in South Africa, a critique of the cheap labour-power thesis', DPhil thesis, University of Sussex, 1983, ch 3.

⁷ C Simkins, Four Essays . . . , p 76, Table 6.

⁸ C Simkins, Four Essays . . . , p 75, Table 5.

⁹ This term was coined by P Smit and J J Booysen, in Swart Verstedeliking: Proses, Patroon en Strategie, Tafelberg: Kaapstad 1981.

Influx controls were applied more comprehensively and effectively in the 1960s than in the 1950s.¹⁰ Rights of permanent residence under Section 10 of the Urban Areas Act were undercut by placing further obstacles in the way of settlement of women and children, and by preventing men from qualifying for permanent residence exemptions.¹¹ Did these measures prevent urbanisation? The effect was to enforce temporary migration and prevent permanent settlement of families in towns, and to that extent urbanisation in existing centres was retarded. But it does not follow that influx control thereby preserved the conditions of rural life in the bantustans.

From the mid-1950s the rural material basis of temporary migration was rapidly diminished as agricultural production and incomes within the bantustans dropped.¹² Temporary migrants became migrating proletarians dependent on employment and incomes in urban areas yet unable to settle there with their families because of influx controls and shortages of housing and social services for family life. From the 1960s, the impact of enforced temporary migration was to dissolve rural society from within, to transform and supplant pre-existing economic and social relations with forms generated within the urban centres. Studies of African villagers in the 1970s show that even in cultural terms the influence of the urban areas had penetrated deeply, if unevenly, into previously rural communities.¹³

Conditions within the bantustans were influenced as much by the rural policies of the apartheid period as by urban policies. Under the Land Act of 1937 thousands of African squatters and labour tenants on white capitalist farms were removed and relocated to areas known as 'closer settlements' within the bantustans. Many African land owners in the white rural districts, on farms officially termed 'black spots', were also resettled. Most of these removals took place in the 1960s. This resulted in the formation of quasi-urban settlements of various kinds within the bantustans in which population density was high and access to agricultural land minimal or absent.¹⁴ Land and population settlement policies pursued within the bantustans had similar effects. The so-called ¹⁰ D Hindson, 'The Pass System . . .', pp 240-55.

¹¹ D Hindson, 'The Pass System . . .', pp 255-75.

¹² C Simkins, 'Agricultural production in the African reserves of South Africa, 1918-1969', in Journal of Southern African Studies (7) 1981.

¹³ P Mayer (ed), Black Villagers in an Industrial Society, Cape Town: Oxford University Press. See especially the Introduction by Mayer.

¹⁴ Many examples of such areas are described in the Surplus People Project, Forced Removals in South Africa, Cape Town: Surplus People Project, 1983 (5 volumes).

land rehabilitation and betterment schemes of the 1960s and 70s produced quasi-urban settlements, many of whose residents were cut off from access to land and became increasingly dependent on urban employment and incomes.¹⁵

Apartheid policies not only displaced urbanisation spatially by physically resettling populations within the bantustans, it also dammed up urban populations by creating barriers to movement out of the bantustans. Since the 1970s a process of internal migration has occurred within the bantustans from rural districts to areas within commuting distance of the major urban centres. Examples of peri-urban commuter areas of this kind are Umlazi (near Durban) and Winterveld (near Pretoria), which have grown massively during the late 1970s and 1980s.¹⁶

Exclusion of informal peri-urban commuter settlements and quasi-urban settlements in areas which are more remote from the cities leads to serious under-estimation of the extent of African urbanisation. Johann de Villiers Graaf has shown that if settlements with 5,000 or more people and informal peri-urban commuter settlements in bantustans are included as urban areas, the level of African urbanisation in South Africa as a whole in 1980 was 66 per cent, this being double Simkins' estimate.¹⁷ This finding obviously overturns the idea that urbanisation in any simplistic sense has been stalled. It calls for serious reconsideration of the meaning of the terms 'rural' and 'urban' in South Africa.

Since the late 1970s, influx and efflux controls in some areas have begun to break down, especially where distances between urban centres and bantustans make commuting impossible.¹⁸ There has consequently been rapid growth of illegal squatter settlements on urban peripheries in places such as Crossroads in the Western Cape and Soweto-by-the-Sea near Port Elizabeth. These movements have occurred despite the continued application of influx controls and reflect the failure of this policy in the 1980s.

Clearly then, it should not be assumed that the major urban problems ¹⁵ J Yawich, Betterment, the Myth of Homeland Agriculture, Johannesburg: South African Institute of Race Relations.

¹⁶ J de Villiers Graaf estimates that there were 1.7 million Africans living in peri-urban areas in the bantustans in 1980. See his article entitled 'The present state of urbanisation in the South African homelands and some future scenarios', paper to Development Society Conference, Cape Town, September 1985, p 12, Table 2.

¹⁷ J D Villiers Graaf, 'The present state of urbanisation . . .', pp 1-2.

¹⁸ D Hindson, Pass Controls and the Urban African Proletariat in South Africa, Johannesburg: Ravan Press, forthcoming, 1987, ch 5.

in South Africa spring from under-urbanisation, or that an exceptionally high proportion of the population lives, works and subsists in the rural areas, except in the sense that their wider geographical setting is rural. Rather, apartheid policies have displaced urbanisation spatially and promoted forms of geographically dispersed quasi-urban settlement through influx control, enforced temporary migration and agricultural resettlement policies. Border industrialisation policy and internal migration within the bantustans have promoted dispersed urban and industrial growth especially in places where parts of bantustans lie on the fringes of the metropolitan areas. This legacy of apartheid confronts future planners with specific problems and challenges.

2) Orderly urbanisation

The assumption underlying both 'orderly' and 'positive' urbanisation is that racial and regional inequalities in South Africa are essentially the outcome of misplaced state interference in the economic system.¹⁹ Racial state policies over three decades—influx control, bantustans and industrial decentralisation—are the root cause of unemployment, poverty and inequality. These policies have resulted in the misallocation of labour and other resources sectorally and regionally and have prevented the South African economy from attaining levels of output, employment and welfare consistent with its endowment of natural and human resources. Today's urban crisis is the result of prejudice and state mismanagement.

The policy implications flowing from this view are that South Africa's major economic problems—unemployment, poverty, and regional and racial inequalities—can best be resolved by abolishing apartheid and allowing market forces and individual choice to determine where population and industry are located. The role of the state should be limited to the planning of residential and industrial sites and the correction of market failures where urbanisation leads to a divergence between private and social cost. Deregulated urbanisation, it is argued, ¹⁹ The term 'orderly urbanisation' is associated with the Report of the Committee for Constitutional Affairs of the President's Council on An Urbanisation Strategy for the Republic of South Africa, (PC 3-1985). The term positive urbanisation has been coined by the Urban Foundation to distinguish its policy from that of the state. See for example 'A Statement by the Private Sector Council on Urbanisation', issued at its first meeting on November 1, 1985, The Urbanisation Unit, Urban Foundation, Johannesburg, 1985.

ALTERNATIVE URBANISATION STRATEGIES will automatically stimulate capital accumulation, employment and income growth. Regional and other inequalities will gradually disappear as the barriers to movement are dismantled and labour and other resources move to the cities where productivity, incomes and employment are highest.²⁰

The policy of 'orderly urbanisation' was set out in the President's Council Report, 'An Urbanisation Strategy for the Republic of South Africa', and adopted in a government White Paper in this year.²¹ 'Orderly urbanisation' replaces traditional apartheid with a policy which accepts African urbanisation as inevitable, but seeks to reorder this process within a regional planning framework. It conceives of the economic re-integration of the bantustans into nine new development planning regions which cross-cut and supersede the existing boundaries of the bantustans and provinces. Within each development region one or more 'metropolitan' region will provide the framework for the organisation of third tier government, fiscal and administrative structures and the planning of industrial and residential siting within the larger development regions.

In the form currently being implemented by the state, the strategy of orderly urbanisation is based on five fundamental principles: racial residential segregation; social differentiation within residential areas; industrial and residential deconcentration within and between development regions; privatisation of house ownership; and devolution of provision of municipal services. In short, 'orderly urbanisation' represents a form of decentralised apartheid in which market forces are to be given play within a regional planning framework based on the principles of racial residential segregation and the spatial dispersal of industry and population.

In a significant departure from orthodox apartheid, 'orderly urbanisation' entails the abolition of traditional influx and pass controls. But it replaces these with new measures to control movement from the bantustans to the rest of South Africa, and to control movement and settlement within the non-bantustan areas.

The Aliens Act is, for example, being used to prevent citizens of independent bantustans from settling permanently and acquiring ²⁰ Variants of these ideas underlie the President's Council Report on urbanisation and are present in the publication of the Urban Foundation. See, for example, A Bernstein, 'The abolition of influx control and the development of a new urbanisation strategy', Speech to the 1986 Manufacturing Strategy Convention, Sandton, 11 March 1986, pp 5-14.

²¹ White Paper on An Urbanisation Strategy for the Republic of South Africa, WP 1986.

citizenship rights outside the areas designated as their national states.²² Within non-bantustan South Africa, traditional pass and influx control measures have been replaced with squatter, health and trespass law. These are being used to restrict urbanisation in metropolitan centres and channel new urban settlers to ethnically ordered settlements or metropolitan peripheries, both within and outside the bantustans. Examples of the new deconcentration areas to which Africans are being removed are Onverwacht, Khayelitsha, Ekangala and KwaNdebele. These are areas such as these that Cosmos Desmond in his book The Discarded People termed 'dumping grounds'.²³ However, unlike the dumping grounds of the 1960s and 1970s, these areas are being integrated into labour markets centred on metropolitan and deconcentrated industrial and commercial areas.²⁴ The opening up of urban labour markets to workers living in peri-urban settlements does not, of course, guarantee that more jobs become available to previously excluded workers. The aim is to subject relatively protected urban labour markets to competition from impoverished workers located residentially on the peripheries of the metropolitan centres.

Under the Urban Areas Act which governed African urbanisation until 1986, a distinction was drawn between permanent and temporary African populations in towns. Permanent residents with Section 10 rights were given a degree of protection from removal while they remained in employment.²⁵ The principle underlying the new official housing policy is that residential differentiation should be encouraged to promote class stratification within racially segregated areas. Housing and services are to be tailored to income levels, so that better serviced suburbs will be created for the relatively well-off residents, while the poor will be confined to areas with less developed residential infrastructure and poorer services.

An implication of the new housing strategy is that economically inactive, unemployed and low income groups—the majority of urban Africans—have all become vulnerable to eviction and removal. Since March 1986, major confrontations have occurred between rent ²² G Budlender, 'Influx control in the Western Cape: from pass laws to passports', South African Labour Bulletin 11(8) 1986.

²³ C Desmond, The Discarded People, Harmondsworth: Penguin 1971.

²⁴ W Cobbett, 'Orderly urbanisation: continuity and change in influx control', in South African Labour Bulletin, 11(8) 1986.

²⁵ Section 10, Black (Urban Areas) Act, Act 25 of 1945.

boycotting residents and township authorities bent on enforcing payment of rents. This battle is decisive for the strategy of orderly urbanisation. It is only if progressive township organisations are defeated that the state can remove poorer sections of the urban African population to deconcentrated areas, end housing subsidies and implement the policy of private ownership and social differentiation. It is decisive for township organisations, too, for survival will be difficult if the state succeeds in sifting out, evicting and removing the poorest and most militant township residents.

Within the deconcentrated areas a policy of 'ordered informal settlement' has been adopted. Apartheid housing policy involved the provision of subsidised housing and services for permanent urban Africans, hostels for migrants and, from the 1960s, housing expansion only in the bantustans. The present policy of ordered informal settlement envisages the growth of African urban settlement through the designation of new residential sites on metropolitan peripheries in which basic infrastructure and serviced sites will be provided by the state. State construction and subsidisation of housing will be phased out and replaced by a policy of privatisation and self-help.

Ordered informal settlement represents a form of controlled slum development. The strategy is rationalised in terms of an ideology of upgrading. Individuals, it is argued, will be able to upgrade their homes, and communities upgrade their infrastructure and services, as employment and incomes rise. In this way, so it is argued, informal settlements will be transformed ultimately into fully serviced suburbs with high housing standards.

A third element in the 'orderly urbanisation' strategy is the use of fiscal measures to discourage the concentration of labour-intensive, low-skill industries in metropolitan centres and to promote their dispersal to de-concentrated residential areas. It is here that the small business and informal sector strategies lock into 'orderly' urbanisation. Small businesses are officially defined as independent enterprises with less than a given number of employees—for example fifty in the manufacturing sector and a hundred in mining—whereas the informal sector refers to enterprises which are not registered as businesses. Official policy since 1984 is to promote such enterprises, especially in deconcentrated industrial areas, in the hope that they will generate high levels of employment and incomes. Measures to promote informal and small businesses include de-regulating economic activities, lowering health and safety standards, relaxing legally determined wages and other conditions of employment, and the provision of cheap loans to individual businessmen.²⁶

Experience elsewhere shows that only a minority are capable of raising their living standards above the level of the mass of population through such means. The primary function of strategies of this kind is to secure the existence of surplus and marginalised sections of the working class. The growth of surplus population, and its maintenance at or below subsistence levels, ensures that wages of organised workers within the formal sector are held in check.²⁷

Seen from this perspective, ordered informal settlement and the informal sector strategies are means of restructuring and sustaining reserve armies of labour at or below subsistence levels. They release the state and employers from meeting costs of reproduction of labour-power and shift this burden directly on to the working class. This is not being done, as in the past, by conserving pre-capitalist production relations and re-distributive networks in the bantustans, but by dismantling state housing and service subsidies within the urban townships and allowing market forces, coupled with property rights, trespass and squatter laws, to sift out and stratify the African population.

Finally, the orderly urbanisation strategy is linked to a political strategy in which Africans are to be formally incorporated into local and regional political structures on a racial basis. The aim is for the white ruling groups to accommodate the demand for political participation, but in a manner which fragments national politics racially and regionally.²⁸ Powers over the provision of municipal services are to be devolved on a group (ie racial) basis to local and metropolitan government, while the key security and order functions of the state—monetary policy, the judiciary, army, national police—are to be concentrated in centralised national structures sealed off from majority access and accountability.

²⁶ Department of Manpower, National Manpower Commission, Report on an Investigation into the Small Business Sector in the Republic of South Africa, with Specific Reference to Factors that may affect the growth and development thereof, Report 1, 1984; and White Paper on A Strategy for Creating Employment Opportunities in the Republic of South Africa, WP C-1984.

²⁷ A debate occurred in the early 1970s as to the theoretical standing of the concepts of marginalisation, the reserve army of labour and surplus population. See for example A Quijano, 'The marginal pole of the economy and the marginalised labour force', Economy and Society, (5) 1974 and M Legassick and H Wolpe, 'The bantustans and capital accumulation in South Africa', Review of African Political Economy (7) 1976.

²⁸ W Cobbett et al., 'South Africa's Regional Political Economy, A Critical Analysis of Reform Strategy in the 1980s', in South African Review (3) 1986.

3) Positive urbanisation

Until recently the Urban Foundation has been amongst the most vocal of critics of government—albeit from a reformist stance—for its failure to abolish influx control and promote African urbanisation. However, with the official adoption of the President's Council Report a convergence appears to be taking place in the views of the Urban Foundation and reformers within government. This is no doubt in part because the policy of orderly urbanisation set out in the President's Council Report was heavily based on the positive urbanisation strategy of the Urban Foundation, and the state's adoption of this strategy implies broad acceptance of Urban Foundation policy. However, certain differences in their positions remain.

Prior to the publication of the White Paper on Urbanisation, the Urban Foundation had publically rejected the Group Areas Act, the Population Registration Act and the use of the Aliens Act to prevent citizens of independent bantustans from acquiring South African citizenship.²⁹ All these racial laws, for the time being at least, remain foundations of state policy.

Apart from the question of race, there is also an important difference between the Urban Foundation and government reformers over industrial and residential deconcentration. Official policy rests on the argument that urbanisation should be regulated to correct for divergences between the private cost of newly urbanising people and the social costs to the existing urban populations. Unregulated urbanisation, the state planners argue, would lead to overcrowding, pollution and the deterioration of living conditions in existing residential areas. Vigorous state intervention is needed, not to override market forces, but to correct the market's failure to signal to individuals the true social costs of moving to cities. On these grounds the policies of industrial dispersal and residential deconcentration both within and between regions are justified.

In contrast, the Urban Foundation is sceptical about the extent to which urbanisation raises social costs and emphasises instead the economic advantages of heavy urban concentration in terms of ease of communication, specialisation, markets and so on. It is suspicious of vigorous state intervention to effect spatial redistribution of industry and population. It argues that problems of regional inequalities can best be addressed by allowing the poor to move to the cities, and providing them with jobs and houses there. It favours, at most, mild intervention to promote existing growth points close to the major metropolitan centres.³⁰

²⁹ J H Steyn, 'South Africa 1986: a watershed year', address to National African Federated Chamber of Commerce and Industries Conference, Cape Town, 8 July 1986.

While these differences remain, it is significant that the Urban Foundation has recently been reorganised to concentrate on residential development and construction in African townships.³¹ What this seems to indicate is broad acceptance of the state's orderly urbanisation strategy—subject to outstanding criticisms over its racial and regional dimensions—and commitment to assisting the state in implementing its housing strategy.³²

The corner-stone of this strategy and a point at which state and Urban Foundation policy meet is the policy of developing low cost and informal housing. The flaw in this policy is that it seeks to develop a short-term expedient into a principle of urban strategy, and to bolster this with an ideology of individual initiative and upgrading.

In circumstances of widespread unemployment and poverty, the concept of self-help seems the least appropriate of all approaches to a rational housing programme. It places the burden of providing adequate shelter on individuals and communities with the least access to the material resources necessary for such a task, and at the same time releases from all social obligation individuals and social classes over-endowed with these material resources.

4) Alternatives to orderly and positive urbanisation

Alternatives to official and business-backed urban strategies must clearly be grounded in an understanding of the causes of racial, regional and social inequalities in South Africa. A well-established body of literature holds that apartheid policies developed originally to support and extend capitalist development in South Africa and that the two have historically been mutually reinforcing rather than antagonistic.³³

³⁰ A Bernstein, 'The Abolition of Influx Control . . .', p 37.

³¹ J H Steyn, 'South Africa 1986 . . .', p 2.

³² J H Steyn, 'Statement issued on behalf of the Private Sector Council on the 23 April 1986 on the White Paper on Urbanisation', issued by the Urban Foundation, 1986.

³³ I am referring to the revisionist and Marxist writings which appeared from the late 1960s. For example, F A Johnstone, 'White prosperity and white supremacy in South Africa today', African Affairs 69 (275) 1970; M Legassick, 'South Africa: capital accumulation and violence' in Economy and Society (3) 1974.

Capitalist expansion has been fuelled by policies which sought to retard urbanisation because the perpetuation of temporary migration and the tribal authority system in the bantustans released capital and state from costs of reproduction of labour power and the maintenance of surplus population.³⁴ However, with the collapse of the reserves as reproductive bases for African migrant labour, and with the modernisation and increasing sophistication of the industrial sector, it can be argued that apartheid policies have subsequently become increasingly dysfunctional to capitalism.³⁵

In this approach it is the system of production and distribution that is the underlying determinant of racial and regional inequalities, the growth of unemployment and poverty. State policy provides a framework within which capitalist development takes place. State intervention can influence patterns of urbanisation and the social and regional distribution of wealth and poverty, but only within limits dictated by tendencies inherent in capitalism. Thus, displaced urban development and the concentration of impoverished populations in quasi-urban settlements in the bantustans are made possible by the tendency of capitalist development to generate a surplus population relative to its needs for labour. The bantustan strategy represents the specific form in which state policy has sought to manage the social and regional inequalities of accumulation in the context of this particular peripheral capitalist society.

It follows that the mere abolition of apartheid cannot be expected to resolve the major social and economic problems associated with urbanisation. The relaxation of influx controls will undoubtedly alleviate racial inequalities to a degree, and will certainly lead to greater concentration of population and industry within metropolitan areas. However, unrestrained, market-directed urbanisation is likely to reproduce social and regional differentiation, albeit in forms which cross-cut the racial and regional matrices of capitalism under apartheid. Therefore, the resolution of social, racial and regional inequalities must be sought not in removal of the state from the market, but in urban and regional planning within the framework of a transformed state and economy.

Debate on alternatives to orderly and positive urbanisation is as yet in its infancy. These two strategies have been met with scepticism and suspicion by progressive organisations within South Africa, but not as yet with coherent critical responses, let alone rational alternatives.³⁶ What is clear from these organisations is that it is not merely the intrinsic merits of alternative blueprints that will determine their reception, but also the method by which they are arrived at. Progressive organisations are hostile to policies imposed on them by unrepresentative state authorities. Their demand for full participation in the formulation and implementation of policies affecting their members is unlikely to be abandoned under a post-apartheid state.

³⁴ For example, H Wolpe, 'Capitalism and cheap labour-power: from segregation to apartheid', Economy and Society (1) 1972.

³⁵ D Hindson, Pass Controls . . . , ch 5.

Alternatives must clearly arise out of the demands, needs and active participation of local communities, but the formulation of an alternative national urbanisation strategy also presupposes the existence of national democratic political processes. Without this there is no legitimate mechanism capable of expressing and weighing the needs of different communities, urban and rural, against each other, and residential needs against other national objectives. Until the present regime is dismantled, there will be severe constraints on the capacity to formulate, let alone implement, acceptable alternatives based on national economic priorities. Nevertheless, a start may be made by examining the Freedom Charter adopted at the Congress of People in 1955, and weighing its declared aims against the urban conditions and demands of urban people in present-day South Africa.³⁷

The Freedom Charter sets out an ideal towards which an urbanisation strategy should strive. It states that all shall have the right to live where they choose and to be decently housed. Rents should be controlled and unused housing space made available. Slums should be demolished and new suburbs built with adequate infrastructural provisions and social amenities. It declares that the right and duty of all to work shall be recognised by the state.

This statement of rights and aims points to an urbanisation strategy which differs radically from orderly urbanisation, especially on the question of race, and from positive urbanisation, especially on the question of state intervention. But these broad principles are compatible with different degrees and forms of state intervention and a range of concrete mechanisms and institutions. They do not, and umably were not intended to, represent a policy programme able of grappling with the details of urban and regional development.

³⁶ Statements from organisations in special edition in Influx Control and Reform, South African Labour Bulletin 11(8) 1986.

³⁷ The Freedom Charter, adopted at the Congress of the People, Kliptown, 26 June 1955.

My aim in the last section of this article is not to try to read into the Freedom Charter a possible urbanisation strategy or to offer an alternative blueprint, but to raise some broad issues that must be pressed in formulating a national urban strategy capable of meeting needs of the majority of South Africans. I will limit myself to three in issues: regional policy, housing and employment.

Should a planned approach to urbanisation be based on abandonment of efforts to decentralise industry and population or should further decentralisation be encouraged? In taking this question a distinction should be drawn between industrial decentralisation to areas remote from the metropolitan centres, and concentration, much of which has taken place within areas—inside and outside the bantustans—which are extensions of existing metropolitan areas. A considerable degree of dispersal of industry and residential infrastructure in the latter areas has already taken place in South Africa, in part as a consequence of state inducement, but also due to spontaneous capital movements.³⁸ Furthermore, migration within bantustans has resulted in family settlement on a large scale in metropolitan fringes surrounding these dispersed industrial areas. In these metropolitan peripheries there has also been considerable investment in housing and amenities and the development of transport works and social amenities such as schools.

The existence of this industrial and residential infrastructure, and the presence of settled, family-based communities, provides grounds for planned development and expansion of such areas, rather than their abandonment. This should be done by means of measures to promote employment through industrial siting, and through the provision of improved housing (including means for improving existing housing stock), social services and amenities such as schools, crèches and recreational facilities.

In contrast, there seems far less scope for promotion of far-flung industrialisation to communities in the quasi-urban settlements in the areas remote from the major urban centres. A large proportion of this population must inevitably be catered for within the centres of mining and industrial employment. Here there is a need for measures to promote family migration to the urban-industrial centres through a vigorous programme of housing construction, including the conversion of hostels and compounds into married quarters.

³⁸ T Bell, 'The new inter-regional division of labour in South Africa', Journal of Southern African Studies 12(2) 1986.

It is probable that many, but not all, migrant workers and their families would choose this option. Given the investment of many migrants in homes in the bantustans, and retention of ties to land and means of rural production for a remaining few, voluntary temporary migration and weekly and monthly commuting can be expected to continue for a long time to come for a section of the contract labour force in the towns and in the mines. Positive incentives (such as access to improved housing and services in urban areas and agricultural support in rural areas), rather than force, should be used to encourage the gradual separation of the migrant work-force into stable urban and rural communities.

Clearly, the question of land tenure systems and the mode of organisation of agricultural production—in the capitalist and subsistence sectors—will have a major bearing on the nature and scale of the urban problem, not only because of their influence on migration, but also, and crucially, because of their effects on the availability of agricultural surpluses and scope for balanced development of industry and agriculture and trade between these sectors. Attempts to increase agricultural productivity within the bantustans are likely to reduce rather than increase the scope for local employment and may well increase the outflow of population to the cities. In contrast, there may be considerable scope for reabsorption of African cultivators in agricultural areas presently owned by whites.

The movement of population out of concentrated settlements in the bantustans would allow for the reallocation of rural resources, the reorganisations of rural production and the formation of permanent agriculture work-forces. Increased specialisation, and rising levels of productivity and improvement in output and income levels would lead ultimately to a narrowing of the gap between rural and urban living conditions. But it can be anticipated that the reconstruction of agriculture in the bantustan areas will require substantial state redistributive economic assistance: agricultural training, expenditure on physical and social infrastructure and communications, financial and other assistance.

The dismantling of apartheid and reconstruction of African agriculture will undoubtedly result in a very substantial migration out of the bantustans into South Africa's cities. It is thus unquestionably within the major metropolitan areas, and on their peripheries, that homes and jobs will have to be provided for the vast majority of South Africa's presently unemployed and impoverished people. And it is here that the greatest efforts will have to be made to provide adequate living conditions, services and social amenities and expand employment.

The starting point for an alternative housing strategy for the urban areas will have to be the abolition of the Group Areas Act and any other future measures which restrict residential areas to racially defined groups. This will immediately make available considerable vacant accommodation to families previously excluded from the market on grounds of race. But housing prices in these areas are likely to continue to exclude all but the privileged few. Thus, it will be necessary to adopt measures in these areas to promote increased housing density and higher occupation rates. This can be done by increasing the effective costs of large residential sites and homes and by taxing large sites and unused housing space and by reallocating public expenditure on infrastructure such as urban road networks to higher density residential areas.

However, the housing needs of the mass of urban people in South Africa go way beyond the existing housing stock, even if this were to be more equitably and rationally distributed. These needs can only be met by a massive housing and residential programme which harnesses the resources of the state, industry and local communities. Alternatives to apartheid housing policy and the shack strategy of orderly and positive urbanisation must be based on public acquisition and planning of residential sites close to employment, the provision of residential infrastructure and services and the building and provision of assistance in building of housing. This will require research and experimentation into a wide range of housing types and methods of construction including large-scale contracting, and collective and community based construction.

The non-monopoly sector of the economy is likely to continue to play a major part in creating employment within the metropolitan centres and will undoubtedly expand rapidly once racial barriers such as those provided under the Group Areas Act are dismantled. However it will be important to ensure that minimum standards of wages and working conditions are set to prevent its use as a cheap labour sector. Solutions for the problems of unemployment and poverty which a post-apartheid economy will face must be sought also in the reorganisation of the large-scale industrial, mining and commercial sectors. It is here that the bulk of the material resources of the economy are concentrated and here that the surpluses needed to build up South Africa's economic and social system will be generated. Employment creation on a scale capable of resolving South Africa's unemployment crisis can only be effected through a major reorganisation of production methods and priorities and through the redistribution of work. This presupposes social ownership of the means of production, democratic forms of organisation and control of the labour process and the subordination of market forces to social needs.

It is only through the development of a national urban and regional plan, democratically formulated and implemented, that a beginning can be made to the resolution of South Africa's racial, regional and social inequalities and the construction of a non-racial society.

The cost of apartheid

The magnitude of the problems to be dealt with by a future government in a post-apartheid South Africa will be vast. The purpose of what follows is to provide some indication of the size and complexity of these problems in what can be termed the welfare arena. This arena is so broad and involves so many major issues that discussion will be restricted to five areas within it: poverty, migrant labour, unemployment, housing and nutrition. A descriptive emphasis will be used, not in order to document the obvious inequalities that will be inherited by a future South Africa, but to highlight their extent and emphasise that few of the problems associated with these inequalities are amenable to easy solutions.¹

Although South Africa is ranked by the World Bank as a middle-income country—and the ninth wealthiest of the oil importing ones—the actual average level of development places the country much lower than such an income measure suggests.² When contrasted with other countries of similar average income South Africa falls behind them in terms of welfare indicators, such as average life expectancy of the population, infant and child mortality rates. This gap between economic indicators and welfare ones is a clear reflection of the extreme inequality in the distribution of income and production capacity in South Africa. Income is unequal between colour groups, the sexes, and the urban and rural areas, and production capacity unequal between the metropolitan regions (particularly Pretoria, Witwatersrand and Vereeniging area) and between urban areas and the rest of the country.³ The gross skewness of distribution of economic and welfare resources between groups and geographical areas is fuelling a widening divide between rich and poor, between urban and rural areas and between bantustans and their inhabitants and other areas.

¹ Roger Southall in 'South Africa: constraints on socialism' (paper at 'The Southern African Economy After Apartheid' Conference at University of York, England, October 1986) provides a broad ranging discussion of political and economic problems that will face South Africa and is useful background to a discussion of this future.

² See Jill Nattrass 'South Africa's status in the international development stakes', Indicator SA 1(3) 3-9, 1983.

³ ibid., p 8.

Apartheid has exacerbated the already serious problems associated with economic development. South Africa has a population that is increasing by 2.3 per cent per year and is expected to increase in size by almost 40 per cent between 1980 and the year 2000, (adding an average of about 800 thousand people a year to existing population figures over the period.)⁴ Its urban population is expected to increase by ten million by the year 2000, and by that year South Africa will need to have provided four million new housing units and six million new jobs to meet the needs of its population. Such demands on economic resources due to population growth are to be expected in a relatively new industrial economy. By themselves these demands place great strains on the ability of the economy to provide a widely acceptable minimum living level for all South Africans.

The apartheid regime, being based on the politics of racial exclusion, has shown itself to be unable to redistribute resources to meet the basic welfare needs of the population. It is improbable that it could 'reform' itself to do so, by significantly redirecting resources from the white and affluent towards the poor and excluded. In addition, apartheid has produced a serious economic crisis in which there is a minimal economic growth rate, an inflation rate hovering around 20 per cent, a withdrawal of foreign investment and an escalating application of boycotts and sanctions. The crisis which apartheid has produced is deep-seated, severely aggravating the problems associated with industrial and population growth and lessening the ability of the economy to finance the welfare services required by the population either now, or in the future.

Poverty and inequality

The high levels of racial inequality and poverty in South Africa point to a diseased economic and political system and to severe economic problems ahead. The magnitude of economic inequality is made clear by examining figures in three areas: the distribution of income, wealth and poverty in contemporary South Africa. In the first areas, inequality in the distribution of personal incomes between households is best summarised in the Gini coefficient of inequality, which in 1975 stood at 0.68 (zero being perfect equality), giving South Africa the unenviable distinction of having the most unequal distribution of income for any economy for which data is currently available.⁵ Other studies of income demonstrate a notable skewness of its distribution by colour and indicate that in 1980 white per capita incomes were 12.9 times higher than African incomes; 5.3 times higher than 'coloured' incomes and 3.9 times higher than Indian ones.⁶ In other terms, the average per capita income of whites was almost thirteen times greater than the African average. A more recent summary measure of income inequality indicates that in 1985 11 per cent of households had incomes of over R1400 per month, 33 per cent of households had incomes of between R400 and R1400 per month, while the bulk of households in South Africa (56 per cent) had incomes below R400 per month, with 40 per cent of households having incomes below R280 per month.⁷

⁴ P Spies 'South Africa in the year 2000: society will decide', Energos (10) Part 2, 1984, p 154 and also Herman Giliomee 'Afrikaner nationalism and the fable of the Sultan's horse', Energos (13) 1986, p 38.

Wealth distribution figures are similarly markedly skewed, with the top 5 per cent of wealth-holders having 88 per cent of personally owned wealth.⁸ This pattern is writ large in the corporate economy where a growing pattern of concentration of ownership has led to six groups of business companies controlling 84 per cent of the assets on the stock exchange. Associated with this concentrated ownership has been a concentration of economic power and decisionmaking, as indicated by such findings that a mere 704 persons hold some 60 per cent of the directorships of all public companies in South Africa.⁹

It is within this setting of severely unequal incomes, wealth and economic power that massive poverty exists. Almost half of all households in South Africa live below the least generously defined poverty level, with poverty being most widespread and acute in the rural

⁵ Merle Holden and Mike McGrath, 'Economic outlook: retrospect', Indicator SA (34) 1986, p 44.

⁶ D W Williams et al., 'The realities of social security in South Africa' (mimeo), The Actuarial Society of South Africa, October 1986, p 4.

⁷ Charles Simkins 'How much socialism will be needed to end poverty in South Africa?' Paper at 'The Southern African Economy after Apartheid' University of York Conference, October 1986.

⁸ Jan Lombard (ed) 'Power in the market economy', Focus Key Economic Issues (34) 1984 (Johannesburg: Mercabank).

⁹ Michael Savage 'An anatomy of the South African corporate economy: ownership, control and the interlocking directorate', Seminar paper, Centre for African Studies, University of Cape Town, 1985.

areas and among the African population. McGrath provides careful calculations to show that 30 per cent of African households in metropolitan areas live below the poverty level and that this figure rises to over 70 per cent in rural areas and the bantustans.¹⁰ Reynolds provides a summary figure of those families living below a poverty line, to show that 7 per cent are found in the cities, 13 per cent in 'white' rural areas and 83 per cent in the bantustans.¹¹ In other words, despite the pressing and evident nature of poverty in urban areas, 93 per cent of poverty in South Africa is outside the major cities and is concentrated within the bantustans.

The level of poverty in the bantustans, where more than half the African population live, has been documented in several studies that show meagre household incomes and a measure of the extent to which these incomes fall below survival levels. Thus, a recent study by Simkins indicates that in 1980 8.9 million people in the bantustans, or 81 per cent of their population, had incomes below a harshly drawn minimum living level. The extent of absolute poverty within the bantustans has been increasing since 1960 as then 250 thousand people (5 per cent of the population) were in households that had no income at all, by 1980 such poverty had grown with 1.4 million people (13 per cent of the population) having no measurable income.¹²

While groups of government functionaries, limited numbers of workers on the fringes of the bantustans near 'white' towns, together with some migrant mine workers may have been improving their incomes, the depth of overall poverty in these areas appears to have deepened as most probably has the proportion of people living in poverty. Detailed studies point to the severity of poverty in particular areas. A study of the Mahlabitini district of KwaZulu in 1981 shows the mean household income, including the small value of agricultural production, to be R114 per month—with 43 per cent of this income coming from remittances by migrant labourers and 16 per cent coming from pensions. It is clear that the majority of households in Mahlabatini live in grinding poverty (with incomes below a notional subsistence level of R184 per month) and that people's survival in this area is dependent on cash transfers from migrants.¹³

¹⁰ Mike McGrath, 'Global poverty in South Africa', Social Dynamics 10(2) 1984, pp 38–48.

¹¹ N Reynolds 'Citizens, the state and employment', Paper presented to Carnegie Conference on Poverty, University of Cape Town, April 1984.

¹² Charles Simkins, 'What has been happening to income distribution and poverty in the homelands', Development Southern Africa 1(2), 1984, pp 142–52.

There is no absence of black poverty in the cities but the figures cited suggest that even the widespread nature of urban poverty pales into near insignificance compared to what is found in the bantustans and the 'white' rural areas of South Africa.

Studies in all areas of South Africa point to the multi-dimensional nature of poverty and of the need to examine factors other than income to understand its extent and depth. The recent Carnegie conference on poverty in South Africa drew together research throughout the country to indicate that it was not merely in terms of income but also in terms of access to fuel, transport, food, water supplies and health, that poverty has to be examined and understood.

Buch and his colleagues provided a penetrating insight into the poverty of one rural African community—Mhala in the Eastern Transvaal. In this area an average of 706 people share a water tap; a study of 2,609 sub A and sub B schoolchildren showed that 16 per cent of them had bilharzia, 39 per cent of them had no breakfast prior to coming to school and that 46 per cent of them were suffering from active tuberculosis.¹⁴ In the Transkei, a study of five villages showed that an average family spent 187 minutes a day fetching water; and in the Manguzi area of KwaZulu more than 60 per cent of the households are more than a one-hour round trip to water and for those too crippled to walk who have to pay someone to draw water, the cost is 1 cent per litre, which is approximately thirty-three times more expensive than running tap-water in the urban homes of metropolitan South Africa. Other studies have pointed to the inadequacy of basic sanitation. In Alexandra, on the edge of the affluent suburbs of northern Johannesburg, there is an absence of adequate sanitation and one report for the Carnegie conference described 'sewage flowing in the streets' as a result of the overloading of the existing bucket system. In the small town of Clarens in the Orange Free State the 800 residents of the black township have only twelve pit latrines to use, an average of sixty-six persons to each toilet, but 'Permission now (1984) has been given by the Oranje Vaal Board for residents to dig a pit toilet in each stand.' Other studies point to the connections between poverty and fuel resources available to the mass of the population. In the valley lowveld of KwaZulu the average distance walked in collecting one headload of firewood is 3.6 km and the time taken in collecting the load is over 2.5 hours. In the grassland area the distance and time are 8.3 km and 4.5 hours. In Cape Town, in Valhalla Park, it has been found that fuel for cooking, lighting and heating costs more per unit for the poor, (who have to use paraffin and candles at a monthly average cost of R65 per household) than for the better-off, who can afford the electricity connection fee and who then spend on average R25 a month on fuel.

¹³ M Gandar and N Bromberger, 'Economic and demographic functioning of rural households in the Mahlabatini district', Social Dynamics 10(2), 1984, pp 20-37.

¹⁴ These and the following figures are drawn from overviews of the Carnegie Inquiry Conference by Francis Wilson contained in 'South African poverty major issues', Social Dynamics 10(2) 1984, pp 61-69; and 'Water, Sewerage and Fuel', RSA 2,000 8(1) 1986, pp 53-58.

All such studies point to the widespread and multi-dimensional nature of poverty and indicate that a fundamental redistribution of resources is required in a future South Africa if all its people are to live with even their most basic needs being adequately met.

Migrant labour

The pervasive system of migrant labour in South Africa rests upon the political fragmentation of the country into 'black' and 'white' geographical areas and the stringent controls governing movement between these areas. There presently exist three main categories of migrant workers in the economy. The first and major category of migrants are those workers migrating from places within South Africa usually on labour contracts as 'single labour units', to live and work in 'white' areas. In 1985 there were 1,842,240 such internal migrants, 82 per cent of whom were male, and approximately half of them worked on the Witwatersrand or in the gold-mines.¹⁵ The second category consists of migrants officially classified as 'commuters', who live in the bantustans but travel on a daily basis to work in 'white' areas. Some 614,847 African workers were classified as commuters in 1985 and while some of these workers live in areas such as Mdantsane or Umlazi, relatively close to major metropolitan centres, many of them are forced into travelling long hours on a daily basis between work and home. At present 400,000 African workers in this category travel more than thirty km per day and recently there has been an appreciable shift to medium and long-distance commuting. Thus, for example, in north-eastern Bophuthatswana a survey of 100 Pretoria commuters revealed that their average travel time to work was 7 hours 19 minutes, which was longer than the average time these workers spent sleeping.¹⁶ Overall, 20 per cent of 'commuting migrants' travel on average between 3.5 and 7 hours a day, the other 80 per cent travelling on average 2.5 hours a day.¹⁷ Thirdly, there are 371,008 foreign migrants coming from neighbouring countries to work in South Africa. The great majority of these migrants are employed in the mining industry and originate from three neighbouring countries—Lesotho (140,000), Mozambique (69,000) and Malawi (30,000). Thus, in total the South African economy contains over 2.2 million migrant workers who are employed and live in 'white' South Africa on a semi-permanent basis. In addition, it contains over 600,000 'commuting migrants' from the bantustans and large numbers of workers who are forced through having to live far from their work, into becoming what could be termed 'daily migrants'. It is not unrealistic to state that approximately one out of every three workers in South Africa can be classified as a migrant worker.

¹⁵ Figures drawn from Central Statistical Services Reports and Reports of the Department of Cooperation and Development.

The impact that the migrant labour system has had, and continues to have, on South Africa is vast. The system has generated grossly distorted patterns of population settlement, has significantly contributed to the undermining of stable community and family life, contributed to the failure to provide adequate wages and social security, as well as having had serious effects on the provision of adequate housing for workers, on worker organisation and on worker health. The ravages of the system will take decades to repair and will involve massive fiscal expenditures.

The recent Abolition of Influx Control Act of 1986 does not significantly alter the compulsory underpinnings of the migrant labour system as it has been associated with new legal and administrative mechanisms controlling freedom of movement. The Act affects only those persons classified as permanent residents in 'white' South Africa and does not affect those stripped of their South African citizenship when the TBVC areas were proclaimed 'independent'. Thus seven million South Africans remain aliens in the country of their birth, subject to the provisions of the Aliens and Immigration Laws Amendment Act of 1984 which require them to obtain permission to live in, or work in, 'white' South Africa.¹⁸ In addition, the abolition of pass laws has also been accompanied by the introduction of administrative measures consciously manipulating black access to land, housing and jobs in urban areas (under the umbrella of the 'orderly urbanisation policy' enunciated by the President's Council) and by a firm implementation of the Trespass Act. Thus, while the legal and administrative underpinnings of the migrant labour system have undergone surface changes, the system remains intact to be inherited by a future South Africa.

¹⁶ J Cameron and A Naude, 'A dependence on subsidised transport', Indicator SA 4(1) 1986, p 79.

¹⁷ Report of the President's Council on 'An Urbanisation Strategy for the Republic of South Africa', 3/1985, p 95.

¹⁸ Cape Times, 23 September 1986.

One of the gravest effects of enforced migrancy is found in the distorted patterns of population settlement existing in South Africa that it has helped to produce. Starkly put, this pattern has led to gross overcrowding in the bantustans, an under-urbanisation of South African cities and a marked decline in the proportion of blacks in rural areas outside of the bantustans. Since 1950 there has been a massive shift of population location toward the bantustans. The proportion of the population living in bantustans, after dropping slightly between 1950 and 1960 (from 39.7 per cent to 39.2 per cent of the total African population), rose rapidly to 47.4 per cent in 1970 and to 52.7 per cent in 1980.¹⁹ Presently, over 11.8 million persons live in these areas, which constitute only 13 per cent of the surface area of South Africa. Many of the inhabitants of these areas have been forcibly removed to them (in the Ciskei one out of every four persons living within its borders, or some 161 thousand people have been dumped there since 1970) under policies that have resulted in the uprooting and removal of three and a half million persons in South Africa since 1960.²⁰

A 1980 estimate of the distribution of the population within the bantustans indicated that 1.9 million people live in urban areas within them (many of these areas being vast dormitory towns attached to 'white' cities); 2 million persons live in peri-urban areas in them; 1.1 million live in semi-urban areas, and 6.8 million in rural areas.²¹ It is particularly this last grouping of rural bantustan inhabitants that are cut off from the mainstream economy. Among them unemployment and poverty is endemic and their living conditions, as the recent nation-wide Surplus Peoples Project stated, 'must be seen to be believed'. With this group the importance of households having a remittance income from a migrant, or of having an income from a pensioner, is critical to physical survival. The dynamic underlying the migrant labour system has helped lock these people into the 'dark recesses of the labour market', yet has made them desperately depend upon migrancy to survive in the rural slums in which they are trapped.

¹⁹ C Simkins, Four Essays on the Past, Present and Possible Future of the Distribution of the Black Population in South Africa, Saldru, University of Cape Town, 1983.

²⁰ Laurine Platzky and Cherryl Walker, The Surplus People: Forced Removals in South Africa, Johannesburg: Raven Press, 1986.

²¹ D W Williams et al., op. cit., p 8.

Enforced migrancy has also resulted in the under-urbanisation of South African society. In 1980 some 13.6 million people lived in urban areas (46 per cent of the total population) with the majority of white, 'coloured' and Indian South Africans being urban residents. However only 6.8 million Africans lived in urban areas (32 per cent of the African population). While absolute figures for urban African population growth indicates a steady increase in the number of Africans in towns, these figures are misleading as they obscure a declining urban growth rate which is particularly marked from 1951 onwards. In the three periods 1951-60, 1960-70 and 1970-80 urban African growth rates show this declining rate to be 4.5 per cent, 3.9 per cent and 2.3 per cent.²² Much of this decline is attributable to the strict application of influx controls, although the failure to provide adequate urban housing and schools also contributed to the decline. Recently several estimates of the extent of under urbanisation have been made, against the backdrop of changes in influx measures. Simkins has calculated that the impact of influx controls currently is keeping 'between 1.5 and 3 million people out of the metropolitan/"white" urban areas, in the sense that the African population would rise by that number in the short and medium terms' with free movement of the population. On the assumption that if all African dependants were to join their breadwinners, Simkins argues that the urban/metropolitan population would now rise by 2.3 million.²³ Cameron and Naude provide a larger estimate, stating that if a true 'laissez-faire' pattern of urban settlement took place 'then the 1980 urban population would be swelled by between 4.5 and 7 million migrants and their offspring'.²⁴ Precise estimates either of under-urbanisation, or of possible urban size in the true absence of influx control measures, are impossible to make. But it is clear that if freedom of movement to the towns was to exist there would be enormous immediate needs for housing, schools, employment and basic community facilities for the new residents entrants to urban areas. Such needs would be in addition to those already existing in these areas.

²² C Simkins, Four Essays . . . , op. cit.

²³ C Simkins, Four Essays . . . , op. cit.

²⁴ op. cit., p 81.

In the search for survival and for a family life many people presently are entering the urban areas, despite often facing the risk of prosecution for illegal squatting (if they live in an unproclaimed black area) or of being fined up to R600 (if they are TBVC 'citizens' without permission to be in the area) and then 'deported'. In Cape Town the Western Cape Administration Board has released figures indicating a dramatic increase in African migration into the city over the past year. According to the Board figures, the net migration into the greater Cape Town area in February 1985 was about 9,000 persons per month. However, between December 1985 and May 1986 some 130,000 people entered the area, that is about 26,000 people per month, or almost three times the estimate at the beginning of 1985.²⁵ Such migration is placing considerable strains on facilities already chronically under-supplied and is leading to a rapid growth of squatter communities. Much of the movement into the Cape Town area consists of women and children joining breadwinners. The skewed sex and age ratios of the African population in Cape Town (a feature of most 'white' urban areas) help to point to why this is taking place. In 1980 in Cape Town among the African population there were 1.95 males to every 1 female, and the population predominantly consisted of men of working age.²⁶ The movement into cities is clearly a desperate search for family life as well as for survival by the unemployed and by those dependent upon the earnings of breadwinners in the area.

With one out of three African workers being migrant labourers the migrant labour system cannot be dismantled overnight. Given freedom of movement not all migrants will wish to live in family circumstances near their place of work; their living conditions as migrants however will require urgent upgrading. Freedom of movement will lead naturally to many migrants and their families settling permanently in urban areas. While this will increase the pressures on the already under-supplied facilities in the urban areas it will go some way to repairing the damage to the fabric of family life that generations of migrancy has wrought. The full cost of repairing this damage in a future South Africa will be of enormous magnitude and can be repaired only over many years.

Unemployment

The South African economy is characterised by widespread and ²⁵ Cape Town City Council, Low Cost Job Creation in Cape Town, July 1986, p 17.

²⁶ Annual Report of the Medical Officer of Health, Cape Town, 1985.

growing unemployment. In the past decade only half of the necessary jobs to provide work for those entering the labour force and for the unemployed have been created. It is impossible to obtain an accurate picture of the extent of unemployment and under-employment in South Africa as official figures are both inadequate and unreliable. Several estimates of unemployment exist, with Nattrass estimating there to be 1 million unemployed black workers in 1985, and Giliomee indicating that the pool of black unemployed and under-employed workers now has swollen 'to nearly 3 million, or 25 per cent of the black population' (of working age).²⁷ Most recently a report compiled by eight actuaries has indicated that 37 per cent, or 4.5 million persons, of the working age population are either unemployed or under-employed. Detailed surveys give support to these figures.²⁸ A Vista university survey in the Port Elizabeth-Uitenhage area in 1985 indicates that black unemployment stood at 50 per cent; a self-survey in 1985 by residents of Atlantis near Cape Town revealed a 50 per cent unemployment figure; a 1983 survey in Grahamstown indicated a 30 per cent unemployment rate.²⁹

Projections of future unemployment provide an even bleaker picture. By the year 2000 an additional 3.6 million new jobs will have to be created merely to absorb new work-seekers entering the job market, that is 250,000 jobs per year. However a total of 6.8 million new jobs will be needed if unemployment and under-employment is to be eliminated, that is over 450,000 jobs a year.³⁰ Other projections to the year 2000 point to there then being 8.07 million employed persons and 9.85 million unemployed or under-employed workers. In other terms this projection indicates that in 2000 some 55 per cent of the South African population of working age will be unemployed or under-employed.³¹ This projection is by no means conservative, for it is based on the assumption of a 2 per cent economic growth rate over the period 1985-2000. As a result of the current economic recession and increasing isolation of the South African economy this growth rate is unlikely to be met and it is probable that the level of unemployment therefore will be greater than this estimate.

²⁷ Jill Nattrass, 'The year 2000 from the 1986 viewpoint', Energos (13) 1986, p 17; Giliomee, op. cit. (1986), p 38.

²⁸ D W Williams et al., op. cit., p 7.

²⁹ Vista survey reported in Cape Times, 5 August 1985; Atlantis in Argus, 12 August 1985; Grahamstown in D Gilmour and A Roux 'Urban black unemployment and education in the Eastern Cape', Carnegie Conference on Poverty, Paper 120, University of Cape Town, 1984.

³⁰ Bureau of Market Research Report, 1984.

³¹ D W Williams et al., op. cit., p 7.

Three groups in particular are currently hard hit by unemployment. First the young, among whom unemployment is concentrated. A recent survey of Mdantsane found that school leavers had a one-in-three chance of finding employment and that the duration of their unemployment frequently exceeds one year. Experience in other countries points to the conclusion that school leavers who do not quickly obtain jobs are less likely to then obtain them in a climate of general unemployment. Other South African studies have shown that the chances of finding employment on leaving school are not greatly affected by the length of schooling and a projection has been made that if present trends continue by the year 2000 some 3.5 million black South Africans with Standard 8 to Standard 10 qualifications will fail to find employment customarily associated with that level of education.³² South Africa therefore potentially faces the prospect of a rapid growth in the numbers of unemployed youth, including those who are fairly well educated. This, as Giliomee notes, is a potential political time-bomb of the most serious dimensions.

A second group hard hit by unemployment are women, particularly those in the depths of the rural areas. In the economically buoyant 1960s the proportion of women in employment grew considerably, with the rise slowing in the 1970s and 1980s. The rise was particularly marked in the metropolitan areas among black women and Simkins currently estimates that women in this group who are age 15-59 are three times as likely to find employment as their bantustan counterparts.³³ No accurate figures exist of unemployment or under-employment among women, in either the urban or rural areas. However it is evident that declining employment opportunities have an immediate and harsh impact on women, as is shown by even the unreliable official figures on unemployment indicating that in 1985 some 54 per cent of the African unemployed were women and that the proportion of 'coloured' women classified as unemployed exceeded the male unemployment rate (8.5 per cent versus 7.9 per cent).

A third group among whom unemployment and under-employment is most prevalent are those living in the rural areas, and here it is probable that the 'deeper' a person lives in a rural area the more likely he or she is to experience or be affected by unemployment. Again no firm figures exist of rural unemployment but informed estimates, such as that made by Keenan for 1984, indicate that there is a 50 per cent unemployment rate in the Ciskei, Bophuthatswana, Lebowa, KwaZulu and Gazankulu areas.³⁴ In such areas a high proportion of households have females as their heads, because of migrant husbands, and survive on the remittances from them. A survey of 4,500 Transkei households found that more than half of the households survived on a cash income of R80 per month and that more than 90 per cent of this income came from migrants. Some 300 per cent of the families survived on less than R50 per month, 95 per cent of this coming from migrant remittances.³⁵ Unemployment among migrant workers thus has immediate and devastating effects on those living in rural areas.

³² H Giliomee, op. cit., (1986), p 38.

³³ ibid (1986), p 9.

It is clear that a massive programme of job creation requires to be undertaken. Only a handful of estimates of differing reliability and accuracy exist concerning the cost of job creation. Such estimates vary according to the assumptions made about the capital and labour requirements of differing economic sectors and areas, and the ability of parts of the economy to absorb labour. One calculation points out that between R4,000 million and R6,000 million annually is required to provide the 1,500 jobs per day needed to meet the demands of work-seekers.³⁶ Most calculations are agreed in identifying a need to create a minimum of between 1,000 and 1,500 jobs per working day to meet the need for work among the South African population.

In an important study by Abedian and Standish of the University of Cape Town, an estimate is made on the costs of starting to address the problem of unemployment.³⁷ They take two sets of figures: first the figures used in the ineffectual Unemployment Relief Programme in October 1985 of the cost per head in creating a job, which amounted to R2,036, and also the cost per head of creating a training position, which amounted to R1,333. Next they then calculated the percentage of the 1932 budget spent on the poor white problem at the height of the attack on it and conclude that 15.8 per cent of the budget was devoted to financing 'a gigantic and well orchestrated public works programme that set in motion a process which succeeded in eradicating white poverty'. If a similar proportion of the 1986 South African budget, namely 15.8 per cent, was devoted to generating jobs, then R5,936 million would become available. This sum would generate a total of either 2,920,000

³⁴ Argus (Cape Town) 29 October 1985.

³⁵ Reported in Race Relations Survey 1983, p 365.

³⁶ Reported in Race Relations Survey 1984, p 217.

³⁷ Iraj Abedian and Barry Standish, 'An economic inquiry into the poor White saga', Saldru Working Paper No. 64, University of Cape Town, November 1985.

jobs, or 5,240,000 training positions—for electricians, secretaries, bricklayers, book-keepers and so forth.

The attack in the 1930s on the 'poor white' problem involved both the political power and determination to gather economic resources (from a combination of tax increases, budget reallocation and borrowing) to devote to combating and eventually eradicating 'white' poverty. The 1930s experience demonstrated, among other things, that a fundamental reallocation of economic resources is required if unemployment and the poverty associated with it are to be eradicated. Without such determined reallocation, the spectre of South Africa that in little more than fourteen years time, more than half of every two South Africans of working age will be unemployed or under-employed. Employment in the informal sector of the economy will not provide the solution to this critical problem. Lange calculates that by the year 2000 the informal sector of the economy will provide employment for 13 per cent of economically active persons, leaving 36 per cent of persons of working age unemployed.³⁸ It is reasonable to conclude that between one-third and one-half of the South African population wishing to be economically active will be unemployed by the year 2000 unless radical measures are taken to address this situation. Even given a completely changed political and economic system the creation of sufficient employment for the South African population forms a major challenge that will be difficult to meet.

Housing

Figures from all sources are agreed that the housing shortage in South Africa is gigantic and growing annually. A variety of different estimates exist of the size of this shortage and of the projected need for housing. One estimate, by the Venter Commission, placed the size of the housing shortage in 1980 at 6,130 units for whites, 51,780 for 'coloured' persons and at 160,540 units for the African population (outside 'independent' bantustans).³⁹ The Commission noted that these are low estimates and that different calculations would change these figures to shortages of 18,000 units for whites, 80,000 units for 'coloured' persons, 240,000 for Indians and 240,000 for Africans.

³⁸ A Rouwkens de Lange, Rand Daily Mail (Johannesburg) 18 July 1984.

³⁹ Survey of Race Relations 1984, p. 375.

A more recent National Building Research Institute report places the existing shortage of housing in the urban areas of 'white' South Africa in March 1985 at 634,000 units and indicates that there is a surplus of 37,000 thousand houses for whites, while shortages for the 'Coloured', Indian and African population are placed respectively at 52,000; 44,000 and 538,000.⁴⁰ This report states that 'Overcrowded conditions are particularly severe in the urban black townships. The fact that 7.4 million people presently live in only 466,000 relatively small housing units, ie on average nearly 16 persons per dwelling, is indicative of the seriousness of the situation.'⁴¹

Other figures cited by Kentridge indicate that in 1984 there were only 421,000 family housing units for blacks in the urban areas, giving a figure of twelve people per unit, or three people per room. International standards generally consider that more than 1.5 persons per room constitutes overcrowding.⁴²

However measured, the existing housing shortage is acute and growing. By the year 2000 it has been estimated that 4 million new housing units will be needed, which will require the construction of 600 housing units per working day until that point. The present building rate is below twenty units a working day.⁴³ The Venter Commission report states that between 1980 and 2000 an estimated 3,551,500 houses will have to be built, at an annual cost of R8,749 million (in 1981 prices) in order to provide for the increase in the urban population and to eliminate existing shortages.

In face of the existing shortages, the overall quality of housing, particularly for the African population, is declining. Increasing numbers of people are being forced to seek shelter in squatter areas. As such squatter camps generally are 'illegal' if they are built in 'white' South Africa, these camps have grown primarily within the bantustan borders. Sutcliffe provides examples of such areas and their population: Greater Inanda in the Durban region (500,000); Edendale-Zwartkops near Pietermaritzburg (over 250,000); Winterveld in Bophuthatswana (over 300,000); Mdantsane in the Ciskei (over 100,000) and within 'white' South Africa, Crossroads near Cape Town (over 60,000).⁴⁴

⁴⁰ Housing Research Review (8) National Building Research Institute, 1986.

⁴¹ ibid., p 1.

⁴² M Kentridge, 'Housing in South Africa: from political privilege to basic right', Carnegie Post-Conference Paper, Saldru, University of Cape Town, November 1986.

⁴³ ibid., p 7.

⁴⁴ ibid., p 7.

These squatter areas are packed with poverty and unemployment and their growth is testimony to the realities underlying the abstract figures of housing shortages.

The decline in the already low quality of formal urban housing is also marked. As Kentridge points out 'many urban black houses are in serious state of disrepair and a gigantic programme of renovation is needed to make these houses decent habitations.'⁴⁵ He emphasises that it is not merely the houses in these areas that are in need of upgrading, but the total environment in which they are set, which lacks basic facilities and an adequate infrastructure. The bulk of black townships were designed in the 1950s as instruments to facilitate control of the black population (the number of entrances into them is limited and they are generally surrounded by buffer strips of land) and they were principally constructed as dormitory suburbs for black workers required in the economy. They form sterile and overcrowded environments which are totally unscaled in terms of the human activities which they must accommodate. Each area, in terms of its feel and the opportunities it offers, is the same as the others. They are simply uni-functional sleeping areas with little or no sense of place. There is nowhere to escape the privations of the overcrowded private dwellings, save the scaleless streets or the wind-swept 'open spaces', which are in reality, simply unsightly and dangerous dumping grounds for rubbish.⁴⁶

A revealing study of Nyanga, a black residential area 20 km from central Cape Town, by Sikwebu documents the low quality and inadequacy of housing and facilities in one such area.⁴⁷ The official population size of Nyanga in 1980 was 24,020 (although the population, as in all urban areas, is considerably greater than the official figure due to the presence of people living in the area 'illegally') and is accommodated in both hostels and houses. In 1984, Sikwebu indicates that there were 1,838 houses, having a total of 5,260 rooms, and using the 1980 official population figure for those living in houses in the area this reveals there to be three people per room for each small house. The real figure of people per room is inevitably higher than this. In addition Nyanga contains 336 hostel units for migrant workers, which have 1,314 rooms and 8,138 beds, giving an average of over seven people per room. All formal housing in the area is bleak and drably uniform, with the hostels providing a particularly harsh physical environment in which to attempt to live. Up to twenty-two people share the use of one toilet, and basic necessities such as ceilings and internal doors are not provided in most council hostels and have to be installed by the occupants at their own expense. The cumulative effect of poor pay, squalid living conditions and migrancy is socially devastating on the inhabitants of Nyanga.

⁴⁵ ibid., p 8.

⁴⁶ David Dewar, 'Urban poverty and city development: some perspectives', Carnegie Conference Paper No. 163, Saldru, University of Cape Town.

⁴⁷ Dinga Sikwebu, 'Area Study of Cape Town: profile of Nyanga', Carnegie Conference Paper No. 10a, Saldru, University of Cape Town, April 1984.

Facilities within Nyanga equally are undersupplied or do not exist. The area contains only three formal pre-schools that cater for 241 children with the result that many young children roam the streets while their parents are at work. A one day clinic operates in Nyanga and Sikwebu reports that on a daily basis people start to queue for attention outside it at 6 am, two hours before it opens its doors. There are only five sports fields for the Nyanga population; there is no children's playground, no post office; no chemist; no public library; no dentist and no railway line running into the township. The area, nevertheless, has thirty-three shebeens selling liquor and a mobile police station.

Nyanga forms a microcosm of the housing crisis in black urban areas and demonstrates that this crisis does not only involve a shortage of housing but is a deeper one, involving a lack of elementary community facilities, the existence of hostile physical surroundings and an absence of choice and control by the inhabitants over the environment in which they live. It is not possible thus to speak of the housing crisis that South Africa is in, as if it involves only the provision of physical housing stock.

Nutrition

The quality of any nation's health, and the adequacy of its nutrition, are overwhelmingly determined by the nature of its economic and political structure. Measures of under-nutrition and ill-health provide a clear indication of the depth of inequalities in South Africa and point to the size of the task ahead in creating an equitable society.

Poor nutrition is a key factor in infant mortality, as it is with a range of other diseases. In an important study Hansen has estimated that about one-third of all black children in South Africa under the age of fourteen are under-weight and stunted for their age. Currently this means that some 2.9 million children are below international height-weight-age standards and suffer from malnutrition.⁴⁸ Other research has shown that on average about 3 per cent of the population under 5 years suffered from acute nutritional diseases such as kwashiorkor or pellagra and it is estimated that each year between fifteen to thirty thousand children die as a direct result of starvation and illnesses related to under-nutrition.⁴⁹ These figures find direct reflection in the infant mortality rates, which form an indicator of nutritional status. The nation-wide infant mortality rate among the African population in 1982 was 80 per 1,000 live births, among the 'Coloured' population 59 per 1,000, as contrasted to the rate of 13 per 1,000 among whites.⁵⁰ National infant mortality figures however disguise the important feature that geographical location is a crucial variable in determining the chances of a child surviving their first year of life.

There is evidence that the nutritional status of black children is improving in the metropolitan areas of South Africa. The infant mortality rate among African children has dropped in Soweto from 232 in 1950, to 35 in 1979 and in Cape Town the rate has dropped from 59 in 1975 to 37.8 in 1985 among permanent urban residents.⁵¹ However rural bantustan areas contain rates far in excess of the national average, with Knutzen and Bourne indicating among rural families with no access to migrant earnings the infant mortality rate to be 282 per 1,000 live births, and among children of migrants in rural areas to be 227 per 1,000.⁵² Bantustan areas are clearly among the worst environments in which to raise children.

Within the bantustans, Fincham reports community surveys of ambulant pre-school children that showed in the Elim Hospital area of Gazankulu one-third of children to be under-weight, and in the Gelukspan area of Bophuthatswana that half the children were under-weight.⁵³ These figures point to serious nutritional problems in these areas and comparable figures are reported in surveys of the Ciskei, Transkei and KwaZulu. The nutritional status of African adults likewise reflects the urban rural divide—with rural adults tending to be ⁴⁸ J D L Hansen, 'The child malnutrition problem in South Africa', Carnegie Conference Paper No. 208, Saldru, University of Cape Town.

⁴⁹ R J Fincham, 'Food and Nutrition in South Africa', Carnegie Post-Conference Paper No. 1, February 1985.

⁵⁰ Survey of Race Relations 1984, p 723.

⁵¹ Soweto figures provided by Hansen op. cit., Cape Town, in the Annual Report of the Medical Officer of Health 1985, p 2.

⁵² V K Knutzen and D E Bourne, South Africa Medical Journal (51) 1977, p 392.

⁵³ op. cit., p 4.

more stunted in their growth than their urban counterparts (and about a quarter of rural males being more than 20 per cent under-weight).

Fincham surveys several recent research papers on nutrition in South Africa and draws out four features of South Africa's nutritional status. First, that while severe forms of malnutrition exist, particularly in the bantustans, the gravest nutritional problem is under-nutrition, the lack of adequate food supplies within the black population. Second, that nutritional conditions vary geographically and that the further people are removed from a stable urban community the worse their nutrition is. Third, a lack of sufficient protein and an excess of carbohydrates are producing obesity, particularly among urban black women. Finally, 'There is evidence to suggest that levels of nutrition of people in rural areas have been static over time or have declined' and when people move to urban areas their nutritional status invariably improves.⁵⁴ Clearly, a basic necessity is to have a nutrition policy that can deliver adequate food to all the population.

Conclusion

The extent and depth of problems to be tackled in the welfare arena in a future South Africa is daunting. The dismal catalogue of human need that it will face is reflected in the widespread poverty present in South Africa, with half of all households living below the least generously drawn poverty line; in a migrant labour system that has made one of every three African workers a migrant and which has wreaked havoc on family life; in growing unemployment that has currently resulted in three million persons being without work; in the present shortage of housing in urban areas of 630 thousand units, and in the inadequate nutritional status of the black population that has meant that some 3 million children suffer from under-nutrition.

Decades of minority rule have resulted in a gross maldistribution of resources and produced inequalities which are structured, deep and tenaciously defended by their beneficiaries. South Africa's steady descent into a state of overt and endemic violence is one measure of the price that is being paid as a result of apartheid. In the welfare arena the impact of minority rule will leave South Africa with a bitter legacy of deep seated problems and it is virtually certain that even the best intentioned and well organised post-apartheid government will be unable to muster the resources to deal with these problems in less than two generations.

⁵⁴ Ibid., p 7.

At this point a note of optimism can be injected. A future South Africa that excises apartheid from its structures will release the resources that this policy consumes, which then could be directed toward meeting the basic needs of its people for food, employment, housing and education. The direct costs involved in maintaining and operating apartheid programmes are enormous. They include the costs of ten bantustan governments; of providing duplicated services in such areas as health and education; of supporting a swollen bureaucracy, administering apartheid laws; of paying for police, courts, magistrates, prisons and defence forces, who are all involved to greater or lesser degrees in enforcing the policy, and the costs of carrying out such policies as population removals from 'white' areas and implementing Group Areas legislation.

It can be currently calculated that the direct annual cost of apartheid in budgeted state expenditure, in the 1985-86 financial year amounted on a low estimate to R2,800 million, on a medium estimate to R3,900 million and on a high estimate to R5,700 million. These estimates are cautious and include neither past capital costs of items such as buildings, nor any of the economic costs born by individuals and non-State bodies in having to operate under the apartheid system. Yet these figures indicate that between 10 and 21 per cent of the annual budget is devoted to financing apartheid machinery. In other terms, some twelve cents out of every rand spent by the State in 1985-86 was directed toward maintaining and enforcing segregation, in imposing apartheid programmes and on policing the system.⁵⁵

The end of apartheid rule will release considerable financial resources that can be directed toward the very problems that apartheid has aggravated and produced. The size of the resources released will be dependent upon many factors but with the excision of apartheid they will form part of any redistributive efforts to provide basic welfare for the population.

When the deadening grip of apartheid is released, and the creative potential and imagination of South Africans allowed proper scope, many of the inequalities to be dealt with could become more manageable. For example, widespread public works programmes could be instituted which would both build up needed facilities such as houses, schools and community centres and provide employment and training for many. Similarly, a movement of resources from curative to preventive medicine could have an immediate impact on infant mortality and lead to far greater community involvement in health care and in efforts to eradicate disease. Similarly, there exists at present much vacant land around even the major urban areas on which to put 'site and service' schemes for housing. These, if well organised on the principle of secure tenure and provided with adequate basic services, would reduce the pressure on the supply and maintenance of formal housing units. This would be one way forward that would harness considerable human potential in the search for solutions to this critical problem of providing shelter and housing.

⁵⁵ M Savage, The Cost of Apartheid, University of Cape Town Inaugural Lecture series, No. 121, August 1986.

In themselves none of these proposals seems capable of redressing the grotesque imbalances of a society that has been seriously ravaged and haemorrhaged. But it should be recalled that South Africa has a rich resource base and its economy is only semi-developed. To begin seriously the task of addressing its welfare problems South Africa must first reach a domestic political accommodation, only then will its economic potential be able to be harnessed for the benefit of its people and, indeed for the entire region.

South Africa's post-apartheid constitution

The post-apartheid South African government will inherit probably the most authoritarian and centralised political structure on the continent. Just what use is made of that system, developed to implement, maintain and then 'reform' white minority rule, will determine the success of a non-racial, democratic society. There are both dangers and opportunities for the new rulers. Those, to some extent, will be determined by the way power is handed over. Will it be by negotiation? When will those negotiations take place? Will it be through a collapse of the white government in the face of international sanctions and a massive increase in guerrilla activity and civil unrest? Or—in the least-likely scenario at the moment—will it be through the world community, or a part of it, intervening militarily?

The difficulty of predicting with any confidence how and when—or if—negotiations for the new South Africa will take place complicates the scenario of future constitutional development. It is assumed that the 1984 Constitution will still be in place, perhaps adapted further to meet the needs of P W Botha's 'reforms'. This constitution, with its racist base and all its unsatisfactory aspects, is unlikely to be a foundation for the non-racial, democratic state that will follow apartheid. Its predecessor, the 1961 Constitution that was introduced when South Africa became a republic, is, perhaps, closer to the model that the majority of South Africans would like, shorn, of course, of its racial exclusions. But whatever constitution is eventually introduced, the white establishment—or what is left of it—will presumably be governed by the 1984 model.

Negotiation, from the perspective of early 1987, seems an unlikely possibility. Pretoria is defiant; 'reform' has ground to a halt at least until after the whites-only election called for this year, two years ahead of schedule; civil unrest is being handled at a cost that is not yet too great for the country's security budget or white morale; sanctions have still to prove themselves; the divestment campaign is gaining ground but often merely transfers ownership from one group of whites to another; and there has been a significant lowering of expectations that Nelson Mandela will be freed, the essential first of many steps needed before any negotiations begin. The most likely group to be at the negotiating table is the ANC. But two of the ruling National Party's hardliners, Minister of Defence Magnus Malan and former Law and Order Minister Louis le Grange (now moved, in a gesture of contempt to parliamentary democracy, to Speaker of the House of Assembly) spelled out the government's thinking during the party's federal congress in August 1986: 'To the ANC, violence is simply an extension of the political process,' Malan said. 'That is why there can be no possibility of talking to the ANC. If one removes violence from the ANC, there is very little left of the organisation.' Le Grange added: 'We don't negotiate with terrorists. We fight them.'¹ P W Botha's attitude when, on 31 December 1986, announcing the election, was no less hostile. From the ANC's side there are no signs that the government is prepared to reconsider its conditions for negotiation: the unconditional release of Mandela and all other political prisoners; the release of all detainees; the halting of all treason and political trials; the ending of the State of Emergency; the withdrawal of police from black townships; and the recognition of the ANC as a legitimate political party.²

Pretoria's rhetoric does not always match its actions, but since the collapse of the Commonwealth Eminent Persons' Group mission in mid-1986, this appears to be a period when it does. P W Botha is now electioneering and may retire after his expected triumph at the polls. The jockeying for the succession assumes a new importance in the National Party caucus. Right-wing Afrikanerdom is still perceived, or is meant to be perceived, as a threat to the National Party. Until the election is safely out of the way, a qualitative leap in government thinking is unlikely, although some as yet unspecified 'reforms' are to be put to the white electorate for approval. But even the Group Areas Act, now under investigation by the President's Council preparatory to changes or (less likely) its abolition, is now apparently to be retained intact.³

The decision to keep, at least for the present, the Group Areas Act illustrates the workings of what South Africa's former Ambassador to Britain, Denis Worrall, calls 'the limited democracy which we have at the moment'.⁴ It points to some dangers facing any post-apartheid government of taking over any of the legislative structures at present in existence, even as a temporary expedient. It will take a determined exercise of will to implement a democratic government in conditions of probable chaos, bitterness and uncertainty when strong government will be essential.

¹ AP (Johannesburg), 13 August 1986.

² AP 20 January 1986.

³ The Guardian (London) 26 November 1986.

The President's Council, with a membership of sixty, has an in-built government majority: twenty are elected by majority vote of the House of Assembly and another fifteen are nominated by the State President. The other twenty-five members come from direct elections by the House of Representatives (the Coloured chamber) and the House of Delegates (the Indian chamber) and from opposition ranks in all three houses.⁵ In the case of the Group Areas Act, the council's constitutional committee spent two years reviewing the legislation. Its recommendations may include a 'local option' that municipalities shall be able to take their own decisions about de-segregating suburbs. The government majority simply referred the report back to the committee for 'further investigation'.⁶ This prompted the three Progressive Federal Party members of the Council to withdraw temporarily, and put the Coloured and Asian members in some difficulty. Both the two Coloured and Indian members of the Cabinet are committed to abolition of the Act⁷ and their parties' representatives on the President's Council were expected to withdraw as well: the Reverend Alan Hendrickse has even threatened to pull out of the House of Representatives unless the Act is scrapped.⁸

But a boycott of one of the three houses—or the President's Council—will not prove fatal. Provision is made for reduced participation: the legislative function continues through any house that can still sit. In the event of a partial boycott of any of the three houses, a reduced quorum is permitted.⁹ If there is an opposition boycott of the President's Council, it can still function: the quorum is 30, five less than the number of government supporters. Further, the constitution allows ⁴ Sixth Report from the Foreign Affairs Committee, House of Commons, London, Vol 2, 1986 [FAC] p 123.

⁵ South Africa 1985: Official Yearbook of the Republic of South Africa, Pretoria: Department of Foreign Affairs, 1985, [Yearbook] p 127.

⁶ The Guardian, 26 November 1986.

⁷ Roger Omond, The Apartheid Handbook, London: Penguin, 1986, [Apartheid] p 36.

⁸ The Guardian, 26 November 1986.

⁹ Apartheid . . . p 45; Yearbook . . . p 126.

any house to appoint fewer members than its quota, so a refusal to name members of the President's Council will not cripple that forum either.¹⁰

The 'new' 1984 constitution was drafted with all these eventualities in mind based on past experience—the boycott of the Native Representative Council in the late 1940s and the refusal of the Coloured Representative Council in the 1960s to pass a budget, for example—and future possibilities. In most other countries, parliamentary boycotts would provoke severe constitutional crises: in South Africa they are anticipated by legislation and the semblance of democracy maintained. That is important both to keep Pretoria's few remaining allies friendly and for internal reasons as well. However parliament is re-constituted, there may well be temptations to copy some of the provisions that allow for the legislative process to continue in the event of boycotts—and it does not take a great imaginative leap to anticipate walkouts by different groups in the post-apartheid parliament.

The Group Areas Act is not the first item of legislation to have its fate decided by a handful of people. The constitution provides for several different ways to resolve conflicts between the three chambers. One such route is to refer a disputed 'general affairs' Bill, ie one that is deemed to affect more than one race or, in the stilted words of the constitution, 'matters which are not own affairs of a population group', to the President's Council for arbitration. The Council decides on one version which is 'deemed to have been passed by parliament'.¹¹ Several Bills have been so deemed: the South African Police Special Account Bill which allowed for secret projects by the police; the Local Government Affairs Amendment Bill,¹² the Internal Security Amendment Bill, providing for detention without trial of up to 180 days; and the Public Safety Amendment Bill. In the last two cases the Bills were supported only by the National Party members of the Council.¹³

This useful way of forcing legislation through the tricameral parliament has some drawbacks in constitutional theory and practice. Collective cabinet responsibility is one, although one that has long been a dead letter. J H Hofmeyr, as Minister of the Interior, voted against the legislation depriving Africans in the Cape Province of their common roll vote in 1936.¹⁴ More recently, in 1978 a demand that the cabinet

¹⁰ Ibid.

¹¹ Apartheid . . . pp 42–4; Yearbook . . . pp 125–6.

¹² Apartheid . . . p 44.

¹³ South African Press Association, Johannesburg [SAPA] 20 June 1986.

¹⁴ Leonard Thompson and Andrew Prior, South African Politics, New Haven and London: Yale University Press, p 73–4.

should resign because of its collective responsibility for the Muldergate scandal was rejected on the grounds that a judicial commission of inquiry exonerated other ministers.¹⁵

The Reverend Alan Hendrickse said in January 1986: 'It does not mean that because I am a member of the Cabinet that I endorse decisions of the Cabinet or the policy of the National Party. . . . Our participation in that particularly high echelon of government must be seen in terms of seeking for change.'¹⁶ The sole Indian cabinet minister, Amichand Rajbansi, and Mr Hendrickse both dissociated themselves from the President Council's decision to pass the two security laws in June 1986.¹⁷ This, in fact, was foreshadowed when they were appointed: P W Botha said that the rigid application of collective cabinet responsibility would no longer apply and that members of the cabinet could disagree with a cabinet decision provided they cleared it first with the State President. This, Mr Botha said, departed from the Westminster system of collective responsibility but was in line with countries having coalition governments.¹⁸

The converse of this departure, as Professor John Dugard of the University of the Witwatersrand argues, is that 'the cabinet minister, white or brown, who does not publicly dissociate himself from a cabinet or ministerial decision violating human rights must be seen to give it his positive support. He cannot evade moral or political responsibility for his conduct by invoking the doctrine of collective responsibility.'¹⁹ Just what kind of government will emerge in the days after apartheid has been ended is, at best, unclear but some kind of coalition is likely. Collective cabinet responsibility will again, inevitably, be raised as an issue.

The 1984 constitution, like its predecessors, is flexible—but now even more so—and the question of a rigid or flexible post-apartheid constitution will be one of the most important decisions to make. Bearing in mind the history of South Africa since the establishment of the Union in 1910, the arguments for a rigid constitution with built-in safeguards against the kinds of abuses that have been seen in the past decades are strong. The original South Africa Act laid down entrenched clauses that could not be changed 'unless the Bill embodying such repeal

¹⁵ ibid.

¹⁶ South African television (Johannesburg) 7 January 1986.

¹⁷ Sunday Times (Johannesburg) 22 January 1986.

¹⁸ South African Journal on Human Rights (Johannesburg) May 1985, p 52-4.

¹⁹ ibid.

or alterations shall be passed by both Houses of Parliament sitting together, and at its third reading be agreed to by not less than two-thirds of the total number of members of both Houses.²⁰ These clauses protected the franchise rights of the Africans and Coloureds in the Cape Province (those in the other three provinces had no rights to protect) and the equality of the two official languages. Both have been changed: Afrikaans was substituted for Dutch in 1925, Africans were removed from the common voters roll in 1936, and Coloureds, after a long legal battle in 1956.²¹ The Senate was abolished from the beginning of 1981²² to make way for the President's Council and now the entrenched clauses guaranteeing equality of English and Afrikaans can be amended by a two-thirds majority of the House of Assembly alone.²³

As if this increased constitutional flexibility was not enough, the courts cannot 'inquire into or pronounce upon the validity of any Act passed by parliament' apart from the sole remaining language equality clauses.²⁴ The role of the courts in validating or invalidating post-apartheid legislation is also an issue that will have to be examined. The ANC, in the words of Jack Simons in the June 1985 issue of Sechaba, official organ of the ANC, seeks formal equality 'guaranteed by law and providing equal rights to all people'. Some kind of independent arbiter apart from a democratically-elected legislature will be essential.

Even legislatures can be manipulated, as history has shown. In 1981 the government loaded the parliamentary arithmetic even more in its favour through a constitutional amendment providing for four nominated members to the House of Assembly and another eight elected by MPs on the basis of proportional representation for the parties in the Assembly.²⁵ Further, rural constituencies have been 'loaded' since 1910 by up to 15 per cent fewer voters than required for urban seats, giving these voters—mainly Afrikaners—undue strength.²⁶ Any similar loading in the post-apartheid constitution will favour Africans—

²⁰ South Africa Act, section 152

²¹ Thompson and Prior, op. cit., pp 85–8. The long Nationalist campaign to remove the Coloureds from the Cape common voters roll has been written about extensively. In brief, the government had to resort to enlarging the Senate to get its two-thirds majority at a joint sitting with the House of Assembly and to packing the Supreme Court with government supporters so that the removal of the Coloureds would not (again) be overturned.

²² Yearbook . . . p 139.

²³ Ibid., p 140.

²⁴ Ibid., p 136.

²⁵ Ibid., p 140.

²⁶ Thompson and Prior . . . pp 76–7.

perhaps even people like Chief Gatsha Buthelezi whose power base is stronger in the rural areas of KwaZulu than in urban areas.

The 'first-past-the-post' electoral system is another issue: it helped the National Party whose support has been spread fairly evenly throughout rural constituencies and in some urban ones while opposition voters have been more widely dispersed: by some estimates the first National Party government with a majority of voter support was in 1961—that is thirteen years and three general elections of minority government. To what extent the 'first-past-the-post' system will help or hinder an organisation like the ANC is another area that will have to be considered.

It seems likely that proportional representation will not be favoured by the ANC. Such a system might well be considered to run the danger of fragmenting the black vote, although the converse of this argument would be that minorities would be more adequately represented.

The flexible constitution, the government's lack of inhibitions in abandoning parliamentary conventions when judged suitable and rigid party discipline ensured that an increasingly authoritarian state was relatively easy to put into place, particularly after 1948. All these factors that militate against the democratic process need careful thought in the post-apartheid constitution.

Parliament has become increasingly irrelevant except as a legislative rubber stamp or as a forum for opposition questions which sometimes unearth information the government would rather keep hidden. Even the National Party caucus, bound by strict party discipline, has lost authority. The Prime Minister, and now the State President, have accrued more power at the expense of the caucus, parliament and finally the cabinet. The trend became marked under Hendrik Verwoerd, the architect of classical apartheid. He was due to make a major speech on 6 September 1966 spelling out his vision—and therefore his future policy—on the black homelands: neither his cabinet colleagues nor the caucus were reported to know what this was. But he was assassinated shortly before he was due to speak, and his vision went unrecorded. His successor, B J Vorster, reverted more to a 'chairman of the board' approach to cabinet business, but the trend towards even greater powers for the police and defence force accelerated. Under P W Botha, the constitution was changed to provide for an executive presidency with powers akin to, and even exceeding, those of De Gaulle.

These authoritarian trends have been aided by the establishment and increasing prominence of the State Security Council. Its members include the President; the Ministers of Defence, Foreign Affairs and Law and Order; the head of the National Intelligence Service, the chief of the Defence Force, the Director-General of Foreign Affairs, the Director-General of Justice and the Commissioner of Police. Other ministers and senior officials can be asked to attend meetings.²⁷ Co-opted ministers now include those responsible for constitutional development, education and finance. Professor Deon Geldenhuys and Dr Hennie Kotze, both of the Rand Afrikaans University, have said that the ssc has 'probably' reduced the full cabinet's decision-making role: 'Apart from the fact that the full cabinet is only brought into the picture—at the prime minister's discretion [now the state president's]—on an ex post facto basis, cabinet discussion of ssc decisions is bound to be further inhibited by virtue of the decisions carrying the prime minister's stamp of authority.'²⁸ The ssc is the only cabinet committee created by law, the only one chaired by the Prime Minister/State President and its task of advising the government on the formulation and implementation of policy and strategy in relation to national security is 'broad enough to embrace virtually every area of government activity at home and abroad'.²⁹

The ssc has under it the National Security Management System (NSMS) which composes at local level about 500 Joint Management Centres. Its members include police, military, government and municipal officials who are supposed to identify and solve local grievances. The strategy behind it, according to James Selfe, a Progressive Federal Party researcher, includes removing local 'pinpricks' such as poor living conditions which could lead to unrest. If the military or police recommend a political solution to counter a security threat, this is referred upwards to the ssc and cabinet.³⁰

The ssc and the NSMS can be expected to be abolished under a post-apartheid government. Most of their members are unlikely to be very sympathetic to the new government and this in itself will be a danger, given the experience they have had and the network of communications built up. The new government probably will have to build from scratch a whole new local government structure. A further problem could well be the 'tradition' of a compliant parliament and a

²⁷ Apartheid . . . p 154.

²⁸ Ibid.

²⁹ Ibid.

³⁰ Star (Johannesburg) 12 October 1986.

strong executive presidency, given the disorder that is likely to accompany the transfer of power.

It is not only the central South African government that is highly authoritarian. The 'independent' and 'self-governing' black homelands or bantustans have been ably taught, or learned well, the habits of Dr Worrall's 'limited democracy'. The four 'independent' homelands are, to all intents and purposes, one-party states with power concentrated largely in the hands of the Prime Minister or President. Most have relied on chiefs nominated to the legislatures to gain and maintain power: in Transkei, for example, Kaiser Matanzima, despite having won a minority of elected seats, became Chief Minister in 1963 through the support of government-paid chiefs.³¹ Potential or actual rivals within the ruling Transkei National Independence Party or in the opposition have been ruthlessly dealt with: detained without trial, less often charged, and sometimes forced into exile.

Similar events have occurred in the other 'independent' states: Ciskei, Bophuthatswana (although to a lesser extent) and Venda. In the 'self-governing' homelands, democracy is also, at best, a frail plant. In all these 'states', as in South Africa itself, the system has, at least in part, maintained itself through 'security' legislation, the power of patronage and bloated civil services which provide secure and relatively well-paid employment. The cost to Transkei of its public service in 1983-84 was R226.58 million—36 per cent of its total budget.³² In the same year there were 44,127 Transkei civil servants, one for every 59 persons.³³ All the homelands are heavily dependent on South Africa: Pretoria's contribution towards their total budget varies from between 42.9 per cent (Bophuthatswana) and 77 per cent (Transkei).³⁴

The homelands will pose problems for any post-apartheid government. Their existence as administrative and political units will be difficult to ignore although the ANC wants to abolish the bantustans as symbols of apartheid. But they provide, as the Transkei example above shows, an important source of employment for thousands of people in areas where unemployment is high—the by-product of government policy in pushing 'superfluous appendages' of black labour back to the homelands. And whatever the faults of the homeland system, they will

³¹ Barry Streek and Richard Wicksteed, Render Unto Kaiser: A Transkei Dossier, Johannesburg: Ravan Press, p 110.

³² Apartheid . . . p 114.

³³ Ibid.

³⁴ Ibid., p 113.

almost by necessity provide the post-apartheid government with a source of administrative experience and ability.

The position of the largely-white civil service controlled by Pretoria will be even more problematical. They provide the administrative tentacles that administer apartheid and, on the basis both of experience in South Africa and other newly-independent African countries, will be less than whole-heartedly in favour of any post-apartheid government. The limited 'reforms' introduced by P W Botha in the early and mid-1980s were often hindered by the conservatism of the civil service. One of the 'reforming' ministers, Piet Koornhof, at the head of the vast bureaucracy controlling African affairs, likened it to a tortoise. Koornhof is said to have lost his job as a cabinet minister precisely because the bureaucracy's obstructionism hindered the desired 'reforms'. Although there may have been a desire for 'reform' at the top, this did not necessarily reflect at the lower levels—the people actually dealing on a daily basis with Africans.

The Westminster convention that the civil service is neutral and that it will serve any government with willingness and competence is a very questionable assumption, particularly in the South African context. It will be even more so in any post-apartheid state. National Party policy, from its coming to power in 1948, was to Afrikanerise the civil service, both because it felt this would better serve its political aims and to provide employment for many relatively-impooverished Afrikaners. Over the years this was ruthlessly implemented and expanded to the extent that an English-speaking white civil servant at any degree of seniority is a rarity today. Although by no means all English-speakers favour getting rid of apartheid, this shortage of senior white civil servants less wedded to apartheid than many Afrikaners will be an additional problem.

Almost by necessity, perhaps, and reflecting the divisions in the country, the post-apartheid government probably will have to move in the direction of having senior officials appointed from outside the ranks of the civil service, more on the American model, reflecting the views of the elected politicians.

The size of the civil service is and will be another problem. By early 1986, 22 per cent of all urban white adults worked for the government—more than one million people.³⁵ In the black community, 29 per cent of blacks in the metropolitan areas of South Africa worked for the government. They were said, in July 1986, to form an elite: 35 per cent of black adults with household incomes of more than R900 a month were government employees; among those earning R600 to R899, a total of 34 per cent worked for large government concerns. Only in the lower-income group—those earning between R200 and R599—were there more private enterprise employees: 38 per cent against 18 per cent working for the government.³⁶ This relatively large number of civil servants will have to be accommodated somehow by a government that will face economic problems on many fronts.

³⁵ Business Day (Johannesburg) 7 February 1986.

But one thing a post-apartheid government will not have to worry about is the actual cost of administering apartheid: in 1986 Professor Michael Savage of the University of Cape Town estimated that 12 cents of every Rand in the previous year's budget went on maintaining apartheid. He said that apartheid cost the country R8,000 million in lost economic growth because of racial restraints on human resources, loss of potential skills and lost investment. The immediate costs of running the country's legislative network—three houses of parliament and ten legislative assemblies with 1,270 members, and 121 ministers—was nearly R50 million a year. There will be few savings better earned in the post-apartheid state than those of maintaining apartheid. Duplicated facilities of 151 government departments, Professor Savage said, cost more than R130 million a year.³⁷ But some duplication of facilities will be inevitable in a post-apartheid government, at least initially.

Just what form the post-apartheid constitution will take is not clear. The ANC, regarded by many observers as the natural heir to power, has not publicly committed itself to any future constitutional settlement. Its director of information, Govan Mbeki, told the British House of Commons Foreign Affairs Committee in mid-1986 that:

The only thing we have said is that we want to see a united democratic and non-racial South Africa; we want a South Africa in which the population is not defined by race or ethnicity; that this group concept is totally done away with, and that the question of what kind of constitutions we have (because a constitution requires legitimacy, acceptance) is exactly one of the issues that would need to be addressed fundamentally in a negotiating process . . . in specific terms, as of now, we certainly do not have any blueprint.³⁸

Earlier, in October 1985, Mr Mbeki said that 'the ANC would be very much in favour of an entrenched bill of rights in a new constitution for ³⁶ Evening Post (Port Elizabeth) 4 July 1986.

³⁷ Star, 30 August 1986.

³⁸ FAC . . . p 112.

South Africa, but entrenching the rights of individuals, not the rights of groups, because those groups would get defined in the same way that the apartheid structure is defined today.³⁹ Curiously, after years during which it resisted any bill of rights, ministers now appear more ready to accept one. In today's climate, a bill of rights would be little more than a legalistic joke; post apartheid a bill of rights could and should be an essential part of the constitution. How it will be guaranteed is another problem: the South African experience to date has shown, government propaganda to the contrary, that the judiciary has not been a shining beacon of freedom. Ironically, perhaps, the very history of oppression could be the best guarantee that the post-apartheid judiciary will be better than the present and past generations: among the advocates and attorneys are a number who have distinguished themselves defending political prisoners and who are far better qualified to sit on the bench than many of the present incumbents.

Mr Mbeki said that the ANC does not favour a federal constitution. He said: 'We would not want to federate these constitutional units that the apartheid system has created. We cannot say we need a federal structure which must recognise the reality of the bantustans . . . we are saying a united, democratic and non-racial South Africa.'⁴⁰

Others, however, have different ideas. Chief Gatsha Buthelezi agreed with a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee in January 1986 that a federal arrangement, based principally on geography rather than race, could be a possible solution to South Africa's problems.⁴¹ This approach motivated Chief Buthelezi to set up the Buthelezi Commission in 1980 to inquire into possible constitutional arrangements between the KwaZulu homeland and the Natal provincial authorities. Optimistically, this inquiry was viewed as a potential model for future, country-wide negotiations. It proposed a legislature for all race groups in the region.⁴² This led to the Natal/KwaZulu Indaba, which brought together representatives of a number of different strands of opinion in the area. It reported in November 1986 recommending:

- A two-chamber legislature, one of 100 members elected by universal suffrage through proportional representation, and the second of fifty members with equal representation for African, Afrikaans, Asian and English 'background groups'.

³⁹ FAC . . . pp 8-9.

⁴⁰ Ibid.

⁴¹ Ibid., p 95.

⁴² Ibid., p 84.

- A provincial governor appointed by the State President on the advice of the provincial legislature;
- A prime minister and ten-man cabinet;
- A Bill of Rights entrenched constitutionally and an independent judiciary.
- 'Cultural councils' to protect cultural rights.
- A council of chiefs of Africans and 'traditional authorities' to be treated as part of local government.⁴³

As in all South African political life, the proposals exposed some code language that can mean different things to different people. The least subtle is the protection of 'cultural rights'; the black converse in this case is the respect for 'traditional authorities'. 'Cultural rights' translated means 'group rights'—the insistence, usually by whites, that the group must be regarded as more important than the individual. In the parlance of the National Party this has come to mean continued white domination. In the Natal/KwaZulu Indaba it appears to have meant, at least on the part of some conservatives, power-sharing on an 'equal' basis with Zulus—as long as the white minority enjoyed an overriding veto.⁴⁴

Even this did not commend itself to the ruling National Party. The Natal National Party leader and Minister of Home Affairs and Communications, Stoffel Botha, who represented the party at the Indaba, effectively rejected the proposals. In London, however, the then South African Ambassador, Denis Worrall, denied that this was government policy. Yet the Minister of Constitutional Development and Planning, Chris Heunis, distanced the government from the Indaba, denying that he had promised a referendum would be held among whites, Coloureds and Indians to vote on the Indaba. Significant bodies of Afrikaner opinion also rejected the Indaba proposals, including the Durban Afrikaanse Sakekamer and the Handelsinstituut (two commercial organisations) and the Federasie van Afrikaner Kultuurvereniging (an important cultural coordinating group).⁴⁵ Although the Indaba proposals were presented at a time when the government appeared preoccupied with the forthcoming election and was therefore keen not to be seen to be agreeing to political 'integration', the initial response to this mild set of proposals hardly augurs well for any productive talks in the immediate future.

⁴³ Weekend Post (Port Elizabeth) 29 November 1986.

⁴⁴ Financial Mail (Johannesburg) 7 November 1986.

⁴⁵ Eastern Province Herald (Port Elizabeth) 3 December 1986.

Group rights are seen as important in a future post-apartheid South Africa even by the official opposition Progressive Federal Party. In November 1986 a move to drop from the party's constitutional policy the right of a minority to veto legislation was defeated. This was despite the support of Mrs Helen Suzman, widely respected in the party, and the urging of Dr Ntatho Motlane, former chairman of the Soweto Committee of Ten and an influential black politician, for the party to align itself with the ANC's Freedom Charter.⁴⁶

As these sections of the white establishment were making their attitudes clear, a public opinion survey revealed the attitudes of some urban blacks towards ending apartheid. The survey needs to be treated with some caution, however, as more than half those approached were unwilling to answer questions on political affairs. Of those who did reply, 74 per cent said they would prefer a multi-racial rather than an all-black form of government. Seventy-four per cent were also said to have preferred to seek an end to apartheid by negotiation rather than violence. Only 13 per cent said they advocated violence as a solution to the impasse on the total elimination of apartheid. In the 18-24 age bracket, this rose to 17 per cent. Thirty-six per cent said they would be happy to support any blacks willing to work with P W Botha on a national statutory council; 16 per cent said that they would regard blacks on the council as sell-outs, while 9 per cent wanted black leaders to boycott the council.⁴⁷

This survey appears to show that there is less rigidity among blacks than is sometimes thought. Another survey, conducted by the Community Agency for Social Enquiry with the Institute for Black Research (CASE/IBR) found in September 1985 that 20 per cent of urban Africans questioned would accept a federal compromise in post-apartheid South Africa while 80 per cent wanted a unitary non-racial democracy—as favoured by the ANC, PAC, UDF and AZAPO.⁴⁸ Another authoritative poll, conducted by the Institute of Black Research in December 1985 to January 1986, asking about preferred parties and leaders, concluded 'that black people are not as monolithic as white fear conceives them to be; that a significant, though small, proportion of blacks favour existing white political parties and leaders, this being particularly marked among Indians and Coloureds; that black people perceive a considerable choice of leaders, both black and white; that there are marked regional variations in political choices.⁴⁹

⁴⁶ Natal Mercury (Durban) 24 November 1986.

⁴⁷ Argus (Cape Town) 1 December 1986.

⁴⁸ Mark Orkin, The Struggle and the Future: What Black South Africans Really Think, Johannesburg: Ravan Press, p 50.

From the other side of the political fence, the 'differences' have long been emphasised for white political motives. Dr Worrall, for example, told the House of Commons Foreign Affairs Committee in June 1986 that 'it is particularly difficult to find the right constitutional formula for South Africa because the fact is that there is a tremendous incompatibility of interests in South Africa. . . . We are not really one nation and do not have a single perceived history or one single set of shared heroes. . . . there are no models on the continent of Africa and no real precedents one can look at if one is not interested in substituting black rule for white rule and if one is interested in creating, in place of the limited democracy we have at the moment, a fully-fledged democracy. . . . one-person, one-vote in a unitary state is unacceptable to the white South African, in particular to the Afrikaner. The best possible deal he can hope for in terms of this would be like the Basques of Spain, and the worst possible deal he can have is to become a Palestinian in South Africa. . . . blacks are going to have to realise that the final constitutional form should take into account the group and community character in South Africa. . . . white South Africans will have to accept that numbers in the final analysis will be decisive, but it is extremely important that the right of self-determination of the Afrikaner people in particular can somehow be recognised.'⁵⁰

Various other whites have tried to make provision for Afrikaner self-determination. Extreme right-wingers in organisations like the Afrikaner Weerstandsbeweging (AWB), the Conservative Party and the Herstigte Nasionale Party have played around with maps and constitutions that, in one form or another, would give Afrikaners control over the Boer 'heartland', usually defined as the Transvaal, Free State and part of Natal. The rest of the country, the assumption goes, could be parcelled out to the various other contenders. But this is the stuff of dreams and myths, an attempt to return to a simpler age when Bible, musket and laager were all that the Afrikaners needed. The desire to maintain Afrikaner 'self-determination', however, is still strong in most ranks—whatever the constitutional framework.

That is perhaps the major obstacle for any peaceful, or relatively ⁴⁹ Institute for Black Research, Political and Economic Choices of Disenfranchised South Africans, Durban: Institute for Black Research, 1986, p 8.

⁵⁰ FAC . . . pp 123-4.

peaceful, transition. Publicly, at least, the ANC is opposed to any kind of guarantees for group 'rights' and will not accept any constitution that provides for Afrikaner 'self-determination'. It is also debatable whether the English-speaking community would wish to be lumped together with the Afrikaners in a constitution providing for Afrikaner 'self-determination'. On the other hand, they would probably be keen for reserved white seats on the Zimbabwe model—but again this is something that the ANC would not countenance publicly at this stage. Some kind of federal constitution, allowing for 'local autonomy including the right to what cabinet minister Gerrit Viljoen termed 'own residential areas, own schools, own education departments and own separate political representation'⁵¹ would probably emerge as the whites' favoured compromise. But that would be unacceptable to anybody else, perpetuating as it would large elements of the apartheid system. It would also go against the grain of the ANC's commitment that the equality it seeks is 'formal, guaranteed by law, and providing equal rights to all people . . . an essential element of a democracy'.⁵² Any framework as envisaged by Viljoen would leave some people—today's oppressors—more equal than others.

And that, in whatever guise it is presented—apartheid, separate development, parallel development, or the latest euphemism, 'cooperative co-existence'—is what the majority of whites still want. On 31 December 1986, P W Botha announced that the long-awaited white election would be held in early 1987 and that the electorate would be asked to vote on more 'reform' measures. There was no indication then that it would involve any significant degree of real power-sharing. Negotiations leading to any kind of qualitative change of South African society still look a long way off.

⁵¹ Apartheid . . . p 53.

⁵² Sechaba, June 1985.

South Africa's media: the commercial press and the seedlings of the future

'The Financial Mail has been edited to comply with the emergency regulations,' reads a warning buried on page fifty-three of a recent issue of South Africa's leading business magazine. 'Information may therefore be distorted, incomplete and misleading.' Never before in the history of South Africa's beleaguered media have those three adjectives been more fitting than in the period since the imposition of a State of Emergency—the second in less than two years—in June 1986. The Emergency regulations specifically bar representatives of the media from entering areas of unrest without the permission of the police; reporting any statement which incites people to take part in unlawful strikes, boycotts, demonstrations, protest meetings, any acts of civil disobedience, or any actions which undermine military service; promoting disinvestment or the application of sanctions; inciting any member of the public to resist or oppose the government; and—the most restrictive clause, so wide as to bar almost anything—reporting or disseminating a 'subversive statement'. Perhaps even more shocking than this list of media shackles is the fact that they represent no temporary aberration (as the reference to 'Emergency' would seem to indicate) but rather a logical extension of a long-term state plan, aimed at cowing and controlling South Africa's media, which dates back more than a decade.

A series of exposés in the English-language newspapers in 1978 revealed the secret and illegal influence-buying campaigns of the government's Information Department. These began with the establishment of a $74 million slush fund in 1972 and created the so-called 'Muldergate Scandal' which ultimately led to the fall of Prime Minister John Vorster and his Information Minister, Connie Mulder. While the liberal press hailed its revelations as evidence that freedom of the press still thrived, the scandal actually served only to replace one section of the ruling National Party with another. The subsequent ascendancy of the former Defence Minister, P W Botha, has since been coupled with unprecedented state efforts towards media manipulation. Botha's government commissioned a study on press coverage of security matters in 1980 which urged a tightening of constraints on press freedom. A second 'Steyn Commission of Inquiry into the Mass Media' in 1982 exhorted the South African media to inform the public of the 'total onslaught' to which the country was being subjected by the Soviet Union, the Third World, and even certain circles in the West, concluding that 'government credibility must at all times be maintained and strengthened'. The specific recommendations of these government commissions, ranging from the implementation of a 'National Communication Strategy' to the establishment of a statutory register of journalists from which any could be struck off and banned from the profession for life, raised such a public outcry that the government backed down. The long-range strategy, it now appears, was not to force such clear abrogations of the cherished ideal of South Africa's 'free press', with all the attendant negative publicity, but rather to win for the government bargaining chips, for use in future negotiations with the media.

Anyone doubting the advantage of behind-the-scenes government pressure, as opposed to public regulation of the media, need only glance at a confidential memo issued by the Chief of the South African Defence Force, entitled 'Guidelines on Statements in Respect of Sabotage and Terrorism: The Need for Security Consciousness and Responsible Reporting'.¹ 'While the need exists for the general public to be informed and reassured concerning acts of terrorism,' the memo counsels, 'keeping the public informed must be weighed against providing the enemy with intelligence.' The succinct conclusion: 'As a general rule, "the least said, the better" applies.' The memo goes on to warn spokesmen for the South African Police and Defence Force, victims of attacks, as well as media representatives, that they should not mention in public statements any of the following information: how the guerrillas entered or left the premises to launch an attack, details of 'enemy casualties (especially if anybody is captured)', or which access routes were followed.

Although the professed goal of this memo was 'to deny the enemy the intelligence that would assist him to replan his strategies and methods in an effort to attack the RSA more effectively', this directive also seems geared to operate on an ideological level. Since the rise in popular and armed resistance to apartheid following the uprising in the black township of Soweto in 1976, the South African government has, in particular, tried to suppress all information about the political demands of its opponents. The rationale of the Minister of Law and Order, Louis le Grange, is simple: 'Terrorists want publicity for their demands in order to inspire their followers.'

¹ Reproduced in Julie Frederikse, South Africa: A Different Kind of War, London: James Currey, 1986; New York: Beacon Press, 1987; Harare: Mambo Press, 1986; Johannesburg: Ravan Press 1986.

Any outside observer, unencumbered by the fear and ignorance of all the resistance politics so assiduously cultivated by the ruling white minority, would recognise the short-sightedness of such an approach. Banning all reporting of the strategies and motivations of the major anti-apartheid movement, the underground ANC, is a transparent attempt to discredit the organisation as a reasonable political movement and to portray its members and leaders as mindless, bloodthirsty anarchists, bent on violence purely as a means of instilling terror in the white population and intimidating the black majority. The only sure success of such a policy will be in fanning the fear and ignorance of whites, while obscuring any understanding of the grievances of blacks and of the real nature of the conflict that is at the root of the current political upheavals.

The decline of the liberal press

Although more than 60 per cent of South Africa's white and most of the 'Coloured' population group are Afrikaans-speaking, the English-language press dominates the scene, accounting for more than three-quarters of total daily circulation and two-thirds of Sunday circulation.² While the Afrikaans press is in effect the media arm of the ruling National Party and the mainly Afrikaner-owned business interests that support it, the English press reflects the views attached to the English-owned, mainly mining-oriented capital that controls the small opposition party in the white section of Parliament (the House of Assembly), the Progressive Federal Party (PFP). The majority of anti-apartheid activists define the terrain of resistance politics as extra-parliamentary, and see both the PFP and the liberal press as a token opposition, inextricably and unacceptably bound to the state, though the information to be gleaned from the English-language press is certainly appreciated.

² William A Hachten and C Anthony Giffard, The Press and Apartheid, New York: Macmillan, 1984.

If there was one living symbol of the positive contribution of the white-run opposition press in South Africa, it was Johannesburg's Rand Daily Mail, whose editors and reporters were prosecuted for their exposés of prison conditions in the 1960s and the information scandal in the 1970s. Although the 1980s were seeing the Mail's image beginning to tarnish, especially after the political sacking of its outspoken editor, Allister Sparks, the decision of the Anglo American Corporation-owned newspaper monopoly to close the Mail and its sister Sunday paper, the Express, in April 1985, still sent shock waves through media circles all over the world. Many observers saw cynical political motives on the part of English capital, which has, in this season of 'reform', closed ranks with Afrikaner big business and thus no longer needs such a strident anti-government mouthpiece. As the leader of the ultra-right-wing Herstigte Nasionale Party (HNP) observed, 'Big business interests had clearly decided the two papers could be sacrificed for the sake of encouraging co-operation between the government and the PFP.' Other analysts believe that it was, ironically, the Mail's success in championing black causes that ultimately brought it down, for the paper had sought the bulk of its advertising revenues from white-owned and oriented businesses.

Two other English dailies and a black Sunday paper were also closed in the wake of the Mail's demise, and three of the country's five biggest black publications passed from white liberal control to one of the two government-supporting Afrikaans press monopolies. Media critics have begun to worry that 'South Africa's already battered commercial press could end up resembling the Rhodesian press during the last years of Ian Smith's rule, reflecting only the views of a tiny minority'.³ On the brighter side, the ever-narrowing job options for liberal journalists prompted several former editors and reporters to pool their severance pay and launch the independent Weekly Mail in June 1985. Its influence is greater than its 20,000 readers would indicate, as the paper has become essential reading for foreign journalists, diplomats and anti-apartheid activists and it is freely available abroad by subscription. If the new Mail's price—more than a rand per copy—puts it out of the reach of most blacks, another new national weekly is aiming to fill that vacuum. Edited by a veteran black journalist, Zwelakhe Sisulu (son of Walter Sisulu, an ANC leader imprisoned with Nelson Mandela), the New Nation is sponsored by the South African Catholic Bishops Conference. The weekly non-racial but black-oriented paper was inspired by the South African bishops' call for a publication 'designed to enter into the life, struggles, needs and burning aspirations of the majority of South Africa's people', and by the findings of a feasibility study that South Africa's 'large, relatively compact urban population' is now approximately 40 per cent black, with literacy levels as high as 80 per cent in many areas. Both the New Nation and the Weekly Mail are small and struggling, but the fact that they represent the only significant media voices not controlled by either the government or big capital makes them more free and independent than any other commercial media ventures in South Africa today.

³ 'Behind closed doors', Work in Progress (36) 1985, and None But Ourselves: Masses vs Media in the Making of Zimbabwe, London: Heinemann, 1983; New York: Penguin, 1984; Harare: Zimbabwe Publishing House, 1983; Johannesburg: Ravan Press, 1982.

The consensus carrot and the press-bashing stick

This is Pretoria's self-proclaimed era of reform, and the government has no desire to be seen to be further expanding its legislative arsenal against the media. On the contrary, the credibility of the government's reforms depends on the image of a healthy opposition from within the system—expressed in the context of what Pretoria has dubbed 'consensus journalism'. In mid-1984, on the eve of the first sitting of the tricameral parliament, and the burgeoning mass protests that finally forced President P W Botha to declare the first State of Emergency a year later, the Minister of Constitutional Development announced that 'the new deal' would require a 'media style' that would highlight 'consensus opportunities' rather than concentrating on 'problems causing conflict'. The Minister, Chris Heunis, went on to explain that, while the government agreed that it was necessary for the media to point out problems, such observations should always be balanced against the 'potential for consensus'.

As it happened, the events of the eighteen months that followed presented a challenge even for pro-government journalists to emphasise any positive 'potential for consensus', with well over 1,000 people killed in township violence, mainly by the police and army. As a result, the government suddenly dropped the consensus carrot and once again grabbed the press-bashing stick. A telling recent instalment in the recurring clash between government and the media centred not on the newspapers but rather on television. South Africa entered the era of 'ungovernability' with enough laws to constrain the words used to describe the mass protests engulfing the country. Pictures emanating from the townships have, however, been harder to control. Pretoria's first response was to 'blame the messengers' who were bringing to the rest of the world the bad tidings of intensifying civil war in South Africa. During President Botha's much-derided 'Rubicon speech' of August 1985 (in which he bitterly disappointed even his staunchest Western supporters with a total lack of new initiatives), Botha accused the electronic media, asking: 'How do they explain the fact that they are always present, with cameras, at places where violence takes place?' A resident of one of Cape Town's troubled townships wrote to the Financial Mail with an apt repartee: 'To continually maintain that sympathetic journalists are acting as catalysts and making actors out of protesters is another example of the unceasing attempts to pass the buck—and the buck stops in Pretoria.'

The escalation of the government's 'blame the messengers' media policy into a more determinedly anti-press freedom policy of 'kill the messenger' came with the graphic worldwide television coverage during the first State of Emergency (declared in July 1985 and lifted in March 1986, only to be reimposed on a wider scale three months later). The state-run, monopolistic South African Broadcasting Corporation was instructed by P W Botha as far back as 1980 'not to feature reports of the onslaughts on South Africa by revolutionary elements as main news items'; thus the footage from the townships that South Africans watch in their living rooms is routinely sanitised. It was not the local tv fare, but rather the tales of what is seen in the living-rooms of the rest of the world, that began to worry Pretoria in 1985. 'Overseas one is confronted with footage we don't see here at all,' reported a PFP leader after a trip to New York. 'What comes over very clearly is that it's not just a handful of agitators causing unrest in South Africa—it's a whole community in protest.'

It is precisely the spectre of mass protest, motivated by frustration and commitment rather than by 'a handful of agitators', that the government vainly hopes to excise from the public consciousness. The wave of media coverage outside South Africa after the declaration of the State of Emergency was followed, inside South Africa, by a concerted campaign against the foreign media that was disturbing even by South African standards. After a brief abortive attempt to cajole the media into 'toning down' reporting on the townships, a security force committee was appointed to monitor news coverage, and the battle lines were drawn. A month after the declaration of the State of Emergency, nine media representatives were arrested in Cape Town and charged with obstructing the police in the execution of their duties while covering an attempted march on the prison where Nelson Mandela and the bulk of the ANC leadership is being held. The next month, Newsweek magazine, which had featured an article on South Africa that was, by all accounts, accurate and fair, had that issue banned from distribution, and its correspondent summarily deported. The following month saw journalists barred from entering Soweto. Countless other journalists have been turned back from townships at police roadblocks and had their film and videotapes confiscated and sabotaged. Many have even been physically attacked and fired at by soldiers and police with tear-gas, bird-shot and rubber bullets.

Then the smear campaign against the foreign press began, with a suspicious build-up of unbelievable stories, said to emanate from unnamed informants among the foreign press corps and anonymous outraged witnesses. They alleged that tv crews were stage-managing phoney unrest scenes by paying black youngsters to riot. (It was later disclosed in the British press that amongst the government's evidence of these alleged media stunts was a letter that proved to be a crude forgery.) The climax of this press-bashing campaign came with an extraordinary Government Gazette announcement in November 1985 banning the use of audio-visual equipment for recording disturbances or unrest situations in the designated emergency areas, except with official permission, and then only with a police escort. The restrictions, which effectively keep all tv crews and still photographers well away from 'hot' areas, were immediately denounced by the Johannesburg-based Foreign Correspondents Association as a thinly-veiled attempt at a news black-out. The black anti-apartheid activist, the Reverend Allan Boesak, went even further. In his first speech since his release from detention (for attempting to organise the peaceful 'Free Mandela' march), Boesak issued this challenge: 'Botha must answer whether the purpose of keeping reporters out of the townships is so that our children can be murdered in circumstances where there will be no witnesses and no record.' Even Britain's Prime Minister, Margaret Thatcher, whose exhortations to the world to 'cut the oxygen supply of terrorism' from the media were quoted (out of context) in defence of the media ban, saw to it that a member of the South African Embassy in London was summoned to the Foreign Office for the Foreign Secretary to convey the British government's displeasure at the latest violation of press freedom.

Psychological warfare

Why, in fact, did Pretoria invite such controversy by imposing the tv gag? One answer is dictated by 'the bottom line'; that South Africa's economy, in the throes of the worst recession in fifty years, could no longer afford to allow the documentation of what appeared to be an inexorable downward spiral into civil war. In the view of sympathetic foreign analysts, 'With the continued negotiations for foreign loans, the growing disinvestment lobby, and the increasing isolation of Pretoria, it was necessary to get those sjamboks (hide whips) off the screens.'⁴ A group of media academics at the University of the Witwatersrand read a more ominous message into the media ban: that it signalled a watershed in state repression, representing a new police and army strategy in the townships 'which would be even more unacceptable to foreign television audiences'.⁵ These academics cited an incident in which Cape Town police hidden in boxes on the back of a government transport vehicle drove through a township street and then leapt out, 'like macabre jack-in-the-boxes', when stones were thrown, ambushing unarmed demonstrators (including children) with shotgun fire. The fact that the so-called 'Trojan Horse incident' was broadcast on international television is believed to have prompted the media ban. The Witwatersrand academics say that the preconceived nature of such a tactic shows that the authorities have reached the end of an ad hoc response to South Africa's conflict and seem to be embarking on a more open 'occupation force' strategy which will deploy a combination of military manoeuvres and psychological warfare techniques that can only be carried out in a sealed-off 'operational area' over which policemen and soldiers have total control. This strategy represents a desperate response to the heightened level of mass resistance. From the vacuum created by the collapse of state control, a new phenomenon is emerging, known in the townships as 'people's power', and evidenced by the development of street committee cells which unite in civic associations to implement (in coordination with union structures) consumer boycotts and work stay-aways.

⁴ Harriet Gavshon, Eric Louw and Ray Williams, 'Shut your eyes and think of nothing', Weekly Mail (Johannesburg) 8-14 November 1986. Sjamboks are rawhide whips used by the South African police in crowd control.

⁵ Ibid.

Black-on-black violence

Although people's power is still in its incipient stages, its potential threat to the state is chilling. Thus the government, the police and the military have launched an hysterical media campaign to discredit anything to do with those denigrated as 'the comrades' or—another new word suddenly discovered by Pretoria—'the necklace'. For township residents, anyone who supports 'the struggle' is a comrade. For the white-controlled South African media, the term conjures up imagery that is not just violent, but 'savage'. Comrades are those who dispense 'medieval justice' in 'kangaroo courts', who, in the words of a typical editorial in the liberal press, 'give no thought to the wanton damage they are doing to people's—their own people's—property and possessions'. 'The necklace', a township term for a petrol-filled tyre which is placed around a victim's neck and ignited, is a weapon used only by those who are unarmed and have no recourse to authority. The fear and loathing with which it is treated in the media—as 'the other side of the story of police brutality'—smacks of hypocrisy for township residents whose daily experience includes police and army harassment, beatings, shootings, detention and torture.

The government's declaration of the first emergency, as broadcast over SABC-TV, was a prime example of how the state can manipulate media imagery toward its own ends. President Botha's announcement was followed by extensive footage of two incidents filmed in the townships: the mass funeral of four black activists who disappeared and were then found with their bodies grotesquely mutilated, and the 'sell-out killing' of a woman believed to be a police informer. At the Cradock funeral, the head of the South African Council of Churches, the Reverend Beyers Naudé, and the Reverend Allan Boesak, were both filmed so that they appeared to be speaking under the banner of the banned South African Communist Party, although in fact they were on a podium draped with scores of anti-government banners. There was, curiously, no sound as the ministers spoke; the impression left was that they were being inexplicably inflammatory. The SABC then juxtaposed the totally unrelated attack on an informer in Duduza, a township more than 500 kilometres north of Cradock. At six on a Saturday evening, prime viewing time for young children, the camera lingered on the gruesome spectacle of a young woman being burned to death by a frenzied mob. The SABC told viewers nothing of the situation that had sparked the 'mindless violence': the suspected spy had been linked to an apparent police 'dirty trick' in which seven township youths had been supplied with booby-trapped grenades which exploded in the young men's faces and killed them. One TV critic summed up the widespread response to that piece of agitprop: 'You don't have to be a psychologist to realise that the average viewer will perceive a simple causal link—the emergency announcement is justified by the rhetorical behaviour of two ministers of religion and the actions of murderers.'

The next month the SABC featured the necklace killing of a soldier of the despised Ciskeian homeland army by a crowd at the funeral of Victoria Mxenge, a respected political lawyer who had been hacked and shot to death by assailants believed to have been either right-wing vigilantes or police. If a Second World War film had depicted a Nazi sympathiser—let alone an SS soldier—being brutalised by members of the French resistance, there would have been no condemnation of their vengeance, yet this African scene (at Mxenge's funeral) was denounced as a 'macabre orgy of barbarism'. Documented cases of the use of the necklace in reprisals represent a tiny fraction of the more than 2,000 deaths during the past two-and-a-half years of unrest. The majority of these deaths are attributable to the security forces, most of whose unarmed victims (according to a recent study) have been shot in the back. White revulsion at the misunderstood dynamics of political violence is such that evidence of the use of the necklace is actually sought out by the state. When thirty-two decomposed black bodies were uncovered in the homeland of Lebowa in early 1986, police immediately issued reports to the media that they 'suspected the infamous necklace method'. Only after a blaze of publicity did it emerge that gangs of rebellious youths, and not comrades, were responsible for the death, and that, according to interviews with residents, members of the Sekukuneland Youth Congress had tried to prevent the attacks on alleged witches. In fact, villagers said that police had warned them not to talk to the media unless it was to tell them that the victims had been killed by comrades.

The necklace has also been linked by the media to street committees and their 'people's courts' and 'disciplinary' committees', although none of the many sensationalised articles on these structures of people's power has ever turned up a shred of evidence of the use of capital punishment in the execution of township justice. Countless black leaders have appealed against intimidation and violence, and several civic associations have expressly banned necklacing. Moreover, the media descriptions of the leaders and members of street committees as 'faceless people' and 'shadowy groups' is not so sinister once one understands that any anti-apartheid activist who becomes known to the police is routinely detained and harassed.

The most straightforward articulation of the government's efforts to make propaganda capital out of the 'black-on-black violence' issue came in an April 1986 speech to Parliament by President Botha. Citing an unsubstantiated figure of more than 500 'brutal murders by radical blacks, mostly by the necklace method', he charged that 'the ANC and its cohorts use these most callous and gruesome methods of terror and extreme violence to intimidate people in order to gain control of the various black population groups.' Botha went on to claim that it was the alarming rise in black-on-black violence that had left the government with no choice but to extend drastically the powers of the police via the Public Safety Amendment Bill, which in effect obviates the need for future States of Emergency by allowing the Minister of Law and Order to take extraordinary measures to curb unrest without even having to give his reasons. In the words of the civil rights lawyer, Nicholas Haysom, 'The use of the "black-on-black violence" label has served to obscure the emergence of a pattern of extra-legal violence by right-wing vigilantes.'⁶ In his study on vigilante groups, Haysom maintains that their purpose is to alter the balance of power in areas where restoring political control is beyond the scope of the security forces, who are 'limited by potential publicity and hindered by legal restrictions in their ability to perpetrate the deliberate terror and violence to combat popular organisations'.

The most devastating single incident of vigilante violence—and the one most widely, though inaccurately, reported in the media—occurred in May and June of 1986, when vigilantes, police and army forces jointly launched an armed assault on the largest and longest-surviving squatter community in South Africa. According to affidavits filed in the Cape Supreme Court, white men carrying weapons were also seen among the conservative black vigilantes who flattened Crossroads, leaving at least fifty dead and 70,000 homeless. Yet, in the face of abundant evidence of state collusion with the vigilantes, and even after an international television cameraman was brutally hacked to death by vigilantes, most of the media clung to the government line that the carnage was a manifestation of the kind of black-on-black violence that is endemic to black politics.⁷

⁶ Nicholas Haysom, Mabangalala: The Rise of Right-Wing Vigilantes in South Africa. Johannesburg: Centre for Applied Legal Studies, University of Witwatersrand.

Objectivity and context

Curiously, the same media commentators who recoil at the necklace murders which they blame on comrades display a great tolerance for the excesses of vigilantes. The ostensibly liberal Sunday Times (Johannesburg) compared 'the white right wing's lack of faith in the ability of the police to maintain order' with 'black vigilantes' lack of faith in police efforts to ensure justice', arguing further that 'the vigilantes are merely responding to the undeniable provocation of the township militants'. Even more disturbing is the labelling of vigilantes as 'moderate', in obvious juxtaposition to the 'radical' comrades and 'communist terrorists'. The State has now begun laying the groundwork for channelling these supposed moderates into the ranks of the newly-established black municipal police forces, thus setting the scene for private armies of vigilantes who owe allegiance to councillors, homeland officials and other state collaborators. In many ways, the state's vigilante strategy can be seen as a domestic counterpart to its regional destabilisation policy. Pretoria's attitude toward the atrocities committed by vigilantes—professed renunciation coupled with a reluctance to prosecute which is ultimately tantamount to arming them—is comparable to its apparent relationship with the armed gangs now terrorising Mozambique. The analogy is even more striking in the light of reports from the eastern Transvaal that vigilantes loyal to the Lebowa homeland government have been supported by soldiers from Phalaborwa, the South African Defence Force military training centre for Frontline State 'dissidents' and mercenaries.

As far as South Africa's commercial media is concerned, however, both the regional and domestic destabilisation campaigns are so under-reported that they remain, for most of the population, Pretoria's secret wars.⁸ While some details and events do find their way into the newspapers, readers are given no framework in which to analyse developments. The same lack of context is evident in reporting on the police and military presence in the townships. For example, several townships in the eastern Cape have actually been ringed with barbedwire fencing, allowing residents to enter and exit only through road-blocks heavily guarded by armed soldiers. Clearly, this is an urban application of the familiar counter-insurgency warfare technique of forcing villagers into 'protected villages' or 'strategic hamlets', in an effort to deny access to guerrillas. Yet this alarming trend, if reported at all, has been presented as an isolated incident rather than as an integral facet of State strategy to crush the opposition.

⁷ See 'Crossroads is not for burning', Press Trust of South Africa, 3 June 1986.

⁸ See Joseph Hanlon, Beggar Your Neighbour: Apartheid Power in Southern Africa, London: Catholic Institute for International Relations/James Currey, 1986.

The constraints on the media that have been promulgated under the latest State of Emergency can best be understood as forming a key component of such a counter-insurgency campaign. Initially, the international reaction to the emergency regulations was fixated on the ludicrous nature of the decrees issued by the new, all-powerful Bureau of Information: actually forbidding journalists from using certain words, so that the government's legislation could not be described as 'draconian', the state itself was not to be called a 'white minority regime', and the hundreds of men, women and children missing from the townships (but whose presence in police cells could not be confirmed) could not be said to have 'disappeared'. At one stage, the Bureau even went so far as to announce that the white spaces that newspapers had left in place of censored copy had been declared 'subversive'.⁹ But ultimately, the tragedy of the latest assault on South Africa's media lies not in the words and pictures that the censors have taken out, but in the vital context and analysis that reporters, editors and camera crews no longer even attempt to include. To be sure, there are the odd analytical interventions, but as one critic has noted about the media that have 'substituted fads, fashion, food and Fergie for what remains reportable', there is 'no point in complaining about censorship in the leaders or opposite editorial pages if other pages are undermining this critical position'.¹⁰

The commercial media's self-perception as an unwilling victim of state repression finds little sympathy among the majority of the population. The General-Secretary of the National Union of Mineworkers, Cyril Ramaphosa, argues that 'repression alone cannot produce the relations of domination and subordination in our society, for legitimacy and consent have to be generated', and he blames the media for playing a crucial role in this process. Most anti-apartheid campaigners vehemently reject the media's characterisation of itself as objective, for, as Ramaphosa puts it, 'under the guise of objectivity, they have been perpetrators of disinformation and blatant propaganda for the minority regime and the capitalist class in our country'. The conventional Western notions of media objectivity seem grossly distorted to the leaders and members of mass-based anti-government organisations. These groups have to struggle for exposure of their views in the commercial media, while the pronouncements and opinions of the government, of government-created 'leaders' such as homeland chiefs and community councillors, and of individuals who represent no mass base are all disproportionately represented. Many anti-apartheid activists are not only disgusted with the pretensions of South Africa's commercial media to espouse a policy of objectivity; they go on to reject the Western concept of objectivity itself. This attitude is most common among the alternative media which describe their politics as 'progressive'.

⁹ Anti-apartheid groups and newspapers have successfully challenged the 'unduly excessive' range of the emergency regulations in court, but the government responded with amendments to the legislation that have in effect nullified most of the court rulings.

¹⁰ Ruth Tomaselli and Keyan Tomaselli, 'The Bureau of Information before the Emergency: from news management to control', Contemporary Studies Unit, University of Natal, Durban.

This more sophisticated understanding of the economic and political base of the commercial press has in turn led to a more sophisticated critique. Authors, journalists and alternative publishers have formed an Anti-Censorship Action Group to monitor and challenge the unprecedented level of media censorship under the State of Emergency. In years past such a group might have tried to meet the editors of the liberal press or perhaps appeal to the Publications Control Board, but in the current climate the group has concluded that it is self-censorship that not only poses the greatest threat, but is also perhaps open to being successfully challenged. Thus, when the country's largest chain of booksellers began to refuse to sell books that they feared might be regarded as 'subversive' under the wide-ranging emergency regulations, the Anti-Censorship Action Group went straight to the chairman of the conglomerate that controls the shops. It appealed to Tony Bloom, the chairman of the Premier Milling Group that owns the Central News Agency, to put an end to CNA's effective collaboration with the government's censorship campaign. Bloom, who was one of the prominent businessmen who travelled to Lusaka in September 1985 to meet with the ANC at a time when big capital in South Africa first began to voice its growing lack of confidence in the National Party's ability to solve the country's problems, responded positively. Similarly, when evidence emerged indicating that a top international courier service (DHL) had cooperated with security police efforts to intercept informational material being shipped out of the country, the Anti-Censorship Action Group went directly to DHL management to argue against this invasion of privacy.

Commercial vs community media

It is now clear that anyone who seeks a representative sample of popular opinion in South Africa must make a concerted effort to monitor media other than the conventional commercial print and broadcast outlets. One could make a start by buying the 'Extra' or 'Africa' editions of the commercial newspapers (for even the liberal press practises a form of media apartheid and produces different editions aimed at black and white readers) as well as the various magazines aimed specifically at the black market (although it should be noted that virtually all 'black' publications are published by white-owned concerns). Reading what the white press prints for blacks at least gives one an idea of what most blacks are reading—though not necessarily endorsing. Blacks in the eastern Cape staged a ten-week boycott of all editions of the East London Daily Dispatch after an editorial called Nelson Mandela and other jailed political leaders 'criminals'. Many blacks said the boycott represented a more general dissatisfaction with the paper's political reporting. 'There was a lack of coverage of events in our areas,' explained the local publicity secretary of the United Democratic Front (UDF, an umbrella group of more than 800 affiliated anti-apartheid organisations, 'and when they did cover anything concerning us it was always one-sided.' When losses to the newspaper's management topped R40,000 with sales down more than 30 per cent, the Dispatch printed a front-page apology, acknowledging that its editorial policy was seen in some quarters as pro-apartheid. The spirit of non-racialism in anti-apartheid circles is such that the Alexandra township consumer boycott committee circulated a pamphlet urging residents to boycott the black-run Sowetan, in a bid to protest at its 'reactionary' politics.

Unfortunately, blacks and other government opponents cannot usually influence editorial policies through consumer boycotts. Increasing numbers of anti-apartheid activists have given up on the commercial press completely. 'I no longer have any confidence at all in the commercial media,' complained one UDF activist, who says she cancelled her subscription to the Johannesburg Star the day it featured a billboard that read, 'ANC Killers to Hang'. 'I'm sick of reading condemnations of "terrorists" and "marauding mobs" or "angry youths"; so now I get all my news and information from word of mouth and from the community newspapers.'

Like the community organisations and trade unions which they promote, community-based and worker newspapers, magazines and newsletters define local, grassroots fights in the townships, schools or the workplace, as part of a broader national struggle against apartheid. Community and worker media is rooted in a context—resistance—that is alien to the commercial press. While the commercial papers aim to inform and entertain, community media works to raise critical awareness. 'All over South Africa, people are hearing the words of the bosses, and the government tv, the radio, the newspapers and films control what we know and think,' stated Cape Town's Grassroots, a community newspaper that has achieved a circulation of 20,000. 'We need to answer back; we need to speak for ourselves, to find ways of reaching people and passing on our own message. The state uses media to control the people; we must use it to liberate ourselves.' Another key difference between the commercial and the progressive press lies, of course, in the fact that profit is the underlying motive for any commercial paper to publish, while the community media aim only to break even, financially, and often rely more on grant funding and donations than selling advertising.

The rise of community media dates back to 1980, and parallels the mushrooming of the civic associations, the independent trade union movement, student organisations, women's groups and religious bodies, culminating in the launch of the UDF in 1983 and the most powerful non-racial labour movement in South African history, the Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU), in 1985. The state's response to the growing influence of community media has mirrored its reaction to the increasing power of the mass-based organisations: media workers, like community activists and trade unionists, are harassed, detained, physically attacked and forced into hiding or exile. The most common form of state repression of the mass-based media has been through relentless bannings by the Publications Directorate; one community newspaper even had its offices, along with those of a range of community and union organisations, blown up.

Community media workers have coped, in turn, by expanding their scope. Some groups, like COSATU and other unions, do not try to produce full-fledged newspapers, but rather a combination of a broadsheet and a pamphlet, which often includes pull-out posters. Learn and Teach, part of a national adult literacy campaign, now prints 25,000 attractive, highly illustrated magazines a month, and though the language level is necessarily low, the contents range from English lessons set in the workplace to overtly political articles to educative comic strips.

State harassment may handicap the production of an issue of a newspaper, but there are always enough people around to print some leaflets. When production of the monthly UDF News proved impossible at the height of the State of Emergency, those members not in jail or on the run poured their energies into the printing of several thousand handbills that proclaimed, 'Leaders detained, but UDF fights on!' This siege mentality has spurred the development and sophistication of new media forms. Johannesburg's Silkscreen Training Project found itself fighting a constant battle against time, in an effort to get its posters and T-shirts out to meetings and funerals before the authorities declared them 'banned for distribution' (or sometimes even for mere possession). The organisation was ultimately hounded out of existence, after equipment was vandalised (by assailants with axes!) and members were detained and banned. The quest for unbannable media has led to a proliferation of freedom songs, T-shirts, hats, bumper stickers, political graffiti, and, the latest innovation, the placing of placard-bearing dummies on lamp-posts and park benches, where they are seen by hundreds of passers-by before they are confiscated by police. Each new political development brings its media counterpart, as the very definition of community media expands daily. Boycotting students hold alternative education workshops and teach 'People's history' in place of the old Bantu Education (now re-named the Department of Education and Training) syllabus. Protesting township residents stage candle-lit vigils, and when the police baton-charge them in the streets, the people retreat into their homes and send a message via a single candle in the front window of every family's home. When even the community newspapers are banned or confiscated, activists duplicate handwritten letters detailing the latest black-out news from the townships.

Although any section of the media that 'furthers the aims of a banned organisation' is considered 'subversive' under South African law, supporters of the banned African National Congress have in effect unbanned much of what can be seen as the ANC's media. While the police are able to arrest anyone found in possession of any ANC publications, it has become impossible for the State to exert much control over the singing of freedom songs, many of which explicitly praise gaoled and exiled ANC leaders. In addition to the clenched fist 'power' salute that is de rigueur at any anti-apartheid function, an increasing number of activists now signal their express support for the ANC with the thumbs-up sign of the movement. Similarly, ANC flags, and even ANC uniforms, are routinely seen at rallies and funerals. The South African government devotes much effort toward attempts at jamming the transmissions of the ANC's Radio Freedom, broadcast from Angola, Zambia, Tanzania, Ethiopia and Madagascar, yet large numbers of South Africans persevere in their efforts to tune in to the programme. One anecdote that indicates the authority that Radio Freedom commands in the townships came from a white activist who had been anxious about the perception of the nation-wide anti-conscription campaign among young blacks. 'You people are doing good work,' the white activist was told by a black friend. 'That's what we hear on Radio Freedom.'

In conclusion, those who wish truly to comprehend the dynamics of the current South African political scene must travel beyond the familiar and predictable terrain of the commercial media and begin to traverse the unexplored terrain of the media that is being shaped by the forces of the evolving conflict. It is worthwhile to recall that the publications once banned by the white minority government of Rhodesia, such as the Catholic publication, Moto, and the Zimbabwe African National Union's monthly, Zimbabwe News, are now sold on the streets of Harare alongside Time and the Financial Gazette. Time, controlled by multi-national capital, and the Financial Gazette, the voice of Zimbabwean business, still thrive in independent Zimbabwe, while Zimbabwe News continues from the war years as the journal of the country's ruling political party. The national broadcasting corporation, state-run by the former minority regime, is now run by the government of majority-ruled Zimbabwe, which formed the Zimbabwe Mass Media Trust in order to buy out all the previously South African-controlled shares in the country's major commercial newspapers. And Moto, still run by the Catholic Church, remains Zimbabwe's most independent media organ.

Comparisons between Zimbabwe's post-independence media policies and the situation in a post-apartheid South Africa are fraught with complications, for reasons ranging from the levels of organisation to the ideologies of the liberation movements in the two countries. Certainly, any new government that is truly representative of the majority of South Africa's population would move to transform the media so that it would no longer represent the view of a tiny minority.

Thus, one would expect to see totally new management at the national broadcasting network. By the same token, there has been much speculation that, as in Zimbabwe, a new government in Pretoria would acquire an interest in the existing newspaper chains, and that newspapers and magazines that are now banned and produced underground would be published freely under an ANC government.

The ANC has, understandably, not divulged any specific blueprint of its vision of the post-apartheid media, arguing that its Freedom Charter provides a broad outline of the non-racial democracy of the future, with the concrete details to be determined democratically by the people of South Africa once they have the power to realise their aspirations. However, some clues as to the ANC's approach are contained in an assessment of 'Monopoly Capitalism, Racism and Mass Media in South Africa' by the ANC National Executive Committee member, Pallo Jordan, who singles out the 'democratic press' inside the country and the ANC's underground media as the 'seedlings of a future, non-monopoly press, dedicated to serving the cause of the people, social progress and peace'.¹¹ Jordan maintains that, 'For these seedlings to grow into maturity requires the overthrow of the apartheid regime, the uprooting of the colonial structures on which it rests and the re-ordering of the economy so that it serves the people rather than a handful of monopolists.'

¹¹ Sechaba (official organ of the ANC) London, May 1986.

Literature and popular culture in South Africa

'People's education', 'people's history': a decade ago these were little more than radical slogans, declarations of intent. Today they represent well-defined transformative practices which the apartheid state seeks, simultaneously, to repress and to co-opt.¹ They are practices in which highly original research and methodology are tested against the experience of a generation who are, as one sixteen-year-old veteran put it recently, 'fighting for the world'.² Looking both ways, to the past and to the future, they are the two faces of a Janus who guards the doorways of many a 'liberated' classroom in which lessons are held under the noses of the patrolling security forces.³ Likewise, they are the two main aspects of a new cultural vista within which the works of literature to be dealt with in this article need to be situated. In all these works we find evidence of a dual process: on the one hand, a decisive break with the hegemonic culture of South Africa's colonial past; on the other, the forging of new continuities with past epochs of cultural resistance.

¹ For an overview of the prospects for 'people's education' in South Africa and the emergence of a transformative practice, see Pam Christie (ed), The Right To Learn. The Struggle for Education in South Africa, Johannesburg: SACHED/Ravan, 1985; Peter Kallaway (ed), Apartheid and Education. The Education of Black South Africans, Johannesburg: Ravan Press, 1984; Zwelakhe Sisulu, 'People's education for people's power', keynote address to the National Education Crisis Committee Conference, March 1986, Transformation 1 (1986), pp 96-117; Jon Campbell, Eric Molobi, et al., 'National education crisis', Work In Progress 45 (November/December 1986), pp 15-28.

For an overview of 'people's history', see Shula Marks, 'Towards a people's history in South Africa? Recent developments in the historiography of South Africa' in Raphael Samuel (ed), People's History and Socialist Theory, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1981; Luli Callinicos, 'The "people's past": towards transforming the present' in Belinda Bozzoli (ed), Class, Community and Conflict, Johannesburg: Ravan Press, 1987, pp 44-64.

² Author's interview with Willie M (fifteen years old), 1986. After he and other scholars had been engaged in a battle with police at a school near Middelburg, during which the school burned down, Willie was brought to Johannesburg by his father, a migrant worker employed as a cleaner in a block of flats. Now sharing his father's room in a 'location in the sky' (as these roof-top compounds are popularly known), Willie is attending a privately-run 'crammer' in the city. He reflected that if his Middelburg comrades were to find out about this they would probably see him as a traitor, and ask him why he was furthering his education when they were 'fighting for the world'.

³ See, for example, Sefako Nyaka, 'The afternoon class flip', The Weekly Mail (Johannesburg) 18-24 April 1986, and 'No school, but quietly classes go on', The Weekly Mail 17-23 October 1986.

The recovery and utilisation of cultural resources buried by the past—uprooted by conquest and dispossession, alienated by educational fiat or diluted by appropriation, silenced by ban, premature death, or life-long exile—is a task for the cultural activist as much as the scholar. It is being pursued under the same range of penalties as before, but contextualised and strengthened by the maturing of the political struggle which marks off the 1980s from the 1970s. Another development which is thus placed on the agenda is the unification of the national culture, long sundered by the phenomenon of exile—a topic which cannot be dealt with here, though its urgency has been poignantly signalled by the deaths within a year of Alex La Guma, Bloke Modisane, and Bessie Head.

That is, as it were, the strategic view within which to range the works to be discussed. They also, however, engage South African audiences and readerships at the level of cultural tactics: drawing on the past, and projecting a liberated future, they also locate the pulse of the present. Here we might discern two related effects. In the first place, the works offer counsel: that is to say, they invite the practical test of the audience-reader's own experience in a relatively unmediated way. They envisage a world in which one can intervene rather than, as in the hegemonic culture with which they have broken, a world which can only be questioned for the fugitive, ever-problematic 'meaning of life'.⁴ In the second place, in the process of opening up to the audience-reader's experience, these works recognise, jostle and interact with a whole range of cultural acts to which that experience is simultaneously exposed.

Attention has recently been drawn—within South Africa, anyway—to some of the more salient and public cultural forms which have been evolved in the acute phase of struggle which has turned many townships and rural areas into only nominally undeclared war zones.⁵ Political funerals, the site around which many of these forms are clustered, are themselves harbingers of a secular future (in terms of the content of funeral oratory, funeral poetry, icons, photographic images, etc), at the same time as 'looking back' to the centrality of funeral arrangements, wakes, processions, memorialising and grave-tending in the cultural past. Militant dance forms—such as the Eastern Cape's toyitoyi with its ritualised 'hand-grenade', 'bazooka' and other movements—and the reworking of traditional resistance songs to render the sharpened context of today's struggle are among the other obvious examples.

⁴ 'The "meaning of life" is really the centre about which the novel moves. But the quest for it is no more than the initial expression of perplexity with which its reader sees himself living this written life. Here "meaning of life"—there "moral of the story": with these slogans novel and story confront each other, and from them the totally different historical coordinates of these art forms may be discerned.' Walter Benjamin, 'The storyteller: reflections on the works of Nikolai Leskov' in Gregory T Polletta (ed) Issues in Contemporary Literary Criticism, Boston: Little, Brown and Co, 1973.

⁵ See, for example, Charlotte Bauer and Ivor Powell, 'Culture as you don't see it at the city hall'. The Weekly Mail 21–27 November 1986, and a letter criticising this article by Kelwyn Sole, The Weekly Mail 28 November–4 December 1986.

These extremely visible expressions—part of their value is that they will adhere even to the most perfunctory media coverage—are only the surface layer of a cultural groundswell which is sweeping South Africa. Something of the momentum of this process was captured by an incident on 23 September 1986 at the Kinross mine in the Orange Free State when management attempted to hold a memorial service for 177 miners killed in an underground fire. The service had barely begun when thousands of miners marched into the arena and began to circle around it. One by one, the black miners who had elected to attend the official ceremony left their seats and joined the procession, which toppled the 'management' pulpit before moving off to another venue where the miners held their own service.⁶

It is the infrastructure of this cultural momentum that needs to be understood. We need to look at political venues such as shop steward local committees and the 'cultural locals' which have now emerged in some areas, or at the house/yard/block/street/area committee tiers in some townships. It is here, as the slogan of 'grass roots democracy' turns into actual democratic practice, that we shall discover some of the most significant cultural innovations—together with the simultaneous recovery and re-evaluation of older cultural resources. What happens here, for instance, in the new patterns of relationship between children and parents, and between men and women, is of crucial cultural importance. So is the resurfacing, in a new context, of older cultural forms such as story-telling as a means of transferring personal experience and enriching the collective bond of community. The works of literature discussed below open on to this space.

A few years ago Mi Hlatshwayo's name was known only to a small circle of family, friends, and workers at the Dunlop factory where he worked as a driver. He was a union member but not a shop steward. In the Black Consciousness period he had attended political meetings at which poems were read. Hlatshwayo listened, stirred by the power of the poetry but discouraged, too: these poets wrote in English, a language in which his own proficiency was limited. Then one day at a union meeting he heard Alfred Qabula *bonga*⁷ in Zulu.

⁶ The Kinross mine disaster occurred on 23 September 1986.

Qabula had submitted the traditional form of the izibongo, or praise poem, to the energy of a new content. Traditional izibongo varied from the short praises developed by youths to identify themselves within the community to the much longer praises composed, collected, and performed by professional *izimbongi*⁸ to honour chiefs: these less ephemeral praises drew attention to the history, achievements, and heroic qualities of the clan as reflected in the person of its leader and his ancestors. In Qabula's version the chief was replaced by the black trade union movement. What he praised was its struggle and the strength it offered through solidarity: it was 'the black forest that the employers saw and ran for safety'.

Hlatshwayo had no formal training in this traditional poetic style. However the Chilibini (St John's Apostolic) separatist church, of which he was a member, had transmuted the praise poem into a distinctive pulpit oratory with which he was familiar. Hearing Qabula brought Hlatshwayo to one of those creative conjunctures with which we are becoming familiar in South Africa today. A cultural resource carried forward from the precolonial period, and utilised inter alia to resist the hegemony of colonial Christianity,⁹ was now becoming available to the organised working class: a new cultural front of the liberation struggle was opening up. After hearing Qabula, Hlatshwayo found his voice as a poet and his role as an activist.

A poem like The Black Mamba Rises Again In Victory aims, as is evident from the title, at a more specific narrative content than the traditional praise poem, which embodies fragments of narrative—usually very disparate, evoking rather than recording the past—only as an aspect of eulogy.¹⁰ Hlatshwayo's poem celebrates the victory of the Dunlop workers after an uphill fight with management and records the main events of this chapter in the recent history of the trade union movement. Yet this centralisation of narrative is not effected without a ⁷ To compose or recite praises (Zulu).

⁸ Bards or praise poets (Zulu). The singular form is imbongi.

⁹ For a background to the impact of separatist Christianity on forms of performance culture, see David B Coplan, In Township Tonight! South Africa's Black City Music and Theatre. Johannesburg: Ravan Press, 1985, pp 80–81.

¹⁰ The use of the word 'eulogy' here draws attention to a formal characteristic and is not meant to imply that the traditional izibongo were never a vehicle for criticism of chiefs and their policies. See Coplan, op. cit., pp 17–18.

strong tussle with the eulogistic tendency of the form he is using. We might summarise the poet's skill as a matter of imposing this conflict on the traditional form and then wrenching the strong resistance which the form offers into a new rhetorical strategy. The narrative is thus repeatedly subjected to 'eulogising' sequences which actually question it and draw out its significance within the broader context of the struggle for worker power and liberation.

Epic stasis and permanence in the traditional form become dynamism and process in the new, while the epic tenses (present and continuous past) are interwoven with the historic past of direct narrative to lift a current event on to an epic plane. The totemic animal symbols which figure in many praise poems are freed from the specific weight of clan histories, and now carry associative bonds which have been created in the popular memory of national oppression and struggle: black mamba, black buffalo, black ants. Qabula's image of worker solidarity as a forest also recurs. Aspects of traditional culture are often brilliantly transvalued, as when the workers (collectively) become Ngudungudu, the woman who married without any lobolo.

Busy boiling foreigners' pots,

Yet yours are lying cold.¹¹

The unpaid lobolo—or bride price—here captures both the illegitimacy of exploitation and the alienation of the working-class 'bride' from the value of her labour. Imagery of this kind, as well as references to 'our heroes on the Island',¹² evokes both the historic national struggle of black South Africans and its contemporary socialist content.

Worker izibongo, while they need to be located in a wider cultural context than a purely literary one, do not claim attention in a literary vacuum. The poems of a Qabula or a Hlatshwayo need to be assessed, for instance, in relation to the transformation of the Zulu epic tradition by Mazisi Kunene in his *Emperor Shaka the Great*¹³ and Anthem of the Decades,¹⁴ Mongane Serote's choice of the long poem as the vehicle of his more recent work,¹⁵ Ingoapele Madingoane's Africa My Beginning

¹¹ Mi Hlatshwayo, 'The Black Mamba Rises Again in Victory', Staffrider 6(3) 1986, II. 8-10.

¹² Ibid., I. 80.

¹³ Mazisi Kunene, Emperor Shaka the Great, London: Heinemann Educational Books, 1979.

¹⁴ Mazisi Kunene, Anthem of the Decades, London: Heinemann Educational Books, 1981.

¹⁵ Mongane Serote, Behold Mama, Flowers, Johannesburg: Ad Donker, 1978; 'Time Has Run Out', Staffrider 2 (4) 1979, pp 4-5; A Tough Tale, Johannesburg: Ravan Press, forthcoming 1987.

and Black Trial,¹⁶ and Modikwe Dikobe's Dispossessed.¹⁷ The reader who considers all these works together will not need to be persuaded that the poetic language of South Africa is in the process of being remoulded on the other side of a cultural watershed. Among the few critics who have begun to measure the dimensions of this refashioning, the former political prisoner, poet, and activist Jeremy Cronin, has so far made the most decisive contribution.¹⁸

His own verse,¹⁹ while flexible and wide-ranging, has established the prison experience of South Africa's numerous political captives as a focal point in the national consciousness. In these poems, prison is both a microcosm of South African society and a meditative space in which the 'deep history' of individual and national life can be registered, pulsing below the seeming stasis of repression. A light lyrical grace surprisingly informs a book which is analytical, technically experimental, and political to the core:

Overhead is mesh,
To one side the morgue,
To one side the gallows wing, this Is our yard

Into which a raggedy
By happenstance
Butterfly has flown,

Fluttering
Half way to panic
Half way to give a damn

Springtime has come.
The years flow into each other.
The struggle goes on.

Poems like 'Walking On Air', a biographical celebration of fellow prisoner John Matthews, trace the human lineaments of a revolutionary culture in South Africa, delighting in the ordinary in a way which takes us beyond stock depictions of political figures. We meet Matthews the inheritor of a fragment of the radical past:

¹⁶ Ingoapele Madingoane, Africa My Beginning, Johannesburg: Ravan Press, 1978.

¹⁷ Modikwe Dikobe, Dispossessed, Johannesburg: Ravan Press, 1983.

¹⁸ Jeremy Cronin, "'The law that says/Constricts the breath-line (. . .)': South African English language poetry written by Africans in the 1970s', The English Academy Review (3) 1985, pp 25-49.

¹⁹ Jeremy Cronin, Inside, Johannesburg: Ravan Press, 1983.

LITERATURE AND POPULAR CULTURE

He was nine when his father came blacklisted home

From the 1922
Rand Revolt, and there with a makeshift

Forge in their backyard a never again to be employed father passed on to his son

A lifelong love for the making and fixing of things.

Matthews the period dancer:

And later, deedle-deedle
—Dulcie, heel-toe,
his future wife

Whom he courted with (he can still do it) diddle-diddle: the cake-walk . . .

Interspersed with cameos of Matthews the gaol-bird grandfather, the story is told of how in the 1960s he turned to the 'making and fixing' of igniters for the armed struggle and was arrested. The poem's climax is the prisoner's moral victory over the security police who try to use the non-political Dulcie as blackmail to persuade him to give evidence for the state:

—Do you know why they've brought you?
And she said
—I do.
And he said
—Dulcie, I will never betray my comrades.
And with a frog in her throat she replied
—I'm behind you. One hundred percent.

So back they hauled John Matthews then and there, back to the cells,
that was that, then, but all the way down the passage toe-heel, heel-toe, diddle-diddle

ONE HUNDRED PERCENT
I mean, he was high off the ground, man.

He was walking on air.

At the heart of the poems is a linguistic project, an attempt to identify a new South African language by attending closely to the voice notes of a great range of interlocutors, from a bird outside the prison walls to three comrades on Death Row

. . . singing slow
Antiphonal phrases,
Three tongues floating over
That audible
Drop which gathers . . .

An archaeology of South African language-as-history is what one sequence of poems searches towards, offering the reader evidence of the richness which a new language may subsume:

A swift stream in the high mountains, dropping dental, lateral,
Clicking in its palate like the flaking of stone tools;
And a wide river that grazes the plains,
Lows like the wind in summer maize.
And a waterfall that hums like a turbine
And is whirled into light.

A river that carries many tongues in its mouth.

Hlatshwayo's emergence as a worker imbongi took place against the background of a broader engagement by worker organisations in the cultural sphere: educational programmes, choirs, and plays were among the more visible results of this development. Worker plays can draw, to some extent, on the experience of long-standing attempts to initiate an alternative theatre, based on the workshop method. These date back to the early plays of Athol Fugard and to the pioneering Workshop '71 group of the pre-1976 period, which produced plays such as Crossroads, Uhlanga (The Reed), uNosilemela, and Survival.²⁰ More recently the momentum has been carried forward by the Junction ²⁰ The last two plays have been published. R Kavanagh (ed), South African People's Plays, London: Heinemann Educational Books, 1981.

Avenue Theatre Company²¹ and by playwrights such as Zakes Mda,²² Fatima Dike,²³ Julius Mtsaka,²⁴ Matsemela Manaka,²⁵ Maishe Maponya,²⁶ Percy Mtwa,²⁷ Mbongeni Ngema,²⁸ and Barney Simon.²⁹ To varying degrees, all these initiatives have had to wrestle with a central problem: the creation of an audience base in the black community. In the townships politically challenging plays have continued to be eclipsed by the success enjoyed since the 1960s by Gibson Kente,³⁰ a playwright-producer whose 'art did little to raise the political or class consciousness of his audiences' but 'did achieve the important goal of developing a theatre faithful to African daily experience that for the first time reached thousands of township residents.'³¹ Johannesburg's non-racial Market Theatre has provided alternative plays with a focal point since the late 1970s, and has acted as a stepping-stone to international exposure for aspirant playwrights, but it has never succeeded in drawing black audiences out of the townships in great numbers.

²¹ Junction Avenue Theatre Company, The Fantastical History of a Useless Man, Johannesburg: Ravan Press, 1978; 'Randlords and Rotgut' in Stephen Gray (ed), Theatre Two, Johannesburg: Ad Donker, 1981. Unpublished plays include 'Security', 'Will of a Rebel', 'Dikitshineng', 'Marabi', and the recent 'Sophiatown!'

²² Zakes Mda, We Shall Sing For the Fatherland, Johannesburg: Ravan Press, 1980. This collection contains the title play, 'Dead End', and 'Dark Voices Ring'. These plays, together with 'The Hill' and 'The Road', will be available in Andrew Horn (ed), The Collected Plays of Zakes Mda, Johannesburg: Ravan Press, forthcoming 1987.

²³ Fatima Dike, The First South African, Johannesburg: Ravan Press, 1979; 'The Sacrifice of Kreli' in Stephen Gray (ed), Theatre One, Johannesburg: Ad Donker, 1978.

²⁴ Julius Makwedini Mtsaka, Not His Pride, Johannesburg: Ravan Press, 1978. Unpublished plays include 'The Last Man'.

²⁵ Matsemela Manaka, Egoli, Johannesburg: Soyikwa/Ravan, 1980; 'Pula' in Stephen Gray (ed), Market Plays, Johannesburg: Ad Donker, 1986. Unpublished plays include 'Imbumba', 'Vuka', and 'Children of Asazi'.

²⁶ Maishe Maponya, 'The Hungry Earth' in P Hauptfleisch and I Steadman (ed), South African Theatre: Four Plays and an Introduction, Pretoria: HAUM, 1984. Unpublished plays include 'Gangsters', 'Dirty Work', 'Return of the Drum', and 'Umongikaza'.

²⁷ Percy Mtwa's plays include 'Bopha' and, with Mbongeni Ngema and Barney Simon, 'Woza Albert'.

²⁸ Mbongeni Ngema's plays include 'Asinamali' and, with Percy Mtwa and Barney Simon, 'Woza Albert'.

²⁹ Barney Simon's workshop plays—usually created with the participation of the entire cast—include 'Cincinnati' in Hauptfleisch and Steadman (eds), op. cit., 'Born in the RSA', and with Percy Mtwa and Mbongeni Ngema, 'Woza Albert'. Simon's considerable flair for the successful theatre 'package', in terms which include what will 'work' for audiences outside the country, have made his influence on indigenous theatre a topic of debate in recent years. What is undeniable is the energy and originality of his input over a long period and the impossibility of describing South African theatre without taking his contribution into account.

³⁰ Gibson Kente's plays include 'Manana, the Jazz Prophet' (1963), 'Sikalo' (1966), 'Lifa' (1968), 'Zwi' (1970), 'How Long' (1974), 'I Believe' (1975), 'Too Late' (1976), 'Can You Take It' (1977), 'La Duma' (1978), and 'Mama and the Load' (1980). See Coplan, op. cit.

³¹ Coplan, op. cit., p 208.

A play like The Long March, created by the Sarmcol-BTR workers in the course of their protracted struggle with this multinational, is in part a development of this workshop tradition. What makes it different is the depth of the workshop process and the working-class audience base which it has enjoyed from the start. The 'father' of the play is one Zondi, a remarkable man who has seen service in many political and worker organisations down the years and is also a direct descendant of Bambatha, the chieftain who led a famous rebellion against colonial rule and tax-enforced proletarianisation in 1906. The 'home' of the play is Mpophomeni, a resettlement area where many of the Sarmcol workers live. In its first version, under Zondi's guidance, a large part of the play dealt with the history of dispossession and forced removal to which the workers had been subjected. Subsequently it was used in workshops by many different groups, with input from Hlatshwayo, Qabula, and others, including a former member of the Junction Avenue group. Its rich performance dynamics—mime, dance, story-telling, an abbreviated version of the historical material Zondi had stressed—include a papiermâché 'Maggie Thatcher' mask used to highlight the 'imperial factor' in the struggle with management. Most instructively, the language of the play was Zulu in its initial, regional phase. When it played to worker audiences in parts of the country where other indigenous languages predominated, English was introduced by virtue of its role as lingua franca. This process will be extended when the play—finding its own route to an international future—is performed abroad in support of the workers' case against BTR (for infringement of the EEC's Code of Conduct) to be heard at the International Court of Justice at The Hague.

'There is an obstinate correlation between pride, dignity, and time in the worker performances,' writes Ari Sitas, the former Junction Avenue member mentioned above, in an intriguing discussion of the dynamics of workshop theatre in a working-class setting.³² 'Here especially the older workers insist that the time must take its course; they take more than an hour to recount one event with all its correct nuances. They insist on being in control of a time that takes on an epic quality in its unfolding layers.' It is not only on workshop plays that story-telling has had its impact. 'I have listened to countless storytellers on the buses and trains carrying people to and from work in South ³² Ari Sitas, 'Culture and production. The contradictions of working class theatre in South Africa', Africa Perspective New Series 1 (1-2) 1986, p 100.

Africa. The majority of them have woven masterpieces of entertainment and instruction. Others were so popular that commuters made sure they did not miss the storytellers' trains.³³ The speaker now is Njabulo S Ndebele, winner of the Noma Award for African writing in 1984 for Fools, a collection of stories.³⁴ He singles out Bheki Maseko³⁵ and Joel Matlou³⁶ as writers whose works are the closest parallel to the performance art of these oral storytellers.

Maseko's first published stories were brief workplace anecdotes. 'Mximbithi', for example, is a wry, laconic report from the factory floor. It records the rise of an informer who, worming his way into the favour of the firm's white supervisors, obtains (marginally) better-paid positions for himself and a side-kick at the expense of his fellow workers. 'Of course there are limits to the progress leadership maniacs can make. Mximbithi is still a mechanic and a car-washer, though he boasts that he is earning more than everybody else. But rumour has it that he is not recognised either as a driver or as a mechanic by head office.' What takes even this slight piece clear of the protest genre is Maseko's rendering of worker consciousness—rather than, simply, worker misfortune. The end-line, quoted above, is perceptive and ironic about the broader exploitative context within which the informer's paltry victory must be situated, but this wider vision remains rooted in the experience and the idiom of the factory worker. The authorial voice which we hear at the end of the tale is the same as that which earlier remarked that 'the old gossips were beginning to lose ground with Mr Lawrence. They envied Mximbithi who was gaining strength every day; he was coming closer to the 'Baas', every time'; or recalled that, when the workers began to see what Mximbithi was up to, 'Very few went on fine with him.'

Maseko's longer stories move away from the factory milieu, but remain within the ambit and the idiom of those who travel 'people's class' on the story-telling trains. Both 'Mamlambo' and 'The Night of the Long Knives' are receptive to the predominance of sensational stories of sorcery and ritual murder in popular lore. While Maseko

³³ Njabulo S Ndebele, 'Turkish tales and some thoughts on South African fiction', Staffrider 6(1) 1984, p 47.

³⁴ Njabulo S Ndebele, Fools and Other Stories, Johannesburg: Ravan Press, 1983.

³⁵ Bheki Maseko's stories include 'Mximbithi' and 'The Digger's Closing Day', Staffrider (4) 2, 1981, pp 4-5; 'Mamlambo', Staffrider 5 (1) 1981, pp 22-27; and 'The Night of the Long Knives', Staffrider 5 (3) 1983, pp 2-6; and 'Those Were The Days', Staffrider 6 (2) 1985, pp 2-4.

³⁶ Joel Matlou's stories include 'Man Against Himself', Staffrider 2(4) 1979, pp 26-8; 'My Lifestyle', Staffrider 3(2) 1980, pp 16-17; 'Life at Home', Staffrider 6 (4) 1986.

artfully positions a critique of superstition within the second of these texts, it is voiced by a neutral and minor character. The reader's susceptibility to a tale replete with supernatural horror and blood-curdling scenes is thus utilised by the storyteller, though this is by no means the only effect Maseko is aiming at.

'Mamlambo', for instance, deals with the plight of Sophie, a domestic worker who is trying to escape from a cycle of brief love affairs. She is haunted by the memory of her first lover, Elias, who stayed longer than the others but deserted her after a quarrel. When another man turns up who looks likely to last, she calls in the help of a 'traditional doctor'. But the main effect of the potion he gives her is to introduce the 'Mamlambo' or 'fortune snake' into the bed she shares with Jonas that night. While, as its name implies, this snake may bring good fortune, its 'maintenance' requires so many bizarre and cruel sacrifices that it is a curse rather than a blessing. Sophie's problem is how to get rid of it. Another traditional doctor supplies a charm and a suitcase into which Mamlambo is lured. Sophie, after several adventures, manages to 'give' the snake to an old woman by leaving the suitcase in her care on a busy station platform. The old woman is waiting for her son. Leaving her, Sophie narrowly avoids a face-to-face encounter with Elias. This near miss has a cathartic effect. For the first time she feels beyond the power of his memory, and free to commit herself fully to her new love. Her happiness seems assured when Jonas, returning to help his father on the land, offers to share this future with her. The reader, meanwhile, discovers that the son for whom the old woman—and Mamlambo—were waiting at the station was no other than Elias.

It is readily apparent that the story outlined above will yield to a symbolic interpretation which confers on the snake a predominantly sexual value. However, Maseko has not reduced the evocative power of the supernatural to a symbolic schema primarily encoding the interiority of personal relationships—as a 'Western' reading might expect. Instead, the snake's 'meaning' at this level is fully integrated with its broader function as a real social phenomenon, rather than a symbolic literary device. The sense of poetic justice we feel at Mamlambo's transfer from Sophie to Elias and his family, for instance, depends on our acceptance of the supernatural as an aspect of social reality. Maseko emphasises this non-symbolic treatment by introducing his tale with a summary of the lore connected with Mamlambo. The 'fortune snake' is clearly a phenomenon collectively experienced: we may learn from others how to deal with it. 'Someone will come along, pick up a shiny object, and Mamlambo is his. There are many things said about this monster. Here is an account of how Sophie acquired Mamlambo and what happened to her.'

One might argue that the difficulties confronting Sophie (exploitation, loneliness, sexism, lack of education, etc) could be set out in a more concrete fashion. In utilising the supernatural, doesn't Maseko obscure the underlying reasons for her plight? Yet the significance of this writer would seem to lie in the manner in which he has taken hold of a genre—the oral story—which has not been hegemonised by the dominant culture, and which can thus engage his audience/readership in a resilient, oppositional cultural discourse. The habit of taking counsel from a story is not discarded—as might be the case in a different prose treatment which addressed the 'real' causes of Sophie's plight, but did not allow the reader to bring experience to bear in a direct and practical fashion. It may be that such a phenomenon as Mamlambo gathers into its serpentine coils a host of social issues and problems, but this does not necessarily mean that those who occupy Sophie's particular 'site of struggle' lose sight of these in the process. On the contrary, it might be argued that it is through Mamlambo that these issues become 'real' to social agents like Sophie, who are then able to use available social networks, and their own wits, to overcome misfortune—sharing experience through cultural forms such as storytelling in the process. Perhaps when domestic workers organise as a group—a process which is currently taking place—and are included in wider democratic processes, we shall see stories such as Maseko's taking on a new content. Whether this happens or not, and whether the resulting stories will be as richly entertaining as 'Mamlambo', will be one test of the human depth of trade union and democratic political practices.

Ndebele has utilised elements of the oral storyteller's repertoire in his own writing, perhaps most notably in 'Uncle',³⁷ a story which celebrates the gift of one generation to another. For the boy through whose eyes this narrative unfolds his uncle is a source of rare wonder: a master musician whose impromptu playing can cause mayhem in the streets. He is also a source of knowledge: in particular, knowledge of the mystery and delight that can be had from drawing out the potential that lies in one's own life, in one's specific, historically embattled milieu, and in the dream of Africa.

³⁷ Ndebele, Fools, op. cit., pp 53–123.

One episode is the stuff of which stories in the buses and trains are made. His uncle has a showdown in the township streets with the local bully-hero, Nzule, whose woman has transferred her affections to the musician. It is one of those Brer Rabitt encounters that go back to Aesop. His uncle is fleet of foot, and during the first part of the encounter the well-armed and impressively accoutred Nzule pursues him relentlessly around the streets on a circuit of shame, deeply felt by the watching boy. His uncle, however, has a plan. He leads the tiring Nzule towards a pile of stones that he has prepared in advance, and picks his opponent off with well-aimed stones as he attempts to close the gap. The victory of cunning over brute force transfers the sympathy of the watching community to his uncle's side, and small boys join him in pelting the hapless and humiliated Nzule. It is an index of Ndebele's art, and the complex counsel he has to offer, that the boy's reactions to this victory are mixed. His uncle's triumph, in which he shares, is also a source of pain to him: Nzule, a childhood hero and the township's champion, stands revealed in all his limitation. Gaining knowledge means, often, the painful loss of comforting illusions.

Stories coming out of South Africa's townships today are full of variations on the theme of how the cunning strategists of the streets defeat the brute force of the Casspirs. Under cover of darkness, children throw stones at a patrolling vehicle and then run off in a massed group which hides the road ahead from the might and rage of their pursuers. Suddenly the children veer off to either side. The road has been excavated across half its narrow width; the Casspir topples; petrol bombs are lobbed by the 'artillery section'. While Ndebele has criticised 'an art that is grounded in the negation of social debasement, where scenes of social violence and a host of examples of general social oppression become ends in themselves'³⁸ the story when it remains faithful to 'correct nuances' has shown that it can carry a political content. Its capacity to do so, exemplified in Ndebele's own work but also in many anthologies,³⁹ turns on two main aspects which distinguish the presence of the storyteller from that of the novelist.

One is the matter of counsel referred to earlier; the other is the presence of the community to which the storyteller explicitly or implicitly refers, providing for 'counsel' a concrete field of social ³⁸ Ndebele, 'Turkish tales', op. cit., p 45.

³⁹ See for example Mthobeni Mutloatsi (ed), Forced Landing, Johannesburg: Ravan Press, 1980; Norman Hodge (ed), To Kill a Man's Pride, Johannesburg: Ravan Press, 1984; Mbulelo Mzamane (ed), Hungry Flames, Johannesburg: Ravan Press, 1987.

reference. The often-noted 'failure' of black South African writers to produce a major novel (the publication recently of Lewis Nkosi's *Mating Birds*⁴⁰ may force a reassessment of this verdict) while offering such a wealth of stories, might well be reconstructed. Could it be that Western critics, in searching for excellence in what is pre-eminently the literary genre of the 'homeless', atomised bourgeois ego,⁴¹ have overlooked the stronger claim of the story to being the authentic prose genre of the Third World?

⁴⁰ Lewis Nkosi, Mating Birds, New York: St Martin's Press, 1986.

⁴¹ Walter Benjamin, op. cit., p 806.

THE FREEDOM CHARTER

We, the People of South Africa, declare for all our country and the world to know:

that South Africa belongs to all who live in it, black and white, and that no government can justly claim authority unless it is based on the will of all the people; that our people have been robbed of their birthright to land, liberty and peace by a form of government founded on injustice and inequality; that our country will never be prosperous or free until all our people live in brotherhood, enjoying equal rights and opportunities; that only a democratic state, based on the will of all the people, can secure to all their birthright without distinction of colour, race, sex or belief;

And therefore, we, the people of South Africa, black and white together—equals, countrymen and brothers—adopt this Freedom Charter. And we pledge ourselves to strive together, sparing neither strength nor courage, until the democratic changes here set out have been won.

THE PEOPLE SHALL GOVERN!

Every man and woman shall have the right to vote for and to stand as a candidate for all bodies which make laws;

All people shall be entitled to take part in the administration of the country;

The rights of the people shall be the same, regardless of race, colour or sex;

All bodies of minority rule, advisory boards, councils and authorities shall be replaced by democratic organs of self-government.

ALL NATIONAL GROUPS SHALL HAVE EQUAL RIGHTS!

There shall be equal status in the bodies of state, in the courts and in the schools for all national groups and races;

THE FREEDOM CHARTER

All people shall have equal right to use their own languages, and to develop their own folk culture and customs;

All national groups shall be protected by law against insults to their race and national pride;

The preaching and practice of national, race or colour discrimination and contempt shall be a punishable crime;

All apartheid laws and practices shall be set aside.

THE PEOPLE SHALL SHARE IN THE COUNTRY'S WEALTH!

The national wealth of our country, the heritage of all South Africans, shall be restored to the people;

The mineral wealth beneath the soil, the banks and monopoly industry shall be transferred to the ownership of the people as a whole;

All other industry and trade shall be controlled to assist the well-being of the people;

All people shall have equal rights to trade where they choose, to manufacture and to enter all trades, crafts and professions.

THE LAND SHALL BE SHARED AMONG THOSE WHO WORK IT!

Restrictions of land ownership on a racial basis shall be ended, and all the land redivided amongst those who work it, to banish famine and land hunger;

The state shall help the peasants with implements, seed, tractors and dams to save the soil and assist the tillers;

Freedom of movement shall be guaranteed to all who work on the land;

All shall have the right to occupy land wherever they choose;

People shall not be robbed of their cattle, and forced labour and farm prisons shall be abolished.

ALL SHALL BE EQUAL BEFORE THE LAW!

No one shall be imprisoned, deported or restricted without a fair trial;

No one shall be condemned by the order of any Government official;

The courts shall be representative of all the people;

Imprisonment shall be only for serious crimes against the people, and shall aim at re-education, not vengeance;

The police force and army shall be open to all on an equal basis and shall be the helpers and protectors of the people;

All laws which discriminate on grounds of race, colour or belief shall be repealed.

ALL SHALL ENJOY EQUAL HUMAN RIGHTS!

The law shall guarantee to all their right to speak, to organise, to meet together, to publish, to preach, to worship and to educate their children;

The privacy of the house from police raids shall be protected by law;

All shall be free to travel without restriction from countryside to town, from province to province, and from South Africa abroad;

Pass Laws, permits and all other laws restricting these freedoms shall be abolished.

THERE SHALL BE WORK AND SECURITY!

All who work shall be free to form trade unions, to elect their officers and to make wage agreements with their employers;

The state shall recognise the right and duty of all to work, and to draw full unemployment benefits;

Men and women of all races shall receive equal pay for equal work;

There shall be a forty-hour working week, a national minimum wage, paid annual leave, and sick leave for all workers, and maternity leave on full pay for all working mothers;

Miners, domestic workers, farm workers and civil servants shall have the same rights as all others who work;

Child labour, compound labour, the tot system and contract labour shall be abolished.

THE DOORS OF LEARNING AND OF CULTURE SHALL BE OPENED!

The government shall discover, develop and encourage national talent for the enhancement of our cultural life;

THE FREEDOM CHARTER

All the cultural treasures of mankind shall be open to all, by free exchange of books, ideas and contact with other lands;

The aim of education shall be to teach the youth to love their people and their culture, to honour human brotherhood, liberty and peace;

Education shall be free, compulsory, universal and equal for all children;

Higher education and technical training shall be opened to all by means of state allowances and scholarships awarded on the basis of merit;

Adult illiteracy shall be ended by a mass state education plan;

Teachers shall have all the rights of other citizens;

The colour bar in cultural life, in sport and in education shall be abolished.

THERE SHALL BE HOUSES, SECURITY AND COMFORT!

All people shall have the right to live where they choose, to be decently housed, and to bring up their families in comfort and security;

Unused housing space to be made available to the people;

Rent and prices shall be lowered, food plentiful and no one shall go hungry;

A preventive health scheme shall be run by the state;

Free medical care and hospitalisation shall be provided for all, with special care for mothers and young children;

Slums shall be demolished, and new suburbs built where all have transport, roads, lighting, playing fields, creches and social centres;

The aged, the orphans, the disabled and the sick shall be cared for by the state;

Rest, leisure and recreation shall be the right of all;

Fenced locations and ghettos shall be abolished, and laws which break up families shall be repealed.

THERE SHALL BE PEACE AND FRIENDSHIP!

South Africa shall be a fully independent state, which respects the rights and sovereignty of all nations;

South Africa shall strive to maintain world peace and the settlement of all international disputes by negotiation—not war;

Peace and friendship amongst all our people shall be secured by upholding the equal rights, opportunities and status of all;

The people of the protectorates—Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland—shall be free to decide for themselves their own future;

The right of all the peoples of Africa to independence and self-government shall be recognised and shall be the basis of close co-operation.

Let all who love their people and their country now say, as we say here:

'THESE FREEDOMS WE WILL FIGHT FOR, SIDE BY SIDE, THROUGHOUT OUR LIVES, UNTIL WE HAVE WON OUR LIBERTY.'

Adopted at the Congress of the People, Kliptown, South Africa, on 26 June 1955.

* * * * *

How the Freedom Charter came into being

When the Campaign for the Defiance of Unjust Laws was brought to an end in 1953 by new, harsher legislation, a meeting was convened by the African National Congress to discuss what action could be taken next.

At this meeting (of the Executive Committees of the ANC, the South African Indian Congress, the Congress of Democrats and the South African Coloured Peoples' Organisation) Professor Z K Matthews proposed the convening of a national assembly, in effect a general election throughout the country, on the basis of a universal voters' roll. This was considered to be beyond the capabilities of the Congress Alliance, but it was out of this proposal that the idea of the Congress of the People developed.

It was decided to get the widest possible representation from the whole country to draw up a charter of freedom, embodying the peoples' demands. This charter would be put before a mass assembly of delegates from all over the country, elected on the basis that they represented an organisation (trade unions, political parties, sports, etc) or a locality, a street, a region, a factory, a church organisation. The Working Committee that was set up was the first Action Committee of the Congress Alliance. (Previously there had been discussions between the organisations, but no actual alliance.) The Assembly would be open to all. A call went out to existing political parties to participate; they did not respond.

THE FREEDOM CHARTER

The call for the Congress of the People that went out indicated headings for different groups of demands: land, industry, human rights, education, the law, but did not draft direct proposals. This was left to the people up and down the country. And the proposals came flooding in, from simple local demands to theoretical concepts of a new constitution, from carefully worded documents to scraps of paper. A sub-committee put them into a manageable form for submission to the Congress. It was the intention to have a lead speaker for each section, then general discussion. But with the mass intervention of the police, this was not possible. Each section was carried by acclaim rather than by discussion and debate.

So the Freedom Charter was adopted. But by the end of the year 156 leading activists were on trial for treason, and the Charter was cited as a treasonable document. When this first treason trial came to an end after four-and-a-half years, the ANC was banned and the Charter declared illegal. Yet 25 years later it has become the basis for mass opposition to apartheid, acclaimed, published, quoted from, its opening words: South Africa belongs to all who live in it, black and white, as familiar as a popular poem.

When it was first adopted, the whole concept was entirely new. It took many years for its ideas to become generally known, to be accepted, and eventually, through the courage and militancy of a new generation, to be 'unbanned' and distributed openly throughout the country.

Criticisms of the Freedom Charter, particularly from radical organisations in the West, miss its significance. It gave the liberation movement a single programme for the first time, and this unity was cemented by the subsequent treason trial. This unity is the outstanding feature of the South African movement. The Charter is a broad statement of aims, not a policy document or blueprint for a future democratic government. How these general aims will be put into practice is the task that faces the victors. Until then, the Freedom Charter remains the basis for a united struggle to free our land.

HILDA BERNSTEIN

THE NATIONAL ANTHEM

Nkosi Sikelel' i-Afrika*

Nkosi sikelel' i-Afrika
Maluphakanyisw' uphondo lwayo
Yizwa imithandazo yethu
Nkosi sikelela—Nkosi sikelela

Nkosi sikelel' i-Afrika
Maluphakanyisw' uphondo lwayo
Yizwa imithandazo yethu
Nkosi sikelela—Thina Lusapho lwayo

Woza Moya
Woza Moya, oyingcwele
Nkosi sikelela
Thina Lusapho lwayo

Morena boloka
Sechaba sa heso
O fedise dintwa le Matswenyeho

Morena boloka
Sechaba se heso
O fedise dintwa le Matswenyeho
O se boloke—o se boloke
O se boloke—o se boloke

Sechaba sa heso
Sechaba sa Afrika

O se boloke Morena—o se boloke
O se boloke Sechaba—o se boloke
Sechaba se heso
Sechaba sa Afrika

Translation of Nkosi Sikelel' i-Afrika

Lord Bless Africa
Let its Horn be Raised
Listen also to our Prayers
Lord Bless
Lord Bless
Come Spirit
Come Spirit
Holy Spirit
Lord Bless Us
We, thy Children

* Nkosi Sikelel' i-Afrika, the National Anthem of the people of South Africa, has its roots deeply embedded in our history and cultural traditions.

Its composer, Enoch Mankayi Sontonga, was born in Lovedale, Cape Province, in 1860. He left school at an early age and went to Johannesburg, where he was employed in various occupations. A Christian, Sontonga was endowed with a wonderful voice, and he wrote both music and lyrics. His songs, sung in churches and concerts, were popular throughout the country. Composed in 1897, Nkosi Sikelela was commonly sung by choirs, churches and in African schools and by the turn of the century was known throughout the country. Mankayi Sontonga died in Johannesburg in 1904—his grave is in the now all-white Brixton Cemetery.

It was SEK Mqhayi (1875–1945), imbongi yesizwe jikelele (the national poet), who added seven stanzas to the national anthem. The Xhosa lyrics, with the exception of the first stanza which was Sontonga's, was thus Mqhayi's version, and was first published in 1927.

Nkosi Sikelela, originally intended as a hymn, was sung in all provinces and steadily gained recognition as the people's national anthem. The first verse (Sontonga's) has survived as the basis of the popular national anthem of today.

The ANC adopted Nkosi Sikelel' i-Afrika as its national anthem in 1925, and all organisations and churches followed suit. It was also at this time that the ANC adopted black, green and gold as our national colours. Today the song has become the national anthem of many countries in Africa north of the Limpopo River, including Tanzania, Zambia, Zimbabwe and the liberation movement of Namibia, SWAPO. Within South Africa the song is sung in many languages, although an English translation can only be literal and loses the poetic and melancholy rhythm of the song—a prayer for the people of Africa.

Today Sontonga's Nkosi Sikelela is closely associated with and symbolises the struggle of our people for a democratic South Africa. It is heard at protest and solidarity meetings, conferences and funerals. It is sung by workers, women, youth and students, who stand with fists raised while singing—a sign of respect for our traditions, culture and fight for freedom.

Corrections

In Yezid Sayigh's article, 'The Politics of Palestinian Exile' in the January 1987 issue of Third World Quarterly, the last sentence in paragraph 2, page 34, containing the phrase 'had not made it a political force' should read: 'The PRM's overall military capability remained modest, but the swell of Arab popular support had made it a political force to be reckoned with.'

On page 66 of the same article, the interview with A Saif cited in footnote 91, was not conducted by the author, as stated.

Third World Quarterly regrets these errors.

North-South Monitor

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND (IMF)/WORLD BANK

▲ International Development Association (IDA)

Meeting of Deputies

Washington DC, 23–25 September 1986

■ IDA deputies from the association's thirty-four donor countries met for their fourth round of negotiations on the eighth IDA replenishment (IDA VIII). The negotiations had begun in Paris in January 1986,¹ continued in April² and June 1986, and were due to be concluded before the annual meeting of the IMF and World Bank (see below).

According to Moeen Qureshi, Chairman of the negotiations, agreement was reached on a minimum replenishment of $11.5bn over the three years 1988–1990, with a commitment to a higher level through extra donations by Japan, Italy and The Netherlands. These countries, particularly Japan, were making their contributions over and above their existing percentage shares, conditional on receiving larger shares in the World Bank, with a consequent increase in voting power. The USA, the largest share-holder in the Bank, had agreed in principle to reduce its shares, thus making more available for Japan. There was also apparently general support for amending the Bank's fundamental Articles of Association to allow the USA to maintain its veto over amendments to the Articles, despite a fall in its shareholding from 20 per cent to 15 per cent. The hope was that the additional contributions would result in an IDA VIII of $12bn, compared to $10.5bn, for the current three-year period.

IDA lending terms were to be tightened under the new agreement, with repayment periods being reduced from fifty to forty years for the least developed countries, and to thirty-five years for others. The ten-year period of grace before capital repayments began would, however, be maintained, as would the existing service charge of 0.75 per cent.³

▲ Group of Twenty-Four (G24)

Ministerial Meeting

27 September 1986

Group of Ten (G10)

Ministerial Meeting

28 September 1986

IMF Interim Committee

28 September 1986

IMF/World Bank Development Committee

29 September 1986

Forty-First Annual Joint Meeting of the Boards of Governors

30 September–3 October 1986

Washington DC

■ The Annual Meetings of the IMF and World Bank were dominated by the issues
The North-South Monitor was written and researched for Third World Quarterly by Maya Jaggi.

North-South Monitor

of the record trading imbalances among some major industrialised economies, and Third World external debt.

The Group of Twenty-Four (G24) developing countries made a strong protest against the failure of the industrialised countries to tackle the four-year debt crisis, emphasising the 'intolerable burden' which debt servicing placed on developing countries. The ministers pointed out that advocacy of growth-oriented programmes of adjustment in debtor countries would remain mere rhetoric unless the net flow of resources from developing to industrialised countries was reversed. To this end, they advocated reduced real interest rates; an IMF or World Bank interest relief facility; eased terms of debt repayment; increased assistance from multilateral institutions and governmental agencies; and a resumption of voluntary loans from private sources. They also proposed that decisions on financing and performance be linked to changes in the prices of primary commodities, as had been achieved in Mexico's recent debt renegotiation, just prior to the Washington meetings. The G24 recommended the creation of an ad hoc committee of ministers from both developing and developed countries, to re-examine the debt problem in view of these recommendations. The ministers also expressed disappointment over the slow rate of growth in the global economy, and stressed the need for surveillance of the industrialised countries' economies, using economic indicators, with a view to ensuring the compatibility of their policies with global growth and stability. This call for increased surveillance, particularly by the IMF, was reiterated in the subsequent meeting of the Group of Ten industrialised countries (G10).

The Interim Committee identified two priorities: the strengthening of growth in the major industrialised economies, and the implementation of the 'Baker Plan' on Third World debt.⁴ Echoing the statement of the Group of Seven industrialised countries (G7) in their related meeting in Washington DC (see below), the Interim Committee's communiqué advocated the reduction of the US fiscal deficit and the sustaining of growth through adequate domestic demand, particularly in those countries with surpluses. It also recommended greater use of economic indicators in surveillance of the industrialised countries' economies. While reaffirming the continued importance of implementing the Baker Plan, a year after its inception, the communiqué noted the disappointing response of the commercial banks, whose lending to developing countries had declined. The committee noted, however, that lending from multilateral development banks (MDBs) and officially-supported export credits had grown, and it welcomed the renegotiation of Mexico's debt under the Baker Plan. This rescheduling, concluded on 30 September 1986, offered Mexico a further $6bn in commercial bank loans, and the same amount from multilateral and official sources, with an extra $500m in guarantees from the World Bank. An important feature of Mexico's new package, apart from the linking of performance criteria to the price of oil, was the linkage with growth. If the country failed to meet certain growth targets, it would, under strict conditions, be able to borrow more, rather than having to modify its development targets.

The Interim Committee went on to reject G24 demands for enlarged access to IMF resources and to the Compensatory Financing Facility (CFF) in 1987. It also decided that there was insufficient support for a new allocation of Special Drawing Rights (SDRs), another long-standing request of the G24. It urged the IMF Executive Board, however, to review the matter and report to the committee's next session in the spring of 1987. The committee also welcomed Japan's offer to provide the IMF with SDR 3bn to assist its support for adjustment programmes in developing countries.

North-South Monitor

The Development Committee affirmed the need for higher levels of sustained growth in the industrialised countries, as a prerequisite for the success of developing countries' adjustment efforts. Like the Interim Committee, it emphasised the need for increased commercial lending to debtor countries, in support of growth-oriented policies. The committee also urged support for the implementation of the UN Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-90,⁵ and appealed to the industrialised countries to provide the extra annual $2.5bn in concessional flows needed by low-income sub-Saharan countries over the next five years. The Bank was asked to report within a year on progress in meeting this resource gap, and in improving the coordination of aid flows to increase their effectiveness. Expressing concern about the inadequacy of Overseas Development Assistance (ODA) to low-income countries, the committee also asked the Bank to prepare a study on the external resource needs of poor countries outside Africa. Repeating its frequent assertion that lack of capital should not be a constraint on increasing the Bank's lending, the committee agreed that a substantial increase in its General Capital would be needed to fulfil projected lending for the period to 1990. The G24 estimated a lending level of $21.5bn for 1990 as the minimum consistent with the developmental role of the Bank, against the level supported by existing capital of $14.5-15bn per year.

The Development Committee reaffirmed the central role of the World Bank as a global development agency, charged primarily with accelerating world growth and alleviating poverty. This role was stressed by the new President of the World Bank, Barber Conable. In his first speech since succeeding A W Clausen on 1 July 1986, Conable specified a five-point programme by which the Bank could fulfil its role as a leading force in world development:

- the Bank should be a force for development, rather than primarily an agency for debt management;
- it should combine investment with adjustment lending on a country-by-country basis;
- it should accord priority to agricultural development in the poorest countries, as a means to alleviating poverty;
- it should take account of long-term developmental issues, such as population and environmental concerns, as well as the full integration of women in the development process;
- it should maintain flexibility in its programmes and management.⁶

● It is not enough to endorse the proposals US Treasury Secretary Baker made this time last year in Seoul. With regard to middle-income nations, the private financial community must move from approval in principle to action in practice'. Barber Conable, President of the World Bank, advocating increased commercial bank lending under the Baker Plan in his opening speech. Financial Times (London) 1 October 1986.

North-South Monitor

COMMODITIES

▲ UN Conference on Natural Rubber, 1985

Third Session

Geneva, 6-17 October 1986

■ The third round of talks between some fifty rubber producer and consumer countries collapsed without agreement on a successor to the present pact. The International Natural Rubber Agreement (INRA) was signed in 1979 and twice extended, but is precluded by its terms from further renewal.

Consumer countries, led by the USA and the EEC, tabled a series of demands for a new agreement:

- a regular price review every twelve months, as opposed to the present period of eighteen months;
- an automatic price change of 5 per cent if the International Natural Rubber Organisation (INRO) Council failed to agree on a change;
- indicative prices (the outer levels of the pricing mechanism) to become operational if the buffer stock reached a level of 450,000 tons.

The seven producer countries meanwhile made a substantial concession by dropping their demand for a 30 per cent rise in the reference price of rubber, accepting the current price of 201.66c per kilogram, provided that it was enshrined in the new agreement rather than being worded in a more vague format. Their concession was also made conditional on the reference price being expressed in Malaysian dollars, rather than in Singapore's currency.

In the face of a consequent deadlock, the Chairman of the conference, Manaspas Xuto, presented an eight-point proposal, which was rejected by consumers as biased towards the producers' interests. The final stumbling block to agreement proved to be the consumers' insistence on larger and more rapid automatic adjustments in price, to reflect changing market circumstances. While the producers were willing to compromise on the currency issue, they were unwilling to limit the discretion of the INRO Council in determining price changes.

The talks ended with no definite plans for a resumption of negotiations. Producers, bitterly sceptical of the consumers countries' willingness to conclude a new agreement, suggested that a return to free market forces might be less of an evil than conceding to the consumers' demands.⁷

▲ International Tin Council (ITC)

Eighteenth Ordinary session

London, 2-3 October 1986

Association of Tin Producing Countries (ATPC)

Ministerial Meeting

Jakarta, 27-28 October 1986

■ Ministers from the ATP's seven member-countries (Australia, Bolivia, Indonesia, Malaysia, Nigeria, Thailand and Zaire) met to consider means of supporting the price of tin in the wake of the suspension of the Sixth International Tin Agreement (ITA). On 24 October 1985 the buffer stock had ceased its operations, having exhausted its funds and incurred vast debts.⁸ Since that time, the ITC had confirmed the suspension of the buffer stock at successive meetings, including the latest in October 1986,⁹ and the price of tin had fallen by half. The seven ATPC members, accounting for 70 per cent of world tin production, were joined by observers from Brazil and China, accounting for a further 20 per cent of production.

North-South Monitor

The ministers considered the possibility of imposing a production ceiling on tin as a means of raising prices. They agreed on two possible scenarios for the following year: One suggested that the price would attain a level of US$5,000–5,800 per ton, provided that Brazil and China cooperated with the ATPC in limiting production. Alternatively, they judged that a price of US$5,800–6,900 could be achieved only if the two countries joined the ATPC. Member-countries were unlikely to wish to limit their own production in an effort to raise prices, without assurances that their market shares would not simply be replaced by extra sales from non-members. Neither Brazil nor China would, however, commit themselves to joining the association, and action on production and prices was deferred.

The ministers did agree on the disposal of stockpiled tin, requesting their Executive Committee to make an inventory of all tin stocks and report on the possible options for their depletion. Once the committee's recommendations were forwarded to member-governments, the decision to act on them would be a political one. The meeting also expressed concern over continued sales from the USA's General Services Administration (GSA) stockpile. It made a renewed plea for the USA to abide by its agreement of 1983 with producer countries of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) which obliged the USA to limit sales to 3,000 tons per year.

Participants also agreed to urge their respective governments to participate in UNCTAD's discussion on the formation of an International Tin Study Group, whose functions would be chiefly in the field of research and development.¹⁰

● 'Now that the ITC has been virtually inoperative, the tin industry has been left with the ATPC to turn to for international intervention aimed at restoring normality in the market.' Dr Subroto, Indonesia's Minister for Mines and Energy and current Chairman of the ATPC. Financial Times (London) 28 October 1986.

THE NORTH

▲ Group of Five (G5)

Ministerial Meeting

Washington DC, 26 September 1986

Group of Seven (G7)

Ministerial Meeting

Washington DC, 27 September 1986

■ Major disagreements were reported within the Group of Five industrialised countries (Britain, France, Japan, West Germany and the USA) when their finance ministers and central bank governors met in closed session, in the margins of the annual meetings of the World Bank and IMF (see above).

North-South Monitor

The G5 members differed over their immediate prescriptions for interest and exchange rates. In a well-publicised dispute before the meeting, the USA had urged West Germany and Japan to cut interest rates as a stimulus to global growth. The US Treasury Secretary, James Baker, maintained that the fall in the value of the US dollar, presaged by the 'Plaza Pact' of September 1985,¹¹ would be insufficient to reduce the USA's record current account deficit, and the West German and Japanese surpluses, to sustainable levels. Only a further depreciation of the dollar (which the USA opposed) or accelerated growth outside the USA would, he maintained, remedy these trade imbalances. The European countries and Japan, however, while anxious for agreement to stabilise the value of the dollar, were unconvinced of the need to lower interest rates.

In a subsequent communiqué,¹² finance ministers of the Group of Seven (G5, joined by Canada and Italy) concentrated on medium-term prospects, rather than immediate action. Created at the Tokyo Summit of the seven countries in May 1986,¹³ the G7 had been charged with reviewing developments in the major economies, using a range of economic indicators, in an attempt to promote greater policy coordination. In their first exercise of multilateral surveillance, the ministers noted generally favourable prospects for growth in their countries, observing that interest rates had fallen, with corresponding benefits for indebted developing countries, though while inflation was likely to remain low, unemployment would probably remain high.

The ministers agreed that existing trade imbalances could not be sustained at their present levels, citing the need for increased cooperation to reduce them. They recommended that countries with surpluses sustain or accelerate their economic growth, with the US committing itself to cutting its budget deficit. Such actions, they said in their statement, were necessary to reduce imbalances in the world economy without further exchange rate intervention. The G7 statement contained furthermore a recognition of the fact that the Group's member-countries had a special responsibility to 'foster an open, growing world economy' as a means of alleviating the international debt problem.¹⁴

NORTH-SOUTH

▲ Commonwealth

Annual Meeting of Finance Ministers

Castries, St Lucia, 14-15 September 1986

■ Finance ministers from forty-seven Commonwealth member-countries met in their annual effort to reach a concerted position on economic issues before the imminent meetings of the World Bank and IMF.

In a final communiqué,¹⁵ the ministers expressed their concern on a number of issues. These issues notably included the net transfer of financial resources from developing countries to industrialised countries, and the prolonged depression in commodity prices. The ministers welcomed recognition by the major industrialised countries at their Tokyo summit of 1986¹⁶ of the need for increased IMF surveillance of their economies. They also expressed approval of developments in the past year aimed at improving policy coordination between these major economies. They went on, however, to express great dissatisfaction with persisting financial imbalances between some of those countries, calling for enhanced coordination as a means of remedying those imbalances.

North-South Monitor

Developing countries were concerned at the consequences for them of disputes between the US on the one hand and Japan and West Germany on the other, over the US trade deficit and the value of the dollar. In particular, they feared that such imbalances would encourage protectionism, while the US threat to devalue the dollar still further, if realised, could jeopardise developing country exports. The absence from the meeting of the British Finance Minister, Nigel Lawson, was, however, taken by some countries to be symptomatic of the industrialised countries' preoccupation with their own economic woes, including trade imbalances and currency alignments, to the neglect of developing countries' problems with trade and debt.

In a final communiqué, the ministers expressed relief over the agreement, reached at Punta del Este in September 1986,¹⁷ to launch a new round of multilateral trade talks. In particular, they noted the inclusion of agriculture on the agenda of the talks, stressing the link between agricultural protectionism in the major industrialised countries and the persistent weakness of commodity markets.

The communiqué also expressed solidarity with the states of the Southern African Development Coordination Conference (SADCC), echoing a dominant concern of the opening session. Economic cooperation to assist the Frontline states facing South African attempts at regional destabilisation was seen as a necessary corollary of the political accord on sanctions reached at the Commonwealth 'mini-summit' in London in August 1986.¹⁸

● 'Net transfers to developing countries were minus $30bn in 1985. Resources now move from the poor countries to the rich in steady and significant amounts. This is a perversion which is as offensive to commonsense as it is to morality.' Sir Shridath Ramphal, Secretary-General of the Commonwealth Secretariat. The Guardian (London) 25 September 1986.

▲ Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN)—European Economic Community (EEC)

Joint Ministerial Meeting
Jakarta, 20–21 October 1986

■ Foreign ministers from ASEAN's six member-countries (Brunei, Indonesia, Malaysia, Philippines, Singapore and Thailand) met those of the EEC's twelve countries, together with the EEC Commissioner for Relations with Asia.

The meeting was dominated by economic issues, and in particular, discussion of a joint EEC-ASEAN report identifying the major obstacles to increased European investment in Southeast Asia. The report described Europe's investment as lagging behind that of Japan and the USA, and the concentration of its investments in banking and finance rather than manufacturing. One of the report's proposals was for a Southeast Asian Common Market, with the removal of tariff and non-tariff barriers between ASEAN countries. The fact that ASEAN is composed of six separate national markets, rather than a common regional one, was identified by the report as the single most important disincentive to European investment there. The common market proposal was, however, known to be opposed by Indonesia, despite President Suharto's call for increased foreign investment and economic cooperation to help to maintain political stability in the region. Indonesia was known to fear that the removal of regional trade restrictions would swamp its vast domestic markets with goods from more competitive industries in neighbouring countries. The report also recommended an end to investment restrictions in ASEAN countries and more effective copyright protection against pirating and counterfeiting. The participants agreed to establish joint committees in each ASEAN capital, to promote European trade and investment. They also resolved to encourage European financial institutions, such as the European Investment Bank, to offer their expertise.

North-South Monitor

Though the focus of the meeting was undoubtedly economic, there was also discussion of political issues. Sir Geoffrey Howe, the British Foreign Minister, speaking in his capacity as President of the EEC Council of Ministers, challenged the Soviet Union to implement the new and flexible Asian policy which its leader, Mikhail Gorbachev, had espoused in a speech at Vladivostok in July 1986.¹⁹ Recognising that the Vietnamese occupation of Kampuchea remained the greatest obstacle to improving relations between Southeast Asia and Moscow, Sir Geoffrey Howe urged a settlement of both the issues of Kampuchea and Afghanistan. In a final joint communiqué, the ministers appealed to Vietnam to begin serious negotiations for the withdrawal of troops from neighbouring Kampuchea, and agreed that no assistance should be given to Vietnam to maintain its occupation. The EEC agreed, at ASEAN's request, to raise the subject of Kampuchea with the Soviet Union at every available opportunity.

Other subjects discussed included the fight against drug trafficking and terrorism, the need to find a negotiated settlement to the Gulf War and the need for international pressure to end apartheid.²⁰

● 'Recently we have heard much of a new and more flexible Soviet approach to Asia. We have yet to see this take shape as far as Kampuchea and Afghanistan are concerned. The time has come for Moscow to match words with deeds.' Sir Geoffrey Howe, British Foreign Minister and President of the EEC Council of Ministers. The Guardian (London) 21 October 1986.

'The Soviet Union should not underestimate the importance of a withdrawal from Kampuchea as a prerequisite of having better relations with ASEAN members.' Dr Mochtar Kusumaatmadja, Indonesia's Foreign Minister. Financial Times (London) 22 October 1986.

▲ Conference of France and African States
Thirteenth Annual Summit
Lomé, Togo, 13-15 November 1986

■ The annual summit of France and its former francophone colonies in Africa was attended by thirty-nine delegations, twenty-five of which were from full member-countries. Among those present were nineteen African Heads of State, and representatives of anglophone and lusophone countries including Liberia, Mozambique, Sierra Leone and Sudan. The French delegation was led jointly by President François Mitterrand and Prime Minister Jacques Chirac, in accordance with the prevailing political system in France of 'cohabitation'. Observers seeking signs of conflict between the two leaders were, however, disappointed by the level of unity presented in their expressions of French foreign policy.

North-South Monitor

Some leaders such as President Felix Houphouët-Boigny of Ivory Coast and President Denis Sassou Nguesso of Congo, had threatened to stay away from the summit, in the former case owing to personal attacks against him in the socialist press in France in July 1986 and in the latter case of the OAU Chairman, in protest at France's recent reception of South African President P W Botha, while on a private visit, and of the UNITA leader, Jonas Savimbi. The threats were, however, averted by preliminary French diplomatic activity. President Thomas Sankara of Burkina Faso, however, maintained his boycott of the conference.

The opening speeches of President Gnassingbe Eyadema of Togo and President Mitterrand emphasised issues of international terrorism and Africa's economic problems. The leaders called for an international economic recovery programme for Africa similar to the US-financed Marshall Plan for post-Second World War Europe.

Economic discussions were, however, partially eclipsed by further developments in Chad. Accusing Libya of genocide in northern Chad, President Hissène Habré declared that the Transitional Government of National Unity (GUNT), formerly allied to Libya, was now united with the national government in opposition to the Libyan occupation of the north. Following a rapprochement with President Habré, the former GUNT leader, Goukouni Oueddei had, however, reportedly been shot while Libyan officials were attempting to arrest him in Tripoli, and he was now in hospital in the Libyan capital. Seven of the nine GUNT factions had subsequently, however, chosen as Oueddei's successor Acheikh Ibn Oumar, who was still receiving Libyan support. Notwithstanding this continued rebel opposition, President Habré advocated taking advantage of rebel disunity to recapture the north of Chad. While President Mitterrand responded at the summit with an offer of additional logistical support for President Habré, he adamantly refused to support the government in any attempt to regain territory north of the sixteenth parallel, the line of partition determined in 1983. France, it transpired, was unwilling to become embroiled in a war with Libya over Chad.

Southern Africa featured strongly at the conference, with the OAU Chairman, President Sassou Nguesso, urging France to press the EEC for comprehensive sanctions against South Africa, similar to those imposed by the USA. Despite private talks with President Mitterrand, however, the leaders of the Frontline States were reported to have been disappointed by the lack of formal decisions on the region's problems. Other issues discussed included the attempted coup in Togo in September 1986 and France's new immigration laws, together with its recent expulsion of 101 Malis from France, on the grounds of their being illegal immigrants.²¹

● 'We now have a common front with GUNT which has turned its back on Libya,' President Hissène Habré of Chad, The Independent (London) 17 November 1986.

'France has no intention of intervening militarily north of the sixteenth parallel.' President François Mitterrand of France, disappointing President Habré's hopes for French assistance in ending the Libyan presence in northern Chad.

North-South Monitor

SOUTH-SOUTH

▲ South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation (SAARC)

Ministerial Meeting; Second Annual Summit

Bangalore, India, 13 November 1986; 16-17 November 1986

■ Drug abuse and trafficking and terrorism were among the main subjects of multilateral discussion by leaders of the seven SAARC member-countries (Bangladesh, Bhutan, India, Maldives, Nepal, Pakistan and Sri Lanka) at their second summit since the association's inception in Dhaka in December 1985.²² At the meeting, Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi of India assumed the chairmanship of SAARC from President Ershad of Bangladesh. Though 'bilateral and contentious issues' are explicitly excluded from SAARC's purview, the summit was effectively dominated by the peripheral exchanges between India and Pakistan and between India and Sri Lanka. General Zia ul-Haq of Pakistan was absent from the summit, but was represented by Pakistan's Prime Minister, Mohammad Khan Junejo.

Perhaps the main achievement of the summit's multilateral discussions was the creation of a technical committee to follow up a ten-point programme endorsed by the leaders, to restrict the production and distribution of illicit drugs. Pakistan, a major source for the distribution of such drugs from both sides of the border with Afghanistan, and with an estimated 500,000 addicts of its own, was to chair the new committee. Other countries embroiled in the illicit drugs trade were India, Nepal and Bangladesh, which together with Pakistan have replaced the 'Golden Triangle' of Southeast Asia as the main source of world supply. The ten-point programme included: confiscation of the assets of drug traffickers; effective measures to curb production, distribution and consumption, and to limit use to medical and scientific purposes; international exchange of intelligence and close cooperation with Interpol; cooperation with the UN and other international organisations; establishing regional anti-drug associations; harmonising legislation.

On terrorism, the leaders instructed a committee of experts to draw up a list of extraditable offences, for which the defence of their being 'political' would not be available. The previous efforts of the SAARC foreign ministers to evolve a united strategy on terrorism had been hampered by their failure to agree on a definition of 'terrorism'.²³ The summit leaders, however, resolved to abide by UN Resolution 2625, committing them neither to aid nor condone terrorists, and they decided that the committee's draft list would be considered by the SAARC foreign ministers at their Council meeting in mid-1987.

A major development toward the eventual settlement of the ethnic crisis in Sri Lanka was reported to have taken place in the margins of the summit. In a series of bilateral talks, Rajiv Gandhi apparently endorsed a Sri Lankan proposal for a measure of political autonomy for the Tamils. Tamil guerrilla leaders who arrived in Bangalore to consider the proposal, rejected it, however, on the basis that it offered the Tamils a mere enclave in Sri Lanka's eastern province, not contiguous to the northern province also claimed by separatists. President Junius Jayewardene of Sri Lanka had persistently refused to concede to Tamil demands for a Tamil homeland ('Eelam') consisting of the entire northern and eastern provinces of the island, on the basis that there was no Tamil majority over the Sinhalese Buddhists and Muslim populations in the east. The significance of India's support for the Sri Lankan proposal, however, derived from the fact that its southern territory, the state of Tamil Nadu, was host to large numbers of Tamil guerrillas, whose vulnerability had been proved by recent Indian raids on Tamil guerrilla bases around Madras, on 8 November 1986. There was speculation that in his anxiousness to procure a political settlement in Sri Lanka, Rajiv Gandhi would exert pressure on the Tamil leaders in India to accept President Jayewardene's offer.

North-South Monitor

Indo-Pakistan relations remained strained during the summit, which saw them at an already low ebb. Just before the meeting, Indian troops were reported massing on the border with Pakistan, and Mohammad Junejo voiced his scepticism of Indian assurances that the movements were routine military exercises. Rajiv Gandhi, in turn, refused to accept Junejo's assertion that the nuclear 'trigger' test recently alleged to have been conducted by Pakistan had no basis in truth. Relations had further been strained by the hijacking of a PanAm airliner at Karachi airport in September 1986, in which twenty-two people, mostly Indians, had been killed. Rajiv Gandhi had then accused the Pakistan authorities of bungling. India was also angered at the US's avowed intention to supply Pakistan with a sophisticated air-borne early warning system (AWACS). Rajiv Gandhi insisted that Indo-Pakistan relations would not improve until Pakistan had abandoned its nuclear weapons programme, ceased to arm and train Sikh terrorists in the Punjab and curbed drug smuggling into India.

In their closing declaration, the leaders included a number of pledges in relation to the care and rights of children. They endorsed the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child, and set targets of four years for universal immunisation, and until the year 2000 for the provision of universal primary education, better standards of maternal and child nutrition, safe drinking water and adequate shelter. The leaders also agreed to establish a SAARC meteorological information centre in India and an agricultural information centre in Bangladesh.

It was decided that the permanent SAARC secretariat would be set up in Kathmandu in January 1987, and its first Secretary-General was named as Abul Ahsan, a Bangladeshi diplomat. A funding arrangement was approved whereby India would pay the largest sum, followed by Pakistan. The next SAARC summits were scheduled for Kathmandu in 1987 and Colombo in 1988.²⁴

● 'Violence breeds hatred. Hatred cannot be cured by violence. Every time a bullet, whether it be from a terrorist or from the security forces, kills a civilian, it goes deep into my heart. I don't know how to stop this.' President Junius Jayewardene of Sri Lanka, in his address to the summit. The Independent (London) 17 November 1986.

'We do not believe that there should be an Eelam in Sri Lanka. With the package that President Jayewardene has given now, we believe that the Tamils can live in peace and security.' Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi of India, during the summit. The Times (London) 18 November 1986.

North-South Monitor

▲ Arab League

Ministerial Meeting

Tunis, 18-19 October 1986

■ Foreign ministers from the Arab League's twenty-two member-countries agreed unanimously on the need to convene a summit as soon as possible. Observers remained sceptical, however, of the likelihood of a summit's being held in the near future, particularly given the continuing antagonism between Syria and Iraq. No Arab League summit has been held since the extraordinary summit in Casablanca in August 1985,²⁵ owing to deep-seated differences in the Arab world. Chief among the issues which would be discussed at any future summit was the controversial meeting between King Hassan II of Morocco and the Israeli leader, Shimon Peres. Despite appeals by the Arab League Secretary-General, Chedli Klibi, to avoid divisive issues at the ministerial meeting, several countries, including Syria and Algeria, condemned King Hassan's action.

A total of twenty-two draft resolutions were tabled at the Tunis meeting, covering issues such as the Gulf War; the Palestinian problem and refugee camps in Lebanon; Euro-Arab dialogue; and the state of the Arab League's finances. The foreign ministers strongly condemned the recent decision of the Ivory Coast to open an embassy in Jerusalem, following its resumption of diplomatic relations with Israel in 1985. They reaffirmed the 1980 Arab League resolution calling on member-countries to sever links with any countries recognising Jerusalem as Israel's capital, or transferring an embassy there.²⁶

▲ Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC)

Seventy-Ninth Extraordinary Ministerial Conference

Geneva, 6-22 October 1986

■ Oil ministers from OPEC's thirteen member-countries, meeting to determine their permanent production quotas, decided instead to extend with some modifications a temporary agreement reached at their last conference in August 1986.²⁷

The original interim agreement for the period 1 September 1986 to the end of October 1986, had determined an overall production ceiling for twelve OPEC members of 14.8m barrels per day (b/d), allowing Iraq unrestrained production, estimated to add 2m b/d to overall output. Meeting in October 1986, however, two ministerial committees on quota distribution (including the oil ministers of Nigeria, Indonesia and the UAE) and on pricing (Kuwait, Ecuador and Libya) were unable to reach long-term conclusions on future strategy. A statement by the government of Saudi Arabia on 17 October 1986 broke the apparent deadlock, by conceding to a further extension of the interim agreement, despite Saudi Arabia's initial insistence on the fixing of permanent quotas.²⁸ The statement countenanced the temporary measure, however, on condition that it did not extend beyond December 1986, and that certain countries would have slightly increased quotas. These countries were understood to be Ecuador, Gabon, Kuwait and Qatar. The announcement indicated Saudi support for Kuwait's insistent demands for a substantially increased quota, on the basis that its current allocation was based on the entrenchment of concessions it has made on its output in 1983 and 1984.

North-South Monitor

The Saudi Arabian concession formed the basis for the eventual OPEC agreement, though all countries other than Saudi Arabia and the UAE, which voluntarily maintained their present outputs, were granted some increases in their official quotas. Kuwait's current volume of 900,000 b/d was to be increased by 21,000 b/d in November 1986 and by a further 79,000 b/d in December 1986. Ecuador, Gabon and Qatar also received significant increases in terms of their small basic outputs. Saudi Arabia's quota remained static at 4.353m b/d and the UAE's at 950,000 b/d. Iraq, meanwhile, continued to produce without official restraints, hence raising OPEC's production level from the official ceiling of 14.961m b/d in November 1986 and 15.093m b/d in December 1986 by about 2m b/d.

A final communiqué reflected Saudi Arabia's concern that the agreement, enshrined in an OPEC resolution on 22 October 1986, would be a temporary one.²⁹ It also referred to a Saudi proposal (backed by Iran, Algeria and Libya) for a return to a fixed price structure for OPEC. The communiqué reiterated OPEC pleas for the participation of non-OPEC oil producers in the effort to defend global market stability.

The next OPEC ministerial meeting was scheduled to begin on 11 December 1986.³⁰

▲ Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC)

Meeting of Foreign Ministers; Seventh Annual Summit
Abu Dhabi, 27 October 1986; 2-5 November 1986

■ The annual summit of the six GCC member-countries (Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, United Arab Emirates) was dominated by discussion of the Gulf War, and in particular, of the 'tanker war'. Roughly seventy merchant vessels were reported to have been attacked by Iran and Iraq in 1986, against a figure of forty-six for the whole of 1985, an escalation which proved of extreme concern to the Gulf states.

Following their series of closed meetings, the leaders issued a communiqué in which they vowed to protect freedom of navigation in the Gulf. They appealed to Iran to accept mediation towards a negotiated settlement of the six-year war, but the communiqué nevertheless indicated an unwillingness on the part of the member-countries to antagonise Iran. There was speculation that this softening of attitude reflected support for Saudi Arabia's efforts to mediate in the Gulf War.³¹ The leaders also approved undisclosed measures towards enhancing collective security and commended the 'peninsular shield', a collective rapid deployment force based in Saudi Arabia.

A closed meeting of oil ministers from the six states, all but two of which (Bahrain and Oman) are OPEC members, was apparently requested by King Fahd of Saudi Arabia. It was reported that the meeting, called by the new Saudi Oil Minister, Nisham Nazer, was intended to gather support for Saudi oil policy following the dismissal of the previous oil minister, Sheikh Ahmed Zaki Yamani. There was, however, no mention of GCC oil strategy in the final communiqué.³²

North-South Monitor

▲ Southern African Frontline States (FLS)

Emergency Summit

Maputo, 2 October 1986

Zambia-Zimbabwe

Summit

Victoria Falls, Zimbabwe, 15 October 1986

Angola-Mozambique-Zaire-Zambia

Summit

Kasaba, Zambia, 19 October 1986

■ Leaders of the six FLS (Angola, Botswana, Mozambique, Tanzania, Zambia and Zimbabwe) held emergency talks in Maputo amidst Mozambique's fears of an imminent military strike by South Africa.

Following a landmine explosion near the Mozambican border in South Africa on 6 October 1986, in which six South African soldiers had been injured, Pretoria had renewed its accusations that Mozambique was breaching the Nkomati Accord of 1984, by allowing the African National Congress (ANC) to operate from its territory. South Africa threatened military reprisals against alleged ANC bases in the Maputo area, and in what was seen as a form of economic reprisal, decided to repatriate all Mozambican workers at the end of their contracts in South Africa, and to cease recruiting labour from Mozambique. The loss of earnings from the 60,000 Mozambican workers involved was estimated to represent an annual loss of $50m, or one third of Mozambique's entire foreign exchange earnings.

Mozambique had responded with an announcement on 11 October 1986 placing all citizens and the armed forces on a state of 'permanent alert'. It had imputed to Pretoria the intention to overthrow the government of President Machel and replace it with its own puppet regime. Mozambique suggested that South Africa's threats reflected annoyance at the pressure imposed by the FLS on Malawi, notably at a meeting between some of their leaders and Malawi's President Kamuzu Banda in Blantyre in September 1986.³³ The FLS accused Malawi of allowing the South African-backed rebel Mozambique National Resistance, (MNR) to operate from its territory. Since the Blantyre meeting, John Tembo, a contender for succession to President Banda, had visited Maputo and agreed to a Mozambican proposal to establish a high-level joint security commission between the two countries. This agreement was followed, however, by a renewed MNR offensive in northern Mozambique, with rebels pouring across the border from Malawi.

In a final communiqué at Maputo, the FLS appealed to 'all peoples and governments of the world to block South Africa's race towards generalised war'. Condemning South Africa's 'insistent and hysterical campaign of accusations and threats against Mozambique', it warned that South Africa's forces were concentrated on the borders of Mozambique and Zimbabwe, and its commando units had already infiltrated into Mozambique, to promote acts of terrorism. Malawi's 'complicity in the terrorist campaign against Mozambique' was equally condemned.

The Maputo meeting was attended, unusually, by the Prime Minister of Zaire, Kengo Wa Dondo. In a situation analogous to that of Malawi and the MNR, Zaire had been criticised by the FLS for affording bases to the Angolan rebel movement, UNITA. In preliminary talks with Zaire's Prime Minister in Maputo, and later with Zaire's President Mobutu Sese Seko in Zambia, the Leaders of Angola, Mozambique and Zambia apparently discussed regional security and communications. They were reported to have considered ways of lessening their dependence on South Africa's transport system.

North-South Monitor

At bilateral talks at Victoria Falls, President Kenneth Kaunda of Zambia, the FLS Chairman, and Prime Minister Robert Mugabe of Zimbabwe condemned President Banda, while saying that they would not instigate punitive action against either Malawi or Zaire. While their refusal to retaliate was in part a recognition of their vulnerability to South African reprisals, they specified a desire to maintain Southern African solidarity against Pretoria and not to harm the peoples of Malawi or Zaire as their chief motivations.³⁴

●Malawi has become 'a destabilising agent of the whole of Southern Africa. . . . We will have to decide what to do with a country that has decided to be a force of destabilisation.' President Samora Machel of Mozambique. Financial Times (London) 14 October 1986.

'We only hope there will be no need to take any action against our neighbours because if we did, that will weaken our position against the common enemy, apartheid. We are all in one boat and only one action can be taken to steer us off the rock of apartheid—sanctions.' President Kenneth Kaunda of Zambia, Chairman of the FLS. The Guardian (London) 16 October 1986.

▲FLS

Summit

Maputo, 29 October 1986

■Leaders of the six FLS met in the wake of the funeral of President Samora Machel of Mozambique, following his death in an air crash in South Africa on 19 October 1986. The Mozambican delegation to the meeting was led by Marcelino dos Santos and Joaquim Chissano, chief contenders for succession to the Mozambican presidency.

Though awaiting the results of an inquiry into the crash, the leaders suggested that South Africa was implicated in President Machel's death and that 'he fell victim to apartheid'. Prime Minister Mugabe of Zimbabwe meanwhile dismissed the MNR's recent declaration of war against Zimbabwe as constituting nothing new. The FLS Chairman, President Kaunda of Zambia, accused South Africa of making the challenge through the MNR in response to Robert Mugabe's pledge to defend the crucial Beira corridor to the Mozambican port at all costs.

The leaders pledged increased support for the Mozambican government against South Africa and the MNR, and appealed for international sanctions to be applied, and for increased support for the banned South African movements. Attacking South African and US support for UNITA, they condemned France and other European countries which had permitted recent visits by Jonas Savimbi.³⁵

●'There is sufficient circumstantial evidence for us to hold South Africa directly responsible for the plane crash which killed Machel and thirty-three other people.' President Kaunda of Zambia, speaking after the meeting. The Independent (London) 30 October 1986.

North-South Monitor

NOTES

In these notes the following abbreviations are used for newspapers and periodicals: Econ = The Economist (London); FT = Financial Times (London); FEER = Far Eastern Economic Review (Hong Kong); Gma = Granma (Havana); G = The Guardian (London); I = The Independent (London); IHT = International Herald Tribune (Paris); MEED = Middle East Economic Digest (London); MEER = Middle East Economic Review (Washington, DC); MEES = Middle East Economic Survey (Nicosia); Obs = The Observer (London); S = South (London); SN = Soviet News (London); SW = Soviet Weekly (London); ST = Sunday Times (London); SWB = Summary of World Broadcasts (London); T = The Times (London); TWQ = Third World Quarterly (London); UNPR = UN Press Release; USIS = US Information Service; WA = West Africa (London); XNA = Xinhua News Agency.

- ¹ On the first round of the IDA VIII negotiations, see TWQ 8(3) July 1986, pp 1033-4.
- ² On the April 1986 round, see TWQ 8(4) October 1986, pp 1389-90.
- ³ FT 26 September 1986; IHT 27-8 September 1986; IMF Survey (Washington DC) 20 October 1986, p 334; WA 6 October 1986, p 2121.
- ⁴ For the Baker Plan on debt, see TWQ 8(2) April 1986, pp 691-5.
- ⁵ For the UN Programme of African Economic Recovery, see TWQ 8(4) October 1986, pp 1372-4.
- ⁶ Barber Conable's speech is in World Bank Press Release (Paris) 30 September 1986.
The Washington communiqués are in IMF Survey (Washington DC) 20 October 1986. See also FT 25, 29, 30 September 1986, 1, 2 October 1986; IHT 29, 30 September 1986; G 29, 30 September 1986, 1, 3 October 1986; T 29 September 1986, 3, 4 October 1986; Obs 5 October 1986; FEER 16 October 1986, pp 81-5; WA 6 October 1986, p 2094-6; Commonwealth Secretariat International Development Policies (London) No 23, July-September 1986; World Bank News (Paris) 2, 9 October 1986; IMF Survey (Washington DC) 20 October 1986, 3 November 1986.
- ⁷ G 6 October 1986; FT 7, 9, 15, 17, 20, 21 October 1986; I 16 October 1986; FEER 30 October 1986, pp 50-51.
- ⁸ On the tin débâcle, see TWQ 8(2) April 1986, pp 696-9 and 8(3) April 1986, pp 1039-41.
- ⁹ See ITC Press Release 3 October 1986.
- ¹⁰ G 25, 27 October 1986; FT 28, 29 October 1986; FEER 13 November 1986, pp 112-25; WA November 1986, p 2371.
- ¹¹ For the 'Plaza Pact' on exchange rate intervention, see TWQ 8(1) January 1986, pp 293-4.
- ¹² The G7 communiqué is in IMF Survey (Washington DC) 20 October 1986, p 314 and T 29 September 1986.
- ¹³ On the Tokyo Summit, see TWQ 8(4) October 1986, pp 1392-5.
- ¹⁴ FT 26, 27 September 1986, 1 October 1986; G 27, 29 September 1986, 3 October 1986; T 27 September 1986; Econ 4 October 1986.
- ¹⁵ For the Commonwealth ministers' final communiqué, see Commonwealth News Release 25 September 1986.
- ¹⁶ For the Tokyo summit, see TWQ 8(4) October 1986, pp 1392-5.
- ¹⁷ For the Punta del Este decision to launch a new GATT round, see TWQ 9(1) January 1987, pp 311-14.
- ¹⁸ For the Commonwealth mini-summit, see TWQ 9(1) January 1986, pp 306-8. FT 24 September 1986; G 24, 25 September 1986; Commonwealth Currents (London) October 1986.
- ¹⁹ The text of Mikhail Gorbachev's Vladivostok speech is in SN 30 July 1986, pp 337-343.
- ²⁰ T 10, 21, 22 October 1986; FT 20, 22 October 1986; G 21 October 1986; I 21 October 1986, Obs 19 October 1986; Econ 25 October 1986; S December 1986, p 85.
- ²¹ I 14, 15, 17, 19 November 1986; FT 14, 17 November 1986; G 15, 17 November 1986; Econ 22 November 1986; WA 11 November 1986, p 2343 and 24 November 1986, pp 2440-2.
- ²² For the first SAARC summit in Dhaka, see TWQ 8(2) April 1986, pp 724-7.
- ²³ For the first SAARC ministerial Council meeting in August 1986 see TWQ 9(1) January 1987, p 317.

North-South Monitor

- ²⁴ T 12, 15, 17, 18 November 1986; G 14, 17, 18, 19 November 1986; I 14, 17, 18, 20 November 1986; FT 15, 17, 18 November 1986; IHT 17, 18 November 1986; Econ 15 November 1986; FEER 27 November 1986, p 30 and 4 December 1986, pp 26-8.
- ²⁵ For the Casablanca Summit of the Arab League, see TWQ 8(1) January 1986, pp 304-6.
- ²⁶ Ivory Coast is one of the four black African countries to have re-established diplomatic relations with Israel. The other countries are Zaire (1982), Liberia (1983) and Cameroon (1986). G 20 October 1986; IHT 21 October 1986; MEED 25 October 1986; MEES 27 October 1986, p C2.
- ²⁷ For OPEC's Geneva meeting in August 1986, see TWQ 9(1) January 1987, pp 314-16.
- ²⁸ The Saudi statement is in MEES 27 October 1986, p A10.
- ²⁹ The text of the resolution and OPEC press communiqué are in MEES 27 October 1986, pp A7-10.
- ³⁰ IHT 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11-12, 13, 14, 20, 21, 22, 23 October 1986; FT 6, 9, 10, 11, 13, 15, 16, 17, 18, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24 October 1986; T 7, 10, 13, 14, 15, 17, 20, 22, 24 October 1986; G 8, 9, 10, 15, 17, 18, 20, 21, 23, 25 1986; I 13, 14, 20, 21, 22, 23 October 1986; Econ 25 October 1986; MEES 13, 20, 27 October 1986; MEED 1 November 1986, p 18; WA 27 October 1986, p 2274.
- ³¹ See G 20 October 1986.
- ³² IHT 28 October 1986; T 28 October 1986; FT 3, 6 November 1986; G 3, 4, 6 November 1986; I 4 November 1986; MEED 8 November 1986, p 2; S December 1986, p 36.
- ³³ See TWQ 9(1) January 1987, pp 326-7.
- ³⁴ FT 9, 13, 14, 16 October 1986; I 11, 14, 16 October 1986; G 13, 14, 16, 20 October 1986; IHT 13, 14 October 1986, T 13 October 1986; WA 20 October 1986, pp 2202-3.
- ³⁵ FT 30 October 1986, 8 November 1986; I 30 October 1986, 8 November 1986.

Every month

INQUIRY

offers its readers

●An Islamic perspective on world events ●An insight into the policies that create the events ●Behind-the-scenes look at Islamic banking ●A rich ideas section to stimulate intellectual thought

Inquiry Magazine

55 Banner Street, London EC1 8PX Tel:01-253 4726 Telex:262028

United Kingdom	12 issues £12	24 issues £22
Europe	12 issues $25	24 issues $46
Middle East	12 issues $30	24 issues $55
Africa	12 issues $20	24 issues $38
Americas	12 issues $30	24 issues $55

(Tick as applicable)

Please send your subscription and payment to SUBSCRIPTION DEPARTMENT
INQUIRY MAGAZINE
55 Banner Street, London EC1 8PX
TEL:01-253 4726 TELEX:262028 BANNER G or to the Inquiry agent in your country

USA:
 Annual subscription
 US$30 00
 PO Box 177
 Elmhurst
 New York NY 11373

Nigeria:
 Annual subscription 18N Half-yearly subscription 10N
 Inquiry Magazine
 PO Box 11447, Kano
 Cheque Endorsed a/c no 350046385

Iran:
 Annual subscription 240T
 Iran Amalgamated
 Dist Agency
 195 Ave Mottaheri
 Teheran 15

Tanzania:
 Annual subscription
 Tsh 240
 MORAF Ltd
 P O Box 1284
 Dar es Salaam

South Africa:
 Annual subscription 30R
 PO Box 31589
 Braamfontein 2017

India:
 Annual subscription R105
 Paperprint India Ltd
 107 M I Estate
 off Dr E. Moses Rd., Worli
 Bombay 400018

Pakistan:
 Annual subscription
 PR100
 Paradise Subscription Agency
 PO Box 3956
 Karachi

Malaysia:
 Annual subscription M$36
 Syarikat Alkar
 2.93, 2nd Floor
 Pertama Complex
 Jalan Tuanku Abdul Rahman
 Kuala Lumpur

Kenya:
 Annual subscription
 240Ksh
 Publishers Dist Services
 Ltd
 PO Box 30080
 Nairobi

Third World Foundation News

1986 Third World Prize

At the Third World Prize Committee's meeting in London on 10 November 1986, it was decided that Bob Geldof should be awarded the 1986 Prize, worth $100,000, in recognition of his 'mammoth personal crusade against human suffering and human indifference, with which millions the world over identified', according to the citation.

Stunned by television pictures of famine in Ethiopia, Geldof pledged in November 1984: 'I would send some money, I would send more money. But that was not enough. To expiate yourself truly of any complicity in this evil meant you had to give something of yourself.'

As the Committee pointed out: 'That irresistible motivation fired an individual whose creativity and flair had hitherto been confined to the world of rock music, whose idealism lay largely dormant and qualities of leadership undiscovered.' After millions of pounds were raised by Geldof's song 'Do They Know It's Christmas', the sixteen-hour Live Aid concert at Wembley Stadium, London, was watched by over a billion and a half people worldwide in July 1985. The Sport Aid 'Race Against Time', held last May, galvanised the efforts of thirty million runners in over 270 cities and in seventy-eight countries. The event was sponsored jointly by Sport Aid and UNICEF, and was timed to have the maximum impact on the UN's debate on Africa.

Together the three spectacles raised over $130 million, and their success helped swell donations to British charities by 25 per cent; donations to international charities rose by 163 per cent over the period. Most of the money has been invested in long-term, small-scale development and rehabilitation projects in Ethiopia, Sudan, Chad, Mali, Niger and Burkina Faso.

'The driving force—initiator, organiser and leader—was Bob Geldof, who linked three separate if massive individual efforts and gave them continuity and substance,' said the Committee. 'The plight of the Third World has been brought home to people around the globe with an immediacy and a clarity which was compelling.'

The Committee was impressed by Geldof's ability to convince people that they could help remove inequalities and injustices by cutting through bureaucracy and acting effectively. 'His overriding contribution has been to bring into life a dynamic relationship across the North-South divide, moving aid from the realm of charity into the world of popular politics. Internationalism has thereby been given a new content in bringing relief to people in Africa afflicted by famine; in changing perceptions beyond Africa of a grossly unequal world; in mobilising millions to give millions; in altering the dynamics of aid and development as a political issue. Bob Geldof has rendered a service of immense proportions to all humanity.'

Second Manzur Qadir Memorial Lecture

Michael Manley, the former Prime Minister of Jamaica, delivered the 1986 Manzur Qadir Memorial Lecture, entitled 'Dominance or Equity: The Multilateral Institutions', on 16 December in Lahore, Pakistan.

In a critique of the existing international system, Manley condemned 'the financial enforcers of the world economy', and claimed that transnational corporations 'act in chronic disregard of the interests of host countries sacrificing these on the altar of the analyses of cost effectiveness.'

Calling for radical reforms to international bodies such as the IMF, UN and World Bank, Manley argued that only through collective action exerted through some form of international cooperation will the developing countries ensure redress and achieve equity. His key recommendations were for changes in the management of world trade to provide market access for producers, the introduction of an international code of conduct for multinational corporations, and IMF loans based on Third World needs.

Manley also pointed the way forward to a new global political programme, based on consensus to make international institutions: universal in membership, with the inclusion of socialist countries; democratic in decisionmaking, with one country one vote; adequate in financial resources to finance their operations and member-country needs, and powerful enough to enforce recommendations, with the power to impose sanctions.

1986 Faiz Memorial Lecture

The Third World Foundation has instituted an annual lecture, to be delivered in London, in the memory of Faiz Ahmad Faiz, a leading twentieth-century Urdu Poet.

Faiz Ahmad Faiz (1911-84) was a teacher, army officer, journalist, political leader, trade unionist and broadcaster. His poems have been translated from Urdu into several languages, including English, and almost every popular singer has sung his ghazals. He was imprisoned several times by the Pakistani government for his political stance, and spent a period of exile with the Palestinians in Beirut before returning to Lahore in 1984.

The 1986 Lecture, entitled 'Poetry and Man Today', was given by Mrs Rimma Kazakova, a Russian poetess, on 3 December. Mrs Kazakova is a member of the Presidium of the Soviet Afro-Asian Solidarity Committee in Moscow, and she has translated Faiz Ahmad Faiz's poems into Russian.

Bob Geldof, recipient of the 1986 Third World Prize, speaking at the presentation ceremony in London, on 23rd January.

Michael Manley delivering the 1986 Manzur Qadir Memorial Lecture in Lahore, Pakistan.

Rimma Kazakova (on the left) delivering the 1986 Faiz Memorial Lecture in London. Left to right: Rimma Kazakova, Altaf Gauhar, Zahra Nigah.

INFORMATIVE

STIMULATING

CHALLENGING

New thinking on the theory and practice of development

Are you interested in developing countries? Do you want to keep up with theoretical debates about development but haven't time to read the scholarly journals? Do you want to find out where theory and policy meet? The IDS Bulletin is a unique source of information for those interested in the Third World and its problems — because each issue deals with a particular theme, it provides an entry to current debates — because the articles are written by people who are involved in both theory and practice, it combines both perspectives.

Recent issues cover:

Research on rural women; Developmental states in East Asia; UNCTAD: the first twenty years; Educational research; Restructuring in the 1980s; The Western Hemisphere in the World Crisis; sub-Saharan Africa, and Disarmament and Development.

Published in January, April, July and October

Annual subscription (volumes 16 and 17) £11.00 ($17) surface £15.50 ($23) airmail

For free sample copy, details of all subscription arrangements and Publications Catalogue, please write to:

Publications Office, Institute of Development Studies at the University of Sussex Brighton BN1 9RE England Telephone (0273) 606261

Book Reviews

The titles reviewed are listed below with names of authors and editors

Cohen, R: Endgame in South Africa: The Changing Structures and Ideology of Apartheid

Fatton, Jr, R: Black Consciousness in South Africa: The Dialectics of Ideological Resistance to Apartheid

Hanlon, J: Beggar Your Neighbours: Apartheid Power in Southern Africa

Johnson, P and Martin, D: Destructive Engagement: Southern Africa at War

Soggot, D: Namibia: The Violent Heritage

United Nations Institute for Namibia: Namibia: Perspectives for National Reconstruction and Development

CIIR and British Council of Churches: Namibia in the 1980s

Moorsom, R: Transforming a Wasted Land

CIIR: Mines and Independence

Ellis, J: Education, Repression and Liberation: Namibia

Moorsom, R: Exploiting the Sea

Lobstein, T and Namibia Support Committee Health Collective (eds): Namibia: Reclaiming the People's Health

Smith, S: Namibia: A Violation of Trust

Aluko, O and Shaw, T (eds): Southern Africa in the 1980s

Seidman, A: The Roots of Crisis in Southern Africa

Catholic Institute of International Relations: South Africa in the 1980s: State of Emergency

MacShane, D, Plaut, M and Ward, D: Power! Black Workers, Their Unions and the Struggle for Freedom in South Africa

Mbeki, G: South Africa: The Peasants' Revolt

Frankel, P H: Pretoria's Praetorians—Civil—Military Relations in South Africa

Grundy, K W: The Militarization of South African Politics

Cawthra, G: Brutal Force—The Apartheid War Machine

International Defence and Aid Fund for Southern Africa (ed): Nelson Mandela: The Struggle is My Life

Benson, M: Nelson Mandela

Tutu, D: Hope and Suffering: Sermons and Speeches

Boesak, A: Walking on Thorns: The Call to Christian Obedience

Kuzwayo, E: Call Me Woman

Joseph, H: Side by Side: The Autobiography of Helen Joseph de Beer, C: The South African Disease: Apartheid, Health and Health Services

Baker, C and Turshen, M (eds): Africa: The Health Issue

Neuhaus, J R: Dispensations: The Future of South Africa as South Africans See It

Crapanzano, V: Waiting: The Whites of South Africa

Uhlig, M: Apartheid in Crisis

Twenty South African Photographers: South Africa: The Cordoned Heart

Lawson, L: Working Women in South Africa

992 Women Workers and the Institute for Black Research: Factory and Family: The Divided Lives of South Africa's Women Workers/Impilo Yabasebenzi Emzansi Afrika

Journal of Communist Studies: Military Marxist Regimes in Africa

Schwab, P: Angola: Politics, Economics and Society

Ray, D I: Ghana: Politics, Economics and Society

Institute for Foreign Policy Analysis: Third World Marxist-Leninist Regimes: Strengths, Vulnerabilities, and US Policy

Chinweizu, Jemie, O and Madubuike, I: Towards the Decolonization of African Literature. Volume 1: African Fiction and Poetry and their Critics

Ngara, E: Art and Ideology in the African Novel: A Study of the Influence of Marxism on African Writing

Bame, K N: Come to Laugh: African Traditional Theatre in Ghana

Dathorne, O R (ed): The Afro World: Adventures in Ideas

BOOK REVIEWS

FEATURE REVIEWS

Southern Africa at war

Richard Moorsom

Endgame in South Africa? The Changing Structures and Ideology of Apartheid

Robert Cohen

London: James Currey; Paris: UNESCO Press. 1986. 108pp. £4.95pb

Black consciousness in South Africa: the Dialectics of Ideological Resistance to White Supremacy

Robert Fatton, Jr

Albany New York: State University of New York Press. 1986. 189pp.
$42.50hb/$14.00

Beggar your Neighbours: Apartheid Power in Southern Africa

Joseph Hanlon

London: Catholic Institute for International Relations in association with James Currey; Bloomington: Indiana University Press. 1986. 352pp. £8.95pb

Destructive Engagement: Southern Africa at War

Edited by Phyllis Johnson and David Martin

Harare: Zimbabwe Publishing House for the Southern African Research and Documentation Centre. 1986. 378pp. £7.50pb

For those committed to radical political change in South Africa, these are indeed difficult times. There seems to be no limit to the degree of personal sacrifice which many black South Africans are prepared to sustain in confronting the armed might of the apartheid regime, no end to popular mobilisation against the symbols, agents and instruments of racial tyranny. Yet in most manifestations the formidable apparatus of state power appears scarcely damaged in its capacity for ruthless violent repression, the political resolve of the leaders of white supremacy confused but unshaken.

Is the system cracking? Afrikaner political morale disintegrating, the economy in a terminal tailspin? Or are we on the verge of another counter-revolution, as after Sharpeville, the success of brute force reviving investor confidence? In the first of the books under review, Robin Cohen takes a more sophisticated view, that 'when future historians periodise our time, I believe they will fix on the Soweto riots as a "break event", after which and despite many reversals and setbacks over a prolonged period, direct political representation and participation by the black majority in the central organs of the South African state became inevitable' (p ix). A sudden dramatic transfer of power—the 'revolutionary overthrow' or 'bloodbath' paradigm so popular in political and media rhetoric—is therefore a less likely model of political change than a complex transition in which the political economy of a restabilised post-apartheid settlement will be largely determined in the course of the struggle itself.

As might be expected from one of the leading figures in his field, Cohen's short book is ably written, refreshingly free of conceptual clutter, authoritative in its deployment of comparative insights, and lucid in exposition. It forms at the same time a short textbook case-study in applied social theory and an analysis of the potential for radical change in the central ideological and political structures of the apartheid order.

The author's focus is on 'apartheid as an ideology and its relationship to the fundamental structures which it both underpins and reflects' (p 8). This is an unusual line of attack: 'apartheid' is conventionally treated either as a political system of racial domination or as a political economy of racial exploitation of labour under capitalism; and if as a system of beliefs, then so absurdly false as to dismiss all need of serious consideration. Cohen points out that apartheid has not achieved conspicuous success in any of the standard functions of an ideology—as religion, as social science, as a universal message, even as a mask for ruling class interests. He argues nonetheless that there are three forms in which apartheid does so function: reifying the present state of affairs as 'natural' while rationalising the past, deadening white anxieties about the risks of change; generalising special interests, of whites in society as a whole, of segments with the white community, and of foreign capital in the South African state; and, finally, the 'transmutation of contradictions' (p 13), not so much by denying their existence as by displacing their locus to a demonology of abstract hate-symbols.

Cohen proceeds to analyse three of what he identifies as 'the four pillars of apartheid' (p 8) (Afrikaner political control of state power is to be the subject of a parallel monograph by Harold Wolpe): spatial segregation by race; coercive segmentation of the labour market; and urban social control. Some of the terrain covered is fairly familiar, the evidence occasionally anecdotal, the relationships between system and ideology not always clearly drawn. This is nevertheless an illuminating analysis. It assesses the far-reaching changes in influx control and trade union policy over the last decade, the state straining to set its ideological image above race and class as the technocratic harmoniser of social relations. It also covers strategies of urban social control: the repressive state apparatus; the bureaucratic formations of the state and corporate capital, especially in welfare co-option; and processes of socialisation, both informal processes constructing racial identities and the direct and indirect impact of state action.

Finally, Cohen risks a brief assessment of the likelihood of radical change. Criticising conservative 'top-down' analyses which marginalise the oppressed as agents of historical change, he was (December 1985) 'convinced that white minority rule cannot survive' (p 94), describing the current phase of struggle as a possibly prolonged period of 'unstable equilibrium' (p 88). On the dismantling of the 'pillars of apartheid' under majority rule, however, his prognostications are perhaps too conservative: the persistence of racial geography, dependence on white farmers, state direction of labour to farms and mines, a government caught between diehard white resistance and urban black deprivation and disillusionment. Such brief analysis is of necessity simplified: unfortunately the sketchy and partial characterisation of the forces of black resistance renders it also somewhat simplistic.

One of those forces, black consciousness (which Cohen dismisses in three sentences as coincident with the ideological programme of apartheid), is the subject of a full-scale study by American political scientist Robert Fatton. This is a sophisticated, thoughtful and carefully constructed analysis of the origins of the Black Consciousness Movement (BCM) and the formation and theoretical basis of its political ideology. Fatton's stated purpose is 'to analyze the ideology of [the] forms of [African] resistance to white supremacy and specifically to trace the development and radicalisation of the Black Consciousness Movement' (p 2).

What he achieves is somewhat more limited, for there is little actual political history in the book, nor anything more than fragmentary treatment after the early 1960s of the other main components of the black political resistance, especially the ANC. It is nonetheless substantial: a critical assessment of the body of political theory represented or implied in the speeches, resolutions and writings of the BCM between the late 1960s and the banning of its organisations in 1977. One might anticipate that an explicitly Marxist approach would not be at ease with a race-defined cultural politics, but Fatton's interpretation is both strongly sympathetic and rich in insight. His major contention is that the BCM was far more than a limited, race-bound reaction to the impact of apartheid ideology, and that it linked cultural liberation with elements of class analysis to develop an alternative, revolutionary challenge to the apartheid state.

The political significance of the BCM is located in the aftermath of the shattering defeat of the black nationalist resistance in the early 1960s. Fatton places, I think correctly, rather more weight than Cohen on the ideological impact on blacks of apartheid's degrading social engineering and political indoctrination, and of the limited co-option pursued under what he terms the strategy of 'passive revolution' (pp 33ff). The BCM's role in challenging white ideological ascendancy was therefore crucial in building a new self-reliant black cultural hegemony and in liberating the potential for a class-based politics. Drawing heavily on Gramsci, Fatton rejects the mechanistic determinism he sees as dominant in much neo-Marxist writing on South Africa to assert the relative autonomy of ideology, a theoretical framework which enables him to develop a sophisticated analysis of the significance of cultural self-assertion for revolutionary insight and praxis.

In Fatton's view, the BCM's central concept of 'blackness' can be sharply distinguished from the Africanism of the 1950s: it included 'coloureds' and 'Indians'; it excluded political and ideological collaborators with apartheid (labelled 'non-whites'); it recognised, particularly in its later stages, the material conditions of exploitation and not simply racial exclusion from elites. The barring of radical whites was determined by the structural conditions of cultural and political struggle, not a racially exclusive conception of post-apartheid society. At this stage of struggle, in other words, mobilisation on the primary basis of class rather than 'black' solidarity would be more divisive of blacks than of whites; but black liberation could only be finally achieved with the resolution of the class struggle.

Fatton is still some distance from regarding black consciousness as a complete theory of revolutionary change in South Africa. As a 'situational philosophy of praxis' (p 60), it was vague in specifying the new social order towards which it aspired and failed to formulate a sustained revolutionary analysis or programme. The BCM's links with black trade unionism and high school student activists were weak, its translation into political organisation unfulfilled. Yet it did have a central role in creating a 'new ideological terrain' (p 125) on which revolutionary strategies and initiatives could be rooted. Fatton himself fails to trace adequately and therefore underestimates the full political impact of black consciousness after 1977, which has reached far beyond the organisational regrouping under AZAPO and the National Forum into the major battlegrounds of struggle for which other tendencies have taken the credit. But his criticism of the 'programmatically escapism' (p 146) of both the BCM and the ANC—the predilection for substituting rhetorical slogans for critical thinking on revolutionary transformation—carries weight.

Perhaps inevitably in what is principally a work of theory, there remains an air of artificiality about much of the analysis of black consciousness as a political philosophy. 'BCM' positions are frequently presented as a presumed synthesis—'the Movement recognised'—unsituated in time, political context, process of formulation, or extent of support. The author has performed an invaluable service all the same in rehabilitating a major strand in the theory and practice of radical political change in apartheid South Africa.

The two remaining books under review both deal with the destructive external impact on the Southern African sub-continent of the apartheid regime's fight for survival. Both were funded by the Swedish International Development Agency; both reflect a growing concern amongst the more progressive development agencies and intellectuals involved in the SADC region that South Africa's increasingly aggressive drive for regional domination has gained success and credibility under the tacit—sometimes explicit—protection of right-wing governments in key Western countries. The principal objective has therefore been to politicise Western perceptions of South Africa's destabilisation strategy.

BOOK REVIEWS

For that purpose these books are excellent vehicles. Both embody major efforts of research and scholarship over a period of two to three years and are impressive additions to an already strong contemporary literature on South Africa's political economy, foreign relations, and dynamics of change. Both supply a welcome corrective in viewing South Africa mainly from the perspective of its neighbouring states. Both draw not only on standard secondary sources but on a wide range of media reports, political ephemera, unpublished documents and interviews with politicians and officials.

The two books are differently constructed: Destructive Engagement is a collection of ten essays, Beggar your Neighbours a single-authored monograph, albeit assisted by four 'contributors'. In the latter there is accordingly a greater consistency in the deployment of evidence, mode of analysis, and style of presentation; but the former has also clearly benefited from a strong editorial hand. Beggar your Neighbours exhibits a welcome avoidance of self-righteous rhetoric and political jargon in favour of a commitment to communicate effectively to non-specialists, the uninformed, and the undecided. Such restraint is, however, not always so evident in Destructive Engagement, where the frequent use of a pejorative term such as 'bandit' (for 'insurgent', but also 'armed criminal') clouds the analysis.

The central concern of both books is South African destabilisation of its neighbouring states. Destructive Engagement opens with an eloquent and moving foreword by ex-President Julius Nyerere which could equally set the one for both books. It should be made required reading for all Western policy-makers on Southern Africa, from desk officer to Prime Minister and President. Three of the ten chapters in Destructive Engagement are, however, focused on South Africa itself and give hardly any consideration to the regional context at all. Why they should be included in a book about regional destabilisation is far from clear. Two chapters (6 and 7) by Abdul Minty, provide a thorough but pedestrian overview of South Africa's military and nuclear capabilities. It is difficult to take seriously the author's apparent acceptance of fancifully alarmist SADF warnings of a deteriorating military balance with the Frontline States (p 200). The third (chapter 8), by Vella Pillay, develops a technically skilled but somewhat forced case that 'there exists no hope for the apartheid economy' (p 222), arguing that the current economic crisis should be seen as structural and organic rather than cyclical and transient.

The other two general chapters are centrally concerned with the politics and economics of destabilisation. William Minter's fine review of US policy towards South Africa under Reagan (chapter 10) is a sophisticated attempt to integrate US, South African and regional factors into a narrative assessment of the evolution of 'constructive engagement', stressing the broad continuities of US policy on southern Africa, notably the Cold War consensus on confronting 'communism' worldwide. The success of the Free South Africa Movement and President Reagan in politicising respectively the anti-apartheid campaign and aid to right-wing 'contras' has contributed largely to the extraordinary contradiction in Congress between overriding the President on sanctions and endorsing his military aid for South African regional destabilisation.

Green and Thompson's study of the struggle between South Africa for regional hegemony and SADCC for economic liberation (chapter 9) is perhaps the core essay in this collection. It is a dense, complex, sophisticated analysis of the range of economic, political and military factors at play, not always fully integrated but rich in insights, authoritatively founded on the authors' accumulated research and policy-making experience in the region, and fired by their active commitment to the fundamental goals of SADCC, whose very existence, let alone success, they see as a prime target of the South African onslaught. Perhaps a greater political unity of purpose is attributed to SADCC members than is always justified by the diversity of national interests and policies. Nor do the assessments of particular costs and benefits always add up to the marginally upbeat general conclusions. But the impact of destabilisation, the risks of sanctions, and the unrealised potential of SADCC are on the whole evaluated with perceptive realism. As the authors argue, the destructive effects of South African destabilisation, both economic and military, are so horrendous that the extra penalties of more radical disengagement from South Africa's clutches are likely to be compensated in the long run by the gains of economic liberation.

With this interpretation and commitment, Joseph Hanlon is in broad agreement. Partly because they are specifically geared to the regional context, his opening sections (chapters 1-9), provide the most comprehensive integrated account to date of the origins and evolution of South Africa's drive for regional hegemony: from the conception of the 'total strategy', through the initial phase of destabilisation (1982-83) to the high water mark of Nkomati and the subsequent collapse, confusion and escalating militarism. This is contemporary political history of high quality, the narrative approach orchestrating a vast array of evidence into an illuminating and often compelling explanation of complex sequences of events and policies that are all too frequently befogged by the news management of the apartheid regime and its protectors. Economic factors are fully integrated into the analysis and the assessment of the South African Customs Union is particularly useful.

Although ostensibly covering much of the same ground, there are sufficient differences in emphasis, theme, and, to a certain extent interpretation as to establish a useful complementarity between the two sets of country chapters. Beggar your Neighbours is far stronger and more detailed on economic aspects, and largely for this reason presents a more satisfactory analytical synthesis of structural and contingent factors. Destructive Engagement, on the other hand, is concerned primarily with the political and military dimensions of destabilisation, especially the South African use of surrogates, on which its level of detailed information and use of inside information from privileged intelligence and political sources is in several instances (notably the MNR and Super-ZAPU) more comprehensive.

There is nonetheless a certain variability in the quality of the country sections. Hanlon's chapter on Mozambique is disappointingly thin on the post-Nkomati period, especially in view of the author's intimate knowledge of the country. In Destructive Engagement, the chapter on Namibia is depressingly superficial and in places simplistically polemical in its political analysis, although it provides a useful summary of the sequence of international diplomacy and a timely warning of the extent of South Africa's preparations for post-independence domination and destabilisation. Regional and ethnic factors are studiously ignored; so too is some of the best recent literature, including—in a text co-authored by an official of its Department of Information and Publicity—SWAPO's own published history of the liberation struggle. In Beggar your Neighbours, too, literature on Namibia and proper consideration on Namibia as an independent factor in South African regional strategy are noticeably absent and seriously weaken the chapter on Angola.

Strongest in both books are the chapters on Zimbabwe, on which Hanlon/Stoneman's economic analysis is a major contribution in its own right. Here the competition between the two in political explanation is at its most intense and much can be learnt from a detailed comparison of the two accounts, which often address the same issues and episodes with much the same source material. A slight edge in clarity goes to Beggar your Neighbours, in part because an implicit but noticeable hostility towards ZAPU on the part of Johnson and Martin tends to obscure the necessary differentiation of indigenous from South African-inspired dissidence.

A more serious deficiency is the failure in both books to relate political action systematically to the domestic social structure, elite economic interests, and modes of political mobilisation and control. On occasion the narrative of political events has the appearance of surface froth, leaving the deeper historical roots and structural forces, although not entirely ignored, somewhat obscure. This weakness is most evident in treatment of South African manipulation of internal political divisions in the Frontline States and of the cultural and political bases of South African-sponsored dissidence.

Typographical errors are relatively few, as are editorial slips—Harold Macmillan, he of 'wind of change' fame, was most definitely the British Prime Minister in 1960 and not 'foreign secretary' (Destructive Engagement p xv). There are occasional misjudgements too: Hanlon's description of P W Botha's 1984 tour of Europe as 'triumphal' (p 148) would be disputed both by the tens of thousands of anti-apartheid activists who mobilised to harry him all the way and by the Mozambican government following its diplomatic offensive during 1983 (p 143). A technical irritation in so long and factually dense book as Destructive Engagement is the complete absence of an index. Although there is useful cross-referencing within the text of Beggar your Neighbours and an index, the latter is inadequate—a thorough upgrade would considerably enhance the book's accessibility for reference.

Although the flood of publications on Southern Africa has been criticised for opportunism and superficiality, analyses of high quality, acute perception and political commitment to the cause of liberation from the destructive evil of apartheid are mixed in the tide. All four of the books reviewed here are worthy contributions to the genre.

The Namibian cause

Randolph Vigne

Namibia: the Violent Heritage

David Soggot

London: Rex Collings. 1986. 333pp. £17.50

Namibia: Perspectives for National Reconstruction and Development

United Nations Institute for Namibia

Lusaka: United Nations Institute for Namibia. 1986. 1008pp. np

A Future for Namibia: 1 Namibia in the 1980s [1981, 2nd edition 1986. 83pp. £3.50pb], 2 Agriculture: Transforming a Wasted Land. Richard Moorsom [1982. 114pp. £2.95pb], 3 Mines and Independence [1983. 155pp. £2.95pb], 4 Education, Repression and Liberation: Namibia. Justin Ellis [1984. 94pp. £2.95pb], 5 Exploiting the Sea. Richard Moorsom.

London: Catholic Institute for International Relations. 1984. 123pp. £2.95pb

Namibia: Reclaiming the People's Health

Edited by Tim Lobstein and Namibia Support Committee Health Collective

London: AON Publications. 1984. 151pp. £12.95, £3.95pb

Namibia: A Violation of Trust

Susanna Smith

London: Oxfam. 1986. 96pp. £3.00pb

Since 1984 and the beginning of a new phase in the South African revolution

BOOK REVIEWS

Namibia has disappeared from the headlines. The world media follow the national State of Emergency in South Africa in detail, despite tight censorship. Reports tell of mass detention—8,000? 12,000? An occasional priest or professional man manages to tell his story of torture and brutality in detention. The Botha regime fails to keep secret the existence of camps where detainees are held for 're-indoctrination'. Western politicians—at least since the total failure of the mission of the British Foreign Secretary, Sir Geoffrey Howe, in July 1986—have realised the futility of trying to talk the Afrikaner nationalist Government in South Africa into moving towards a new democracy based on 'one person—one vote—one value'.

Now substitute 'Namibia' for 'South Africa', change figures pro rata for Namibia's 1.5 million compared to South Africa's 28 million, omit the reference to the world media interest and you have the Namibian scenario of the past ten years. With the world's eyes on South Africa, and its independent neighbours understandably concerned more about their own security than Namibian freedom, the politicians can leave Namibia to the UN Council for Namibia and to the UN General Assembly, where lost causes never die. In this twenty-first year of SWAPO's armed struggle against South African occupation, the once burning issue of Germany's last pre-1914 colony and South Africa's refusal to free its people, wards of the international community, is scarcely an ember in the world's cabinet rooms.

If this is the time to prepare for the revival of the Namibian cause, we are well placed as never before to learn what is at stake. A neophyte could do little better than read his way through the books listed above to acquire, if not expertise, at least a working knowledge of South Africa's rule of violence (from Soggot), views of social and economic conditions today and in the future (the CIIR series) and a comprehensive study of the future and its needs (the UNIN Perspectives) with a view of the physical effects of their treatment on Namibians (the health study) and an apportionment of current responsibility for the whole grim tragedy of Namibia (the Oxfam report).

David Soggot explains his connection with the 'political and insurgent battles in Namibia (which) have in recent years come to be fought with increasing ferocity':

Since the early seventies my work as a defence lawyer has brought me into close collaboration with many of the main actors in the conflict. This contact together with political trials which were often focal points of political and social confrontation were for me a discovery.

His narration of these events from the early 1970s onwards forms the great bulk of a very substantial book. It is brought to life by the noticeable effect of this 'discovery' on him. We learn that he taught political science at the University of the Witwatersrand before being called to the Johannesburg bar. Yet, though a South African radical, he had to 'discover' the political and social situation in the neighbouring territory his country had ruled since long before his birth and had, in his boyhood, tried to annex as a fifth province. Such is the obscurity of the great landmass of Namibia and its people, which has for more than a hundred years permitted foreign invaders—the Germans and then the South Africans—to oppress its people and plunder their natural wealth. And it is this obscurity which his book so forcefully seeks to dispel, if its publishers and the Namibia 'lobby' in New York and London will only let it.

He begins with a concise account of the German invasion with its horrific consequences of genocide and brutalisation, followed by the years of the League of Nations mandate so cynically misapplied by South Africa. In 1935, fifteen years after His Britannic Majesty had had the mandate conferred upon him (to be administered by South Africa on his behalf) the total sum spent by South Africa on the education of the bulk of the black population, living in Ovamboland, was £200! And yet in 1946, we learn, it was their anxiety to hold on to the protection of the British Crown, however remote, that persuaded the chiefs on Ovamboland to vote in favour of the continuance of South African rule. The irrecoverable loss of this protection when South Africa became a Republic in 1961 was but one of the acts of betrayal which have led to the present abdication from any responsibility at all for Namibia's continuing tragedy by the present British Government.

The early growth of an independence movement, in reaction to the hated contract labour system in the main, is well described. But the book pays tribute to the vital role of the churches too, particularly in confronting the apartheid regime of Prime Minister Vorster and in the leadership of its black Lutheran and white Anglican bishops, followed by the ordinary clergy, many of them, if black, cruelly victimised by South African police and military gaolers and torturers. Again there is a paradox, for we are given an unsparing account of the shameful role of many Lutheran missionaries in support of colonial rule at its harshest and most unjust. It is right that the work of such churchmen as Auala, Gowaseb, Dumeni, Mize, Winter, Wood, Witbooi and Karuaera should be acknowledged as well as the sins of their predecessors.

That work is interwoven with the author's own labours in the many legal actions which led him from that first discovery to a deep knowledge and understanding of the Namibian freedom struggle. He describes with clarity, modesty and restraint these dozen or so cases (and refers to many more in which he played no direct part). He intersperses these chapters with his account of the interminable negotiations that have led to and followed UN Security Council Resolution 435 of 1977, the 'UN plan' for South African withdrawal, and this takes up most of his concluding chapters. His analysis of the 'political machinations' which have so far brought forth two 'internal settlement' regimes is more illuminating as he was closer to the events described. The lesson is equally clear: SWAPO will always, though often publicly unseen and unheard, triumph over South Africa's synthetic constitution-making and the creation of governments with no conceivable base in the people (except for the right-wing Afrikaner Nationalist elements, which bedevil Pretoria's plans almost as much as would SWAPO's participation, from the opposite angle).

The capacity of SWAPO to endure was the discovery that seems most to have impressed Soggot. We see its revival after the exile of its early leaders, and again in the great days of the SWAPO Youth League in the early 1970s (and, it seems from recent reports, during the present rule of the Interim Government of National Unity, the current synthetic constitutional apparatus). Waves of police activity would remove political leaders from the scene and:

The newspapers would announce the death of SWAPO only to witness—with unpublished disappointment—its miraculous resuscitation. What the papers and editors did not realise was that the strength of SWAPO lay not in any bureaucratic cohesion nor in the charisma of prevailing leaders; it was rather that the grievances and grief, and a nation's aspiration, were mirrored in the language and action of SWAPO's leadership.

The grievances and grief are the fabric of all the cases Soggot fought in the Namibian courts. A rough count would suggest that of twelve legal actions two were withdrawn for lack of funds, ten were lost (three of them later won in the Appeal Court in South Africa), one dropped by the prosecution and only the Nkandi case won outright in the Namibian courts. There can be no question but that these results show up not the weakness of the plea nor certainly the abilities of the defence team. In virtually every case it is the judges' inhumanity, prejudice and moral bankruptcy that are exposed for all to see.

It can be accepted that there is still some residue of jurisprudential rectitude in the South African courts, though they are not, after thirty-eight years of Afrikaner Nationalist rule, the unchallengeable fortresses of the law that South Africa's apologists still claim them to be. Good men are passed over and men who can be relied upon to do the Government's dirty work are appointed to the bench. Even good men on the bench are silent in the face of the most glaring evidence of police brutality and malpractice, and pass draconian sentences because they are mandatory, without comment on the legislation that has made them so. But in the South African courts right occasionally still triumphs, as has recently been seen in relation to the State of Emergency now in force.

Namibia is like a grotesque distorting mirror set against the already ugly face of South Africa. On all sides there are aspects of apartheid which mar the lives of black South Africans. For black Namibians these aspects are the same ones—social status, labour conditions, health, education, living conditions, political life—but infinitely worse. The legal system as revealed here is another of these aspects. With commendable moderation and no trace of animus Soggot repeats to us the comments of judges or reflects on their verdicts and the reader cannot but be horrified. The discovery here is that the Namibian distorting mirror reflects not some disfigurement scarring a subject people through a hundred years of colonialism, but the disease of colonialism itself. Apartheid in South Africa is evil enough but there is opposition to it from among the white community, expressed by their newspapers, and many of its worst excesses are checked or well hidden. In Namibia the only comparably privileged opposition comes from white churchmen who are treated as political confederates of the black Namibians and, as is the one newspaper, The Namibian, which exposes the wickedness of South African rule, the victims of firebombs, death threats and constant vilification.

The Court was not always an elevated forum in which white prosecutors and white defence performed before white judges and assessors while bewildered black men and women humbly awaited their fate. Among many other key processes of the 1970s recorded here was the rise of the SWAPO Youth League, followed inevitably by the merciless attacks of the Security Police. In 1973 the chairman, Jeremiah Ekandjo, his vice-chairman and a third member were put on trial under the Sabotage Act, charged with inciting Namibians to take up arms. Their attitude to the Court is best exemplified by Ekandjo's characterisation of it, when addressing the judge in mitigation of sentence at the end of the trial, as the 'temple of devils where Namibians are being crucified'. At an earlier stage he asked the judge: 'Has this court perhaps obtained permission from the UN to try us?' and another time lectured Judge President Badenhorst on the illegality of South Africa's presence in Namibia, as decided by the World Court the previous year: the UN alone was responsible for them. Vice-Chairman Ngidina summed up:

We have sabotaged nothing, We are oppressed. The people in Namibia who do sabotage are the whites of South Africa. This Court is here illegally and terrorises us in our own land. Only the United Nations may hear us. We do not recognise the court and we will be back.

They were sentenced to eight years imprisonment. Six months later their comrades Taaipopi, the new SYL chairman, and Kashea were found guilty of having a hand in a letter calling for help from the SWAPO President in exile, Sam Nujoma—a letter of marked sobriety and sense. For incitement to murder, public violence and arson, they were sent to Robben Island prison for two years, with three further years suspended. Leaving the Court, Taaipopi called out: 'I am off to college. There I will meet our head boy, Ja Toivo.'

The great value of Namibia: the Violent Heritage is that it exposes from the inside not only the violence and wickedness of the foreign invaders of Namibia but also the unquenchable spirit of so many of its people who have fought on for their freedom against a cruel enemy. Measured against such as these, the functionaries South Africa has recruited to masquerade as an 'internal government of national unity' seem poor stuff indeed. And it records with spirit and accuracy the weary processes of the UN and the self-appointed 'Contact Group' in their work towards South African withdrawal. If only the spirit of the SWAPO heroes Soggot defended could infuse the politicians of many nations to whom the country's fate has been entrusted.

The reprinting of Namibia in the 1980s, the first of the series of six studies called 'A Future for Namibia', is to be welcomed. From 1981 to date the Catholic Institute for International Relations in London has produced expertly written and researched surveys of agriculture, mining, education and the fishing industry in Namibia, present and future. They have a common pattern: human and material resources have been exploited and squandered: what can be done to conserve the residue and enrich the lives of the Namibians who have been thus plundered? The papers presented to the International Seminar on Health in Namibia, convened by the Namibia Support Committee and the SWAPO Department of Health and Social Welfare in 1983, Namibia: Reclaiming the People's Health, constitutes a sixth such survey. Their usefulness is to offer the wide range of non-governmental organisations, international agencies, government aid bodies around the world and, above all, to the Namibians themselves, an expert series of simply written texts which can help them to judge where their own services might best be applied.

Independent writers and researchers on Namibia are few and some of the best of them are to be found here—Richard Moorsom on agriculture and fishing, and a participant in most of the others, Professor R H Green passim, Justin Ellis on education. The health writers are less known outside their own fields, with the exception of David Werner, whose Where There is No Doctor has found its way wherever two or three volunteers are gathered together in health, education and development centres round the world. For ten years or more responsibility for the independence of Namibia has been arrogated to themselves by South Africa's five Western trading partners: the rapid success of agreement of UN Security Council Resolution 435 was won ten years ago. It is some small recompense for the unpreparedness of those governments to coerce South Africa into withdrawing its oppressive rule that such books as these are produced. It is significant, however, that the 'Future for Namibia' series come from that same defender of human rights and decency as in Namibia itself, the Christian churches.

The new edition of No. 1 in the series is published jointly by the CIRR and the British Council of Churches. It provides a helpful analysis of the events that have led to the paradoxical situation of 1986. At the same time, no vestige of official support remains for South Africa's continued illegal occupation, and no remaining credence, official or otherwise, in South Africa's good faith as a negotiator either in its withdrawal or in the ending of white supremacy in South Africa—yet no willingness has been shown by the powers whose investment underwrites South Africa's continued occupation to consider any form of coercion that will at last expel South Africa from Namibia. Is it the Christian message of hope that inspired the concluding view that 'in the vacuum caused by the US loss of interest, there is room for a new, European initiative'? In Brussels in September 1986 when the EEC finally agreed to impose some form of sanctions on South Africa, it was also agreed that Namibia was to be excluded from these measures. It will take something more than hope, however pious and well-intentioned, to restore to the West, and, in particular, to the Government of Her Britannic Majesty, the sense of duty and responsibility required for resolute action against South Africa.

These ten years of deadlock have seen also the build-up of research, training and basic education organised by the United Nations. The centre of the best work is the UN Institute for Namibia in Lusaka, established in 1976 as a training and applied research institute, which has sought, with success, 'to make available the necessary documentation required by the Liberation Movement and the future government of independent Namibia'. Their splendidly produced 1008-page summary of 'perspectives for national reconstruction and development' addresses itself on an academic and professional level to the subjects of the CIIR series, and many more: water, forestry, wildlife and tourism, energy, transport, housing, commerce, the monetary system, science and technology, the role of women in development and the legal and constitutional framework among the more specific.

In his foreword President Kaunda finds it 'gratifying that Namibians themselves under the leadership of SWAPO have determined their goals, policy objectives and priorities which have so far guided all the support activities and actions of the international community'. With independence the new government will have to 'shape a new environment and define new goals and priorities for the young nation'. The international community, however, must demonstrate its solidarity with the Namibian people in the 'reconstruction and development of a united and independent Namibia'. UNIN's Perspectives has fulfilled its task, as a first stage: the definition of those goals and priorities, as set for it by the UN General Assembly. If the Namibians of tomorrow are to enjoy a heritage different from that which David Soggot so memorably and harrowingly reveals, it will indeed be the Namibians of today who must create it. To expel the foreign power despoiling the sources of that heritage they must surely be helped by the world community. The CIIR hope for a new initiative must somehow be translated into practical action.

Susanna Smith, for the Oxfam Public Affairs Unit, subtitles her book 'an Oxfam report on international responsibility for poverty in Namibia'. Some distracting material—'basic facts', a four-page chronology, summaries of Oxfam aid to Namibians and of the terms of Resolution 435—interrupt her introduction, which climaxes thus:

The challenge facing Britain is clear. There is now an urgent need to consider new measures to secure Namibia's unconditional independence, to relieve the poverty, distress and suffering of the Namibian people [my italics].

These trenchant words should have been presented as the main thrust of the book. Would not a commercial publisher have discerned in them its main point and appeal—rather than her title, dully echoing the standard UN publication: Namibia: a Trust Betrayed, or her subtitle above, which spreads the blame thinly over the world community? Once into her main text, the theme stands out. We examine the shocking equation of abundant natural wealth with grinding human poverty. For the black 94.5 per cent that is. They take 22 per cent of the gross domestic profit—compared to 40 per cent to foreign corporations and colonial businesses (20 per cent goes in tax to South Africa and 18 per cent in salaries and allowances to the white, 5.5 per cent of the population). It is not the figures alone that shock but the author's first-hand and well illustrated account of the poverty of the victims, the inhuman price paid for dividend cheques around the world and revenue for South Africa's military machine.

Her verdict is that only by transforming the structures can the Namibians be saved from the fate she has seen them suffer. And only genuine independence can make possible that transformation. She highlights three spheres—education, health and (counterpointing Soggot) the effect of the South African military response to SWAPO's guerrillas—for which emergency development aid is needed. Her final chapter completes the theme: Susanna Smith's analysis of Britain's interlocking diplomatic and economic roles leads her to demand, speaking for Oxfam, that the British Government (1) should initiate a fresh initiative for unconditional independence, (2) should recognise 'UN Decree No. 1 for the protection of the natural resources of Namibia' (usefully reproduced in an appendix), (3) 'give consideration to . . . economic sanctions against South Africa', and (4) offer generous aid on independence.

Miss Smith's and Oxfam's ascription of responsibility to Britain is well argued. There may be less agreement over her identification of the curative measures to absolve British guilt. But neither she nor, alas, the others who have begotten this fine set of Namibian studies have set their minds to the first essential task. How do you make the citizens of a democracy such as Britain so conscious of their responsibility and guilt that the politicians (and, even more insulated from such consciousness, the bureaucrats) have to impose their will on their own businessmen and EEC partners so as to force through, wielding the powerful economic weapons they hold, that unconditional independence? Though lacking a dimension of education for political change, books like these make it none the less impossible for the British and other Western powers engaged in the exploitation revealed here, ever to ask: 'Why were we not told?'

South African publishing: more or less

Terrence Ranger

Southern Africa in the 1980s

Edited by Olajide Aluko and Timothy Shaw

London: Unwin and Hyman. 1985. 327pp. £20.00

The Roots of Crisis in Southern Africa

Ann Seidman

Trenton, New Jersey: Africa World Press for Oxfam America. 1985. 209pp.
$19.95. $8.95pb

South Africa in the 1980s: State of Emergency

Catholic Institute of International Relations

London: CIIR (3rd revised edition). 1986. 94pp. £3.25pb

Power! Black Workers, their Unions and the Struggle for Freedom in South Africa

Denis MacShane, Martin Plaut and David Ward

Nottingham, England: Spokesman. 1984. 195pp. £4.95pb

South Africa: The Peasants' Revolt

Govan Mbeki

London: International Defence and Aid Fund for Southern Africa. 1984.
160pp. £3.00pb

There are too many books about South Africa. Literally dozens have appeared in the last two years as publishers strove to command territory in the latest 'Scramble' or 'Gold Rush'. Most of these books have been shallow or repetitive or self-indulgent. Readers badly need a Consumer Guide to the literature on South Africa which would test for obsolescence, economy, reliability and so on. There are also too few books about South Africa. Some crucial topics have hardly been treated at all. Readers who want to obtain a coherent, overall picture need to know what the literature largely leaves out. The five books under review here sustain both of these generalisations.

To begin with the Consumer Guide. Books on South Africa can be classified according to their producers. There are four main production groups—academics, journalists, anti-apartheid organisations and participants in the South African struggle. The books reviewed here fit into three of these categories though they do not include an example of the journalist's wanderings with camera and tape recorder through wildest South Africa. Aluko and Shaw's collection is an example of academic production; Ann Seidman's book and the Catholic Institute for International Relations' booklet are examples of support-group briefing; Govan Mbeki, whose book on peasant revolt in the Transkei has been republished by International Defence and Aid, has served more than twenty years on Robben Island. Taken together these books offer examples of the worst of some of these styles of production and the best of others.

At their best, academic writers on South Africa can offer the results of long and careful research, tested by the scrutiny of exacting colleagues. At their worst, they offer the results of hastily assembled gatherings, cobbled together as edited collections and published with excruciating slowness. Alas, Olajide Aluko and Timothy Shaw's Southern Africa in the 1980s is an example of the worst rather than the best of academic production. Issued only last year its rust is already showing and one cannot be optimistic about its resale value. The book emerges from a conference held as long ago as 1980 and its Preface is dated March 1983. The Preface claims that despite the passage of time 'the long-term analyses proposed here remain valid.' The trouble is that long-term analyses are hard to find in a book which is very much the product of the optimistic moment at which its contributors gathered together, and which begins with a classic example of academic lack of proportion:

This collection marks another stage in the further development of (1) the liberation of the peoples of Southern Africa, and (2) the maturation of the Department of International Relations at Ife; both of which have progressed markedly in the 1980s.

The 'African perspective' proposed by this book might indeed have been very welcome when the Defence Ministers of the Organisation of African Unity have been meeting in Harare to coordinate Africa's military response to South African aggression and when African heads of state have been working out their position on sanctions. Its major argument—that South Africa has to be seen above all as part of Africa and that African developments will in the end determine what happens there—is persuasive. But in 1980, or in 1983, it was possible to take a much more optimistic African perspective than now seems sensible. In their Introduction, the editors point to the 'series of successes which the liberation movements have scored against the remaining racist regimes'; remark that 'Africa's attentions and resources are now concentrated on Namibia'; and assume that 'Namibia is free under an internationally acceptable and recognised formula before 1985.' Thereafter, they say, Africa 'will be ready for the final assault on the white-ruled redoubt—South Africa itself.' It all looks very different now, with no prospect of Namibian independence in sight and with South Africa's neighbours in turmoil as a result of her destructive interventions. The books of the moment in 1986—books like Joseph Hanlon's Beggar Your Neighbours (Catholic Institute for International Relations and James Currey, 1986) or Phyllis Johnson and David Martin's Destructive Engagement: Southern Africa at War (Zimbabwe Publishing House, 1986)—do indeed take a Southern African regional perspective, but one for which nothing in the Aluko and Shaw collection prepares us.

It is, of course, easy and often unfair sport to shoot down failed academic prognostications. But most of the contributors to this book took much too superficial and immediate a view to be able to risk longer term prediction.

Boniface Obichere, writing on Zimbabwe, tells us, for example, that the 'militant' faction of ZANU/PF, led by Edgar Tekere; the followers of Ndabingi Sithole and those of Abel Muzorewa; the 'unpredictable guerrillas of ZANLA' are 'all live political forces that must be reckoned with in the 1980s'. This is a comment so much based on a visitor's-eye view of Zimbabwe in 1980 rather than on any long-term analysis that Obichere really deserves the total collapse of his assertion, since by 1985 none of these political forces had to be reckoned with at all. Some contributors to the book—notably Kenneth Grundy and Sam Nolutshungu, whose subtle analysis runs counter to the overall thesis—show what can be achieved by digging deeper and thinking harder. But overall a Consumer Guide would have to caution against buying this expensive book, though it might be made mandatory for the bookshelves of academic Southern Africanists as a warning. (What could also be made mandatory as a model for really long-term and searching academic analysis is Robin Cohen's much cheaper and infinitely better Endgame in South Africa? published in 1986 by James Currey for UNESCO, which is being reviewed elsewhere in this journal but which I cannot resist recommending so as to restore academic morale.)

Anti-apartheid support groups have rather different audiences and objectives in mind. They publish to their particular constituency and as well as seeking to inform it about South African realities they seek to direct it towards immediate and effective action. At their best, support group publications combine forceful and perceptive analysis with committed concern. At their worst, they can be merely rhetorical or sentimental or skewed by too exclusive and partisan support for one South African movement. Ann Seidman's The Roots of Crisis in Southern Africa and the Catholic Institute's South Africa in the 1980s are admirable examples of this sort of publishing at its best. This means that both are very properly directed towards their own constituencies—in Seidman's case that of Oxfam America and in CIIR's case that of radical British Christianity. A Consumer Guide would report that each is ideally designed for its particular market.

But each has a wider interest. One of the most remarkable developments of the last two or three years has been the emergence of a really vigorous and successful anti-apartheid movement in the United States, a movement which has made South Africa an issue in American politics, has forced university and church disinvestment and produced sanctions resolutions in Congress. It is thus very well worth listening in to Oxfam America talking to its constituency. Ann Seidman's book is commended on its back cover by one Congressman and recommended to other 'policymakers and legislators'. Its very useful appendices list the main US companies and banks involved in South Africa and Namibia, give the addresses of the many American organisations concerned with Southern Africa and of the representatives of South African liberation movement offices in the United States, and offer a guide to periodicals, audio-visuals and further reading. It argues that 'analysis of the interests of US citizens should lead to an alternative policy of support for the efforts of the majority of southern Africans to achieve self-reliant development.' This argument is presented with all the lucidity that one might expect from its able and experienced author.

BOOK REVIEWS

As for the Catholic Institute's booklet I am tempted to describe it as the best buy not only of the five books under review here but of all the current crop. No doubt this is because I am a part of its constituency, being particularly interested by the role of religion in contemporary South Africa. But there are other more objective reasons. The booklet is astonishingly up to date, being a third and very comprehensively revised edition of the original 1980 publication. The most important of its sources 'have been South African Christians who, through the network of the universal Church, are able to present their perceptions of their society to a wide audience.' These Christians are committed to an incarnational theology and to the total repudiation of the legitimacy of the South African state. Very many of them have been detained under the recent emergency. They speak from the heart of the South African crisis in a way unparalleled anywhere in the world. This booklet also has its appendices, some of which give the extraordinarily radical flavour of this South African liberation theology. The booklet is not restricted to an account of radical Christianity—indeed it is a brisk, authoritative and marvellously well-informed account of the whole South African crisis. But it is informed throughout by a genuine radicalism which overturns conventional assumptions whether of right, left or centre.

When we turn to the two books by participants, we come to the question of what the literature on South Africa has largely left out. The answer is 'people', not people in the sense of individuals, many of whom feature in journalistic accounts, but people in the sense of actors and agents. Of course, an incarnational theology speaks about people as actors but there is not really space for them in the CIR booklet. Nor can necessary academic analyses of the mega-structures of exploitation and under-development find much room for workers and peasants. Social historians of South Africa are now producing fascinating work on people as actors in the past. What we need is similar work for the present. Three Labour Party or Trade Union activists, Denis MacShane, Martin Plaut and David Ward have combined to produce Power! Black Workers, Their Unions and the Struggle for Freedom in South Africa. Their book was published in 1984 but it is still the best introduction to 'the immense growth in trade unions organising black workers' in South Africa. In its way it is directed to a particular constituency just as much as is Seidman's book or the CIR pamphlet since it argues that 'workers and unions in countries outside South Africa can now play crucial roles in building solidarity with their brothers and sisters in South Africa.' It also has a long section of appendices which allow black Trade Unions and Trade Unionists to speak for themselves, together with a list of the addresses of black Unions with whom readers can get in contact. Plainly, this is a book that every Trade Union activist should buy.

But it is also a book for everyone who wants to catch the voices of black people as actors. The authors draw heavily, and with full acknowledgements from the South African Labour Bulletin, that remarkable collaboration of academics and activists. They also quote frequently from their own interviews in 'South African workplaces and townships'. The result is a book which does not lose sight of the workers while describing their organisations.

And what, finally, of Africans in the rural areas of South Africa? MacShane, Plaut and Ward tell us that 'a great deal of material is available in South Africa' about workers and unions although, until their book, little had been published outside. But all too little is known about black peasants as actors and agents even inside South Africa. There is no rural equivalent of the Labour Bulletin. We sometimes get the impression that the struggle in South Africa is carried on exclusively in 'workplaces and townships'; that it is indeed, to use the title of Julie Frederikse's new book (James Currey, 1986), A Different Kind of War—different, that is, from the rural guerrilla wars of Mozambique and Zimbabwe. Yet the recent newspaper stories on events on KwaNdebele—garbled though most of them were—were enough in themselves to show that crucial contestations are taking place outside the cities.

Govan Mbeki's South Africa. The Peasants' Revolt has been for over twenty years the classic exception to the silence and ignorance. First published in 1964, the book was nevertheless prophetic, foreseeing that the bantustans would become crucial battlefields for the struggle against apartheid. It is a marvellous demonstration of the peasant capacity for action and resistance and a humane discussion of how the limitations of peasant action might be transcended. It is good to have it re-published, though I hope that not every copy of the IDAF edition contains the frustrating blank pages of my review copy which have sent me back to the original Penguin. And yet the need to republish the book in order that the peasants should be heard is an indication in itself of the most lamentable of all the gaps in the literature on South Africa.

We need fewer books about South Africa—fewer books like Southern Africa in the 1980s. We need more books about South Africa—more books like Mbeki's, about other rural areas and brought up to date.

Militaristic apartheid

Elling Njaal Tjoenneland

Pretoria's Praetorians—Civil-Military Relations in South Africa

Philip H. Frankel

Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 1984. 215pp. £22.50hb

The Militarization of South African Politics

Kenneth W Grundy

London: I B Tauris. 1986. 133pp. £16.50hb

Brutal Force—The Apartheid War Machine

Gavin Cawthra

London: International Defence and Aid Fund for Southern Africa. 1986. 319pp. £6.00pb

The coercive instruments of the apartheid state have always played a crucial role in defending and upholding segregation and white supremacy. Traditionally, however, the maintenance of law and order and the control of the non-white population have been left to the police. The South African Defence Force (SADF) has historically been a loose and creaky organisation and has only recently—beginning in the 1960s—been transformed into a highly rationalised device for the preservation of white supremacy and the apartheid state. The 1970s witnessed a rapid and accelerating militarisation. This is evident from statistical evidence showing both a quantitative expansion and growth, and—of even greater significance—a qualitative shift in the role of the military in apartheid politics, a shift which has given SADF increased power in almost every sphere of South African life. With P W Botha as Head of Government, the military gradually became more and more involved in political decision-making and civil law enforcement. Today, the armed forces and the security establishment are at the centre of formulation, coordination and implementation of public policy. Military considerations and the aim of the defending the security of the state seems to be the guiding spirit behind the regime's tactics and strategy of countering what Pretoria perceive as a 'total onslaught'. Increasingly the development of the apartheid state has become identified with the emergence of an authoritarian military-bureaucratic regime.

Despite the crucial role of force and coercion in apartheid society, the amount of research on the South African armed forces (and other instruments of physical repression and control) has been very limited. Pretoria's Praetorians by Philip H Frankel—a political scientist at Johannesburg's Witwatersrand University—is the first critical book-length inquiry into SADF. He succeeds well in his treatment of the Praetorian march on Pretoria. The strength of Frankel's study lies in his analysis of the dynamics behind the process of militarisation. He identifies the rise of a 'garrison state' and an unfolding 'siege culture' as the product of growing international isolation since 1960, the strengthening of black nationalism, regional liberation and majority rule in the neighbouring states. Demonstrating a deep knowledge of South African social and political matters, he shows how National Party rule and apartheid have led to increasingly authoritarian state structures and to political changes which have brought forward leaders more receptive to positions favoured by the military, willing to allocate increased funds to the armed forces and to support systems providing increased political influence to SADF.

Frankel also argues that the increased political role of the military is deeply grounded in South Africa's historic experience—in particular in the 'Kommando ethic' inherited from the Anglo-Boer War with its blurred distinction between civil and military roles. This aspect, however, needs to be further explored and studied. (eg: how is the concept of a volksleer—peoples' army—to be reconciled with a professionalised, armed force?). Beyond his focus on the process of militarisation and the notion of 'total strategy' underlying the tactics and strategy of the Botha regime, Frankel also explores a number of other issues such as the links between SADF and the business community and the expanding military-industrial complex. (Unfortunately, he has very little to say about South Africa's regional policy of destabilisation where the military impact has been particularly strong.)

Kenneth W Grundy—an American political scientist and author of a major study on the non-whites in the South African armed forces—also analyses the rise of SADF, the political role of the military and the whole security establishment centred on SADF. In addition he examines some issues politically influenced by the armed forces, such as the policy towards the 'Homelands' and the neighbouring states.

The strength of this brief but admirable study lies in Grundy's analysis of changes in decision-making processes and structures since the fall of Vorster. He documents how SADF has strengthened its position and gained influence at the expense of other bodies in each of the shifts that have taken place under P W Botha. But he also points out that the military does not always get its own way, and that its influence is not uniformly powerful on all issues. There are, according to Grundy, still forces within the Cabinet and the National Party who challenge Botha's reliance on the security establishment and who to some extent manage to become a check on SADF.

While the books by Frankel and Grundy are traditional academic studies, Gavin Cawthra's contribution is a more popular introduction intended for a wider audience. The book lives up to the tradition of the International Defence and Aid Fund (IDAF) research division of publishing books packed with factual information and instructive overviews. The data brought together on SADF and the coercive instruments of the apartheid state, the various dimensions of militarisation, the pattern of military aggression and the immense implications for the societies of Southern Africa are not easily available elsewhere. Cawthra's discussion on the dynamics of militarisation and the role of SADF in public policy formulation, however, is largely derived from the works by Frankel and Grundy and does not add much new information. The reader hunting for information on arms production, names of navy vessels in operation and listing of police and military headquarters throughout the country is likely to find it in Cawthra's book.

BOOK REVIEWS

Perhaps because it does cover such a wide canvas, Cawthra's study contains several minor factual errors. It would also have benefited from a sharper analytical perspective, eg his discussion of the growth of military expenditures would have been considerably strengthened if he also had included a systematic analysis of SADF spending compared to total public expenditures and GNP. Despite this criticism the book provides a comprehensive treatment, it is the most detailed introduction available to date and it constitutes an indispensable tool for anyone seeking more information about the armed forces and the repressive apparatuses of the apartheid state.

Chester Crocker—the architect of the US policy of 'constructive engagement'—has argued that the rise of the military-bureaucratic Botha regime was a change towards a more modernising regime; one prepared to lay the foundation for peaceful and evolutionary change and elimination of apartheid. These three books make it evidently clear that the increasing power and influence of the military, and the centralisation and concentration of power over the past few years, are far from removing apartheid, and are likely to lead to increased authoritarianism, repression and intensified conflict. The analysis of these studies and additional evidence from South Africa over the last year leads one to the unavoidable conclusion that the rapid militarisation and increased influence of the SADF on state policy is likely to accelerate in the future.

These three books have opened up a previously neglected area of social and political inquiry, one of critical importance in understanding contemporary developments in Southern Africa. They deserve to be widely read by all students of the region. However, it should also be added that, despite these studies, the need for further research on the South African armed forces is still obvious. Compared to research on the military in politics elsewhere (eg Latin America and Israel) the state of our knowledge of SADF is still limited; something which is also evident in the attempts by Grundy and, particularly, Frankel to evaluate the South African military by using the expanding literature on military sociology and civil-military relations as a comparative backdrop. For instance, we know far too little about the internal dynamics of SADF and the inner springs of the security establishment. What are the implications of the fact that SADF is still largely a citizen army with only a small number of professional soldiers? To what extent does continued military build-up and the 'creeping coup' generate new cleavages and conflicts within the white community?

Biographies of the struggle

Lionel Cliffe

Nelson Mandela: The Struggle is My Life

Edited by International Defence and Aid Fund for Southern Africa

London: IDAF. 1986. 249pp. £4.50pb

Nelson Mandela

Mary Benson

London: Penguin. 1986. 268pp. £2.50pb

Hope and Suffering: Sermons and Speeches

Desmond Tutu

Glasgow: Collins. 1984. 189pp. £1.75

Walking on Thorns: The Call to Christian Obedience

Allan Boesak

Geneva: WCC Publications. 1985. 65pp. £2.25pb

Call me Woman

Ellen Kuzwayo

London: Women's Press. 1986. 266pp. £5.95pb

Side by Side: The Autobiography of Helen Joseph

Helen Joseph

London: Zed Books. 1986. 249pp. £18.95, £6.95pb

These recent books by and about prominent South Africans can be read from three different standpoints. At one level they offer absorbing and often inspiring examples of 'lives of struggle'—not only of the author or subject but of others involved in opposition to apartheid—and offer further evidence of the forms of political and social oppression in that society. They are also documents of social and political history. They offer perspectives on the nature of the apartheid system: what life has been and is like for those who reside in its shadow. They all contain descriptions of particular, inhuman aspects of apartheid society and its practices—although any originality in this regard lies not so much in any new insights into horrors that are now on the whole well-documented but in the vehemence of the denouncements and the courage needed to voice them. They have uses (some greater than others) in documenting aspects of the long history of struggle against apartheid.

A third 'reading' is suggested, however, by recent events, when the widespread resistance inside South Africa and its own contradictions have generated a deep crisis in the structure itself. It may take years before apartheid finally disappears but it is no longer premature to talk about what might replace it. If apartheid, as most of our cast of characters would to varying extents agree, is a system of exploitation as well as oppression, then it follows that the range of alternatives to this 'racial capitalism' begins with a politically and socially deracialised version of the same economic system, but extends to the possibility of a more democratic move towards socialism. The paradox of the present moment of heightened struggle is that while it calls for the widest possible unity of action to really put apartheid on the skids, the issue of the character of post-apartheid society will reveal conflicts among blacks—leaders and supporters. In this context it is tempting to glean what one can from texts like these about some of the influential activists and to divine how they see that future.

From this latter standpoint, Nelson Mandela is of course by far the most crucial figure to study. This is so because of the unparalleled position he has come to occupy in the opposition to apartheid. He is now more than just the leader of the ANC. The events of his long life in prison, his refusal to consider any conditions that would secure his release after so many years, swelled by the international campaign for his unconditional release, have made him the supreme symbol of all his colleagues imprisoned, of the thousands detained, and of the whole struggle of a people. Moreover, the ANC itself—outlawed twenty-five years ago, and somewhat marginal to events inside South Africa in the 1970s—has emerged as clearly the most vibrant and widely-backed element in the broad stream of the anti-apartheid movement. Indeed, the present political conjuncture in that country is one where the next round in the struggle hinges on the issue of his release: there is no possibility of further reform from above or of political dialogue or negotiation with any black political figures including even some bantustan leaders without his release as a prerequisite; and no end to the escalation of resistance and repression without such further steps; at the same time his release would vastly galvanise and hopefully focus that resistance.

Given that he is the most significant political figure in South Africa, curiosity about him is intense—and is heightened by the occasional glimpses into the character of the man and his political ideas that are occasioned by some visitors he is at times now permitted. The continued availability of the IDAF collection of his writings and speeches, originally published to commemorate his sixtieth birthday, is therefore very handy. The new biography is equally very timely. It sets out the main events of his political life against a background of the history of the ANC, which Mary Benson has also chronicled, and against the unfolding struggle in South Africa. This latter task has been neatly done for the last decade or so to show that Mandela's views and his circumstances have not been completely isolated from the dramatic happenings of these years.

Hers is also an intensely personal book, befitting someone who has been in close touch with the family, which brings out some of the stature of the man himself rather than the symbol he has come to represent and to which role his incarceration could confine him. The book—through force of circumstances more than any omission—is less revealing about our third level of interest. It is not surprisingly, given the present global interest in someone who is arguably the world's most famous political prisoner, first and foremost a celebration of the man and his cause, his (shared) suffering and unflinching commitment to the national struggle. Most of his own statements of the last twenty-five years have either been submissions in court cases to answer political charges against him, like the famous statement from the dock in 1964, or have been filtered through the heavy restrictions imposed on what he can communicate to the outside world. And yet there are tantalising issues that are raised by Mary Benson's account and by Mandela's own words whose further implications it would be tempting to explore. The Western visitors he has been allowed all seem to have asked him whether he is a communist. He seems to have replied essentially as he did in the 1950s and 1960s: that he is an African nationalist. But more significant than any labels would be the kind of programme for change in post-apartheid he might back. In 1964 he described the Freedom Charter as the ANC's 'most important political document', characterising it as 'by no means a blueprint for a socialist state', and distinguishing the ANC's position from that of the Communist Party as the latter saw the Charter, 'as the beginning, not the end, of its programme', and the Communist Party 'sought to emphasise class distinctions whilst the ANC seeks to harmonise them'. One itches to know what Mandela's thoughts might be today on this kind of issue, now being hotly debated within the movement. It is intriguing to speculate what his years of daily reading and studying have encompassed and how he might concretise not only the struggle for liberation and its methods (about which his views are known), but the struggle to build an alternative society.

Bishop Tutu and the Reverend Boesak are also both important symbols, but are arguably predominantly religious figures who have had a political significance. In that their views and their roles are sometimes compared to other similar figures. Such evidence that comes over from books that are more theological than socio-political in style suggests that they are more in the Martin Luther King mould than that of Bishop Muzorewa. Apart from the fact that political circumstances and alignments in South Africa would preclude anyway playing a role as embodiment of an 'internal settlement', and that Buthelezi is a more likely candidate, both men seem more honest and smarter than Muzorewa. Tutu in particular invites comparison with Luther King in his position about non-violence and in his emphasis on black liberation in terms of freedom and political rights. He does talk about the poverty of black people and declares his backing for trades unions; he is aware of the co-optation of a black middle class by recent reforms; but does not yet fully acknowledge the socio-economic structures which maintain poverty even when legal political rights are removed, which Luther King only began to recognise at the very end of his life. In a perceptive Introduction, the editor of the volume a (Catholic) father, Mothobi Mutloatse, sums up what Tutu stands for: concern about the 'broken existence of black people'; an end to the pass laws, common South African citizenship, common education system; opposition to tribalism. Many of these demands are not too far off, are urged by big business in South Africa and even some in ruling circles. But what beyond this will bring full liberation? The editor's first selection, an earlier (1976) open letter to Vorster, shows Tutu at his most piously ingratiating—reminiscent of Kaunda's nauseating, oily letters to Vorster of the early 1970s—and shows the Bishop's readiness 'even to talk to Pharoah himself', but adds the editorial comment that 'surely the Bishop (now) knows that the latter-day Pharaohs . . . will not relent until they are overtaken by the merciless hand of violence.'

Ellen Kuzwayo's and Helen Joseph's are in fact the best reads of the selection, both covering less well-chartered terrain in the story of institutionalising racism and unfolding political struggle that has characterised South Africa this century. Ellen Kuzwayo's tale is most original in what she describes of her origins in a black family of what could only be described as 'landed gentry' on a large farm, a family heritage that was lost when it was declared a 'black spot' within a white area. She is also interesting in her descriptions of her role in ANC women's work in the 1940s. Helen Joseph had been actively involved in ANC politics since that time, was a defendant in the Treason Trial in the 1950s, and from long periods as a 'banned' person has continued to make her political voice heard into her 80s. Her account is full of revealing incidents in the political story of African nationalism in South Africa.

Health issues

G U Westcott

The South African Disease: Apartheid, Health and Health Services

Cedric de Beer

Trenton, New Jersey: Africa World Press. 1986. 87pp. $19.95hb $7.95pb

Africa: the Health Issue

Carol Barker and Meredith Turshen (eds)

Sheffield, England: Review of African Political Economy. 1986. 119pp.
£2.95pb

The South African Disease is a clearly written and single-minded book showing for the non-specialist reader how the appalling burden of ill health for the majority of the South African population is rooted in social and economic conditions and ultimately in political powerlessness.

Cedric de Beer approaches this task with case studies which also contrive to tell much about South African economic history. In the first chapter, the social history of tuberculosis, he shows how a disease previously unknown among Africans became, through the conditions of mine labour and increasing levels of malnutrition in the general population, the epidemic among black people that it is today. In the second he describes the proposals for a National Health Service for South Africa in the early 1940s, highly progressive for their time; and explains their failure. A later chapter pin-points the commodity form as the convenient way in which health is depoliticised under capitalism, bereft of social or political context. He debunks recent state rhetoric in the 1977 Health Act, locating it in the current political strategy of attempting to woo and co-opt the urban black population (now perhaps morbid if not quite buried), and shows the references to 'community participation' and 'self-care' to be the cover for continuing an impoverished system of health care for blacks while whites get their needs met in the private market. The chapter on the bantustans takes as its focus the allegation of 'genocide' made by the Black Sash organisation, and a picture of the unimaginable suffering of millions of families after forced removals to overcrowded desert areas is clear focused.

The book will be accessible to a large audience among health workers who want to see major changes in the health system. Not all may respond to the didactic tone, particularly in the last chapter, and the reference to 'workers' and 'the working class' and not to 'black people' or to racism, however strong theoretical justification for this usage may be, and however well put the basic message that ill health results from oppression of whatever kind, whether race, class or gender.

In the last chapter de Beer gives his views about the development of a democratic health system in South Africa. It is extremely condensed and reflects much thought; an expanded version with examples might well be useful though one might imagine greater risks to be attached to its publication. He argues that health professionals (but sometimes 'doctors') should put their expertise at the disposal of growing democratic groupings (unions, community and womens organisations) so that they can understand their health problems better and use health issues to improve their bargaining power with the authorities; but that there is also a need for 'sympathetic' health workers within the health services, for although what they can achieve now by way of change is limited, when the revolution comes they will be indispensable. One wonders if the extraction of concessions from the state is as viable a strategy now that communities are facing survival issues more strongly under renewed emergencies. I think also that de Beer underplays the need to fantasise about a future health service for South Africa. True, ideas will be clarified in struggle, but it should be noted how much the Vietnamese learnt from previous experiments in other countries that was of value in their struggle to meet health needs during and after the war. As South Africa moves towards escalating violence on all fronts this may well be the kind of example which progressive health workers will need. Nevertheless, de Beer is to be congratulated on a clear and enlarging view of South Africa's health problems.

The Special Issue of ROAPE on health is a more specialised publication. It contains extremely worthwhile contributions, for example on health policy in Mozambique, the effect of aid and aid donors on health in Africa, on the 'Selective Primary Health Care' debate, AIDS in Africa and other topics. Although the geographical range is not as great as it might be in the main articles (Mozambique and Tanzania are favourites) one gains a perspective on the way health is affected in a time of economic crisis, drought, falling real incomes in many countries and increased pressure on social policies from international agencies.

Annie Thébaud points out in 'Aid Games' that little if any of the health improvement which occurred in many African countries between 1960 and 1982 can be attributed to health aid (often of minute proportions compared to interest on the foreign debt). Indeed Caroline Baylies, in 'The Meaning of Health in Africa' shows how limited the implementation of primary health care strategies has often been and doubts whether health services have contributed much to this improvement. She notes that improved availability of water supplies may have done. Thébaud appears to take the statistics on life expectancy at face value (Baylies does not). However she makes the interesting point that international health aid can allow discontented physicians from industrialised countries to project elsewhere an ideal of transforming medicine that cannot be put into practice in their own community.

The group of British-based socialist health workers who worked in Mozambique in the early years of independence seem to have achieved somewhat more than this, besides writing a good part of this issue of ROAPE (in which their book about that period is also reviewed). In the article 'Mozambique Health Holding the Line' we are brought up to date. Julie Cliff, Najmi Kanji and Mike Muller show how, in an economy devastated by war and a health system under severe pressure, the multiplicity of aid agencies threaten the successful national pharmaceuticals policy, enforce priorities of their own without reference to local realities and needs and require inordinate administration and hosting of visitors and consultants where skilled personnel are already scarce; and yet how priority is still being given to the Primary Health Care network.

Meredeth Turshen's and Peter Kumuzora's articles in different ways both re-emphasise the shortcomings of present approaches to promoting occupational health in an African setting. The needs of peasant producers, workers in the informal sector and rural women and child labourers are generally neglected. (A note on child labour emphasises the devastating effects premature employment can have on children.) Amandina Lihamba contrasts models of health presented in African theatre. Contemporary plays (such as those of Soyinka), like traditional performances, refer to the balance of forces in a cosmology whose disturbance brings illness. Health education plays tend to situate causation in material forces alone and isolate individual responsibility. Theatre in development brings people to an awareness of the socio-economic causes of their health problems and, says Lihamba, could play a much greater role in establishing community expression and action. It is impossible to do justice to other worthwhile contributions, but some deserve mention: Jennie Linsay's report on South Africa's population control in Namibia; Carol Barker and Meredith Turshen's exposé of the politics of Selective Primary Health Care; and their argument that the pattern of AIDS in Africa gives the lie to Western stereotypes about the disease—stereotypes which still prevent the problem being acknowledged by African governments.

South African voices

David Moore

Dispensations: The Future of South Africa as South Africans See It

Richard John Neuhaus

Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans. 1986. 317pp. n/p

Waiting: The Whites of South Africa

Vincent Crapanzano

London: Paladin. 1986. 377pp. £4.95pb

Apartheid in Crisis

Mark Uhlig

London: Penguin. 1986. 334pp. £3.95pb

BOOK REVIEWS

'Dispensation' is another one of those unique Afrikaner words, or at least its meaning has been peculiarly appropriated by South African semanticists. It combines the divine and the political to mean 'a system of revealed commands and promises regulating human affairs'¹ and thus the politicians in South Africa dispense their milestones of reform: those who are divinely ordained 'grant dispensation' to their subjects.

The vast majority of South Africans are hoping to dispense with apartheid, but in much more fundamental ways than their temporary masters. One would hope that of the scores of books being produced about the crisis in South Africa many would lay the groundwork for a 'dispensation' allowing most South Africans a future transcending the now clearly formed bounds of neo-apartheid. Unfortunately, of all the words and pages in the three books under review, only a few come close to the heart of this matter. That is, there is no analysis that assiduously calculates the balance of forces creating the present interregnum in South Africa. Thus, if one relied on the material at hand, one would be hard put to imagine a way out of the crisis that would go beyond the pitfalls that have plagued the rest of Africa—that would overcome neo-colonialism.

It is, of course, something akin to a neo-colonial solution that is desired by the most 'progressive' elements of international and South African capital. These books include only a few of these dispensations, too. Of those few, however, one stands out with startling clarity. It is encapsulated in the words of Pretoria's Denis Worrall, in response to Neuhaus's persistent questioning about the true nature of 'reform'. 'Listen . . . there are some things we cannot say. You've read Huntington. That's it. That's the Scripture.' (Neuhaus, p 296).

It is revealing that Huntington is a guiding light behind what John Saul has called the 'formative action'² of the South African State's attempts at a new dispensation. Most students of Third World politics are familiar with Huntington's work, and hopefully a majority reject his conservative—nay, reactionary—stance.³ Huntington, who believes that the untutored masses—be they hungry in the South or well-fed in the West—deserve very little say in the affairs governing their lives,⁴ has turned his attention to advising the governors of South Africa on how best to construct a 'consociational oligarchy'. It should not be surprising that a man who thinks democracy makes the world ungovernable has donated his skills to a regime most compatible with his views. It is a bit more shocking to see an apparently religious and seemingly progressive man spend nearly ten pages replicating Huntington's advice,⁵ judging it as 'approximating our democratic ideal of justice', (Neuhaus, p 306) and giving qualified assurances that this is indeed the path being followed by Botha's 'modernisers'.

¹ That this definition comes from an American dictionary, Webster's Seventh New Collegiate Dictionary, certainly indicates that dispensation is not an Afrikaans word. However, none other than that Calvinist state would use it in such a way.

² John S Saul, 'South Africa: the crisis deepens', Monthly Review, 37(1) April 1986, p 7. See also John S Saul and Stephen Gelb, The Crisis in South Africa: Class Defense, Class Revolution, second edition, New York and London: Monthly Review Press and Zed Books, 1986. See also Saul's 'South Africa: the question of strategy', New Left Review (160) November–December 1986, pp 3–23, for a precise posing of the questions needed to be asked if the future of South Africa is going to be substantially beyond apartheid.

³ Colin Leys, 'Samuel Huntington and the end of classical modernization theory,' Introduction to the Sociology of Developing Societies, Hamza Alavi and Teodor Shanin (ed), New York and London: Monthly Review Press, 1982, pp 332–49. Also see the classic, Donald Cruise O'Brien, 'Modernization, order, and the erosion of a democratic ideal', Journal of Development Studies (7) 1971, pp 141–60.

Neuhaus's remarkable affinity with the views of those he apparently started out criticising seems less of a volte-face on second glance. Caution signs are sprinkled throughout. How could he claim that South Africa's military leaders are 'thought to be a liberalising influence?' (Neuhaus, p 281). Has he not heard of their role in a 'total strategy' which has probably led to the murder of Samora Machel?⁶ Can a truly objective analyst state that the ANC is the 'vehicle' for those persuaded by quotes in Marx (p 268), go on to précis its history solely in terms of its dominance by the South African Communist Party, and proceed to pose 'severe problems' for Western liberals who would like to support change in South Africa, but 'who cannot endorse Marxism-Leninism and who have learned from past experience the dangers of viewing incipient totalitarians as gentle agrarian reformers'? (p 275). How can anyone the least bit informed about the sub-continent ignore Inkatha's many terrors⁷ and portray Gatsha Buthelezi as 'thoughtful and humane'? (p 258). The list goes on: it is implied that Beyers Naude has been 'used by the communists' (pp 106-22), divestment and sanctions are denigrated, and the views of trade unionist David Lewis are subtly distorted so that the working class can be presented as an ally of multinational capital.⁸

All in all, Neuhaus's attempt appears too much a product of 'constructive engagement'—albeit in its verligte form—to be taken seriously, although the various conversations he records do reveal quite a bit about some important South Africans, and his excursions into religion provide some food for theological thought.

⁴ Ernesto Laclau and Chantal Mouffe, Hegemony and Socialist Strategy, London: Verso, 1985, p 165.

⁵ The original is S P Huntington, 'Reform and stability in a modernizing multi-ethnic society,' Politikon 8(2) December 1981, pp 8-26.

⁶ Victoria Brittain and Paul Fauvet, 'Beacon of death', The Guardian (London) 13 November, 1986, p 21.

⁷ Kwazulu residents, 'Terror in the townships', The Guardian, 19 September 1986, p 21. John Brewer, 'The modern Janus: Inkatha's role in black liberation', The Societies of Southern Africa in the 19th and 20th Centuries, Volume 12, Collected Seminar Papers, No 28, London: Institute of Commonwealth Studies, 1981.

⁸ See David Lewis, 'Capital, the trade unions and the national liberation struggle', Monthly Review 37(11) April 1986, pp 39-50.

It would be impossible to label all the disparate parts of the Uhlig collection as proponents of an enlightened constructive engagement—a sample of Andries Treurnicht's verkrampte ideology burst any unity there, while Mothobi Mutloatse and Cyril Ramaphosa indicate promising departures from the many instant orthodoxies ushered in by talk of reform—but the vast majority could just about fit in under a liberalised Huntingtonian umbrella, by default. Their pulling apart of what should be the integrated realms of economics, politics and ideology, combined with a general lack of historical perspective, leads to a paucity of analysis that could help us start thinking of a way forward. Thus one is left with a vacuum in the calculation of change, and Huntington's isolated elite is again let in by the back door. Too many of the articles end up putting the ball in the white's court, no doubt actually believing they can do something with it.

Perhaps the majority of the works Uhlig has put between his covers reflect the most forward thinking elements of American, or in a broader sense Western, liberalism. Certainly, when over two hundred and fifty of the 334 pages are written by white liberals, the book can hardly be claimed to be representative of 'voices in South Africa today', as the cover states. (The cover also says that Chester Crocker will make his views known inside, but alas he does not appear. Maybe he is in a spot of trouble for admitting, backhandedly, that the ANC could be called 'freedom fighters'.) One reads Nadine Gordimer's anguished letter, quite consciously crafted to reach the New York Times Magazine readers (she is also featured in Neuhaus (p 122) and Crapanzano (p 29)). It is also notable that Uhlig's own pieces were written for the ultimate medium of the North Atlantic left-liberal intelligentsia, the New York Review of Books, and that many of the substantial pieces are taken from Foreign Affairs—perhaps a liberal journal, certainly not a leftist one—held in high esteem by many Washington power brokers. Archbishop Desmond Tutu sounds just like John Dewey when he claims that 'we have reached this sad state of affairs because of our appalling education system' (Uhlig, p 18)—not because of its gross inequalities, but because of its production of acquiescence: it is remarkable how the peculiarly American notion that liberal education can cure all social ills has made its way around the world. The Archbishop later condemns apartheid for altering the 'free market system' (Uhlig, p 21): Neuhaus notices this economic critique and asks if he is calling for South Africa to practise the free enterprise system he has at other times said he loathes (Neuhaus, p 133). The response was first a chuckle, then 'maybe . . . maybe not'.

Friedman's piece on labour is fraught with the pitfalls of workers' struggles being eclipsed by the political one, but his analysis seems compromised by an either/or dichotomy that splits the unity of economics and politics. Thus it is endangered with being placed in the canons of a certain liberalism, too. With the majority of the unions joining the United Democratic Front (UDF) or the Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU), he says that 'the goal of independent worker politics appeared to have receded' (Uhlig, p 187), rather than allowing for the possibility that such a move could further expand a 'consciousness' that is already, as he notes, well beyond economism, and thus significantly alter the path of nationalist politics. The dialectic that is missing here can lead to a sterile 'workerism' which asserts that class politics should not be compromised by the petty bourgeois traps of nationalism.⁹ It can also end up with a benign sort of corporatism which would allow the unions to join in a version of tripartite consociationism. Friedman does not come down clearly on either of these sides, but he implies that it is easier for unions to deal with capital—and maybe even with South African whites—than with black nationalists. Thus he finishes with a very contradictory sentence: 'The unions' growth . . . provides the white establishment with the prospect of a relatively peaceful transition to an egalitarian society' (Uhlig, p 189). One rather doubts if the whites want egalitarianism; the chances would seem better to go with a 'few high profile leaders' in the 'black elite' (pp 184–5) rather than with a white elite allied with international capital.¹⁰ Happily, Karis's comprehensive analysis of black politics suggests that the COSATU and UDF unions will not forget their base: rather, the debate on 'race and class' is developing further as a result of this historic coming together.

The other major contributions in Apartheid in Crisis—interspersed by the abbreviated but still very revealing voices of P W Botha, Frederick van Zyl Slabbert, Nelson Mandela, Gatsha Buthelezi and a terror-stricken seventeen year-old township woman—are good examples of the netherworld between journalism and academia that inevitably has to catalogue the ever-changing currents of contemporary South Africa: they are strong on detail and middle-range analysis, weaker on the deeper structures behind the scenes. They are all informative, critical, and most are unequivocally progressive. Uhlig's two pieces and Karis's make good cases for the ANC. Martin and Johnson unravel many of the mysteries of destabilisation as only those excellent front-line based writers-cum-publishers can. Vale and Unger lay out a prescription for American 'constructive confrontation' which shows just how illiberal the present regime is—and perhaps indicates a bit of wishful thinking, even though there is nothing in their suggestive list of pressure measures that would challenge the interests of capital. Its optimism is contrasted not only by Martin and Johnson's chronicle of destruction, but Michael Gavin's sober economic survey. South Africa is not going to fall with sanctions, nor of its own economic accord. It takes this essentially conservative economist to quell a host of liberal hopes and say, point-blank, that real change will only come about after 'civil unrest . . . intensifies' (p 248). Incidentally, that is no doubt why sanctions should be supported—they will not of their own accord bring down the regime, but they will weaken it and thus shorten what Gavin has called the period of civil unrest.

⁹ For more on this debate see Robert Davies and Dan O'Meara, 'The workers' struggle in South Africa—a comment', Review of African Political Economy (30) September 1984, pp 109–16.

¹⁰ David Lewis, op. cit., pp 44, 48. Also see 'Focus on labour', Southern Africa Report (Toronto) 2(1) June 1986, on the issue of foreign solidarity and the labour movement(s) in South Africa.

Vincent Crapanzano's whites are waiting for that day of revolution, even though they cannot quite bring themselves to say it. His records of the discourse in a small village near Cape Town are intriguing, if irritating. At first, one feels like hammering some sense into the heads of the people who utter such vapid and repetitive clichés. Eventually the circularity draws in, and—as with Crapanzano, perhaps—one gets lulled into a sinking mesmerisation. Chapter headings and the odd bits of Sartrean analysis—sometimes penetrating, other times maudlin—snap the reader out of the wasteland.

Perhaps Crapanzano's schemata are too grandiose for his subjects: his theories about the dead weight of 'waiting' for an end that cannot be named could just as well apply to all of us, living as we do under the nuclear dispensation. And even the 'decent' and nearly liberals—and English or Jewish—rural-dwellers in this social anthropologist's case-study cannot fail to display the peculiarly South African affliction that dominates their consciousness as much as they exploit black—or 'coloured'—labour: Waiting certainly does demonstrate the all-embracing hold that a deeply entrenched racist ideology has on its perpetrator/victims. And it is interesting to note that the dominance of this ideology extends to perceptions of and about the various white ethnic groups in South Africa: indeed Afrikaners and English seem to denigrate each other much more than their more obvious protagonists. This indicates the deeply structured mental walls these people have erected around the real problems of the country. They will have a real shock when the day of reckoning—and reconciliation—comes.

When Professor Crapanzano does make his various phenomenological explanations of these distorted articulations, one is a little disappointed that his lack of a material grounding forces him to rely on the Afrikaner's own interpretations of history, or idealist liberal variations of it, to score his own subtle critique. Thus the circularity of their discourse is reflected in his. It is never deconstructed. Recent work on ideology, hegemony and discourse could have been used to break out of this problem. Some of it has been applied in Dan O'Meara's Volkskapitalism,¹¹ countering the ethnic mobilisation theories of Adams and Moodie. But in general the book is an enlightening, albeit saddening, one.

All three books are sobering—even the optimistic liberal ones, because they lack grounding—illustrating as they do Gramsci's by now oft repeated observation that in the long interregnum between the dying of the old and the birth of the new, the symptoms are morbid. But Gramsci also wrote about pessimism of the intelligence and optimism of the will. There are other works, based on a materialist understanding of South Africa, which leave room for an intelligent optimism.¹²

¹¹ Dan O'Meara, Volkskapitalism: Class, Capital and Ideology in the Development of Afrikaner Nationalism 1934–1948, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1983.

¹² For an example of a work relying on talks with a lot more than whites in a small village, and using the analytical techniques of the 'new school' of materialist South African historiography, see James North, Freedom Rising: War and Peace in Southern Africa, New York and London: Macmillan, 1985.

Images of apartheid

Tsehai Berhani-Selassie

South Africa: The Cordoned Heart

20 South African Photographers

Cape Town: The Gallery Press. 1986. 186pp. £14.95pb

Working Women in South Africa

Lesley Lawson

London: Pluto Press, 1986. 144pp. £5.95pb

Factory and Family: The Divided Lives of South Africa's Women Workers/ Impilo Yabasebenzi Emzansi Afrika

992 Women Workers and the Institute for Black Research

Durban: Institute for Black Research. 1984. 105pp. n/p

These three photo journals are powerful documentations of the brutal realities of life in South Africa for the poor, the migrant labour force and the women factory workers. Their compilation is certainly no mean achievement under current press restrictions.

